Musicians & Composers

of the 20th Century

Musicians & Composers

of the 20th Century

Musicians & Composers
of the 20th Century

Editor
Alfred W. Cramer
Pomona College

Salem Press
Pasadena, California Hackensack, New Jersey

Editorial Director: Christina J. Moose
Developmental Editor: Jeffry Jensen
Acquisitions Editor: Mark Rehn
Manuscript Editor: Constance Pollock
Research Assistant: Keli Trousdale

Photograph Editor: Cynthia Breslin Beres
Production Editor: Andrea E. Miller
Page Design: James Hutson
Layout: William Zimmerman

Cover photo: Leonard Bernstein (Erich Auerbach/Getty Images)

Copyright © 2009, by Salem Press

All rights in this book are reserved. No part of this work may be used or reproduced in any manner whatsoever or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopy, recording, or any information storage and retrieval system, without written permission from the copyright owner except in the case of brief quotations embodied in critical articles and reviews or in the copying of images deemed to be freely licensed or in the public domain. For information address the publisher, Salem Press, P.O. Box 50062, Pasadena, California 91115.

∞ The paper used in these volumes conforms to the American National Standard for Permanence of Paper for Printed Library Materials, Z39.48-1992 (R1997).

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Musicians and composers of the 20th century / editor Alfred W. Cramer.
p. cm.
Includes bibliographical references and index.
ISBN 978-1-58765-512-8 (set : alk. paper) — ISBN 978-1-58765-513-5 (vol. 1 : alk. paper) — ISBN 978-1-58765-514-2 (vol. 2 : alk. paper) — ISBN 978-1-58765-515-9 (vol. 3 : alk. paper) — ISBN 978-1-58765-516-6 (vol. 4 : alk. paper) — ISBN 978-1-58765-517-3 (vol. 5 : alk. paper) —
1. Music—20th century—Bio-bibliography—Dictionaries. I. Cramer, Alfred William.
ML105.M883 2009
780.92'2—dc22
[B]

2009002980

First Printing

PRINTED IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

Contents

Publisher's Note xiii
Editor's Introduction xv
Contributors xix
Key to Pronunciation xxv

Will Ackerman 1
Roy Acuff 2
John Adams 5
Cannonball Adderley 8
Toshiko Akiyoshi 11
Herb Alpert 13
Trey Anastasio 16
Laurie Anderson 18
Leroy Anderson 21
Marian Anderson 24
Dame Julie Andrews 28
Martha Argerich 32
Harold Arlen 34
Louis Armstrong 38
Eddy Arnold 42
Vladimir Ashkenazy 44
Chet Atkins 46
Hoyt Axton 49
Charles Aznavour 51

Milton Babbitt 54
Babyface 57
Burt Bacharach 60
Erykah Badu 63
Joan Baez 65
Samuel Barber 67
Daniel Barenboim 70
Ray Barretto 72
Béla Bartók 74
Count Basie 79
Amy Beach 83
Sidney Bechet 85
Beck 89
Jeff Beck 91
Sir Thomas Beecham 93
Bix Beiderbecke 96
Harry Belafonte 98
Tony Bennett 101
Alban Berg 104
Alan Bergman 107
Luciano Berio 109
Irving Berlin 114
Elmer Bernstein 118
Leonard Bernstein 120
Chuck Berry 123
Jussi Björling 126
Otis Blackwell 128
Rubén Blades 130
Eubie Blake 134
Art Blakey 136
Mary J. Blige 139
Kurtis Blow 141
Bono 142
Nadia Boulanger 145
Pierre Boulez 147
David Bowie 151
Jacques Brel 153
Benjamin Britten 155
Garth Brooks 159
Clifford Brown 161
James Brown 163
Roy Brown 166
Jackson Browne 168
Dave Brubeck 170
Jimmy Buffett 173
Johnny Burke 175
Solomon Burke 178
Gary Burton 180
Adolf Busch 182
Ferruccio Busoni 184
Paul Butterfield 188
David Byrne 190

John Cage 193
Sammy Cahn 196
Maria Callas 198
Glen Campbell 202
Mariah Carey 204
Wendy Carlos 206

Karen Carpenter 208
Benny Carter 210
Elliott Carter 213
Maybelle Carter 216
Enrico Caruso 219
Henri Casadesus 221
Pablo Casals 223
Johnny Cash 226
Ray Charles 230
Carlos Chávez 233
Maurice Chevalier 237
Charlie Christian 239
Chuck D 240
Kyung-Wha Chung 242
Eric Clapton 245
James Cleveland 248
Van Cliburn 251
Jimmy Cliff 253
Patsy Cline 255
Kurt Cobain 257
George M. Cohan 260
Leonard Cohen 264
Nat King Cole 267
Cy Coleman 270
Ornette Coleman 272
Judy Collins 276
Phil Collins 278
Willie Colón 281
John Coltrane 283
Sean Combs 287
Harry Connick, Jr. 290
Sam Cooke 292
Aaron Copland 294
Chick Corea 298
Elvis Costello 302
James Cotton 305
Sir Noël Coward 307
Henry Cowell 311
Bing Crosby 314
David Crosby 317
Andraé Crouch 320
George Crumb 322
Celia Cruz 325
Xavier Cugat 328

D. M. C. 332
Roger Daltrey 334
Hal David 336
Ray Davies 338
Miles Davis 341
Sammy Davis, Jr. 344
Claude Debussy 346
Sandy Denny 350
John Denver 352
Paul Desmond 355
Neil Diamond 357
Bo Diddley 359
Marlene Dietrich 361
Willie Dixon 363
Dr. Dre 365
Charles Dodge 368
Arnold Dolmetsch 370
Eric Dolphy 372
Plácido Domingo 374
Fats Domino 378
Thomas A. Dorsey 380
Lamont Dozier 383
Jacqueline du Pré 386
Bob Dylan 388

Steve Earle 393
Fred Ebb 395
Duane Eddy 397
Danny Elfman 399
Sir Edward Elgar 402
Duke Ellington 405
Cass Elliot 408
Missy Elliott 410
Eminem 413
Brian Eno 416
Enya 419
Melissa Etheridge 421
Bill Evans 423
Don and Phil Everly 426
Sammy Fain 430
Morton Feldman 432
Freddy Fender 434
Arthur Fiedler 437
Dorothy Fields 439
50 Cent 441
Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau 443
Ella Fitzgerald 446
Kirsten Flagstad 450
Lester Flatt 452
Béla Fleck 454
John Fogerty 456
Aretha Franklin 459
Lefty Frizzell 462

Blind Boy Fuller 464
Peter Gabriel 467
Sir James Galway 470
Jerry Garcia 472
Art Garfunkel 475
Judy Garland 477
Erroll Garner 481
Marvin Gaye 483
George Gershwin 486
Ira Gershwin 490
Stan Getz 492
Barry, Maurice, and Robin Gibb 495
Gilberto Gil 498
João Gilberto 501
Dizzy Gillespie 502
Philip Glass 507
Gerry Goffin 511
Jerry Goldsmith 513
Osvaldo Golijov 515
Benny Goodman 518
Dexter Gordon 521
Glenn Gould 524
Percy Aldridge Grainger 528
Grandmaster Flash 531
Amy Grant 533
Stéphane Grappelli 535
Adolph Green and Betty Comden 538
Al Green 541
Dave Grusin 543
Sofia Gubaidulina 546
Arlo Guthrie 550
Woody Guthrie 552
Buddy Guy 556
Merle Haggard 559
Bill Haley 562
Marvin Hamlisch 565
M. C. Hammer 567
Oscar Hammerstein II 569
Lionel Hampton 573
Herbie Hancock 577
W. C. Handy 580
Nikolaus Harnoncourt 583
Emmylou Harris 585
George Harrison 589
Lou Harrison 591
Deborah Harry 596
Lorenz Hart 598
Coleman Hawkins 600
Isaac Hayes 604
Jascha Heifetz 606
Fletcher Henderson 610
Jimi Hendrix 613
Victor Herbert 616
Bernard Herrmann 620
Paul Hindemith 624
Christopher Hogwood 628
Billie Holiday 630
Eddie and Brian Holland 634
Buddy Holly 637
Gustav Holst 639
Arthur Honegger 642
John Lee Hooker 645
Lightnin' Hopkins 648
Lena Horne 649
James Horner 652
Vladimir Horowitz 654
Son House 657
Howlin' Wolf 660
Alberta Hunter 663
Mississippi John Hurt 665
Chrissie Hynde 667
Ice Cube 670
Ice-T 672
Julio Iglesias 674
Burl Ives 677
Charles Ives 679
Janet Jackson 683
Mahalia Jackson 685
Michael Jackson 688
Sir Mick Jagger 691
James Jamerson 695
Elmore James 697
Etta James 700
Leoš Janáček 703
Bert Jansch 707
Keith Jarrett 708
Jay-Z 711
Blind Lemon Jefferson 713
Waylon Jennings 715
Joan Jett 718
Antônio Carlos Jobim 721
Billy Joel 723
Sir Elton John 727
Lonnie Johnson 729

Robert Johnson 732
Elvin Jones 735
George Jones 737
Hank Jones 740
Quincy Jones 744
Janis Joplin 747
Scott Joplin 749
Louis Jordan. 752

John Kander. 756
Herbert von Karajan 758
Jerome Kern 761
Aram Khachaturian 765
Ali Akbar Khan 768
Nusrat Fateh Ali Khan 770
Albert King 772
B. B. King 774
Carole King 777
Rahsaan Roland Kirk. 780
Kitarō. 782
Otto Klemperer 784
Zoltán Kodály. 788
Kool DJ Herc 791
Erich Wolfgang Korngold 793
Serge Koussevitzky. 796
Alison Krauss 798
Fritz Kreisler 800
Kris Kristofferson. 803
Fela Kuti 805

Patti LaBelle. 809
Wanda Landowska 811
K. D. Lang 814
Queen Latifah. 817
Leadbelly 820
Peggy Lee 823
Michel Legrand 826
Lotte Lehmann 829
Tom Lehrer 831
Jerry Leiber 834
John Lennon. 836
Gustav Leonhardt 840
Alan Jay Lerner 843
James Levine 846
Jerry Lee Lewis 848
John Lewis. 851
György Ligeti 855
Gordon Lightfoot. 859
Little Richard 861
LL Cool J. 864
Sir Andrew Lloyd Webber. 866
Frank Loesser 869
Frederick Loewe 872
Alan Lomax 875
Lyle Lovett 879
Alvin Lucier. 881
Witold Lutosławski 884
Loretta Lynn 887

Yo-Yo Ma 891
Sir Paul McCartney. 894
Bobby McFerrin. 898
Roger McGuinn. 901
Marian McPartland. 903
Madonna 905
Gustav Mahler 907
Miriam Makeba 911
Henry Mancini 913
Bob Marley 917
Wynton Marsalis 920
Frank Martin 923
Sir George Martin 925
Bohuslav Martinů. 927
Hugh Masekela 929
Johnny Mathis 932
Dave Matthews 934
Curtis Mayfield 936
Dame Nellie Melba. 938
Lauritz Melchior 940
Memphis Minnie 943
Gian Carlo Menotti. 945
Sir Yehudi Menuhin 948
Johnny Mercer 951
Ethel Merman. 953
Robert Merrill. 956
Olivier Messiaen 958
Pat Metheny. 962
Darius Milhaud. 964
Glenn Miller. 967
Roger Miller. 969
Ronnie Milsap 971
Charles Mingus. 973
Joni Mitchell. 977
Thelonious Monk. 980
Bill Monroe 984
Wes Montgomery 987
Ennio Morricone 989
Jim Morrison 991

Van Morrison 994
Morrissey 997
Jelly Roll Morton 999
Anne-Sophie Mutter 1002

Conlon Nancarrow 1006
Milton Nascimento 1008
Fats Navarro 1011
Ricky Nelson. 1013
Willie Nelson 1015
Aaron Neville 1019
Anthony Newley 1021
Alfred Newman 1023
Randy Newman 1026
Red Nichols 1029
Stevie Nicks 1031
Carl Nielsen 1033
Luigi Nono. 1037
Jessye Norman. 1039
Notorious B.I.G. 1041

Odetta 1044
David Oistrakh 1047
Mike Oldfield 1049
Pauline Oliveros. 1052
Roy Orbison 1054
Carl Orff 1058
Johnny Otis 1060

Ignace Jan Paderewski. 1063
Jimmy Page. 1065
Eddie Palmieri. 1067
Charlie Parker 1071
Gram Parsons 1075
Arvo Pärt. 1077
Harry Partch. 1080
Dolly Parton 1082
Charley Patton. 1086
Les Paul 1088
Luciano Pavarotti 1091
Tom Paxton 1093
Carl Perkins 1095
Itzhak Perlman 1097
Oscar Peterson. 1100
Tom Petty 1103
Édith Piaf. 1105
Astor Piazzolla. 1109
Wilson Pickett 1112
Robert Plant 1114

Cole Porter 1118
Francis Poulenc 1121
Bud Powell. 1125
Pérez Prado 1129
Elvis Presley 1131
Sir André Previn. 1134
Leontyne Price. 1138
Charley Pride 1140
Prince. 1143
John Prine 1145
Professor Longhair 1147
Sergei Prokofiev 1149
Giacomo Puccini. 1153
Tito Puente. 1157

Sergei Rachmaninoff 1161
Ma Rainey 1164
Bonnie Raitt 1166
Joey Ramone. 1169
Jean-Pierre Rampal 1172
Maurice Ravel 1174
Otis Redding. 1178
Jimmy Reed 1180
Lou Reed 1182
Steve Reich. 1185
Django Reinhardt 1188
Ottorino Respighi 1191
Silvestre Revueltas 1193
Sir Tim Rice 1196
Keith Richards. 1197
Jean Ritchie 1200
Tex Ritter. 1202
Max Roach 1205
Robbie Robertson 1209
Paul Robeson 1211
Smokey Robinson 1213
Jimmie Rodgers 1216
Richard Rodgers. 1220
Sonny Rollins 1225
Sigmund Romberg 1228
Linda Ronstadt 1231
Diana Ross 1233
Mstislav Rostropovich 1236
Nino Rota 1240
Miklós Rózsa. 1244
Artur Rubinstein 1248
Otis Rush. 1251
Tom Rush 1253
John Rutter. 1255

Frederic Rzewski 1258

Buffy Sainte-Marie. 1261
Esa-Pekka Salonen. 1263
Salt and Pepa 1266
Carl Sandburg 1267
Pharoah Sanders 1270
Carlos Santana. 1272
Erik Satie 1275
Pierre Schaeffer 1278
Artur Schnabel. 1281
Alfred Schnittke 1284
Arnold Schoenberg 1287
Franz Schreker. 1291
Albert Schweitzer 1294
Gil Scott-Heron 1296
Aleksandr Scriabin 1298
Earl Scruggs 1301
Charles Seeger. 1303
Mike Seeger 1307
Peggy Seeger. 1309
Pete Seeger 1311
Ruth Crawford Seeger 1315
Bob Seger. 1318
Andrés Segovia 1320
Rudolf Serkin 1323
Joseph Shabalala 1326
Tupac Shakur 1328
Ravi Shankar. 1331
Artie Shaw 1335
Wayne Shorter. 1337
Dmitri Shostakovich 1340
Jean Sibelius 1344
Beverly Sills 1348
Joseph "Run" Simmons 1351
Carly Simon 1353
Paul Simon. 1355
Nina Simone. 1358
Frank Sinatra 1361
Grace Slick 1364
Bessie Smith 1366
Kate Smith 1369
Mamie Smith 1371
Michael W. Smith 1374
Patti Smith 1375
Snoop Dogg 1377
Sir Georg Solti 1379
Stephen Sondheim 1382
John Philip Sousa 1385
Phil Spector 1389
Bruce Springsteen. 1391
Ralph Stanley 1394
Pops Staples 1396
Max Steiner 1398
Isaac Stern 1401
Cat Stevens. 1405
Rod Stewart 1407
William Grant Still 1409
Stephen Stills 1412
Sting 1415
Karlheinz Stockhausen 1418
Leopold Stokowski 1420
Mike Stoller 1423
Sly Stone 1426
George Strait. 1428
Richard Strauss 1430
Igor Stravinsky 1435
Billy Strayhorn. 1439
Barbra Streisand. 1441
Joe Strummer 1445
Jule Styne. 1446
Donna Summer 1449
Sun Ra 1451
Dame Joan Sutherland 1453
Shin'ichi Suzuki 1456
George Szell 1458
Joseph Szigeti 1461
Karol Szymanowski. 1463

Tōru Takemitsu 1467
Tan Dun 1471
Art Tatum 1473
Sir John Tavener. 1475
Cecil Taylor 1478
James Taylor. 1481
Renata Tebaldi. 1483
Sonny Terry 1486
Léon Theremin 1488
Michael Tilson Thomas. 1490
Virgil Thomson 1493
Dimitri Tiomkin. 1496
Sir Michael Tippett 1499
Mel Tormé 1501
Arturo Toscanini 1503
Peter Tosh 1507
Pete Townshend. 1510
Merle Travis 1513
Ernest Tubb 1515

Big Joe Turner 1517
Tina Turner 1519
Jeff Tweedy 1522
Conway Twitty 1525
McCoy Tyner 1528

Umm Kulthum 1531

Ritchie Valens 1534
Vangelis 1536
Eddie Van Halen 1538
Jimmy Van Heusen 1541
Dave Van Ronk 1543
Townes Van Zandt 1545
Edgard Varèse 1547
Sarah Vaughan 1551
Stevie Ray Vaughan. 1554
Ralph Vaughan Williams. 1556
Suzanne Vega 1560
Heitor Villa-Lobos 1562
Gene Vincent 1566

Tom Waits 1569
T-Bone Walker. 1571
Fats Waller 1573
Bruno Walter 1575
Sir William Walton 1578
Clara Ward. 1580
Dionne Warwick 1583
Dinah Washington 1585
Muddy Waters. 1587
Roger Waters 1591
Doc Watson 1593
André Watts 1597
Franz Waxman 1599
Jimmy Webb 1601
Anton von Webern 1603
Ben Webster 1607
Kurt Weill 1609
August Wenzinger 1613
Paul Whiteman 1615
Hank Williams. 1618
John Williams 1620
Lucinda Williams 1624
Mary Lou Williams 1626
Sonny Boy Williamson I 1628
Sonny Boy Williamson II 1630
Meredith Willson 1633
Brian Wilson 1636
Jackie Wilson 1638
Julia Wolfe 1641
Stevie Wonder 1643
Tammy Wynette. 1646

Iannis Xenakis 1649

Yanni 1653
Lester Young. 1655
Neil Young 1658

Frank Zappa 1661
Hans Zimmer 1665

Appendixes
General Bibliography 1671
Glossary 1696
Chronological List of Musicians 1725
Electronic Resources 1733

Indexes
Category Index 1743
Geographical Index 1759
Personages and Groups Index 1767
Works Index 1779

Publisher's Note

Musicians and Composers of the 20th Century offers in-depth biographical and critical essays on those men and women who made an enduring impact on music from 1901 to 2000. Covering more than 600 musical artists in detailed essays ranging from three to five pages in length, this A-Z reference will provide an entry point for students seeking the basics on musicians in all genres, worldwide.

Scope of Coverage

Musicians and Composers of the 20th Century features 608 essays on 614 individuals from around the world who have gained significance as composers, performers, instrumentalists, vocalists, and teachers. They have made contributions to a variety of musical genres, from classical to jazz, opera to musical theater, blues to soul, folk to rock, traditional regional forms to contemporary country. New Age, rap, reggae, and world music, relative newcomers on the scene, are covered as well.

The 101 women and 513 men covered in these five volumes are musically classified into one or more of the following categories or genres: accordion players (1), arrangers (16), avant-garde musicians (10), bandleaders (15), banjoists (7), bebop musicians (16), bluegrass musicians (7), blues musicians (40), boogie-woogie musicians (7), cabaret singers (3), calypso singers (1), cellists (8), Celtic singers (1), choral directors (4), Christian music performers (6), clarinetists (4), classical composers (111), other classical musicians (57), conductors (36), cornetists (3), country and country-western musicians (52), disco musicians (4), drummers and other percussionists (12), dulcimer players (1), electronic and electroacoustic musicians (13), experimental musicians (8), film composers (45), flutists (4), folk-rock musicians (8), folksingers (35), funk musicians (16), glam-rock musicians (5), gospel musicians (9), grunge-rock musicians (2), guitarists (245), hard-bop musicians (8), harmonica players (6), harpsichordists (3), hip-hop musicians (19), instrument makers (3), jazz composers (59), other jazz musicians (57), keyboardists (13), Latin jazz musicians (13), Latin popular musicians (5), librettists (6), lute players (3), lyricists (36), mandolinists (1), mariachi musicians (2), minimalist composers (4), multimedia artists (1), music educators (8), musical-theater composers (42), musical-theater singers (12), musicologists (7), New Age musicians (8), new wave musicians (3), opera composers (57), opera singers (17), organists (2), performance artists (2), pianists (86), pop-rock musicians (13), popular composers (14), popular singers (59), punk-rock musicians (7), ragtime musicians (7), rappers (25), record producers (8), reggae musicians (3), rhythm-and-blues musicians (44), rock musicians (93), rockabilly musicians (9), salsa musicians (6), sarod musicians (1), saxophonists (21), serial and atonal composers (10), singer-songwriters (230), sitar players (1), ska musicians (2), songwriters (28), soul singers (22), swing musicians (18), synthesizer musicians (5), television composers (3), trombonists (3), trumpeters (8), vibraphonists (2), viol players (3), violinists (19), and musicians identified with the relatively new genre of world music (19).

The persons covered in these volumes are equally diverse geographically, identified with one or more of the following countries or regions: Africa (5), Argentina (4), Australia (3), Austria (11), Bangladesh (1), Belgium (2), Brazil (5), Canada (9), China (2), Cuba (4), Czech Republic (4), Denmark (2), Egypt (1), England (49), Estonia (1), Finland (2), France (20), Germany (19), Greece (3), Hungary (7), Iceland (1), India (2), Ireland (2), Israel (3), Italy (12), Jamaica (4), Japan (3), Korea (1), Lithuania (1), Mexico (5), Middle East (4), Netherlands (2), Nigeria (1), Northern Ireland (2), Norway (1), Pakistan (1), Panama (1), Poland (5), Puerto Rico (2), Romania (2), Russia (15), Scotland (2), South Africa (3), Spain (4), Sweden (1), Switzerland (2), Ukraine (2), United Kingdom (53), United States (428), and/or the West Indies and Caribbean (9).

Essay Length and Format

Each essay ranges in length from three to five pages (1,500 to 2,500 words) and displays standard ready-reference top matter offering easy access to biographical information:

- Name: Every essay is headed by the name of the musician as best known in standard English-language sources.

- Identification line: Every essay's heading is followed by an identification line that lists the individual's nationality and his or her musical identity, from arranger to blues musician to classical or jazz composer to singer-songwriter.
- Summary description: A brief italicized paragraph encapsulates the individual's significance in the history of music.
- Born and Died lines list the most accurate dates of birth and death available, followed by the precise locations of birth and death; both contemporary and modern place-names (where different) are listed.
- Also known as lists additional names—including full names, birth names, alternative spellings, pseudonyms, nicknames, and other monikers.
- Member of lists principal groups, such as bands or choirs, with which the musician is associated.
- Principal works or Principal recordings (sometimes both) lists, by genre or type (such as "albums" or "orchestral works" or "operatic roles") the individual's major works or recordings, including first performance dates and (for foreign-language works) any common English translations. For collaborative works, primary "coauthors" such as lyricists and librettists are listed in parentheses. "Writings of interest" appear at the ends of these listings for those musicians who produced books about their lives and music. These extensive listings form one of the set's major features.
- The Life introduces the main text of the essay, providing biographical facts about the individual's life from birth through death.
- The Music, the heart of the essay, offers analytical commentary on the musician's work as a whole as well as core selected works, such as famous compositions, key performances, and notable recordings.
- Musical Legacy describes the musician's influence on styles, genres, and subsequent generations of musicians, as well as his or her impact on popular culture.
- Byline: All essays are signed by the scholars who wrote them (who are also listed, with their academic affiliations, in the front matter to Volume 1).
- Further Reading: This section sends readers to key books and other print resources for students wishing to conduct additional study. All entries are annotated to guide readers to particular areas of interest.
- See also lists cross-references to related musicians covered in Musicians and Composers of the 20th Century—an especially useful feature for popular band members and musical-theater collaborators.

Special Features

Musicians and Composers of the 20th Century is illustrated with more than 400 photographs of the musicians scattered throughout the five volumes. In addition, several resources and finding aids for users of this encyclopedia appear at the end of Volume 5, including a General Bibliography, a Glossary, a Chronological List of Musicians by birth year, an annotated list of Electronic Resources, a Category Index classifying musicians into more than 90 genres, a Geographical Index of 50 countries and regions represented, a Personages and Groups Index listing both musicians discussed in the text and musical groups such as bands, and finally a Works Index listing all major works that receive significant text discussion.

Acknowledgments

Salem Press would like to extend its appreciation to all involved in the development of this work. Special thanks go to Alfred W. Cramer, Associate Professor of Music at Pomona College, Claremont, California, who developed and monitored the contents list for contributing writers to ensure the set's relevance to a broad range of high school and undergraduate curricula. Professor Cramer teaches courses in the history of twentieth century music and music theory. The recipient of the Society for Music Theory's 2004 Outstanding Publication Award, he received his B.A. in music from Yale University in 1987 and his Ph.D. in music theory from the University of Pennsylvania in 1997. He is also an accomplished violinist and has soloed with the National Repertory Orchestra and played in several regional orchestras.

The essays were written and are signed by more than 200 music scholars and other academicians, a list of whom will be found in the following pages, accompanied by their academic affiliations. Without their contributions, a project of this magnitude would not be possible.

Editor's Introduction

Musicians and Composers of the 20th Century examines the work of more than six hundred artists representing classical art, jazz, rock, folk, blues, soul, gospel, country, Latin, New Age, reggae, and world music as well as music for film and musical theater. If someone at the start of the twentieth century had envisioned a future encyclopedia of twentieth century musicians, it would not have had this scope. Although anyone could have anticipated that music would evolve, no one could have anticipated the surprising ways in which the basic concept of music changed during the century.

Consider the fundamental changes in the way music was experienced. In 1900 virtually all music was live music. When people wanted to hear music, they played or sang it themselves, or they went to a public event—a graduation, a parade, a religious service, or, of course, a concert. The technology of sound recording was barely two decades old, and the idea that recordings might play music was more recent than that. By the late 1920's, it had become common to experience music through recordings. The first radio broadcasts began in about 1919. Recorded sound was routinely synchronized to films by the late 1920's. Beginning in the 1950's, tape recording made possible new ways to edit and manipulate sound. By the 1990's, widely available computers had given millions of people the ability to make sophisticated recordings or to create music without singing or playing an instrument.

In 1900 most people thought of music as notated. At that time, classical music, written down by composers, had more prestige; popular songs, published as sheet music, made more money. Nevertheless, there was plenty of unnotated music, mostly considered folk music. To those concerned with high art, folk music was valuable primarily as the raw material on which a nation's refined culture could be built. It was largely through attention to their common folk culture that the separate kingdoms of Germany had come together as a nation during the nineteenth century; and, with Germany's example in mind, composers such as Bedřich Smetana and Antonín Dvořák in Bohemia and Jean Sibelius in Finland had developed national styles of art music rooted in folk idioms. From 1892 to 1895, Dvořák lived in America, where he turned American attention toward Native American and African American music as the likely raw material for an American art music that would validate America as a nation.

Thus, a prognosticator from 1900 might have expected some folk musicians to appear in this encyclopedia, in a deferential position to the classical musicians, who would by far take up most of the pages. The variety of styles found here would have been inconceivable. Such a broad mix also might have raised eyebrows during the middle decades of the twentieth century, when, amazingly, many people referred to the music of high culture as "good" music, considering it a more accurate term than "classical." (Interestingly, jazz musicians called it "longhair" music.) By that time, this encyclopedia would have been conceivable in more or less its present form. Many of the key changes had taken place by 1940, the year Woody Guthrie met Pete Seeger.

During the Great Depression, Seeger's father, Charles, and stepmother, Ruth Crawford Seeger, sought to join ranks with those who were suffering economically, largely by bringing to them a brand of avowedly dissonant modernist music. Perhaps not surprisingly, such music did not catch on, so the Seegers set about rethinking their assumptions about composing. They decided that anyone who changed a few notes here or a few words there to a folk song was engaging in the authentic process of composition. This meant that folk music was no longer considered static raw material bound by tradition, but rather it was a living body of music being created anew by ordinary people. Pete Seeger put this idea into practice with his singalong performances of folk music, while Guthrie, Leadbelly, and other singers were lauded as folk music composers. This transformation of folk music (and, by extension, of American music) from quaint, Romanticized ballads to earthy, often raucous statements signaled a fundamental shift in attitude: A song did not have to be performed by a refined singer in order to be realized at its fullest. The homespun sound of the folk performer was no embarrassment but in fact an integral part of the musical expression. When folksinger Bob Dylan got an amplifier and began to transform rock music, he helped rock music make a similar claim to the status of serious high art, despite its lack of conventional refined singing.

This history says more about the concept of folk music than it says about the music's sound, creation, or dissemination. The folk songs collected by John and Alan Lomax, the Seegers, and others were a mix of Appalachian music sung by folks of British origin, blues sung by African Americans, cowboy songs of the Western United States, and more, but much of this music was already available on commercial recordings and radio broadcasts by the late 1920's. It was marketed to niche audiences: white, non-urban audiences for the country music of artists such as the Carter Family, black audiences for the blues of Bessie Smith, and so on. Seen in this light, the folk music movement of the late 1930's to early 1950's was an attempt to counter the commercialization of traditional music by the recording and broadcast industries, as well as an attempt to fight against the racial and economic divisions that were perpetuated by the marketing of the music.

Even the folk music movement itself could not withstand such commercialization; by the late 1960's, "folk" was yet another label on a bin in the record store. Rather than identifying a certain type of creative process, as the Seegers would have had it, folk music was now identified by its style, which most often began with a solo singer and an acoustic guitar. Ethnicity was also still at the heart of commercial categorizations, and "folk music" was predominantly associated with white singers. Indeed, the commercial classification of music continues to invoke ethnicity. To some extent, this is no surprise; after all, if musical traditions are handed down within communities, it stands to reason that they be associated with the ethnicities of those communities, although the dynamics may be quite complex. For example, hip-hop culture developed during the 1970's as a way for urban African Americans and Latinos to interact in a positive way, yet rap, the music of hip-hop, is generally labeled African American—even while other groups (such as Asian Americans) adopt the style as an expression of their own identities.

It is unlikely that a 1900 prognosticator could have imagined anything like hip-hop, let alone envisioned the inclusion of rap artists in an encyclopedia such as this one. Even today, there is debate over whether the recited lyrics of rap can be considered music; and the rap artists' use of disc-jockey techniques and electronic manipulation of preexisting recordings is a long way from what constituted composition in 1900. One could fill many pages discussing the precursors of rap's musicalization of the spoken word in African American history. Nevertheless, rap music is also a reminder that technology has continually changed not only the way musicians work but also what they think music is.

A 1900 prognosticator would have thought much differently about genre (a French word that means "type" or "category"). In 1900 attempts to categorize music tended to focus on national style or on the different forms of classical music—templates for composition such as the brief symphonic overture, the storytelling symphonic poem, and the long, four-movement symphony; for small groups of solo instruments, the sonata, trio, and quartet; for solo instrument accompanied by orchestra, the concerto; for voice (usually with instrumental accompaniment), the song or aria; and the grandest spectacle of all, opera, a staged story set to music. The differences among such forms seem to matter less now, although many listeners respond quickly to the differences among the country, rock, blues, and musical-theater templates for songs. Today listeners encounter a wider range of music than ever before, with the result that they tend to categorize music by broad traditions rather than by the different forms within those traditions. Moreover, the Romantic notion of music as universal expression makes us reluctant to pigeonhole different kinds of music in separate compartments. Miles Davis quite rightly observed that music is "just music."

Davis was understandably concerned that categorizations of music were likely to get something wrong. Nevertheless, it is necessary to recognize differences in genre and style in order to understand music. Just as one needs to know the language of a speaker in order to respond to what the speaker is saying, one needs familiarity with a musical genre in order to respond fully to its expression. The sound of a slide guitar in a country song recorded in Nashville expresses something quite different from the same sound in Hawaiian music. In fact, a number of twentieth century classical composers relied on the genres they inherited from the nineteenth century to give their works meaning—especially the symphony. Aaron Copland developed a sound that is now iconic of America by working out a style of melody rooted in folk songs and dance tunes and fitting such melodies into symphonies, ballets, and other forms. In the "neoclassical" movement begun in the 1920's, composers such as Igor Stravinsky, Paul Hindemith, and Ottorino Respighi revived many of the forms of the eighteenth century and earlier as a way of drawing attention away from the Romantic expressivism that they regretted inheriting from the nineteenth century. In the Soviet Union, the symphony genre, which had connoted heroism ever since Ludwig van Beethoven's Eroica symphony of 1805, provided the kind of heroic expression that the dictator Joseph Stalin desired for the Soviet state. Dmitri Shostakovich composed such works; indeed, compared with other symphonies his works often seem overly heroic—so much so that listeners who know the genre well sometimes feel that he was secretly thumbing his nose at the Soviet regime.

Developments in music, of course, have much to do with the other events of history. By 1900 the United States had the world's largest economy. England, France, and the Netherlands held vast colonies around the globe, while Japan and the United States were beginning to annex territories. Many European countries were already republican or parliamentary democracies, but Germany, Austria, and Russia were still imperial monarchies while aristocrats and gentlemen dominated other countries as well. People behaved as though the foundations of society had been securely established, and all that was needed was perpetual improvement of the details. Nevertheless, the cracks were showing for anyone willing to look: poverty, mistrust between nations, and the inequality of women and minorities were at odds with most of these societies' stated progressive principles. Seemingly local revolutions kept undermining foundations: in politics, the spontaneous 1905 uprising in Russia; in science, Albert Einstein's 1905 theories of relativity and quantum mechanics; in painting, cubism and expressionism. Three of the century's greatest composers—Arnold Schoenberg, Stravinsky, and Béla Bartók—produced some of their most daring works before 1914, the year when the onset of World War I changed everything. All the countries involved in the war suffered horrific losses, and the war brought down the monarchies of Germany and Austria (which became democratic) as well as that of Russia (which became the totalitarian Soviet Union). During the 1920's, the economies of those three countries failed to recover, and the economic depression spread around the globe by the early 1930's.

Thus, during the 1920's and 1930's, society and its institutions seemed broken and ready for reinvention. If music before World War I tended toward the large striking statement or at least the small sentimental statement, music between the world wars was often fashioned with a view toward reinventing music's social function. This encyclopedia tells how musicians such as Hindemith and Francis Poulenc sought to take classical music off its pedestal and make it useful to people. Zoltan Kodály, Carl Orff, and others in central Europe got involved in teaching music to small children, as did Shin'ichi Suzuki, who was studying in Germany at the time. Darius Milhaud, Kurt Weill, the young Copland, and many others incorporated jazz elements into their work. It was not just that jazz's driving, syncopated rhythms captured something about modern life during the Jazz Age of the 1920's. Jazz also represented the promise of a new, less racialized social structure. (This aspect of jazz was celebrated in Europe more than in America, where most jazz performance was racially segregated well past World War II.) Furthermore, because it was new, not yet codified, and evolving swiftly, jazz represented possibility. George Gershwin aimed to elevate jazz by fitting it to the templates of "good" music—rhapsody, concerto, symphonic poem, and opera. Even the notion that jazz involved improvisation was not clear; by the late 1920's, the now-standard jazz form in which soloists improvise over the chord changes of a popular tune was just being tested by Louis Armstrong and others. The image of jazz at the time belonged to Bing Crosby as much as to Armstrong.

World War II (1939-1945) brought the Great Depression to an end, and with the rising prosperity of the 1950's came less attention to music's social function and more attention to the intrinsic properties of music itself. In the classical realm, the more populist styles lost prominence to the more structurally complex music of composers such as Pierre Boulez, Karlheinz Stockhausen, and Milton Babbitt—composers who were little concerned with reaching a wide audience. Jazz was dominated by bebop and its successors; this music of Charlie Parker, Max Roach, Dizzy Gillespie, Thelonious Monk, Davis, and John Coltrane was not dance music but was rather created to stand on its own.

From the 1960's to the end of the century, musicians increasingly saw their work as commentary on the state of the world. The folk music movement had long seen itself as a vehicle for rally and protest, and this concept spread into rock music (notably in the work of John Lennon) and eventually into rap and other popular styles. Although no catastrophes on the scale of the world wars took place during the second half of the twentieth century, there was a tone of anxiety as people came to understand the possibility of nuclear annihilation or man-made environmental catastrophe. There were laments and anger over the various regional wars that did occur; George Crumb's Black Angels: Thirteen Images from the Dark Land is a particularly striking lament over the Vietnam War. There was soul-searching as Europeans tried to come to terms with the Nazi holocaust of the 1930's and 1940's and to build new relationships with their former colonies, and as Americans sought to end racial injustice. The 1970's brought the most powerful women's rights movement yet. (By the end of the century, significant numbers of women could be composers, finally.) There was a sense that the world was shrinking, as jet airplane travel became routine and as human beings even traveled to the moon. Thus Steve Reich sought to bring to classical music the cyclically repeated rhythmic and melodic patterns of African and Indonesian music; Julia Wolfe and others sought to bridge the stylistic gap between classical music and rock-inflected popular music; and Tan Dun and Osvaldo Golijov attempted syntheses of different styles from around the world.

Much music after 1950 sounded decidedly different from anything heard early in the century. This was especially true of experimental music by composers such as Harry Partch, John Cage, Pauline Oliveros, and Alvin Lucier. Nowhere was sonic unfamiliarity more significant than in rock music, whose amplified sound and raw energy seemed to some more liberating and to others more threatening than almost anything else going on in the world. A 1900 prognosticator could scarcely have imagined these sounds or their diversity.

Early twentieth century historians sought to retrace the deepest, longest channel of the wide river of music, and it was understood that that deep channel belonged to the great European composers. Halfway through the century, people began to think music was not a single river; they began to talk of the world's "musics," in the plural. It is now difficult to identify a single main channel of music history. How would one decide what the main channel is? Is it the music that sells the most recordings? Is it the most sophisticated, advanced music? The most expressive music? Expressive for whom?

In fact, this is an age of musical eclecticism. Musicians and Composers of the 20th Century contains articles about musicians from many musical traditions, each with its own rich living history, and many people are quite familiar with a good deal of music from outside their traditions. Thus, the musicians chosen for inclusion represent the eclectic mixture of styles likely to be encountered by American audiences. The few entries on world music, for example, cannot possibly do justice to all the musics of the world, but they can stand for the large amount of world music that is being heard in America.

Many musical reference volumes from 1900 to the present have focused on the lives of important musicians. Musicians and Composers of the 20th Century does so with a special emphasis on their music. Now that the twentieth century is over, such an emphasis on the music offers an invitation to find historical patterns and connections that may not yet be obvious. This introduction has tried to show some relationships among disparate musical traditions. Readers may find other patterns of coherence or choose to focus on one particular genre or group of musicians without reference to other connections (a project facilitated by the Category Index and the Geographical Index at the end of Volume 5). Both kinds of research will be essential as new histories of the twentieth century are written. With its manageable and informative guides to further reading, this encyclopedia is meant to get readers started on such research. At the same time, this encyclopedia will have succeeded if it inspires readers to listen to some unfamiliar music or to hear something new in music they already know.

Alfred W. Cramer

Contributors

Michael Adams
CUNY Graduate Center

Bland Addison
Worcester Polytechnic Institute

Joshua Addison
Apple Hill Center for Chamber Music

Stephen Arthur Allen
Rider University

David E. Anderson
Seymour, Indiana

Abby Anderton
University of Michigan, Ann Arbor

Andy Argyrakis
Tribune Media Services

Erica K. Argyropoulos
University of Kansas

Sylvia P. Baeza
Applied Ballet Theater

Christa A. Banister
Saint Paul, Minnesota

John W. Barker
University of Wisconsin—Madison

Samantha Ryan Barnsfather
University of Florida

Maryanne Barsotti
Warren, Minnesota

Amy M. Bauer
University of California, Irvine

Michael Baumgartner
University of British Columbia

Alvin K. Benson
Utah Valley University

Luke Berryman
Boston University

Margaret Boe Birns
New York University

Nicholas Birns
The New School

Dan Blim
University of Michigan

Joseph A. Bognar
Valparaiso University

Jonathan W. Boschetto
Princeton University

Delbert S. Bowers
University of Southern California

Joel J. Brattin
Worcester Polytechnic Institute

Howard Bromberg
University of Michigan Law School

Gwynne Kuhner Brown
University of Puget Sound

Karina Bruk
Rutgers University

Thomas W. Buchanan
Ancilla Domini College

Richard R. Bunbury
Boston University

Gary W. Burdette
University of Kansas

Laura Burns
Chicago, Illinois

Justin D. Burton
Rutgers University

Susan Butterworth
Salem State College

Brian G. Campbell
Saint John's University

Carey L. Campbell
Weber State University

Daniela Candillari
Indiana University

Louis R. Carlozo
Loyola University Chicago

William S. Carson
Coe College

Christopher W. Cary
University of Florida

Eric Charry
Wesleyan University

John L. Clark, Jr.
Connecticut College

Gretchen Rowe Clements
SUNY, Buffalo

Bud Coleman
University of Colorado at Boulder

Michael Conklin
The College of New Jersey

Alfred W. Cramer
Pomona College

Rebecca Cypess
Yale University

Mary Virginia Davis
University of California, Davis

Frank Day
Clemson University

Lisa de Alwis
University of Southern California

Terry L. Dean
University of Georgia

Paul Dellinger
Wytheville, Virginia

Andrew Raffo Dewar
Wesleyan University

Marcia B. Dinneen
Bridgewater State College

Joy M. Doan
University of Michigan

Slawomir P. Dobrzanski
Kansas State University

Brian Doherty
Arizona State University

Ryan Scott Ebright
Peabody Institute

Robert P. Ellis
Northborough Historical Society

Thomas L. Erskine
Salisbury University

Oran Etkin
Brooklyn Conservatory

William A. Everett
University of Missouri—Kansas City, Conservatory of Music & Dance

Jack Ewing
Boise, Idaho

Sandra J. Fallon
Brandeis University

Dennis E. Ferguson
Boston University

Susan M. Filler
Chicago, Illinois

Frances Conover Fitch
Longy School of Music

Luminita Florea
Eastern Illinois University

Anthony J. Fonseca
Nicholls State University

Kate Friedricks
Tujunga, California

Gary Galván
LaSalle University

Cory M. Gavito
Oklahoma City University

Samantha Giarratani
Saint Anselm College

Dilek Göktürk
University of Florida

Sheldon Goldfarb
University of British Columbia

Melissa Ursula Dawn Goldsmith
Nicholls State University

Lewis L. Gould
University of Texas at Austin

S. Andrew Granade
University of Missouri—Kansas City, Conservatory of Music & Dance

Eben Graves
Tufts University

Jasmine L. Hagans
Northeastern University

Christopher Hailey
Franz Schreker Foundation

Fusako Hamao
Santa Monica, California

Brian Timothy Harlan
University of Southern California

Marcus Desmond Harmon
University of California, Los Angeles

Rob Haskins
University of New Hampshire

Diane Andrews Henningfeld
Adrian College

Eduardo Herrera
University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign

Teri A. Herron
Indiana University, Bloomington

Dane O. Heuchemer
Kenyon College

Michael Hix
Troy University

Matthew Ryan Hoch
Shorter College

Peter J. Hoesing
Florida State University

John R. Holmes
Franciscan University of Steubenville

Lisa Hooper
Indiana University, Bloomington

Gregory D. Horn
Southwest Virginia Community College

Julie H. Huang
Oklahoma City University

Kelly A. Huff
University of Kansas

Mark Humphrey
Santa Monica, California

Stephen Husarik
University of Arkansas—Fort Smith

Raymond Pierre Hylton
Virginia Union University

Mitsutoshi Inaba
University of Oregon

Margaret R. Jackson
Troy University

Ron Jacobs
Asheville, North Carolina

Jeffry Jensen
Glendale Community College

Sheila Golburgh Johnson
Santa Barbara, California

Jeffrey Daniel Jones
University of Kentucky

Joseph E. Jones
University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign

Alexander Kahn
University of California, Berkeley

Ajay Kalra
University of Texas at Austin

Ryan R. Kangas
University of Texas at Austin

Paul E. Killinger
Western Illinois University

Mary J. King
California Baptist University

Joseph Klein
University of North Texas

Phillip J. Klepacki
University of Florida

Grove Koger
Boise State University

Helena Kopchick
University of Oregon

Madeleine Kuhns
Chicago, Illinois

Hedy Law
University of Chicago

Michael Lee
University of Oklahoma

Sonia Lee
University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign

Cara Lemon
ChoiceStream

James Leve
Northern Arizona University

Roberta L. Lindsey
Indiana University

Alexander Raymond Ludwig
Brandeis University

Paige Clark Lush
University of Kentucky

R. C. Lutz
Madison Advisors

Clyde S. McConnell
University of Calgary

Thomas MacFarlane
New York University

David W. Madden
California State University, Sacramento

Claire D. Maiers
Tufts University

Siu-Yin Mak
University of Southern California

Victoria Malawey
Kenyon College

Martin J. Manning
United States Department of State

Andrew R. Martin
Inver Hills Community College

Sonya Mason
Manhattan School of Music

LeeAnn Maton
Chicago, Illinois

Joseph R. Matson
University of Iowa

Michael Mauskapf
University of Michigan, Ann Arbor

Matthew Mihalka
University of Minnesota—Twin Cities

Sam Miller
Wesleyan University

Susan W. Mills
Appalachian State University

Don Allan Mitchell
Delta State University

Rachel E. Mitchell
University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign

Andrea Moore
Camerata Pacifica

Alice Myers
Bard College at Simon's Rock

John Myers
Bard College at Simon's Rock

Philip D. Nauman
Boston University

Leslie Neilan
Virginia Polytechnic Institute and State University

William Nelles
University of Massachusetts—Dartmouth

Byron Nelson
West Virginia University

Matthew Nicholl
Berklee College of Music

Ann Glazer Niren
Indiana University Southeast

Eric Novod
Rutgers University

Daniel Nuñez
University of Colorado at Boulder

Arsenio Orteza
St. Thomas More High School

Robert J. Paradowski
Rochester Institute of Technology

Jessica Payette
Stanford University

Alyson Payne
Southwestern Michigan College

Jonathan G. Secora Pearl
Perceptral LLC

Edward Pearsall
University of Texas at Austin

Michael Pelusi
Philadelphia, Pennsylvania

Amanda M. Pence
University of Kansas

Ray Pence
University of Kansas

Mark E. Perry
University of Kansas

Mark A. Peters
Trinity Christian College

Barbara Bennett Peterson
California State University, San Bernardino, Palm Desert Campus

John R. Phillips
Purdue University Calumet

Anastasia Pike
Patrick Henry College

Constance Pollock
Glendale, California

Mark D. Porcaro
University of Dayton

Luke A. Powers
Tennessee State University

April L. Prince
University of Texas at Austin

Bryan Proksch
McNeese State University

Sarah Caissie Provost
Brandeis University

P. Brent Register
Clarion University

Rosemary M. Canfield Reisman
Charleston Southern University

Betty Richardson
Southern Illinois University, Edwardsville

Diane M. Ricks
Georgia Southern University

Edward A. Riedinger
Ohio State University

Jerry E. Rife
Rider University

Gregory Rivkin
Rutgers University

R. Todd Rober
Kutztown University of Pennsylvania

Richard Allen Roe
Rockville, Maryland

J. Griffith Rollefson
University of Wisconsin—Madison

Ryan Ross
University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign

Jason Salter
University of Calgary

Mark C. Samples
University of Oregon

Richard Sax
Lake Erie College

Peter Schimpf
Metropolitan State College of Denver

Eric Olds Schneeman
University of Southern California

Lacy Schutz
Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute

Elizabeth Scoggin
Boston University

Laurie R. Semmes
Appalachian State University

R. Baird Shuman
University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign

Douglas D. Skinner
Texas State University—San Marcos

Frederick Key Smith
Lake City Community College

Joanna R. Smolko
University of Pittsburgh

Tim J. Smolko
University of Georgia

Jennifer L. Smull
University of Texas at Austin

Juliana Snapper
University of California, San Diego

Staci A. Spring
McMurry University

Stephanie N. Stallings
Florida State University

James Stanlaw
Illinois State University

Jill Stapleton-Bergeron
University of Tennessee

August W. Staub
University of Georgia

David Steffens
Oklahoma City University

Eric S. Strother
University of Kentucky

Jonathan A. Sturm
Iowa State University

Tim Sullivan
University of Michigan

Janine Tiffe
Florida State University

Monica T. Tripp
Spelman College

Judy Tsui
Chicago, Illinois

Jamshed Turel
McGill University

Stephen Valdez
University of Georgia

Yiorgos Vassilandonakis
University of California, Berkeley

Francesco Dalla Vecchia
University of Iowa

Daniel R. Vogel
Edinboro University of Pennsylvania

Mary H. Wagner
University of Michigan—Flint

Zachary Wallmark
University of Oregon

Gabriel Weiner
University of Southern California

David J. Weisberg
William Paterson University

Twyla R. Wells
University of Northwestern Ohio

Tyrone Williams
Xavier University

Mary A. Wischusen
Wayne State University

Mandy Suzanne Wong
University of California, Los Angeles

Sandra S. Yang
California State Polytechnic University

Elizabeth Anne Yeager
University of Kansas

Robert Young
Los Angeles, California

Jeremy Yudkin
Boston University

Key to Pronunciation

Many of the names of personages covered in Musicians and Composers of the 20th Century may be unfamiliar to students and general readers. For these unfamiliar names, guides to pronunciation have been provided upon first mention of the names in the text. These guidelines do not purport to achieve the subtleties of the languages in question but will offer readers a rough equivalent of how English speakers may approximate the proper pronunciation.

Vowel Sounds

Symbol	Spelled (Pronounced)
a	answer (AN-suhr), laugh (laf), sample (SAM-puhl), that (that)
ah	father (FAH-thur), hospital (HAHS-pih-tuhl)
aw	awful (AW-fuhl), caught (kawt)
ay	blaze (blayz), fade (fayd), waiter (WAYT-ur), weigh (way)
eh	bed (behd), head (hehd), said (sehd)
ee	believe (bee-LEEV), cedar (SEE-dur), leader (LEED-ur), liter (LEE-tur)
ew	boot (bewt), lose (lewz)
i	buy (bi), height (hit), lie (li), surprise (sur-PRIZ)
ih	bitter (BIH-tur), pill (pihl)
o	cotton (KO-tuhn), hot (hot)
oh	below (bee-LOH), coat (koht), note (noht), wholesome (HOHL-suhm)
oo	good (good), look (look)
ow	couch (kowch), how (how)
oy	boy (boy), coin (koyn)
uh	about (uh-BOWT), butter (BUH-tuhr), enough (ee-NUHF), other (UH-thur)

Consonant Sounds

Symbol	Spelled (Pronounced)
ch	beach (beech), chimp (chihmp)
g	beg (behg), disguise (dihs-GIZ), get (geht)
j	digit (DIH-juht), edge (ehj), jet (jeht)
k	cat (kat), kitten (KIH-tuhn), hex (hehks)
s	cellar (SEHL-ur), save (sayv), scent (sehnt)
sh	champagne (sham-PAYN), issue (IH-shew), shop (shop)
ur	birth (burth), disturb (dihs-TURB), earth (urth), letter (LEH-tur)
y	useful (YEWS-fuhl), young (yuhng)
z	business (BIHZ-nehs), zest (zehst)
zh	vision (VIH-zhuhn)

Essays

A

Will Ackerman

American New Age composer and guitarist

Ackerman is one of the seminal figures in contemporary instrumental, or New Age, music. As a guitarist and composer, he focused on expression and emotion in his music; as a businessman and founder of a record label, he was responsible for promoting and producing notable artists in the genre.

Born: November 1, 1949; West Germany (now in Germany)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): In Search of the Turtle's Navel, 1976; It Takes a Year, 1977; Childhood and Memory, 1979; Passage, 1981; Past Light, 1983; Conferring with the Moon: Pieces for Guitar, 1986; Imaginary Roads, 1990; The Opening of Doors, 1992; Sound of the Wind Driven Rain, 1998; Hearing Voices, 2001; Returning, 2004.

The Life

Of European heritage, William Ackerman (AK-ur-man) was adopted as an infant by an American family. His adoptive father was an English professor at Stanford University; his adoptive mother committed suicide when he was young, so he was sent to live at a boarding school in Massachusetts. There he was involved in competitive swimming, and he also took an interest in poetry and guitar. Equally important to his brief musical experiences at this time was his growing attraction to the New England countryside.

After attending Stanford University, he worked for several years as a carpenter and a general contractor before settling in Windham County, Vermont. Largely self-taught as a guitarist—his only formal training was one lesson with Robbie Basho—Ackerman began a career as a composer and performer while at Stanford, although he did not know how to read music. In 1975 Ackerman founded Windham Hill Records and, as one of the pioneers of a musical movement that became known as New Age, profoundly impacted the American musical landscape. While managing the record label for more than two decades, Ackerman recorded several of his own albums and produced albums by such notable musicians as Alex de Grassi, Michael Hedges, Liz Story, and George Winston. After Ackerman sold Windham Hill Records in 1992, he recorded and produced music from his Imaginary Road studio in Vermont.

The Music

Though his music is often categorized as New Age, Ackerman's style might best be described as a lyrically emotional and primarily acoustic fusion of folk, jazz, and classical. Ackerman acknowledged that he was influenced by the American guitarists Basho, John Fahey, and Leo Kottke, as well as the French composer Erik Satie. Particularly noteworthy is Ackerman's use of a different open guitar tuning for almost every one of his compositions, resulting in music that relies—for Ackerman and the listener—more on emotion than on intellect. In performance, this usually requires the aid of an offstage guitar tuner, and it lends an air of spontaneity and freshness to his music, whether live or recorded.

Early Albums. Ackerman's first two albums, In Search of the Turtle's Navel and It Takes a Year, are generally considered landmarks in New Age music, and they provided the foundation to the establishment of the Windham Hill label. Both recordings feature Ackerman's solo guitar on songs in miniature that are highly original and personal, especially the former's "Processional" (written as incidental music for a production of William Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet) and the latter's "The Bricklayer's Beautiful Daughter" (perhaps his most famous piece) and "The Impending Death of the Virgin Spirit" (inspired by the suicide of his mother). Stylistically, both albums reflect a fusion of folk, bluegrass, and the blues.

Past Light. Ackerman fully embraced composing for ensemble settings on his fifth album, Past Light. Expanding the vocabulary of his music, as well as its timbres and textures, Ackerman reached out to guest performers for Past Light. Particularly noteworthy on Past Light, the strongest of Ackerman's ensemble albums, are the tracks "Visiting," "Garden," "Ventana," and "Night Slip." Following albums featured a notable list of guest artists, including Charles Bisharat, Chuck Greenberg, Michael Hedges, Michael Manring, Paul McCandless, Tim Story, Russel Walder, George Winston, and the Kronos Quartet.

Sound of the Wind Driven Rain and Hearing Voices. Both nominated for Grammy Awards, these albums are marked by the addition of the human voice. On the heels of several ensemble-based albums, Sound of the Wind Driven Rain finds Ackerman's guitar taking the central melodic role, and the album is supported by the earthy vocals of African musician Samite and various guest instrumentalists. Hearing Voices also includes the vocal work of Samite and six other singers. Though Hearing Voices includes texts in such languages as Luganda, Gaelic, Arabic, Hebrew, Italian, Hindi, and Sanskrit, the meaning of the words is secondary to the manner in which their sounds blend with the guitar and other instruments.

Returning. In 2004 Ackerman revisited eleven pieces from previous albums, reinterpreting and rerecording them as intimate solo expressions. The result is an album in which each track is imbued with new meaning and emotion. Despite the fact that Returning contains no new music, it reaffirmed Ackerman's personal style and demonstrated his mature reinterpretations. The technology and instruments employed give a fresh sound to the pieces.

Musical Legacy

With numerous gold and platinum albums to his name, as well as two Grammy nominations and a Grammy Award for Returning, Ackerman established himself as a popular and successful guitarist. He performed at such notable venues as the Imperial Palace in Japan, the Kremlin, the Montreux Jazz Festival, Carnegie Hall, and the Hollywood Bowl. As an artist and the founder and principal producer of Windham Hill Records, Ackerman played a significant role in the establishment and perpetuation of the style of instrumental music known as New Age. Perhaps most noteworthy, however, was Ackerman's focus on writing and performing music that emphasized emotion over intellect without sacrificing quality.

Frederick Key Smith

Further Reading

Bank, Rena F. "Shhh! Don't Call His Music 'New Age.'" The New York Times, Sepember 11, 1988, p. NJ19. Informative article discusses Ackerman's music, including his compositional style, in the context of New Age music.

Bronstein, Scott. "Making Money Out of 'Mellow.'" The New York Times, May 4, 1986, p. F4. Discusses the success of the Windham Hill label, focusing on Ackerman's influence on the company.

Cohen, Jonathan. "Six Questions with Will Ackerman." Billboard, November 19, 2005: 42. Provides a basic overview of Ackerman's creation of and involvement with the Windham Hill label.

Kleinfield, N. R. "Soft Music: What a Grind." The New York Times, November 8, 1992, p. 391. An informative and largely biographical article on Ackerman, before and after his involvement with Windham Hill.

Taylor, Chuck. "At Twenty-five, Windham Hill Keeps Its Spirit Alive." Billboard, July 21, 2001: 1. A retrospective look at the Windham Hill label, including material on Ackerman's life and music.

See also: Satie, Erik.

Roy Acuff

American country singer, songwriter, and fiddle player

Acuff grew up immersed in the rich musical climate of southeast Tennessee: lonesome mountain ballads, fiddle tunes, and church hymns. After World War II, when country artists were going for a smooth, pop-oriented style, Acuff never abandoned his Southern roots.

Born: September 15, 1903; Maynardville, Tennessee
Died: November 23, 1992; Nashville, Tennessee
Also known as: Roy Claxton Acuff (full name); King of Country Music
Member of: Roy Acuff and His Smokey Mountain Boys

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): Old Time Barn Music, 1951; Songs of the Smokey Mountains, 1955; Great Speckled Bird, 1958; Once More It's Roy Acuff, 1961; That Glory Bound Train, 1961; Hymn Time, 1962; Country Music Hall of Fame, 1963; Hand-Clapping Gospel Songs, 1963; Roy Acuff Sings American Folk Songs, 1963; Star of the Grand Ol' Opry, 1963; The World Is His Stage, 1963; Great Train Songs, 1965; Roy Acuff, 1965; The Voice of Country Music, 1965; Roy Acuff Sings Hank Williams, 1966; Waiting for My Call to Glory, 1966; I Saw the Light, 1970; Roy Acuff Time, 1970; Sunshine Special, 1970; Time, 1970; Back in the Country, 1974; Smokey Mountain Memories, 1975; That's Country, 1975; Wabash Cannonball, 1975; So Many Times, 1995; Fireball Mail, 2004; Just a Closer Walk with Thee, 2006.

ALBUMS (with Roy Acuff and His Smokey Mountain Boys): Fly Birdie Fly, 1990; Hear the Mighty Rush of Engine, 2001.

The Life

Roy Claxton Acuff (AK-uhf) was born in a small town in the Smokey Mountains near Knoxville, Tennessee. Acuff's main interests as a child were sports, and he excelled at baseball. He was scheduled for a tryout with the Yankees, but severe sunstroke contracted on a fishing trip in Florida, and a subsequent nervous breakdown, confined him to bed for all of 1930. He picked up his father's fiddle to pass the time, and when he recovered he was good enough to join Doc Haur's traveling medicine show. Acuff found he enjoyed pitching the cure-all Mocoton Tonic and entertaining crowds. He honed his showmanship skills and his singing on the road, and in 1932 he formed his own band, the Crazy Tennesseans. After they performed for local radio stations, they were asked to try out for the Grand Ole Opry in 1938, and they were hired.

The 1940's were a productive period for Acuff. During World War II, he was as popular as the big band leaders among the soldiers. It is said that Japanese soldiers in Pacific would taunt U.S. Marines by shouting, "To hell with Roy Acuff!" In 1942, with songwriter Fred Rose, Acuff formed Acuff-Rose Music Publishing, turning country-music songwriting into a professional business. By 1985 the company held twenty thousand copyrights.

After touring in the 1950's and 1960's—including shows with Elvis Presley—Acuff observed record sales declining, so he decided to perform mainly at the Grand Ole Opry. However, the folk boom in the 1960's gave acoustic music new life and a new audience: urbanites and college students. In 1971 Acuff sang on the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band's crossover album "Will the Circle Be Unbroken" with several other veteran country stars, exposing him to a new generation of fans.

The Music

Acuff grew up immersed in the rich musical climate of southeast Tennessee: lonesome mountain ballads, fiddle tunes, and church hymns. After the war, when many country artists were going for a smooth, pop-oriented style, Acuff never abandoned his Southern roots.

"Great Speckled Bird." A famous and widely performed song in the country-music canon, "Great Speckled Bird" clearly demonstrates early country's close connections to gospel and Anglo-American ballads. The title refers to a phrase from the King James Version of the Bible (Jeremiah 12:9), allegorically describing the persecution of the Christian church. Acuff heard the song performed by Charlie Swain and his group, the Black Shirts, in 1935, paying fifty cents for a copy, and he immediately incorporated the song into his repertoire. A talent scout for the American Record Company (which later became Columbia Records) looking for the song signed Acuff and recorded his rendition in 1936.

"Wabash Cannonball." When Acuff and his band first recorded this song in 1936, Sam "Dynamite" Hatcher handled the vocals. Published in 1904, and recorded by several country artists, including the Carter Family in 1929, this song is still a bluegrass and country standard. Though the Wabash Railroad did have a Cannonball speedster running in the 1880's between various Midwest locations, the song exaggerates its exploits, making it America's mythical train. Acuff recorded his version in 1947, with its memorable train-whistle introduction. This was one of Acuff's most requested numbers, played at every public performance. In 1965, after being asked how many times he had played the song, Acuff supposedly said, "About three times a day, 365 days a year, for thirty years."

"Precious Jewel." As a boy Acuff said that he had wondered how the earth could hold all sorts of treasures, but when a body is buried, it cannot contain the soul. While driving in the car late one night in 1940, with band members Pete "Bashful Brother Oswald" Kirby and "Sister" Rachel Veal, Acuff imagined an inspirational tune about the premature death of a young woman, a jewel on earth and in heaven. Within half an hour, he finished writing the song. Acuff and his band recorded "Precious Jewel" in April, and it became one of their most enduring pieces. In the 1980's, Acuff experienced the death of his wife and his band members Howdy Forrester and Jimmie Riddle. He rereleased this poignant song in 1987, this time as a duet with fellow veteran country superstar Charlie Louvin (a video came out in 1989). This version hit number eighty-seven on the country charts, the last time Acuff would appear on the charts.

"Wreck on the Highway." In 1938 the Dixon brothers recorded a maudlin song about a severe drunk-driving car accident in rural North Carolina. Their "I Didn't Hear Anybody Pray" met with only modest success. However, Acuff, thinking it was in the public domain, changed the melody slightly, deleted several stanzas, and altered the words in a few places. His more powerful version—"Wreck on the Highway"—went on to become a hit in 1942. In 1946 Acuff became concerned that Dorsey Dixon was indeed the composer, and he arranged for Dixon to receive credit. The song has many of the indispensable features of folk and early country music: the pain of needless and violent death always present in the background of daily life, the evils of drink, and the perils of neglecting Jesus.

Musical Legacy

In 1943 the governor of Tennessee, Prentice Cooper, declared that hillbilly music was disgracing the state. In protest Acuff entered the gubernatorial primaries in 1944. In 1948 he won the Republican nomination, although he was soundly defeated in the election. While Acuff's political career was modest, he left an impressive musical impact. In 1962 he was inducted into the Country Music Hall of Fame (the first living person ever elected). He received a Lifetime Achievement Grammy Award from the National Academy of Recording Arts and Sciences in 1987; in 1998 it gave him a Hall of Fame Award for "Wabash Cannonball." He was the first recipient of the Minnie Pearl Humanitarian Award in 1989. He received the American National Medal of the Arts from the National Endowment of the Arts in 1991. Acuff starred in eight films, and he has a star on the Hollywood Walk of Fame (at 1541 Vine Street). He performed before President Richard Nixon in 1974, and President George H. W. Bush gave him a Kennedy Center Honors Award in 1991.

James Stanlaw

Further Reading

Brown, Garrett, ed. Legends of Classic Country. Richmond, Va.: Time-Life Books, 2000. An illustrated history of country music until the 1970's that has a chapter on Acuff by a country-music scholar Charles Wolfe.

Dunkleberger, A. C. King of Country Music: The Life Story of Roy Acuff. Nashville, Tenn.: Williams, 1971. Acuff tells the story of his life, with details about his family and his life on the road.

Kingsbury, Paul, and Alanna Nash, eds. Will the Circle Be Unbroken: Country Music in America. New York: DK, 2006. Beautifully written and illustrated history of "America's sound track," with excellent material on Acuff.

Schlappi, Elizabeth. Roy Acuff: The Smoky Mountain Boy. Gretna, La.: Pelican, 1993. This well-researched biography is by a longtime collector of Acuff memorabilia. Includes a detailed discography until 1977 of some four hundred songs.

See also: Carter, Maybelle; Jones, George; Presley, Elvis; Scruggs, Earl; Watson, Doc; Williams, Hank.

John Adams

American classical composer and conductor

Adams's musical career embraces a wide range of musical genres, including the opera, the concerto, and works for chamber and symphony orchestras. His large-scale compositions are both innovative and deeply connected to the traditions of Western music.

Born: February 15, 1947; Worcester, Massachusetts
Also known as: John Coolidge Adams (full name)

Principal works

CHAMBER WORKS: Piano Quintet, 1970; American Standard, 1973 (for unspecified ensemble); Grounding, 1975 (for three solo voices, instruments, and electronics); China Gates, 1977; Phrygian Gates, 1977; Shaker Loops, 1978.
ELECTRONIC WORK: Onyx 4-Channel Tape, 1976.
OPERA (MUSIC): Nixon in China, 1987 (libretto by Alice Goodman); The Death of Klinghoffer, 1991 (libretto by Alice Goodman); I Was Looking at the Ceiling and Then I Saw the Sky, 1995 (libretto by June Jordan); Doctor Atomic, 2005 (libretto by Peter Sellars).
ORATORIO (music): El Niño, 2000 (libretto by Peter Sellars).
ORCHESTRAL WORKS: Common Tones in Simple Time, 1979; Shaker Loops, 1983 (for string orchestra); Harmonielehre, 1985; Eros Piano, 1989 (for piano and orchestra); Violin Concerto, 1994; On the Transmigration of Souls, 2002; The Dharma at Big Sur, 2003 (for violin); My Father Knew Charles Ives, 2003.
VOCAL WORKS: Harmonium, 1981 (for chorus and orchestra); Grand Pianola Music, 1982; The Wound-Dresser, 1988 (for baritone and orchestra).

The Life

John Coolidge Adams was born in Worcester, Massachusetts, on February 15, 1947, and raised in Woodstock, Vermont, and East Concord, New Hampshire. Devoted amateur musicians, his parents encouraged their son's musical interests. His father taught Adams the clarinet, and the composer remembers singing alongside his mother in a community production of the musical South Pacific. Adams also remembers sitting on a piano bench next to Duke Ellington when the legendary jazz musician and composer came to perform at a dance hall run by Adams's grandfather.

During his teenage years Adams's musical experiences were centered on Boston, where he took clarinet lessons and attended concerts. His instrumental skills and familiarity with orchestral music allowed him to be called upon occasionally to play as a substitute clarinetist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Entering Harvard University, he studied with composer Leon Kirchner and others, absorbing—finally, with serious misgivings—the twelve-tone serialism that at the time dominated the teaching of composition in many university music departments.

Attracted by the experimental arts scene in the San Francisco Bay Area, Adams headed west in his Volkswagen Beetle after completing his undergraduate studies at Harvard. First supporting himself by operating a forklift in a warehouse, he began teaching within a year at the San Francisco Conservatory of Music, where he also led a new music ensemble and explored electronic sound. Among his influences at the time were the works of composer John Cage, who embraced the notion of chance events in the creation of art, and the compositions of such minimalists as Steve Reich and Terry Reilly.

With the appearance of mature compositions such as Shaker Loops and Harmonium in the early 1980's, Adams became a prominent musical personality in the San Francisco area. In 1983, after several years as an artistic adviser to the San Francisco Symphony, he became its first composer-in-residence. While remaining closely identified with the Bay Area, where he has settled with his wife and two children, Adams has also forged a strong relationship with Los Angeles and its Philharmonic Orchestra, which he has conducted on several occasions.

Living in California inspired Adams to learn to read and speak Spanish, and his growing affinity for Latin American culture led to the composition of an oratorio, El Niño, with texts in Spanish, Latin, and English. He has also established strong ties with Europe as both conductor and composer. In 2003 Adams was awarded the Pulitzer Prize for his composition On the Transmigration of Souls, a work commissioned by the New York Philharmonic in memory of the victims of the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001. The premiere recording of the work received three Grammy awards in 2005.

John Adams. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

The Music

Adams began composing by the age of ten, and by fourteen he had written a suite for string orchestra and heard it performed by a local community orchestra. Early influences included American popular music as well as the traditional repertoire of the European classics. Adams has always been an avid student of what he has called "vernacular" music, but exposure to the great symphonic works of such composers as Jean Sibelius and Anton Bruckner was especially formative. Adams remarks that his life was "utterly transformed" by the availability of long-playing recordings of classical music, which had become commonplace and affordable in the mid-1950's.

While Adams attended Harvard University in the late 1960's, he absorbed the music of European and American modernism while also listening to pop, soul, and rock music. The contrast between the exuberance of popular music and the seemingly exhausted, uncommunicative language of contemporary classical music weighed upon him, and in 1972 he determined that he needed a change of scene. Instead of traveling to Europe—where he felt he would find music of the same unappealing, intellectual modernism—he went to California, which he made his home in 1972.

Shaker Loops. One of the experimental musical trends that Adams encountered in California was minimalism. Characterized by a devotion to pulse, repetition, and sustained diatonic harmony, minimalism was deeply attractive to Adams. Though he was younger than most of his minimalist colleagues, he soon became recognized as a significant contributor to the movement. His initial exploration of the minimalist idiom took the form of a work for strings called Wavemaker, which was soon withdrawn. In 1977 Shaker Loops, for string sextet, was completed and attracted immediate attention. A 1983 adaptation of the work for string orchestra is widely regarded as a classic of the minimalist idiom. Among the technical ideas underlying Shaker Loops, and contributing to its title, is the "tape loop" familiar from earlier works by Reich and others in which a piece of audiotape cycles repeatedly through a playback head.

Harmonielehre. Beginning in the 1980's, Adams completed large-scale works almost yearly. These vary widely in mood and artistic intention, but their progress is marked by Adams's increasing confidence in using large orchestral forces. Harmonium for orchestra and chorus sets poems by the Englishman John Donne and the American Emily Dickinson. Harmonielehre, another commission from the San Francisco Symphony, appeared just over three years later. The title, translated as "theory of harmony," is a reference to an influential book by Austrian composer Arnold Schoenberg. Adams said that this composition was "the culmination—so far—of my teaching myself about harmony." However, Harmonielehre seems to address harmony not just in Adams's musical practice but also in his personal experiences: The composer related that it was an intense dream that unlocked the composition of this work after months of creative blockage.

Nixon in China and The Death of Klinghoffer. First presented in 1987 and 1991 respectively, these operas established Adams as an artist willing to address unconventional subject matter and to challenge the public with novel musical gestures. The idea for Nixon in China originated not with the composer but with stage director Peter Sellars. The action of the opera takes place over a few days in February, 1972, when U.S. president Richard Nixon traveled to China to meet with Chinese leader Mao Zedong. The representation of an historic event in an opera while many of its participants were still living was rightly thought to be artistically daring, and Adams's aggressive score lives up to Sellars's conception and the libretto by poet Alice Goodman. Adams collaborated again with Sellars and Goodman for The Death of Klinghoffer, but this time difficulties beset the project because of its subject matter: the hijacking by terrorists of the cruise liner Achille Lauro in 1985, during which an American passenger, Leon Klinghoffer, was murdered and thrown overboard. Many who heard the opera, and others who only read about it, took exception to its representation of the terrorists, and some even asserted that the terrorists were more sympathetically portrayed than the victims. Regardless of this intractable political and social controversy, The Death of Klinghoffer is a resonant and theatrically effective work.

Violin Concerto. In writing a violin concerto, Adams was acutely aware of the standard set by the great Romantic and early twentieth century composers, and more than one aspect of Adams's composing practices might have precluded him from the task. For example, Adams did not think of himself as a natural melodist, and he was not accustomed to setting out in advance the detailed architecture of a piece. Moreover, he was not a string player—though he was fascinated by the violin and prepared for this composition by listening to many performances of non-Western bowed string instruments. It was Adams's initial conception to follow a fast first movement with concluding slower movements, but the work eventually exhibited the familiar fast-slow-fast three-movement form, with the middle section assuming an intensely lyrical, rhapsodic character contrasting strongly with the pyrotechnical, virtuosic writing in the outer movements. A measure of the work's artistic success is that it was played by more than a dozen violin soloists in the three years following its first performance.

Doctor Atomic. This work is centered on J. Robert Oppenheimer, director of the Manhattan Project, which developed the atomic bombs dropped on Hiroshima and Nagasaki, Japan, in August, 1945. The theme of the opera was suggested to Adams by the director of the San Francisco Opera, and the work was composed in less than eighteen months. Using diverse documentary and literary sources, Adams and director Sellars sought to evoke the personalities and emotions of the story's characters as they prepared for the weapons test at the Trinity site in July, 1945. Adams's first inspirations came from the music of science-fiction films of the post-World War II era and from the works of the French-born American composer Edgard Varèse, whose Déserts (1954) suggested to Adams a "post-nuclear holocaust landscape." Like several other Adams works, Doctor Atomic employs synthesizers, amplified voices, acoustic instruments, and taped sounds and music. Its premiere took place at the San Francisco Opera on October 1, 2005.

The Dharma at Big Sur and My Father Knew Charles Ives. These works, both from 2003, can be paired on the basis of how they reflect, respectively, Adams's productive encounter with California and the West and his New England origins. The Dharma at Big Sur is an indirect homage to Beat writer Jack Kerouac and, more directly, to California composer Lou Harrison. It is essentially a violin concerto written for a six-string electric violin tuned in Just Intonation, a system of tuning long favored by Harrison. The composition of the work was inspired by Adams's collaboration with the virtuoso violinist Tracy Silverman and embodies aspects of West Coast landscape and culture that are close to the composer's heart.

The title of My Father Knew Charles Ives refers to an innovative and somewhat eccentric composer who is a central figure in the history of American music. Noting that his father did not actually know Ives but might well have found him to be a delightful companion, Adams intends this composition to call to mind Ives's 1914 masterpiece, Three Places in New England.

Musical Legacy

Though performances of Adams's compositions are relatively frequent and widespread, recordings are the principal means through which listeners come to know his work. Adams's recordings of his own work are well supported not only by thorough, well-written liner notes but also by an expertly designed Web site run by Adams's technical organization. A meticulous attention to modern communications media is hardly unique to Adams, but the adequacy and transparency of this communication indicates an awareness not just of marketing but also of the need to bridge the distance between artists and the public. Adams's works are undoubtedly his most significant legacy, but the public form of his career has also notably contributed to the vitality of the contemporary music scene.

Clyde S. McConnell

Further Reading

Adams, John. "John Adams." http://www.earbox.com. Adams's official Web site offers biographical information, lists of works and recordings, links, and more.

May, Thomas, ed. The John Adams Reader: Essential Writings on an American Composer. Pompton Plains, N.J.: Amadeus Press, 2006. Engrossing book brings together reminiscences, reviews, and concert programs, though it lacks in-depth analysis.

Ross, Alex. "The Harmonist." The New Yorker 76, no. 41 (January 8, 2001): 40-46. Ross is a brilliant and sympathetic observer of Adams as musician and cultural figure.

Schiff, David. "Memory Spaces: John Adams's On the Transmigration of Souls Finds Redemption in September 11, and Should Bring Contemporary Classical Music to a New Audience." The Atlantic Monthly 291, no. 3 (April, 2003): 127-130. Describes Adams's "9/11" work and explains it in the context of the composer's earlier compositions.

Taruskin, Richard. "Music's Dangers and the Case for Control." The New York Times, December 9, 2001. A professor of music history at the University of California, Berkeley, articulates his belief that works such as The Death of Klinghoffer should be withheld from certain audiences, some of the time.

See also: Cage, John; Ellington, Duke; Nancarrow, Conlon; Reich, Steve; Salonen, Esa-Pekka; Schoenberg, Arnold.

Cannonball Adderley

American jazz saxophonist and composer

Adderley was a pioneer of the hard-bop, funky style of jazz prevalent in the 1960's and 1970's. At a time when popular interest in jazz was waning, he helped reestablish jazz music in the mainstream with a blues- and gospel-influenced sound.

Born: September 15, 1928; Tampa, Florida
Died: August 8, 1975; Gary, Indiana
Also known as: Julian Edwin Adderley (full name)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: The Adderleys: Cannonball and Nat, 1955 (with Nat Adderley); Cannonball Adderley and Strings, 1955; Presenting Cannonball, 1955; Julian Cannonball Adderley, 1955; In the Land of Hi-Fi, 1956; Cannonball En Route, 1957; Cannonball's Sharpshooters, 1958; Somethin' Else, 1958 (with Miles Davis, Hank Jones, Sam Jones, and Art Blakey); Alabama Concerto, 1958; Jump for Joy, 1958; Things Are Getting Better, 1958 (with Milt Jackson); Cannonball and Coltrane, 1959 (with John Coltrane); Cannonball Adderley Collection, Vol. 6: Cannonball Takes Charge, 1959; Cannonball Adderley Collection, Vol. 1: Them Dirty Blues, 1960; Cannonball Adderley Collection, Vol. 4: The Poll Winners, 1960; Cannonball Adderley Collection, Vol. 5: The Quintet at the Lighthouse, 1960; Know What I Mean?, 1961; African Waltz, 1961; The Quintet Plus, 1961; Nancy Wilson/ Cannonball Adderley, 1961; The Lush Side of Cannonball, 1962; Cannonball Adderley Collection, Vol. 2: Bossa Nova, 1962; Cannonball Adderley

Collection, Vol. 7: Cannonball in Europe, 1962; Cannonball Adderley Collection, Vol. 3: Jazz Workshop Revisited, 1962; Cannonball Adderley, 1962; Two for the Blues, 1963; Jazz Workshop Revisited, 1963; Fiddler on the Roof, 1964; Domination, 1965; Great Love Themes, 1966; Mercy, Mercy, Mercy! Live at "The Club," 1966; 74 Miles Away/Walk Tall, 1967; Why Am I Treated So Bad!, 1967; Accent on Africa, 1968; Country Preacher, 1969; The Happy People, 1970; Experience the E, Tensity, Dialogues, 1970; Inside Straight, 1973; Cannonball Adderley and Friends, 1973; Pyramid, 1974; Phenix, 1975; Lovers, 1975; Big Man, 1975; Bohemia After Dark, 2003; Cannonball Plays Zawinul, 2004.

The Life

Julian Edwin "Cannonball" Adderley (AD-dur-lee) was born in Tampa, Florida, to musical parents. He began playing music as a child, and later he joined his high school's jazz group. After attending Florida A&M in Tallahassee, he directed the jazz band at Dillard High School in Fort Lauderdale from 1948 to 1956. During this time, while he studied at the U.S. Naval Academy School of Music, he played his saxophone in military bands and in other groups.

Adderley first arrived on the New York jazz scene in 1955, intending to accompany his brother, Nat, also a jazz instrumentalist, and start graduate school at New York University. By chance, he landed a gig with Oscar Pettiford and his band after sitting in with them at Club Bohemia, and this led to a recording contract. When Miles Davis first heard Adderley's saxophone, he was interested in collaborating. However, Adderley went back to Florida to teach, so it was not until October of 1957 that Adderley joined Davis's legendary group.

Adderley's career was launched by his participation in several influential recordings with Davis, including Kind of Blue (1959). Adderley went on to make several records under his own name, joining forces with his brother. They recorded and toured successfully until 1975. Later in his career, Adderley returned to teaching, which he loved, by incorporating lectures and workshops in his concerts on college campuses.

Adderley's nickname comes from childhood, when friends in Florida started calling him "Cannibal" because of his large appetite. This was then slurred into "Cannonball." Despite his aggressive-sounding nickname, Adderley was a jovial, intelligent, and kind gentleman. He died in 1975 after a massive stroke.

The Music

Adderley's musical style was rooted in gospel, blues, and jazz. He began listening to and collecting jazz records at a young age. At the same time, he was dancing to gospel music every Sunday night at the Tabernacle Baptist Church. When he first arrived in New York in the 1950's, Adderley was called the "new Bird" (after Charlie "Yardbird"

Cannonball Adderley. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

Parker, a popular jazz saxophonist who had recently died), but Adderley's warm sound and controlled style of improvisation guaranteed that he was a unique artist. His later releases under his own name were characterized by a funky, bluesy hard-bop style that appealed to both casual audiences and jazz purists.

Early Works. Although Adderley produced several records under his own name in the late 1950's, it was as a sideman for Davis that Adderley grew as an artist by contributing his sound to such successful albums as Kind of Blue. Playing alongside the remarkable tenor saxophonist John Coltrane greatly challenged Adderley and influenced the sound and style of his improvisations. Addeley's soul-infused, hard-swinging solos countered Coltrane's lengthy explorations, while the pair's impassioned playing provided a balance to the laid-back style of Davis.

Mercy, Mercy, Mercy! Live at "The Club." One might be easily fooled by the liner notes for this album, which place the setting of this live recording at "The Club." However, Adderley pretended to have recorded this album there as a favor to the Chicago club's owner, who was in need of business. The album was recorded in a Hollywood studio in 1966, with an audience invited to contribute the spirit of an appreciative crowd to the sound of the album. It became one of the top-selling jazz albums, and the title cut, written by Austrian-born pianist Joe Zawinul, was a Top 10 single. Other contributions to the album were Cannonball's "Sack o' Woe" and "Sticks," as well as Nat Adderley's "Fun" and "Games." The album reflected the spirit of the gospel and blues tradition, and it also explored the harmonic language of bebop.

Country Preacher. Recorded live at a Saturday-morning session of the Operation Breadbasket organization in 1969, this album melds Adderley's sociopolitical activism and his artistry. His group appeared at this event in conjunction with the Reverend Jesse Jackson, who was promoting justice and freedom for African Americans. The album contains stirring, uplifting, and poignant music, from the upbeat march "Walk Tall" to the bluesy "Country Preacher." The electric-piano stylings of Zawinul and Adderley's interactions with the audience enhance the soul-jazz, church-style feel of this album. The four-part "Afro-Spanish Omelette" explores avant-garde musical territory.

Musical Legacy

Witty and articulate, Adderley was a consummate bandleader, able to establish rapport with audiences while entertaining them as a creative soloist. Many of his works became leading sellers on the Riverside Records label, and his albums and singles often appeared on Billboard charts. At a time when jazz was moving toward more avant-garde styles, Adderley used the music of traditional African American culture in a modern context. He kept conventional concepts of melody and harmony in his music, and he expanded his blues foundation to include a variety of expressions from jazz, Latin, and pop traditions. His music reflected the pride of black Americans in the wake of the Civil Rights movement. Through his records, touring, and teaching in America and abroad, Adderley spread his legacy of social awareness.

Staci A. Spring

Further Reading

Baker, David N. The Jazz Style of Cannonball Adderley: A Musical and Historical Perspective. Miami, Fla.: Studio 224, 1980. Includes musical transcriptions for the study of Adderley's style. Bibliography, discography.

DeMichael, Don. "Cannonball Adderley: The Responsibilities of Success." Down Beat 63, no. 1 (January, 1996): 34. This reprint of a 1962 interview with the saxophonist gives highlights of his career and includes Adderley's views on his responsibility toward his audience.

Jones, Ryan Patrick."'You Know What I Mean?' The Pedagogical Canon of 'Cannonball.'" Current Musicology 79/80 (Spring/Fall, 2005): 169. Explores the way Adderley applied his teaching methods to his everyday professional career.

Price, Tim, ed. Julian "Cannonball" Adderley Collection. Milwaukee, Wis.: Hal Leonard, 1995. Includes twenty-four solo transcriptions, performance notes, photographs, and an interview with Nat Adderley.

Sheridan, Chris. Dis Here: A Bio-discography of Julian "Cannonball" Adderley. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2000. Annotated discography lists every Adderley recording session. Provides anecdotes and details of Adderley's daily life during his professional career.

Williams, Gene A. "Julian 'Cannonball' Adderley

(1928-1975)." The Black Perspective in Music 4, no. 3 (Autumn, 1976): 307. An article published shortly after his death comments on Adderley's life, music, and contributions to the African American community.

See also: Coltrane, John; Davis, Miles; Jones, Hank; Parker, Charlie.

Toshiko Akiyoshi

American jazz composer, pianist, and bandleader

A leading composer, Akiyoshi blends Japanese musical and cultural elements into her jazz compositions.

Born: December 12, 1929; Darien, China
Also known as: Toshiko Mariano
Member of: The Toshiko Akiyoshi Jazz Orchestra

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): Toshiko's Piano, 1953; Amazing Toshiko Akiyoshi, 1954; Toshiko, Her Trio, Her Quartet, 1956; The Many Sides of Toshiko, 1957; United Nations, 1958; Toshiko Mariano and Her Big Band: Recorded in Tokyo, 1965; Road Time, 1976; March of the Tadpoles, 1977; Salted Gingko Nuts, 1978; From Toshiko with Love, 1981; Remembering Bud/Cleopatra's Dream, 1992; Desert Lady/Fantasy, 1993; Monopoly Game, 2001; Shio Ginnan, 2001.

ALBUMS (with the Lew Tabackin Big Band): Kogun, 1974; Long Yellow Road, 1975; Insights, 1976; Tales of a Courtesan, 1976; Farewell to Mingus, 1980; European Memoirs, 1982.

ALBUMS (with the Toshiko Akiyoshi Jazz Orchestra featuring Lew Tabackin): Wishing Peace, 1986; Four Seasons of Morita Village, 2001; Hiroshima: Rising from the Abyss, 2003.

WRITINGS OF INTEREST: Life with Jazz, 1996 (autobiography).

The Life

Toshiko Akiyoshi (toh-shee-koh a-kih-yoh-shee) was born in the Manchuria region of China to a family that, among others, profited from Japan's occupation of the region. Akiyoshi benefited from a substantial and strict educational system, and music was part of her curriculum, starting at age seven with training in classical piano.

With the collapse of the Japanese empire in 1945, her family lost everything, and it relocated to Japan. Akiyoshi remained interested in music, but she lacked an instrument. This motivated her to join a band that played popular tunes for American military personnel. Initially she kept this job a secret from her family, but it was decided later that Akiyoshi could play until she entered medical school. The family's difficult financial situation led to her advanced education being repeatedly postponed, however, and Akiyoshi began contemplating a career in music. Although she had focused on classical piano, Akiyoshi began exploring jazz after hearing several recordings, including Teddy Wilson's "Sweet Lorraine."

Akiyoshi soon moved to Tokyo, and by 1951 she was leading a combo, although listening to recordings remained her primary training tool (particularly those of Bud Powell). In 1953 Oscar Peterson heard Akiyoshi play, and he suggested to record producer Norman Granz that she be recorded. Granz recorded Akiyoshi later that year. In 1956 she entered Boston's Berklee School of Music, where she learned about jazz composition. She also found some professional success, with opportunities to play with many established artists (including Charles Mingus). Stereotyped as a woman and a foreigner, Akiyoshi was prevented from reaching the status she desired. In 1959, Akiyoshi married saxophonist Charlie Mariano. Forming a quartet, they enjoyed some success, finding an outlet for Akiyoshi's compositional endeavors.

Akiyoshi returned to Japan in 1964, where she recorded an album for the Jazz in Japan series, and she gave birth to a daughter, Michiru Mariano. Akiyoshi spent the second half of the decade working in Boston, New York, and Tokyo. She continued to find employment, but the number of people who saw beyond her gender and ethnicity remained a fairly small circle, jazz critic Leonard Feather being among the most notable. Her marriage soon ended, and much of her subsequent activity was focused on a 1967 New York big band debut.

In 1969 she married saxophonist Lew Tabackin, and they moved to Los Angeles in 1972. There, they formed a quartet and a big band, which they initially organized as a rehearsal ensemble for Akiyoshi's continued compositional development. In 1974 the band's first album, Kogun, was released in Japan, where it was a commercial success. Other recordings followed, and by 1976 the band was winning Down Beat polls, and its albums were beginning to garner significant awards.

In 1982 Tabackin and Akiyoshi decided to move to New York, where they reorganized the ensemble as the Toshiko Akiyoshi Jazz Orchestra featuring Lew Tabackin. Although the group remained active until 2003, it did not achieve its previous level of commercial success. Nevertheless, Akiyoshi's works continued to earn critical acclaim. One of her longer compositions, Hiroshima: Rising from the Abyss, garnered considerable attention, and Four Seasons of the Morita Village won the Swing Journal Silver Award. Akiyoshi received fourteen Grammy Award nominations, and in 2007 she was named a National Endowment of the Arts Jazz Master.

The Music

Akiyoshi's gradual career development provided for a methodical and thorough musical growth. Her many years of piano practice resulted in an impressive level of technical ability and stylistic flexibility. Akiyoshi's compositional output includes works in swing, swing-shuffle, blues, waltz, Latin, ballad, and bebop styles, and her abilities are clearly revealed through her recordings, particularly those of Akiyoshi with the Lew Tabackin Big Band. Her scores point to many influences, including Mingus, Duke Ellington, Gil Evans, and Thelonious Monk.

Akiyoshi has composed works of modest and longer length. Road Time, Insights, and Farewell to Mingus, for example, include works ten minutes and longer. Minimata, a three-movement suite released on Insights, and "Henpecked Old Man," from the live album Road Time, have a recorded duration in excess of twenty-one minutes. Many of Akiyoshi's compositions, however, include extended sections available for improvised solos. "Henpecked Old Man," for example, features eight minutes of improvisation prior to the ensemble's entrance, and the work showcases several soloists. While Akiyoshi and Tabackin each displayed improvisational skills in these recordings (Tabackin was a particularly powerful soloist, on both tenor saxophone and flute), Akiyoshi devoted considerable space to featuring other members of the band, including Bobby Shew, Steven Huffsteter, Bill Byrne, and Bill Reichenbach. Although Akiyoshi's compositions lend much variety to the band's recorded legacy, it must also be noted that the quality of improvisation is very strong.

"Strive for Jive." Composed in a fast bebop style, this up-tempo song from Tales of a Courtesan evokes much of the Charlie Parker-Dizzy Gillespie tradition. In thirty-two-measure aaba form, the harmonic rhythm is fast, and the writing for the ensemble embraces bebop virtuosity. Although the voicings are rich in harmonic content, the composite shape of the harmonized melody recalls a standard bebop rendition of the tune. This work is among Akiyoshi's more virtuosic compositions of her early mature style.

Minimata. Akiyoshi's incorporation of Japanese music elements, played by Japanese musicians as well as imitated in stylized renditions by the band's players, gave the band's sound a unique identity. Appearing on Insights and organized in three movements, entitled "Peaceful Village," "Prosperity and Consequence," and "Epilogue," Minimata opens with a child (Akiyoshi's daughter) singing a traditional Japanese melody, which then transitions into a duet (for trumpet and flute), playing a variant of the opening tune in unison. The resulting imperfections in intonation between the two players bear a resemblance to the Japanese heterophonic performance style. In the final movement, traditional Japanese vocals and percussion (provided by No artists, from Japanese musical dramas) are superimposed upon Tabackin's final solo (with the rhythm section) and the ensemble's concluding tutti.

Japanese Sound. "Kisarazu Jink," a composition included in Toshiko Mariano and Her Big Band: Recorded in Tokyo, is built on a traditional Japanese tune, but Akiyoshi made no attempt to project the Japanese elements as authentic. Instead, Akiyoshi's nonmetrical piano introduction is followed by a hard-driving swing style, in 5/4 meter. Tales of a Courtesan is among the first of her recordings to reveal Akiyoshi's experiments in including Japanese elements within the big band environment, although the interest seems primarily focused on the philosophical side rather than in the musical vocabulary. In the live recording Road Time, and specifically in "Kogun," Japanese musical elements possess deeper compositional value. While Akiyoshi initially tended to keep the Japanese-oriented sections distinct from those in more traditional jazz styles, she did begin to blend them to a greater degree as the band's repertoire continued to expand.

While her charts present the players with considerable challenges, and the use of Japanese music elements can be viewed as her most notable contribution to jazz, in other areas Akiyoshi seems relatively conservative. Formally, outside of sections in which Japanese music elements are featured, she tends to write within standard jazz structures, sometimes sprinkled with phrase extensions and other formal alterations. Similarly, while she makes liberal use of extended harmonies, rich chromatically altered chords, tritone substitutions, and other reharmonization techniques, her works are quite tonal.

"Studio J." "Studio J" was inspired, according to Feather, by Akiyoshi's memories of improvisational training at the Berklee School of Music. Composed in the standard thirty-two-measure aaba form, this piece, which appears on Insights, features a mixture of traditional jazz harmony with more ambitious chromaticism and substantial use of extended harmonies. There is frequent use of contrary motion when the ensemble tutti is in voicings, and the rhythmic style is dense and complex. The extended solo section is followed by an energetic shout chorus, and Akiyoshi concludes the work by reprising the ensemble's opening idea.

Musical Legacy

Akiyoshi's greatest legacy lies in her original contribution to the field of jazz. As a woman, she is considered an exceptional musician and a pioneer. Her Japanese nationality presented another hurdle in achieving success in jazz, but she persevered. As a composer, she balanced convention with her own voice, releasing nothing that was not of excellent quality. Finally, her interest in blending Japanese elements into the big band compositional vehicle provided an early example for those artists active the crossover movement.

Dane O. Heuchemer

Further Reading

Feather, Leonard. The Passion for Jazz. New York: Horizon, 1980. Feather was among Akiyoshi's most avid supporters, and this interview from 1976, with both Akiyoshi and Tabackin, concentrates on their careers up to the point where their big band was finally finding success. Feather also wrote the album notes for many of the Akiyoshi-Tabackin Big Band recordings, and his comments provide considerable background and insight into her works.

Koplewitz, Laura. "Toshiko Akiyoshi: Jazz Composer, Arranger, Pianist, and Conductor." In The Musical Woman: An International Perspective, Volume II, 1984-85, edited by Judith Lang Zaimont. New York: Greenwood Press, 1985. This is a fairly comprehensive treatment of Akiyoshi, including biographical information and a discussion of her approach to composition, her style, and more. The information is relevant to the Akiyoshi-Tabackin Big Band era.

Koyama, Kiyoshi. "Jazz in Japan." In The Oxford Companion to Jazz, edited by Bill Kirchner. Oxford, England: Oxford University Press, 2000. While Akiyoshi is just one of the musicians discussed, this article provides context for the atmosphere in which she began her career and found substantial popularity.

Lyons, Len. The Great Jazz Pianists: Speaking of Their Lives and Music. New York: Da Capo Press, 1983. An interview with Akiyoshi concentrates primarily on her style as a pianist, an issue that is understated in the study of her career.

See also: Ellington, Duke; Evans, Bill; Gillespie, Dizzy; Mingus, Charles; Monk, Thelonious; Parker, Charlie; Peterson, Oscar; Powell, Bud.

Herb Alpert

American trumpet player and record producer

In addition to pioneering an eclectic mix of mariachi, jazz, and rock and roll known as Ameriachi in the 1960's, Alpert cofounded A&M Records, which became a leading independent record label.

Born: March 31, 1935; Los Angeles, California
Also known as: Herbert Alpert (full name)
Member of: Herb Alpert and the Tijuana Brass

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): Just You and Me, 1976; Herb Alpert/Hugh Masekala, 1978; Rise, 1979; Beyond, 1980; Magic Man, 1981; Fandango, 1982; Blow Your Own Horn, 1983; Wild Romance, 1985; Keep Your Eye on Me, 1987; Under a Spanish Moon, 1988; My Abstract Heart, 1989; North on South Street, 1991; Midnight Sun, 1992; Second Wind, 1996; Passion Dance, 1997.

ALBUMS (with the Tijuana Brass): The Lonely Bull, 1962; Herb Alpert's Tijuana Brass, Vol. 2, 1963; South of the Border, 1964; Going Places, 1965; Whipped Cream and Other Delights, 1965; S. R. O., 1966; Tijuana Brass, 1966; What Now My Love, 1966; Herb Alpert's Ninth, 1967; Sounds Like, 1967; Beat of the Brass, 1968; Christmas Album, 1968; The Brass Are Comin', 1969; Warm, 1969; Summertime, 1971; Solid Brass, 1972; You Smile, the Song Begins, 1974; Coney Island, 1975; Noche de amor, 1983; Bullish, 1984; Colors, 1999.

SINGLES (solo): "This Guy's in Love with You," 1968; "I Need You," 1973 (with the Tijuana Brass); "Rotation/Angelina," 1979; "North on South St.," 1991; "Jump St.," 1991.

The Life

Born in Los Angeles in 1935, Herbert Alpert (AL-purt) grew up in a family of amateur musicians. His Russian father played mandolin, his mother played the violin, his sister played piano, and his brother played drums. Alpert began playing trumpet at age eight. Later, after two years of study at the University of Southern California, he left school to enlist as a trumpeter in the Sixth Army Band in San Francisco. His teachers over the years included Harold "Pappy" Mitchell, Ben Klatzkin, Lou Maggio, and Carmine Caruso.

In 1962 Alpert cofounded, with Jerry Moss, A&M Records (for Alpert and Moss). Each invested a paltry one hundred dollars in the venture, which was launched in Alpert's garage. The label's first record, The Lonely Bull, featured Alpert on trumpet with sounds from a live bullfight and a backing group of studio musicians dubbed the Tijuana Brass. Over the next three decades, A&M Records discovered and signed a number of prominent musicians, including the Carpenters, Sting, Janet Jackson, and Garbage. By 1966 A&M Records was worth an estimated twenty million dollars, and in 1990 the label was sold to PolyGram for more than five hundred million dollars.

Active as a recording artist from 1958 to 1999, Alpert sold more than seventy-two million records worldwide. His accolades include seven Grammy Awards, sixteen Grammy nominations, fourteen platinum albums, five number-one albums, and a number-one single. With the sale of 13.7 million albums in 1966, he had an astonishing five albums at one time on the Billboard Top 20. His recording of "This Guy's in Love with You," by Burt Bacharach and Hal David, hit number one on the charts in 1968. In the 1970's he added other artistic expressions to his life, working in painting and sculpture. In 1988 he played "The Star Spangled Banner" at Super Bowl XXII in San Diego.

Alpert used his wealth to promote the performing arts, primarily through the Herb Alpert Foundation. In 1994 he funded the Alpert Award in the Arts through the California Institute of the Arts, an annual monetary prize that goes to five independent artists in the fields of dance, film-video, music, theater, and the visual arts. In 2007 he gave thirty million dollars to the University of California, Los Angeles, where the school of music was renamed in his honor.

The Music

Alpert's career divides roughly into three periods. From 1962 to the mid-1970's Alpert and the Tijuana Brass popularized Ameriachi, a fusion of jazz, mariachi, and rock and roll. Its brilliant sound of multiple mariachi trumpets over a Latin-rock accompaniment of acoustic guitar and drums drew a wide audience. In 1965 Whipped Cream and Other Delights captured the group at its height, and its racy cover, which featured an apparently naked woman covered in whipped cream, attracted popular attention. Alpert's solo career followed in the 1970's, a time during which Alpert recorded with trumpeter Hugh Masekela and produced the disco-funk-inspired sound epitomized by his album Rise. After a brief period of inactivity, Alpert made a comeback in 1996, issuing several albums featuring an eclectic mix of jazz, salsa, and hip-hop.

Going Places. The definitive Tijuana Brass album Going Places exhibits the musical formula that propelled Alpert to fame. The opening track, "Tijuana Taxi," composed by band member Ervan Coleman, commences with a honking horn over a shuffle drumbeat followed by the group's distinctive trumpeting over a marimba-guitar accompaniment. Composed in thirty-two-bar aaba form, this ditty moves forward on the sequencing of a short, catchy riff. Each a section features the seven-note riff in sequence. The bridge section includes an antiphonal call-and-response between the trumpets and the trombone, punctuated by the taxi horn. The following a sections explore different textures, employing solo marimba and dueting trumpets. "Spanish Flea" follows the same formula: a sequenced two-bar riff, a trumpet duet, a bridge featuring the trumpets with the answering trombone, a concluding section with solo balalaika and another trumpet duet, and continual punctuation points provided by the bass drum.

Rise. The release of Rise in 1979 solidified Alpert's solo career, propelling him back to the top of the charts after an extended absence. His newfound sound, with its heavy reliance on disco and funk, is evident in the opening moments of the album's first track, "1980," an Alpert composition. The classic Tijuana Brass instruments are now replaced by an electronically altered trumpet sound (with a heavy reverb and occasionally synthesized), an electric piano, and a synthesized bass. However, "1980" includes many of Alpert's tried-and-true formulas: a prominent trumpet duet toward the end of the track, a repeated sequenced riff, phrase punctuations played by the snare drum, and a bridge section juxtaposing the trumpet and the bass. Alpert's Tijuana Brass roots reappear in the background of the album's title track, which includes a marimba, mariachi-inspired turn figures on the trumpet, and nonmusical source material, including talking and a clap track.

The Late Albums. Alpert shows an interest in a variety of musical styles in Second Wind, Passion Dance, and Colors. Much of Second Wind draws on jazz fusion, especially late Miles Davis, while Passion Dance turns to salsa. The difference between Alpert's late recordings and his 1980's-era albums is apparent in "Route 101," a cover from Fandango. Latin sounds, together with elements of hip-hop, return in Colors. The album is almost completely electronic, including an electronic accordion on "Libertango," though the cover of "Magic Man" uses Alpert's more familiar laid-back Latin sound. None of these late albums achieved the notoriety of his earlier recordings. All were released on another Alpert-Moss venture, the short-lived Almo Sounds label.

Musical Legacy

Alpert's musical legacy is threefold. First, he demonstrated the economic viability and popular potential of purely instrumental music, blazing a new trail that made possible the careers of instrumentalists such as Chuck Mangione, Kenny G, and Chris Botti. Second, his work as a record executive at A&M Records led to the discovery of a number of highly influential musicians. Finally, much of Alpert's legacy is still being written, as his foundation has shaped the paths of young musicians through endowments, scholarships, and grants.

Bryan Proksch

Further Reading

Erdmann, Tom. "A Passion for Creativity: An Interview with Herb Alpert." International Trumpet Guild Journal 29, no. 2 (2005): 21-30. A lengthy interview with Alpert on a wide range of topics.

Gridley, Mark, Robert Maxham, and Robert Hoff. "Three Approaches to Defining Jazz." Musical Quarterly 73 (1989): 513-531. This article challenges the popular notion that Alpert's music can be defined as jazz.

Lewis, George H. "Ghosts, Ragged but Beautiful: Influences of Mexican Music on American Country-Western and Rock and Roll." Popular Music and Society 15, no. 4 (1991): 85-103. Brief discussion of Alpert's musical influences in the 1960's.

Roberts, John Storm. The Latin Tinge. Oxford, England: Oxford University Press, 1979. Outline of Alpert's career, including his fall from popularity in the early 1970's.

Rollin, Betty. "Small Band, Big Sound: The Tijuana Brass." Look, June 14, 1966, 104-110. An account of Alpert's rocketlike rise to popularity.

See also: Bacharach, Burt; Carpenter, Karen; David, Hal; Getz, Stan; Iglesias, Julio; Jennings, Waylon; Masekela, Hugh; Notorious B.I.G.; Sting; Warwick, Dionne.

Trey Anastasio

American rock guitarist, songwriter, and jazz composer

A founding member of the jamband Phish, Anastasio remains an integral figure in the development of America's contemporary jamband scene, creating music that allows relentless improvisation, challenges commercial genre boundaries, and strives for a communal intimacy that blurs the lines between the stage and the audience.

Born: September 30, 1964; Fort Worth, Texas
Also known as: Ernest Joseph Anastasio III (full name)
Member of: Phish; Oysterhead

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): One Man's Trash, 1998; Trampled by Lambs and Pecked by the Doves, 2000; Trey Anastasio, 2002; Plasma, 2003; Seis de Mayo, 2004; Shine, 2005; Bar 17, 2006; The Horseshoe Curve, 2007.

ALBUM (with Oysterhead): The Grand Pecking Order, 2001.

ALBUMS (with Phish): Junta, 1988; A Picture of Nectar, 1991; Lawn Boy, 1991; Rift, 1993; Hoist, 1994; A Live One, 1995; Billy Breathes, 1996; Slip, Stitch, and Pass, 1997; The Story of the Ghost, 1998; Phish (The White Tape), 1998; Farmhouse, 2000; The Siket Disc, 2000; Round Room, 2002; Undermind, 2004.

The Life

In the summer of 1966, Ernest and Dina Anastasio (an-ah-STAH-zyoh) moved their family to Princeton, New Jersey. Ernest was an executive vice president of the Educational Testing Service, and Dina was an editor of Sesame Street magazine. They enrolled their son, Ernest Joseph Anastasio III, at the Princeton Day School in the fifth grade, Anastasio became close friends with his future songwriting partner, Tom Marshall, and Anastasio developed his musical abilities by joining the jazz band and serving as the drummer in the school's production of the musical Carnival. For high school, Anastasio transferred to the Taft School, and he started an eight-member band, Red Tide, which, by his senior year, evolved into the band Space Antelope.

From 1983 to 1986 Anastasio attended the University of Vermont. These years were pivotal for his musical growth, with the university's student lounge serving as the launching pad for the group Phish. In the fall of 1986, Anastasio transferred to Goddard College, from where, upon completion of his senior study, "The Man Who Stepped into Yesterday," he graduated in 1988.

Anastasio spent the better portion of the 1990's developing music and touring with Phish. On August 13, 1994, he married Susan Eliza Statesir. They became parents to daughters Eliza Jean and Isabella.

Phish's millennium New Year's celebration "Big Cypress" left Anastasio remorseful that the band might have reached its creative and musical pinnacle. Already independently exploring new musical outlets, he used the time afforded by the band's self-imposed hiatus at the end of 2000 to explore solo side projects.

By the summer of 2001 he was fully immersed in a self-billed tour with an eight-piece band. There was a Phish reunion on December 31, 2002, and Anastasio continued to play until Phish's final performance on August 15, 2004, while juggling other commitments to his side projects and those of husband and father.

Post-Phish, Anastasio was arrested on December 15, 2006, for driving under the influence and for drug possession. In attempts to heal and move on with his life, Anastasio handled the legal proceedings and his drug treatment privately. In late 2007 Anastasio reappeared on the jamband scene, playing with the Dave Matthews Band and Phil Lesh and Friends.

The Music

Passing time in suburban shopping malls while a teen, Anastasio listened to Top 40 radio stations. and through friends he grew fond of the Allman Brothers Band, Led Zeppelin, and the Grateful Dead. He also developed an interest in the classical orchestration and composition of Maurice Ravel. This cross-fertilization of musical identities led Anastasio to create music that valued discipline, composition, and improvisation.

"First Tube." While the origins of "First Tube" are often debated by fans, the same claim cannot be made about fan reception of the song. Many believe "First Tube" was the first song that Anastasio performed with the Phish side project, the Eight Foot Fluorescent Tubes, in Winooski, Vermont, in 1994. Others cite the absence of lyrical content from the official studio version of "First Tube" as distinguishing it from any similar melodic versions that followed. Released in 2000 as the final track on Phish's Farmhouse, "First Tube" was played at more than a third of the band's concerts that year, and without inciting complaints from fans. The extended guitar crescendo provides ample space for Anastasio to shine while routinely returning to the song's recurring rhythmic base groove. Also appearing on Plasma, a two-disc compilation of live music Anastasio performed with his band during Phish's hiatus, "First Tube" demonstrates both musical and popular longevity with the addition of horn and percussion sections.

Gamehendge. Gamehendge is the fictional land of Lizards, Colonel Forbin, and the evil tyrant Wilson. It serves as the backdrop to numerous Phish songs, including "The Man Who Stepped into Yesterday," "Colonel Forbin's Ascent," "The Lizards," "Wilson," "Tela," "AC/DC Bag," "Fly Famous Mockingbird," "The Sloth," "Possum," and "McGrupp and the Watchful Hosemasters." When performed by the band live in narrative order, the song cycle is commonly referred to as the Gamehendge Saga. "Gamehendge" debuted on March 12, 1988, before a live audience and has since been performed in various forms with additions such as "Axilla (I)," "Axilla (II)," "Divided Sky," "Harpua," and "Llama." "Gamehendge" is an important part of Phish lore, for the band and fans.

"You Enjoy Myself." Anastasio wrote "You Enjoy Myself" (or YEM) after he and Jon Fishman spent the summer of 1985 in Europe. After it debuted on February 3, 1986, YEM—which combines improvisation, complex time signatures, nonsensical lyrics, and trampolines—became a Phish staple and a fan favorite. It appears on several albums, including Phish (The White Tape), Junta, and A Live One. Broken into four sections (intro, jam, bass and drums, and lyrical vocal jam), the song varies in length from ten to more than twenty minutes when performed live, depending on the extent of improvisation. Revealing his own desire for perfection, Anastasio stopped the band mid-note during a January 2, 2003, performance of the song and restarted it.

Musical Legacy

Anastasio's blend of disciplined improvisation, varied genre arrangements, and humor marks a unique space in American music culture. Afraid of becoming a nostalgia act, Anastasio chose to in 2004 leave Phish and begin a new chapter in his life. The experimentation and perfection Anastasio so relentlessly sought are embraced by jambands and their fans alike, solidifying a grassroots desire to look beyond the status quo and seek out innovative musicals styles and sounds.

Elizabeth Anne Yeager

Further Reading

Budnick, Dean. "Phish." In Jambands: The Complete Guide to the Players, Music, and Scene. San Francisco: Backbeat Books, 2003. Contains biographies of Anastasio and Phish, with an annotated bibliography.

_____. The Phishing Manual. New York: Hyperion, 1996. A detailed account of Phish's formative years, including song origins and statistics.

_____. "Trey Anastasio." In Jambands: The Complete Guide to the Players, Music, and Scene. San Francisco: Backbeat Books, 2003. Band biography and annotated discography.

Mockingbird Foundation. The Phish Companion: A Guide to the Band and Their Music. 2d ed. San Francisco: Backbeat Books, 2004. Song and venue statistics, band member bios, interviews, and show reviews through 2004.

See also: Garcia, Jerry; Ravel, Maurice.

Laurie Anderson

American performance artist, singer-songwriter, and violinist

Anderson is known primarily as a multimedia performance artist, and her large-scale works mix sounds, music, storytelling, and multimedia visuals, all of which use her multiple talents as a visual artist, singer, composer, filmmaker, and inventor.

Born: June 5, 1947; Glen Ellyn, Illinois
Also known as: Laura Phillips Anderson (full name)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: You're the Guy I Want to Share My Money With, 1981; Big Science, 1982; Mister Heartbreak, 1984; United States Live, 1984; Home of the Brave, 1986; Strange Angels, 1989; Bright Red, 1994; The Ugly One with the Jewels and Other Stories, 1995; Talk Normal: Laurie Anderson Anthology, 2000; Life on a String, 2001; Live at Town Hall NYC, 2001; Live in New York, 2002.

SINGLES: "Big Science," 1981; "O Superman (For Massenet)," 1981; "Sharkey's Day," 1984; "Language Is a Virus," 1986; "Babydoll," 1989; "Strange Angels," 1989; "Beautiful Red Dress," 1990; "In Our Sleep," 1994.

WRITINGS OF INTEREST: Stories from the Nerve Bible: A Retrospective, 1972-1992, 1994.

The Life

Laura Phillips Anderson grew up in a suburb of Chicago, Illinois, the second of eight children born to Mary Louise and Arthur Anderson. A gifted musician and artist, she played violin in the Chicago Youth Orchestra and took painting classes at the Chicago Art Institute. By 1966, after a brief stint as a premedical student at Mills College, she enrolled in the art history program at Barnard College, New York, which was followed by a graduate degree in sculpture from Columbia University. Upon graduating, she wrote art reviews and taught art history.

Soon, however, Anderson began developing and performing art installations that involved the spoken word. One of her earliest works from 1974, which examined the idea of balance, was called Duets on Ice (1974-1975) and involved her standing in ice skates on blocks of ice while playing an electronically altered violin and telling stories. At this time, Anderson also met Bob Bielecki, who would become her longtime collaborator in the invention of new instruments.

In 1978, Anderson performed in an important festival of avant-garde performers in New York, where she met novelist William S. Burroughs, who would later become a collaborator. A year later, Americans on the Move, a performance piece about Anderson's extensive travels across America, premiered at Carnegie Recital Hall; it incorprated music, media, and the spoken word. This piece would eventually be reworked into United States, an epic portrait of America and its people that was premiered at the Brooklyn Academy of Music in 1983. Anderson's success during this time, however, was catapulted to unprecedented heights by 1981 with the crossover hit single "O Superman," which reached number two on the London pop charts and led to a multialbum deal with Warner Bros. Records.

After touring with United States, Anderson continued to generate large performance pieces throughout the 1980's, such as Mister Heartbreak (also the title of her second solo album), which developed into a self-directed video, Home of the Brave, released in 1986. Her most elaborate computer-generated stage and sound effects piece was her book Stories from the Nerve Bible (1994), which continued Anderson's concentration on themes of politics, war, and anonymity in a world of mass culture. By the end of the 1980's, however, Anderson was tired of the grueling touring schedules and the pressure of being a huge commercial success, and she began to turn her attention toward art installations and less overtly political topics.

In 1995, Anderson was one of the first artists to explore what was then the new technology of CD-ROMs: The release of Puppet Motel (1995), which consisted of thirty-three virtual rooms that allowed users to interface with various audio and visual elements related to her own works and interests. In 1998, Anderson developed art installation Del Vivo, as well as the performance piece Songs and Stories from Moby Dick (1999-2000), which was her first large work that did not directly comment on current political issues. In 2003 Anderson became an artist-in-residence for the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA), a role that culminated in the performance piece The End of the Moon. In 2005 she was artist-in-residence at the New School in New York. In 2007, she toured with the work Homeland. In April, 2008, she married longtime partner Lou Reed.

The Music

Even though it is difficult to discuss Anderson's music separately from the other media in which she works, it is possible to trace important musical developments. A pioneer in electronically generated sound and invented instruments, Anderson did not specifically aspire to become a musician, and many of her album recordings concentrate on either the speaking voice as instrument or manipulated versions of her own voice to portray certain characters. However, after taking lessons with a voice coach in 1986, Anderson discovered her singing voice and shortly thereafter released Strange Angels (1989), which was considered a breakthrough not only because of the use of her natural voice but also because of her extensive collaborations with other artists. Aside from her solo albums and multimedia performances, Anderson has composed for film, theater, and orchestra.

Big Science. This album was Anderson's first solo recording, released by Warner Bros. Records in 1982, and it contains the unlikely eight-minute-long hit single "O Superman." This album comprises mostly spoken words over hypnotic electronically generated beats that suggest simplicity. When other instruments are brought in, however, the effects are dramatic, and in the "It Tango" the uneven brass initiates the mix-ups ahead, and an off-key saxophone solo in "From the Air" anticipates the threat of a plane crash. With her words, Anderson has an ability to make epiphanic revelations by saying very little. In "Walking and Falling," Anderson points out that "You're walking/ And you don't always realize it/ but you're always falling." Big Science was rereleased for its twenty-fifth anniversary with enhanced audio, the bonus track "Walk the Dog" (the original B side of the single "O Superman"), and the "O Superman" video clip.

"O Superman." Released both as a single and on the album Big Science, "O Superman" brought Anderson international attention. It is an ominous digital chant about the intrusion of technology into everyday life and the miscommunications of a family who converse with one another only through answering machines (which, at the time the song was released, were just becoming standard equipment in people's homes). The intentional irony is that this piece was made through the use of technological resources, including the manipulation of Anderson's voice.

United States. There is no video version of the original and seminal 1983 performance of United States; however, there is a box set of the original live performance (1984); the album Big Science, which contains a sampling of the musical pieces; and a book (1984) of images and sketches from the actual performance. The original eight-hour staged performance was premiered at the Brooklyn Academy of Music over two nights and featured a series on intertwined visual and sound worlds that attempted to capture modern America at the beginning of the 1980's, with its new technological possibilities, emerging mass culture, and conservative political environment. Presented in four parts—"Transportation," "Politics," "Money," and "Love"—and performed by Anderson accompanied by five musicians, United States combined slide projections, video, graphics, animation, and musical numbers (sometimes spoken, sometimes sung), interspersed with spoken monologues.

Laurie Anderson. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Anderson often utilized her own technology-inspired inventions, such as her headlight glasses, which made her appear as though her eyes were light beams; the battery-operated light that she wore behind her teeth to make them glow; the tape-bow violin (one of her many manipulated violins); and the vocoder, which altered Anderson's voice. The result was a successful mix of high and low arts that encapsulated modern cultural issues such as national identity, miscommunication, suspicions that language often confuses rather than reveals, and the anonymity of living in a mass culture.

The Collected Videos. In 1990, Anderson released a collection of her film and video work from 1980 to 1990. It includes music videos from many well-known songs, including "O Superman," "Language Is a Virus," and "Sharkey's Day" (the later two are from Home of the Brave), as well as works initially seen only on television. The best of these are the acerbic public service announcements and What You Mean We?, which featured Anderson having a conversation with a clone of herself.

The public service announcements were produced in lieu of regular advertisements for Anderson's compact disc (CD) Strange Angels. In the kitchen of a busy coffee shop, Anderson makes humorous and ironic conversation with herself about military research, the national debt, women and money, and the national anthem.

What You Mean We? was broadcast on the television series Alive from Off-Center, which showcased performance videos by artists and was hosted by Anderson. Anderson often generated electronically manipulated versions of herself so that she could create personas to voice to the opinions that she felt uncomfortable expressing as herself. This video also includes the artist giving a tour of her home studio.

Song and Stories from Moby Dick. This performance piece was premiered at the Brooklyn Academy of Music in 1999 and represents a shift from previous works for three reasons: It does not raise overtly political issues; it is based on a preexisting text, the novel by Herman Melville of 1851; and it uses actors to act out the story on stage.

Songs and Stories from Moby Dick is a deeply philosophical piece; in the concert program's liner notes, Anderson describes being attracted to the "dark conclusions about the meaning of life, love, and obsession." Anderson occasionaly quotes long passages of Melville's text verbtim; overall, however, she uses little of the actual text, sometimes taking single phrases to initiate a new song or simply writing something new. Musically, the whole is completely computer-generated yet has a lush, graceful quality to it. Anderson used a new invention called the talking stick, a wireless instrument that can replicate any preprogrammed sound when touched and that is also used as an acting prop (such as a staff or a harpoon) as well as a light source. Two of the songs from this work were released on the 2001 CD Life on a String.

Musical Legacy

Laurie Anderson was single-handedly responsible for redefining performance art. A largely twentieth century genre, performance art had a history of being somewhat obscure and esoteric, often taking a hostile stance toward audiences, as in the Dada movement of the 1920's and the Fluxus movement of the 1960's. In Anderson's work, high and low multimedia arts are successfully merged, and communication and accessibility are at the core of her staged performances.

Anderson has also been key in developing new electronic sound worlds both from digital sources and in her manipulation of the violin, and she is a leader at voicing the cultural concerns of the modern world, whether in her staged performances, her art installations, or her video shorts. She has fundamentally changed the way music and narration are performed together on stage.

Anderson has been the recipient of many awards, including grants from the National Endowment for the Arts and a Guggenheim Fellowship.

Sonya Mason

Further Reading

Berghaus, Günter. "Laurie Anderson." In Avant-Garde Performance: Live Events and Electronic Technologies. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2005. An excellent resource geared toward college students. Includes an interview with Anderson, which discusses how Anderson integrates her thoughts into artworks. Encourages readers to compare the writings with various other artists from within the book.

Celent, Germano. Laurie Anderson: Del Vivo. Milan: Fondazione Prada, 1998. Compiled to coincide with the installation of the same name, which focuses on the live image of a prisoner being projected via cable to an exhibition space nearby. The project explored issues of incarnation, imprisonment, and voyeurism. Includes a detailed description of the project, background on the prison, and biographies of both Anderson and the prisoner, Santino Stefanini.

Duckworth, William. "Laurie Anderson." In Talking Music: Conversations with John Cage, Philip Glass, Laurie Anderson, and Five Generations of American Experimental Composers. New York: Schirmer, 1995. An interview with Anderson from the late 1980's that reveals much about her early influences and development. Places Anderson's work in the context of five generations of other experimental musicians.

Goldberg, RoseLee. Laurie Anderson. New York: Abrams, 2000. This comprehensive volume was written in close collaboration with the artist. It traces Anderson's chronological development through the use of extensive interviews, pictures, and photographs. Includes lists of records, films, videos, scores, songs, and CD-ROMs.

Howell, John. Laurie Anderson. New York: Thunder's Mouth Press, 1992. A thorough study of Anderson, including a biographical essay by the author, an interview with the artist, and an essay by curator Janet Kardon about the visual themes in Anderson's work. Also includes storyboards and sketches from United States and Home of the Brave and a time line of events and productions.

Huxley, Michael, and Noel Witts, eds. "Laurie Anderson: The Speed of Change." In The Twentieth-Century Performance Reader. New York: Routledge, 2002. Contains a short but important and interesting section on Anderson, placing her in the context of avant-garde performance history.

Summer, Melody, Kathleen Burch, and Michael Sumner, eds. "Laurie Anderson." In The Guests Go to Supper. Oakland, Calif.: Burning Books, 1986. Includes a transcription of an interview in which she discusses working with technology, along with a list of eight song lyrics with notes by the artist.

See also: Byrne, David; Reed, Lou; Reich, Steve.

Leroy Anderson

American classical composer

A master at light orchestral music, Anderson wrote sparkling arrangements and clever compositions for band and orchestra.

Born: June 29, 1908; Cambridge, Massachusetts
Died: May 18, 1975; Woodbury, Connecticut

Principal works

BAND WORKS: Ticonderoga March, 1945; Governor Bradford March, 1948; A Trumpeter's Lullaby, 1949; Bugler's Holiday, 1954; March of the Two Left Feet, 1970.

MUSICAL THEATER (music): Goldilocks, 1958 (libretto by Walter Kerr and Jean Kerr).

ORCHESTRAL WORKS: Jazz Pizzicato, 1938; Jazz Legato, 1939; Promenade, 1945 (for strings and trumpet); The Syncopated Clock, 1945 (with Mitchell Parish); Fiddle-Faddle, 1947; The Irish Suite, 1947 (additional movements, 1949); Old MacDonald Had a Farm, 1947; Sleigh Ride, 1948 (with Parish); The Typewriter, 1950; The Waltzing Cat, 1950 (with Parish); Belle of the Ball, 1951 (with Parish); Blue Tango, 1951 (with Parish); The Penny-Whistle Song, 1951; Plink, Plank, Plunk!, 1951; Song of the Bells, 1951; Girl in Satin, 1953; Summer Skies, 1953; The Bluebells of Scotland, 1954; The First Day of Spring, 1954; Sandpaper Ballet, 1954; Arietta, 1962; Clarinet Candy, 1962; Home Stretch, 1962.

PIANO WORKS: Concerto in C Major, 1953; Forgotten Dreams, 1954 (with Parish).

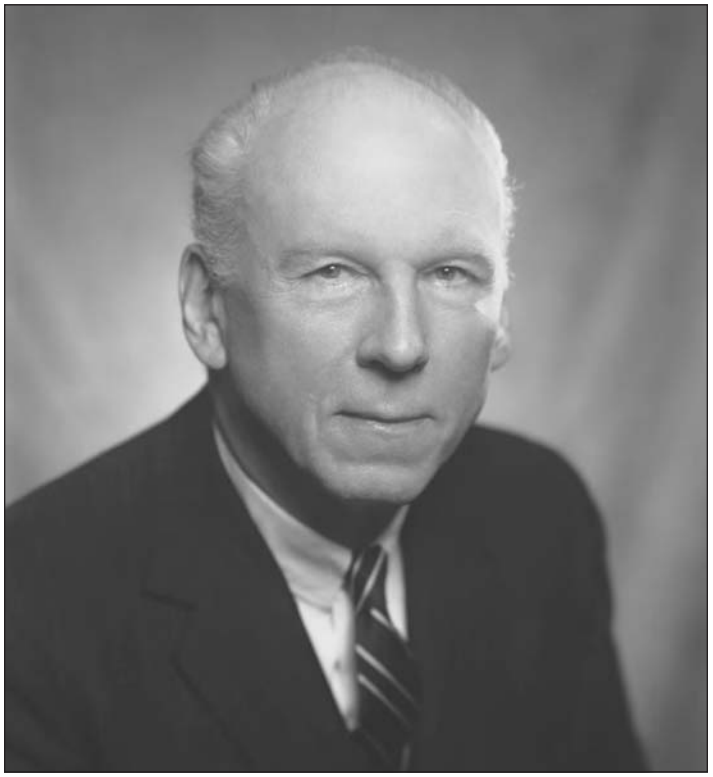
The Life

Leroy Anderson was born in 1908 to Swedish immigrant parents who came to the United States when they were children. His father, Bror Anton Anderson, was a postal clerk who played the mandolin. His mother, Anna Margareta Anderson, played the organ at the Swedish Church in Cambridge, and her son's first musical training was on the organ. With these musical influences at home, Anderson was ready for piano lessons, which he began at the New England Conservatory of Music in 1919. He attended the Cambridge High and Latin School, graduating in 1925. For his graduation ceremonies, he orchestrated the school song, and he conducted the school's orchestra in a rousing rendition of it. Anderson's father bought his son a trombone while he was in high school, in hopes Anderson would earn a front-row seat in the Harvard Band.



Leroy Anderson. (© Oscar White/CORBIS)

Fulfilling his father's wishes, Anderson did enter Harvard, playing both the trombone in the band and double bass in the orchestra, and singing with the Harvard Glee Club. He studied counterpoint with Edward Ballantine, who had been a student of pianist Artur Schnabel. Ballantine's music was noted for its humorous quality, which had a major influence on Anderson. When he was a senior, Anderson became the conductor of the Harvard Band, and for it he arranged some traditional Harvard songs, along with tunes from other Ivy League colleges. These were so fresh and original that they laid the foundation for his career. His arrangements attracted the attention of Arthur Fiedler, the director of the Boston Pops Orchestra.

Anderson continued his education at Harvard, studying composition with Walter Piston, who also taught composer and conductor Leonard Bernstein. At the time, the United States was entering the Great Depression, and although Anderson had obtained a master's degree in music, he doubted his ability to make a living in the field. With a great facility for languages, Anderson began his Ph.D. studies in German and the Scandinavian languages, hoping to make a living as a language teacher. Eventually he learned to speak Danish, Norwegian, Icelandic, German, French, Italian, and Portuguese.

In World War II Anderson was drafted into the U.S. Army, and the military took advantage of his linguistic ability. He was stationed in Iceland to serve as a translator and an interpreter. His excellent abilities prompted the U.S. government to offer him the job of U.S. attaché to Sweden after the war. Anderson declined the position, although he was sent to Washington, D.C., to work in intelligence at the Pentagon. He was discharged from the Army when the war ended.

Determined to forge a career in music, Anderson began to write original works and to contribute more arrangements to the Boston Pops Orchestra. In addition, Fiedler asked him to conduct. During the 1950's Anderson gained international fame for his light concert music and for his songs. He recorded for Decca Records, and his Blue Tango went gold in 1952.

In the 1960's, Anderson augmented his arranging and compositional activities with guest-conducting for several orchestras near his home in Connecticut and in such venues as the Hollywood Bowl. In the 1970's, the Boston Pops invited Anderson to guest-conduct during a televised concert tribute to his career. Anderson told his wife that it was "the most important evening of my life."

Anderson married Eleanor Firke in 1942, and they had four children: Jane, Eric, Rolf, and Kurt. He composed and conducted until the end of his life, dying of cancer in 1975.

The Music

Anderson was a skilled arranger, and he brought a pronounced sense of play to his compositions, eliciting unexpected sounds from an orchestra. He scored for nontraditional instruments, such as a manual typewriter, which takes center stage for The Typewriter. The soloist taps the keys in rhythm, and the instrumentalists help to sound the margin bell and to imitate the clunk of the carriage as it returns at the end of a line. For Sandpaper Ballet, Anderson was inspired by vaudeville dancers who sprinkled sand on the stage to accent their steps. The orchestra's percussionists used sandpaper-covered blocks to scrape out their parts, the composer indicating fine, medium, and coarse grade to achieve the desired effect. The Waltzing Cat rivals any Viennese waltz, with violins imitating "meows," and Anderson finds the perfect coda: an instrumental bark that sends the musical feline scurrying.

Jazz Pizzicato. Anderson was still in college when Fiedler heard his arrangements for the Harvard Band. That led to an invitation to compose a work for the Boston Pops string section, with Anderson creating a sprightly one-minute, forty-five-second flurry of plucked strings that Fiedler immediately added to the Pops' repertoire. This launched a decades-long working relationship between Fiedler and Anderson, with the eminent conductor introducing Anderson to music publishers. In the wake of Jazz Pizzicato came Jazz Legato, which Anderson wrote as a companion piece.

Sleigh Ride. This perennial holiday classic may be Anderson's best-known composition. In 1948, the first time Fiedler and the Boston Pops played it, the enthusiastic audience demanded that they play it again. In three minutes, the work depicts a sleigh, drawn by horses, skimming over a snowy landscape and fading into the distance. Within the delightful melody, Anderson scored horse whinnies, the clip-clop of horse hooves, and the smart crack of a whip, elements that are often obscured in the later version, which included lyrics by Mitchell Parish. The renditions of "Sleigh Ride"` by Gene Autry, Karen Carpenter, and other singers are still heard on the radio at Christmastime, and the Ventures performed it rock style. Anderson claimed he composed it during a heat wave.

The Syncopated Clock. One day, while he was serving in military intelligence at the Pentagon, Anderson was distracted by the ticking of a clock, and he conceived the idea of a timepiece that did not keep a regular beat. This time, he thought of the title first, and then he composed the rhythmically complex song for orchestra to go with it. For a few years, The Syncopated Clock was played by the Boston Pops and other orchestras. In 1950 Decca Records asked Anderson to record an album entirely of his music, and he included this work. An executive at CBS heard it and wanted to use it as a theme song for a program of old movies the network was about to debut called The Late Show. After the first program, CBS received dozens of phone calls—not about the movie but about the memorable theme. The Syncopated Clock became attached to the program, and it became widely recognized, enhancing Anderson's reputation. Later, the onomatopoeic "Plink, Plank, Plunk!" became the theme for a long-running television game show, I've Got a Secret.

Blue Tango. Written while he was still in the Army, Blue Tango showcased Anderson's facility for combining various musical elements in one piece. As the title indicates, there were South American rhythms and blues phrasings. He added some jazz aspects, with swelling dynamics and an irresistible beat. The danceable song became a favorite on radio and on jukeboxes, and it reportedly was the first instrumental record to sell a million copies. No one was more surprised at the success of Blue Tango than its unassuming composer, who watched in amazement as it climbed up the charts. Anderson claimed he wrote concert music, not pop music. He underestimated the infectious quality that permeates all his work.

Concerto in C Major. Written in 1953, Concerto in C Major for piano was Anderson's attempt at a full-scale orchestral work. He completed it just two weeks before it premiered in Chicago, played by the Grant Park Symphony Orchestra. For the composer, it was an ambitious work, including solo piano, one piccolo, two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, four horns, three trumpets, three trombones, one tuba, timpani, suspended cymbals, maracas, claves, snare drum, strings, and cowbell. It had four-part fugues, tango rhythms, and, as evidenced by the cowbell, a hoedown theme. Although Concerto in C Major was performed two more times, Anderson was dissatisfied, withdrawing it with the intention of revising what he considered its weak spots. He never returned to it; after his death, his family released the work.

Goldilocks. In 1958 Anderson tried his hand at a Broadway show. The book was written by Walter and Jean Kerr, and the musical starred Don Ameche and Elaine Stritch. The story involved a comical feud between a stage actress and a movie director trying to find the financing to make an epic film about ancient Egypt. Anderson's score featured several songs and even a ballet. The show closed after 161 performances. Critics were generally positive about the music for Goldilocks, one calling it "charming," although most agreed the story was flawed.

Musical Legacy

Film composer John Williams, who conducted the Boston Pops Orchestra for several years, said that Anderson's music "remains forever as young and fresh as the very day on which it was composed." More than sixty years after he created them, his arrangements for the Harvard Band remain a part of its repertoire, and its new band quarters were named the Anderson Band Center in 1995. In 2003 Anderson's hometown of Cambridge dedicated the corner near his boyhood home as Leroy Anderson Square. Extensively recorded and performed, Anderson's music retains its timeless quality.

Constance Pollock

Further Reading

Anderson, Leroy. "How to Spoil Your Concert." The Instrumentalist 44, no. 1 (August, 1989): 69. An interesting perspective from Anderson the conductor about how concert presentations can be improved for the audience.

_____. "The Syncopated Clock Still Ticks." Music Journal 26, no. 9 (September, 1968): 30-31. Anderson describes how he conceived one of his most recognized pieces and how it migrated to television.

Biegel, Jeffrey. "Composer Leroy Anderson Went from Harvard to the Boston Pops." Clavier 34, no. 6 (July/August, 2004): 20-21, 24. A brief but thoughtful overview of Anderson's life, including an analysis of individual works.

Tommasini, Anthony. "Tuneful Gems from a Master of a Lost Art." The New York Times, March 10, 1996. In an album review of a collection of Anderson's music, the writer describes several of the composer's most famous works.

See also: Fiedler, Arthur.

Marian Anderson

American classical and opera singer

Known for her rich contralto voice, Anderson used her passion for music to transcend racial, gender, and national boundaries.

Born: February 27, 1897; Philadelphia, Pennsylvania
Died: April 8, 1993; Portland, Oregon

Principal works

OPERATIC ROLE: Ulrica in Giuseppe Verdi's Un ballo in maschera, 1955 (The Masked Ball).

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: He's Got the Whole World in His Hands and Eighteen Other Spirituals, 1962; Snoopycat, 1963.

SINGLES: "My Lord, What a Mornin'," 1924; "Nobody Knows the Trouble I Seen," 1924; "Heav'n Heav'n," 1928; "Ave Maria," 1935; "The Cuckoo," 1935; "My Soul's Been Anchored in the Lord," 1936; "Every Time I Feel the Spirit," 1937; "I Know the Lord Laid His Hands on Me," 1937; "Lord, I Can't Stay Away," 1937; "Were You There?," 1937; "I Don't Feel Noways Tired," 1938; "My Old Kentucky Home," 1941; "O What a Beautiful City," 1941; "Hear the Wind Whispering," 1945; "Nobody Knows the Trouble I Seen," 1947; "The First Nöel," 1951; "O Little Town of Bethlehem," 1952; "None But the Lonely Heart," 1955; "Over the Mountains," 1955; "The Lord's Prayer," 1956; "Angels We Have Heard on High," 1961; "He's Got the Whole World in His Hands," 1961; "I Want Jesus to Walk with Me," 1961; "Joy to the World," 1961; "O Come All Ye Faithful," 1961; "He'll Bring It to Pass," 1964; "Oh, Heaven Is a Beautiful Place," 1964.

Marian Anderson. (Library of Congress)

The Life

Marian Anderson was born in 1897 in Philadelphia to John and Anna Anderson. She began singing in the junior choir at church at the age of six. Two years later, although the family could not afford any music lessons, her father bought her a piano. Anderson began to teach herself music, eventually receiving formal training until the age of seventeen. She began to perform in public in 1914, singing solo roles in performances of George Frideric Handel's Messiah (1742) and Felix Mendelssohn's Elijah (1846). In 1915 she took lessons with the soprano Mary Saunders Patterson. Because Anderson could not afford the one-dollar lesson fee, Patterson taught her free of charge. After six months, at Patterson's suggestion, Anderson continued her singing lessons with the contralto Agnes Reifsnyder, with whom she studied through 1918. In the summer of 1919, Anderson studied with Oscar Sanger at the Chicago Conservatory of Music, and in the following year Giuseppe Boghetti, who analyzed her vocal tones, improved her breathing techniques and expanded her repertory. In 1921 Anderson graduated from South Philadelphia High School for Girls.

By the late 1920's, Anderson realized that a career for a contralto could be found in Europe, not in America. In October, 1927, she sailed to London, where she performed "Air de Lia" from Claude Debussy's L'Enfant prodigue (1884). In 1930 she went to study lieder with Michael Raucheison and Sverre Jordon in Berlin on a scholarship from the Julius Rosenwald Fund. In Germany she met Norwegian manager Rule Rassmussen. With his help, she undertook concert tours to Norway, Sweden, Finland, and Denmark. She obtained critical acclaim in Scandinavia in 1933, giving twenty concerts within two years, during which she learned from Kosti Vehanen songs by the Finnish composer Jean Sibelius. Two years later, at an afternoon concert in a hotel in Salzburg, Austria, she experienced a defining moment in her career. The conductor Arturo Toscanini heard her sing, famously exclaiming that "a voice like hers is heard only once in a hundred years." With the critical acclaim she obtained in Europe, the American impresario Sol Hurok launched her career in America in the 1935-1936 season. In 1938 Anderson gave seventy recitals in the United States alone, an unprecedented number for any concert singer.

Anderson toured in Europe in 1936 and 1949; in the 1950's and early 1960's she toured in Canada, the United States, Scandinavia, Europe, South America, Jamaica, the West Indies, Japan, Thailand, Burma, Vietnam, Korea, Philippines, Malaysia, India, Israel, Morocco, Tunisia, and Australia. She concluded her singing career in a yearlong farewell tour in 1964, with the final recital on Easter Sunday, April 19, 1965, at Carnegie Hall. She died on April 8, 1993, of heart failure. She was ninety-six.

The Music

Anderson was passionate about singing. While singing at church when she was young, she had the range to sing any parts in the choir. In addition to having an extended range, she could sing in diverse styles, ranging from German lieder by Ludwig van Beethoven, Johannes Brahms, Robert Schumann, Hugo Wolf, Richard Strauss, French arias by Francis Poulenc, Italian songs by Girolamo Frescobaldi, to English songs by Henry Purcell and Paul Hindemith. She was not primarily an opera singer, but her operatic repertory included "Ah! mon fils" from Giacomo Meyerbeer's Le Prophète (1849). She understood the emotional significance of spirituals, and therefore she was eager to learn and perform folk songs in her concert tours. Her dark, sweet contralto voice was particularly suitable for moving her audiences through folk songs. At her first concert in Helsinki, Finland, in 1931, for example, Anderson sang the household Finnish folk song "Läksin minä kesäyönä käymään" (one summer's night I went walking) in Finnish.

"America." By the late 1930's Anderson was one of the most prominent singers in the United States. Hurok, her manager, wanted to make history by arranging for her to sing in Constitutional Hall in Washington, D.C., on Easter Sunday of 1939. However, the management—the Daughters of the American Revolution—canceled Anderson's performance because of her race, a decision that infuriated many people, including First Lady Eleanor Roosevelt, who resigned from the Daughters of the American Revolution and arranged Anderson to give a free open-air concert at the Lincoln Memorial on the day she was supposed to perform at the Constitutional Hall. This event was widely advertised, and it drew an audience of seventy-five thousand, the largest crowd that had ever gathered in the capital. Accompanied by only her pianist, Vehanen, Anderson sang with the audience "The Star-Spangled Banner." Then she performed with great control "America," "O mio Fernando," and Franz Schubert's "Ave Maria" in German, a song that showcased her thick contralto timbre and her powerful dynamic range. After a brief intermission, she sang a group of spirituals, including "Gospel Train," "Trampin'," and "My Soul's Been Anchored in de Lord." For an encore, she chose the spiritual "Nobody Knows the Trouble I Seen." The powerful performance presented a strong testimony against racial inequality.

"Der Erlkönig." In the late 1920's, Anderson worked hard to master German lieder. She learned how to portray the complex psychological journey of one character from serenity to self-doubt in Franz Schubert's "Die junge Nonne," a lied that prepared her for interpreting lieder that involved multiple characters: the narrator, the queen, and the dwarf in "Der Zwerg" (1822), and the narrator, the dying boy, the anxious father, and the sinister spirit in "Der Erlkönig" (1821) In these complex lieder, Anderson made good use of her broad range, expressive power, and dramatic intensity to contrast markedly different personalities. Impressed by her performance of "Der Erlkönig" in Tokyo in 1953, a critic remarked that she created the illusion of four distinct dramatic characters through her voice. Her penetrating interpretation of "Der Erlkönig" remains one of her most notable artistic achievements.

Un ballo in maschera. Anderson was the first African American to break the racial barrier at the New York Metropolitan Opera. Approached by the general manager of the Metropolitan Opera, Rudolf Bing, at a party in September, 1954, she agreed to sing her operatic debut as Ulrica in Giuseppe Verdi's Un ballo in maschera (1859) on January 7, 1955. Although Ulrica is a minor role, it is critical to the opera's dramaturgy, vocally demanding, and hence suitable to Anderson's considerable talent. The music world was well aware of the historical significance of the performance. She received one thousand dollars per performance, which made her the highest-paid opera singer at the Metropolitan Opera at that time. Her debut became the selling point of the 1955-1956 season: Tickets were sold out within days; journalists from as far as the West Indies came to New York to witness the historical moment. Celebrities such as President Harry Truman's daughter Margaret Truman, the Duchess of Windsor, and First Lady Eleanor Roosevelt attended her debut. As soon as the curtain rose at the beginning of act 2, showing Ulrica's cave, the audience gave Anderson an enthusiastic five-minute ovation. At the end of the act, she came out for her curtain call, receiving another round of thunderous applause. After her stunning performance, she received two thousand telegrams of congratulations from across the world.

"Deep River." Anderson's deep voice was particularly suited to conveying the sorrow portrayed in spirituals, and "Deep River" showcased her skill. It was the performance of this song that impressed her first serious singing teacher, Giuseppe Boghetti, in 1920. Over the span of her career, she sang a repertory of more than one hundred spirituals arranged by Harry T. Burleigh, Nathaniel Dett, and Hall Johnson. Anderson followed the tradition established by her black predecessors, including Roland Hayes, and concluded her concerts with a series of spirituals, even when she had been warned specifically not to do so during tours in the Soviet Union in 1934. Nevertheless, the Russians responded with great enthusiasm by joining her in singing "Deep River" with their deep voices. During her tour to Israel in 1955, her performances of spirituals were an exotic appeal to students, many of whom heard black music for the first time in her concerts. This tradition continues in concerts by such African American vocalists as Jessye Norman, Kathleen Battle, and William Warfield. A recording of Anderson's performance of "Deep River" closed her memorial in the Union Baptist Church in June, 1993.

Musical Legacy

One of the first African American women to have a distinguished international singing career, Anderson used her voice to promote equality and justice across the world. In July, 1939, Anderson received the Spingarn Medal of the National Association of the advancement of Colored People from Eleanor Roosevelt. From the late 1930's to the 1950's, she received honorary doctorate degrees in music from Howard University (1938), Rutgers University (1957), New York University (1958), and the University of Pennsylvania (1958). In 1957 she received an honorary doctor of law degree from Saint Mary's College. Outside the United States, her artistic achievement was recognized by the Finnish government in 1949, and in 1952 she received from King Gustav of Sweden his government's Litteris et Artibus medal. Five years later, in 1957, she was invited by the U.S. Department of State to do a ten-week tour of India and the Far East as a goodwill ambassador, and she was given the Albert Einstein Commemorative Award. Her ambassadorial work was recognized repeatedly by the U.S. government. President Dwight Eisenhower appointed her a delegate to the United Nations Human Rights Committee, and she delivered a speech at the United Nations in 1958. In 1963 President Lyndon Johnson awarded her the American Medal of Freedom. In 1977 Congress awarded her a gold medal in celebration of her birthday. In 1980 the U.S. Treasury Department coined a half-ounce gold commemorative medal with her image. Her successful singing career was marked by the Kennedy Center Honors she received in 1978, followed by the National Medal of Arts from President Ronald Reagan in 1986 and a Grammy Award for Lifetime Achievement in 1991. The Marian Anderson Award was established in 1998 to honor eminent artist-humanitarians in the United States.

Hedy Law

Further Reading

Anderson, Marian. My Lord, What a Morning: An Autobiography. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1992. Anderson's autobiography was originally written in 1956, after her debut at the New York Metropolitan Opera. This is a passionate, emotional, and honest account of an extraordinary talent.

Emerson, Isabelle. Five Centuries of Women Singers. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 2005. A study of twenty classical female singers from the sixteenth through the mid-twentieth century. The book provides a historical overview of the business of music, and it explains the achievements of notable singers within their historical context. This includes a reference to Anderson's remarkable career.

Freedman, Russell. The Voice That Challenged a Nation: Marian Anderson and the Struggle for Equal Rights. New York: Clarion Books, 2004. An accessible biography of Anderson written for young readers. Each of the eight chapters discusses one major event of her life.

Gill, Glenda Eloise. No Surrender! No Retreat! African American Pioneer Performers of Twentieth Century American Theater. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2000. A study documents how fifteen African American performing artists, including Anderson, overcame oppression in the course of their careers. Includes archival documents and interviews.

Keiler, Allan. Marian Anderson: A Singer's Journey.

New York: Scribner, 2000. A thorough biography, this offers detailed primary and secondary research that chronicles Anderson's life, and it includes interviews with Anderson. An indispensable resource for those interested in the social history of black Americans.

Roosevelt, Eleanor. Courage in a Dangerous World: The Political Writings of Eleanor Roosevelt. Edited by Allida M. Black. New York: Columbia University Press, 1999. Situates Anderson and the Daughters of the American Revolution within the history of women in twentieth century America. This book helps us understand the historical significance of Anderson's performance in 1939 from Roosevelt's perspective.

Ware, Susan. Letter to the World: Seven Women Who Shaped the American Century. New York: W. W. Norton, 1998. This book chronicles the lives of seven women of extraordinary achievements—Eleanor Roosevelt, Dorothy Thompson, Margaret Mead, Katherine Hepburn, Babe Dedrikson Zaharias, Martha Graham, and Anderson. It shows how each woman created a persona critical to her success and emphasizes how each balanced her public and her private lives.

See also: Hindemith, Paul; Norman, Jessye; Odetta; Poulenc, Francis; Toscanini, Arturo.

Dame Julie Andrews

English musical-theater and pop singer

Andrews is a gifted interpreter of musical roles and songs, with an remarkable ability to deliver story through melody in stage productions and on film.

Born: October 1, 1935; Walton-on-Thames, England

Also known as: Julia Elizabeth Wells (birth name); Julie Edwards (married name)

Principal works

MUSICAL THEATER (singer): The Boy Friend, 1954 (libretto, music, and lyrics by Sandy Wilson); My Fair Lady, 1956 (libretto and lyrics by Alan Jay Lerner; music by Frederick Loewe); Camelot, 1960 (libretto and lyrics by Lerner; music by Loewe); Victor/Victoria, 1995 (libretto by Blake Edwards; music by Henry Mancini; lyrics by Leslie Bricusse).

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: The Lass with the Delicate Air, 1957; Julie Andrews Sings, 1958; Broadway's Fair Julie, 1961; Don't Go in the Lion's Cage Tonight, 1962; Heartrending Ballads and Raucous Ditties, 1962; A Christmas Treasure, 1968; Darling Lili, 1970; Christmas with Julie Andrews, 1982; Love Me Tender, 1982; Love, Julie, 1989; Broadway: The Music of Richard Rodgers, 1994; Here I'll Stay: The Words of Alan Jay Lerner, 1996; Julie Andrews Selects Her Favorite Disney Songs, 2005.

WRITINGS OF INTEREST: Home: A Memoir of My Early Years, 2008.

The Life

Julie Andrews was born Julia Elizabeth Wells, to Edward Wells, who taught woodworking and metalsmithing, and Barbara Mores, a pianist. She had a younger brother, John. When Andrews was five, her parents divorced.

During World War II, when Andrews's stepfather, Ted Andrews, led community singing in air-raid shelters, he noticed his stepdaughter's remarkable vocal ability and her four-octave range. After the war, Andrews began singing in her mother and stepfather's vaudeville act; she soon took her stepfather's name, Andrews, professionally. Andrews spent the next several years singing in various musical revues, including the Starlight Roof revue at the London Hippodrome. In November, 1948, she participated in a Royal Command Performance, hosted by Danny Kaye, at the London Palladium. Andrews also appeared in pantomimes (musical fairy tales), a type of children's entertainment popular in Britain.

While appearing in an unsuccessful play in the English provinces in 1954, Andrews was offered a role in an upcoming American production of The Boy Friend (1954), a cheerful spoof of 1920's musicals that was already a smash hit in London. At first Andrews was reluctant to take the part. She thought she was too young for the role, and the show would be her first appearance outside of England. Nevertheless, she signed a one-year contract, and The Boy Friend opened at Broadway's

Royale Theatre on September 30, 1954. New York critics were delighted with The Boy Friend, and they were especially charmed by Andrews as Polly, a wealthy young woman who fears she will be loved only for her money. Though The Boy Friend was an ensemble piece, with several actors having equally large parts, Andrews was given featured billing on the Royale Theatre's marquee a few weeks after the show opened. As soon as her contract expired, she returned to England. The visit was short, because she was besieged with job offers back in the United States. In one of these, Andrews played a supporting role in the television special High Tor (1956), a musical version of the Maxwell Anderson play that starred Bing Crosby as a romantic dreamer and Andrews as the ghost of a beautiful girl from the seventeenth century with whom he falls in love. By the time High Tor aired on CBS in early March, 1956, Andrews was back on Broadway in My Fair Lady (1956), the Alan Jay Lerner and Arthur Loewe musical play based on George Bernard Shaw's Pygmalion (1913).

In May, 1959, during a vacation from the London production of My Fair Lady, Andrews married Tony Walton, a theatrical set designer; they had one daughter, Emma, born in November, 1962. The couple worked together professionally, most notably on Mary Poppins (1964), but they divorced in 1968. The next year, Andrews married film director Blake Edwards. They adopted two daughters from Vietnam, Joanna and Amy.

At this time, Andrews worked in television, appearing in a number of specials, a variety series in the early 1970's that was critically acclaimed but not popular with the public, and a situation comedy in 1992 that lasted only a few weeks. The majority of her screen appearances since the late 1960's have been in films directed by Edwards, including such ribald comedies as 1979's 10 and 1981's S.O.B.

In 1974 Andrews published her first children's book, The Last of the Really Great Whangdoodles. It was followed in 1989 by Mandy, and she has published several more, including The Great American Mousical, an introduction to the theater for children. At the American Library Association's annual conference in June, 2007, Andrews announced that her publisher, HarperCollins, has established the Julie Andrews Collection, a book series, as an incentive to encourage children to read.

In 1997, near the end of her two-year run on Broadway with Victor/Victoria, Andrews was diagnosed with a noncancerous growth on her vocal cords. She wrapped up the musical in June, and she had surgery shortly afterward. Even though she had been told her vocal cords would not be compromised, Andrews lost her singing voice. Early in 2000, she filed a lawsuit against her doctor and his associates, but she accepted an undisclosed settlement, dropped the lawsuit, and moved on to other projects.

Andrews has worked on behalf of many charities, including Operation USA, the United Nations Children's Fund, and Save the Children. Andrews received many honors for her charity work as well as for her contributions to entertainment. In 2000 she was made a Dame Commander of the British Empire by Queen Elizabeth II, and in 2001 she received an Honor Award from the John F. Kennedy Center for Performing Arts in Washington, D.C. On January 28, 2007, Andrews won the Lifetime Achievement Award from the Screen Actors Guild.

The Music

My Fair Lady. The now classic production of My Fair Lady opened at Broadway's Mark Hellinger Theatre on March 15, 1956, to nearly unanimous praise. My Fair Lady retained much of Shaw's original dialogue, and the part of Eliza Doolittle demanded more acting ability than the average musical comedy role, and certainly more than Andrews had when she started rehearsals. Andrews had extensive experience as a singer, but almost none as an actress. Andrews later admitted in interviews that she had problems trying to learn the role and dealing with the prickly leading man, Rex Harrison, who wanted her to be replaced with someone more experienced. To help Andrews with her characterization, director Moss Hart gave her a grueling week of private coaching, going over every line of dialogue and nuance of the role. In gratitude, his leading lady later acknowledged that Hart made her Eliza Doolittle. The musical enjoyed an original run of 2,717 performances, and it garnered wonderful notices for Andrews. She returned to England to star in the London production of My Fair Lady, which opened April 30, 1958, at the Drury Lane Theatre, beginning a run of 2,281 performances. In total, Andrews spent three and half years performing in My Fair Lady.

Cinderella. In February, 1957, Andrews began rehearsals for the title role in the Richard Rodgers and Oscar Hammerstein II musical Cinderella (1957) while still doing eight shows a week in My Fair Lady. Cinderella was the celebrated team's only original production for television, and the producers surrounded Andrews with a stellar cast of actors, including Ilka Chase and Broadway legends Howard Lindsay and Dorothy Stickney. It was broadcast live on CBS on Sunday, March 31, 1957.

Camelot. Andrews returned to Broadway to play Guenevere in Lerner and Loewe's Arthurian musical Camelot (1960), which opened at the Majestic Theatre on December 3, 1960. Though Camelot did not repeat the triumph of My Fair Lady, it was a solid hit. Andrews immensely enjoyed the year and a half she spent with the lavish show, one of the costliest Broadway productions up to that time. Andrews befriended her Welsh-born leading man, Richard Burton, as King Arthur, whom she found affable and approachable. Andrews left Camelot when she discovered that she was pregnant.

While Andrews was appearing in the final months of Camelot, producer Jack L. Warner started to cast the film version of My Fair Lady. Although Andrews was tested for the role of Doolittle, Warner wanted for the part a big star who could guarantee big box-office receipts. He ensured this by hiring Audrey Hepburn, whose musical numbers were dubbed by Marni Nixon. Controversy over this decision continued until the Academy Awards ceremony, when Andrews's stage costar, Harrison, received his Best Actor Oscar for repeating his role in the film version and graciously thanked "two fair ladies." Similarly, Warner did not select Andrews for the role of Guenevere when he was producing the film version of Camelot in 1967. Instead, he signed British actress Vanessa Redgrave, another nonsinger.

Mary Poppins. Although Andrews was disappointed at not being hired to portray Doolittle on film, she accepted an offer from Walt Disney, who had admired Andrews's performance in Camelot, to star in his musical film version of Mary Poppins (1964), based on the P. L. Travers books. The score was written by Richard and Robert Sherman. This was Andrews's first motion picture, and the combination of live action and animation proved popular, making it one of Disney's most successful films. The great critical and commercial success of Mary Poppins, which costarred Dick Van Dyke, turned the loss of starring in the motion picture My Fair Lady into a stroke of good fortune for Andrews. She won the Best Actress Academy Award (one of the film's five wins) for her portrayal of the magical nanny who brings joy to a stuffy family in Edwardian London; it was a rare instance of a performer in a musical film being so honored. In addition, Andrews was the first Disney actress to be given an acting honor that was not honorary, an immense achievement.

The Sound of Music. After Mary Poppins, Andrews appeared in a World War II black comedy, The Americanization of Emily, in a nonsinging role, opposite frequent Andrews costar James Garner. Released in November, 1964, after Mary Poppins and before The Sound of Music (1965), The Americanization of Emily was generally well-received. The film version of Rodgers and Hammerstein's musical The Sound of Music, the tale of a rambunctious novice nun who becomes the nanny to an aristocratic Austrian family and then marries their father, reached theaters in March, 1965. Although critics were not enthusiastic, it became one of the most beloved films of all time. The 1959 musical was based on the story of the singing Von Trapp family, who left Austria before World War II and emigrated to the United States, ending up in Stowe, Vermont. The film version was shot on location in Salzburg, Austria, where the family estate was located. Some of the musical numbers were photographed in a series of locations that moved the story along, a novelty at the time.

The reviews praised the film's breathtaking Alpine scenery but criticized its sugary plot. Nevertheless, global audiences turned out in record-breaking numbers. It became the highest-grossing musical up to that time. There are even sing-along events, in which audience members dress up as characters in the film and sing along while the lyrics appear on the screen. Andrews got an Academy Award nomination for her role as Maria, and the film earned the Best Picture award. This is the film role for which Andrews is best known, although it did tend to lock her remarkable talent into a stereotype of the singing governess from which she had trouble escaping.

Thoroughly Modern Millie. Two nonmusical roles followed: Torn Curtain (1966), a suspense drama directed by Alfred Hitchcock and costarring Paul Newman, and Hawaii (1966), a big-budget epic about New England missionaries on the Pacific island, with Richard Harris and Max Von Sydow, Andrews came back to her musical roots with a 1920's spoof similar to The Boy Friend, called Thoroughly Modern Millie (1967), costarring Carol Channing, Mary Tyler Moore, James Fox, and the great British comedian Beatrice Lillie. It was one of the most popular films of the year, and its bouncy title tune, sung by Andrews over the opening credits, became a popular commercial success. The film featured Andrews in the title role as a 1920's flapper. Although the film received lackluster reviews, its score, by Elmer Bernstein, won an Academy Award. Thoroughly Modern Millie typified the film-musical genre, whose popularity peaked at the height of Andrews's vocal powers.

Star! The highly touted 1968 film Star!, based on the life of stage actor Gertrude Lawrence, teamed Andrews with her The Sound of Music director, Robert Wise, but the film was poorly received. She superbly re-created Lawrence's Broadway musical triumphs, with a far superior singing voice than Lawrence possessed, but Andrews was generally lambasted by critics as too ladylike for the role. Her costar, Daniel Massey, won a Best Supporting Actor nomination for his role as Noël Coward, and their scenes together invigorated a rather dramatically weak and inaccurate film.

After she married Edwards, Andrews appeared in several of his films, and she became a regular guest star on television, most notably in a series of specials with her friend, Carol Burnett, and in many specials, such as The Julie Andrews Hour (1972-1973), Julie on Sesame Street (1973), and Julie Andrews: The Sound of Music (1987).

Victor/Victoria. The most successful film effort of Andrews and Edwards, Victor/Victoria, broke with her ladylike image. In the 1982 musical farce, Andrews plays a down-on-her-luck opera singer who turns to female impersonation to earn a living, Victor/Victoria offered her a sophisticated and edgy role that allowed her to break away from her wholesome image. Her effectiveness in pretending to be a man who is pretending to be a woman earned Andrews a Best Actress Academy Award nomination, and it provided her with one of her best film roles in years, appearing opposite Garner again and Robert Preston in a brilliant turn as her gay mentor and friend. The role solidified Andrews's status as a serious and accomplished actor.

Back on Broadway. In the 1990's, with a less-pressing domestic situation, Andrews made a long-awaited return to the theater. She participated in the off-Broadway production Putting It Together (1993), a revue of Stephen Sondheim songs, as one of an ensemble cast of five singers, in a limited run of twelve weeks. Two years later, Andrews returned to the theater with the stage version of Victor/Victoria, a large-scale production that totally revolved around her character. Although expectations were high, Victor/Victoria, directed by her husband and with music and lyrics by Henry Mancini and Leslie Bricusse, opened on Broadway on October 25, 1995, to mixed reviews. Andrews was praised, and she received a Tony Award nomination, although she declined to accept the nomination when she discovered she was the only one the show nominated.

Later Projects. In 1998, for the stage musical Dr. Dolittle in London, she performed the voice of Polynesia the parrot, recording some seven hundred sentences and sounds, which were placed on a computer chip that sat in the mechanical bird's mouth. In 1999 she teamed with Garner to make One Special Night, a television film, for CBS. In 2001 Andrews and her The Sound of Music costar, Christopher Plummer, were reunited for a live television broadcast of the play On Golden Pond (1979).

Andrews returned to films in 2001 as the royal grandmother in The Princess Diaries, the story of a gawky teenager who learns that her long-absent father, who has died, was the prince of a small European country. In 2004 Andrews reprised her role as Queen Clarisse Renaldi in The Princess Diaries 2: Royal Engagement, and she also starred as the voice of Queen Lillian in Shrek 2.

Musical Legacy

Andrews was blessed with a beautiful soprano voice and crystal-clear diction that were especially suited to both film and stage musicals. Although her peak of popularity was in the 1960's, her career extended well beyond. She proved that she could mature beyond her typecasting as the singing governess, gaining strength as an actor at a time in her career when many women would be overlooked.

Andrews will always be remembered for her contributions to musical theater on the strength of her performances in the phenomenally popular Broadway musicals My Fair Lady and Camelot and the film musicals The Sound of Music and Mary Poppins. In addition, she has proved her creative versatility, with her roles in films aimed at the youth market and as a respected children's author.

Martin J. Manning

Further Reading

Arntz, James, and Thomas S. Wilson. Julie Andrews. Chicago: Contemporary Books, 1995. With a foreword by Burnett, the book covers the life and career of Andrews, concluding that she is a successful author, dedicated to her charities, and a fine actress not wholly appreciated for her nonsinging dramatic abilities.

Lerner, Alan Jay. The Street Where I Live. New York: Da Capo Press, 1994. This book, originally published in 1978, offers behind-the-scenes details on the making of Andrews's two important stage productions, My Fair Lady and Camelot. Lerner's respect and love for his leading lady is apparent, and he expresses his dismay about the fact that she was not hired for the film version of My Fair Lady.

Spindle, Les. Julie Andrews: A Bio-Bibliography. New York: Greenwood, 1989. Comprehensive on Andrews's career up to 1989.

Wilk, Max. The Making of "The Sound of Music." New York: Routledge, 2007. Interesting story on the making of the successful film, with good material on Andrews.

Windeler, Robert. Julie Andrews: A Life on Stage and Screen. New York: Carol, 1997. Full coverage of Andrews's life up to 1997, although it falls short in later events, such as her vocal problems and her films for Disney.

See also: Bernstein, Elmer; Hammerstein, Oscar, II; Lerner, Alan Jay; Loewe, Frederick; Mancini, Henry; Rodgers, Richard; Sondheim, Stephen.

Martha Argerich

Argentine pianist

A prodigiously gifted pianist and a fiery and impetuous performer, Argerich is known for her powerful technique and her sensitive phrasing.

Born: June 5, 1941; Buenos Aires, Argentina

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Schumann: Kinderszenen, Kreisleriana, 1987; Mendelssohn: Concerto for Violin and Piano; Violin Concerto in D Minor, 1989; Beethoven: Piano Concertos Nos. 1 and 2, 1995; Rachmaninoff: Piano Concerto No. 3 in D Minor, Op. 30; Tchaikovsky: Piano Concerto No. 1 in B-flat Minor, Op. 23, 1995; Chopin: Piano Concerto No. 1; Liszt: Piano Concerto No. 1, 1996; Prokofiev: Piano Concerto No. 3; Ravel: Piano Concerto in G; Gaspard de la Nuit, 1997.

The Life

Martha Argerich (AHR-gur-ihch) began playing the piano at age three, and she started lessons at age five with Vincenzo Scaramuzza. She remained his student until she was age ten. She gave her debut concert in 1949 at age eight, playing Ludwig van Beethoven's Piano Concerto in C Major, Op. 15 (1798). The following year she played Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's Piano Concerto No. 20 in D Minor (1785), and Johann Sebastian Bach's French Suite No. 5 in G Major (1722). In 1955 Argerich's family moved to Europe, where she studied with Friedrich Gulda in Austria. When the eight-year-old Argerich played the last movement of Beethoven's Sonata in E-Flat, Op. 31, No. 3 for legendary pianist Walter Gieseking, he noticed that she was resistant to being pushed to play in public, and he encouraged those responsible for her training to be sensitive to these tendencies. His advice was not heeded, and the young Argerich often resorted to creative methods for avoiding practicing, such as putting water-soaked blotter paper into her shoes in the hope of inducing illness. At musical soirées, the girl so disliked playing for others that she hid under the table, while the young Daniel Barenboim, who loved performing, soaked up the praise of those present.

Although Argerich loved playing the piano, she wanted to be a doctor, not a pianist, and her contradictory relationship with the instrument for which she possesses such immense talent has manifested itself in various ways in her career. Argerich often distinguishes between her love for playing the piano and her dislike for many aspects of the profession of pianist.

In 1957 Argerich won within three weeks both the Geneva International Music Competition and the Ferruccio Busoni International Competition. Shortly thereafter, she suffered a major depression, certain that she would quit the piano and use her language skills to become a secretary. Teacher Stefan Askenase's wife Anny helped Argerich to regain her confidence, to overcome her illness, and to return to the piano after having been away from it for three years. She went on to win the International Frédéric Chopin Piano Competition in 1965.

Argerich's tempestuous personal life has been a matter of interest: She has been married three times, to composer Robert Chen, to conductor Charles Dutoit, and to pianist Stephen Kovacevich. She has three daughters, one from each marriage.

The Music

Performance. Argerich is famous for the speed and ease with which she learns music. She attributes this to never knowing as a child if a piece was difficult or not, and therefore she was not fearful of its complexities. Pianistic legends regarding this ability abound: that she learned a concerto just by studying it on a plane and then performed it upon arrival; that she initially learned Sergei Prokofiev's Concerto No. 3 (1921) by hearing a roommate practice it incessantly; that she can learn new music just a few hours before she performs it. Regardless of the veracity of these stories, their existence attests to her unique talent. Argerich admits that she never practices more than two hours a day.

Beginning in 1981, Argerich mostly eschewed solo literature, and she has played mostly concerti and chamber music. She cites a feeling of extreme loneliness on stage as the reason for avoiding solo performances. One notable exception was a Carnegie Hall concert in 2000 in which the first half consisted of her playing solo repertoire. This benefit concert for the John Wayne Cancer Institute was presented in gratitude by Argerich for the successful treatment of her melanoma, a disease from which she suffered for ten years.

Shrouded in the mystique created by her impassioned performances, commanding personality, and attractive appearance, Argerich also gained notoriety for canceling a considerable number of performances each season. One of the most highly acclaimed performers of her time, Argerich has never signed a contract, and thus she is never obligated to perform.

Recordings. Although her live solo performances are rare, Argerich's recordings are extensive, about fifty albums on various major labels, such as Deutsche Grammophone, Sony, Philips, Teldec, and EMI. She has recorded many compositions from the standard repertoire, and her discography includes works by Johann Sebastian Bach, Béla Bartók, Beethoven, Johannes Brahms, Chopin, Manuel de Falla, César Franck, Joseph Haydn, Franz Liszt, Witold Lutosławski, Niccolò Paganini, Prokofiev, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Maurice Ravel, Franz Schubert, Robert Schumann, and Peter Ilich Tchaikovsky. She regularly performs and records chamber music with a select group of musicians who are also her friends, among them pianists Nelson Freire, Kovacevich, Nicolas Economou, Alexis Golovin, and Alexandre Rabinovitch; flutist James Galway; violinists Ruggiero Ricci, Ivry Gitlis, and Gidon Kremer; and cellist Mischa Maisky.

Martha Argerich. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Musical Legacy

One of the most sought-after performers in classical music, Argerich has permanent invitations to play with prestigious orchestras in North America, Europe, and Japan. She is known primarily for her passionate and expressive performances of many works from the standard repertoire of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Argerich is also involved in a number of music festivals: She became artistic director of the Beppu Festival in Japan in 1998. In 1999 she created the International Piano Competition and Festival Martha Argerich in Buenos Aires, and in 2002 she founded the Progetto Martha Argerich as part of the Lugano Festival in Switzerland. In 2002, in collaboration with EMI, Argerich promoted the talents of selected young pianists in a series of albums titled Martha Argerich Presents.

Argerich has won three Grammy Awards: in 1999 for her recording of Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No. 1 and Piano Concerto No. 3 and Bartók's Piano Concerto No. 3 with Charles Dutoit; in 2004 for piano duo works by Prokofiev and Ravel with Mikhail Pletnev; and in 2005 for Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 2 and Piano Concerto No. 3 with Claudio Abbado. Among her other distinguished awards are Musician of the Year in 2001 from Musical America and Commandeur de l'Ordre des Arts et des Lettres in 2004 from the French government.

Lisa de Alwis

Further Reading

Dyer, Richard. "Argerich Captivates with Focus, Virtuosity." The Boston Globe, August 24, 2004. A review of Argerich's performance at a Tanglewood concert describes her agility at the piano and her ability to create a variety of colors with her playing.

Manildi, Donald. "Musician of the Year 2001: Martha Argerich." Musical America (2001). A comprehensive overview of Argerich's life and career. Manildi writes engagingly and takes great care with the details.

Ross, Alex. "Madame X." The New Yorker (November 12, 2001). Interview with the pianist contains biographical information and a discussion of her performance style, her effect on other musicians, and her charismatic personality.

See also: Barenboim, Daniel; Busoni, Ferruccio; Galway, Sir James; Perlman, Itzhak; Prokofiev, Sergei.

Harold Arlen

American musical-theater composer, pianist, and singer

Arlen developed the musical fusion created by George Gershwin—blending the high and the low, the black and the white sounds of American music. In more than four hundred songs, he perfected a style known as blue-eyed soul, and he was the most jazz-oriented of the Tin Pan Alley songwriters.

Born: February 15, 1905; Buffalo, New York
Died: April 23, 1986; New York, New York

Principal works

MUSICAL THEATER (music): The 9:15 Review, 1929 (lyrics by Ted Koehler); Rhythmania, 1931 (lyrics by Koehler); You Said It, 1931 (lyrics by Jack Yellen); Americana, 1932 (lyrics by Edgar "Yip" Harburg and Johnny Mercer); The Cotton Club Parade, 1932 (lyrics by Koehler); Earl Carroll's Vanities of 1932, 1932 (lyrics by Koehler); The Great Magoo, 1933 (lyrics by Harburg and Billy Rose); Life Begins at 8:40, 1934 (lyrics by Harburg and Ira Gershwin); Bloomer Girl, 1944 (lyrics by Sig Herzig and Harburg; libretto by Fred Saidy); St. Louis Woman, 1946 (lyrics by Countée Cullen and Mercer; libretto by Arna Bontemps); House of Flowers, 1954 (lyrics by Truman Capote); Jamaica, 1957 (lyrics by Harburg; libretto by Harburg and Saidy); Saratoga, 1959 (lyrics by Mercer).

PIANO WORKS: Minor Gaff, 1926 (blues fantasy; with Dick George); Rhythmic Moments, 1928; Mood in Six Minutes, 1935; American Minuet, 1939; Bon-Bon, 1960; Ode, 1960.

SONGS (music): "I Love a Parade," 1931 (lyrics by Ted Koehler); "Lydia, the Tattooed Lady," 1939 (lyrics by Edgar "Yip" Harburg); "Over the Rainbow," 1939 (lyrics by Harburg); "Blues in the Night," 1941 (lyrics by Johnny Mercer); "That Old Black Magic," 1942 (lyrics by Mercer); "Dissertation on the State of Bliss," 1954 (lyrics by Ira Gershwin); "The Man That Got Away," 1954 (lyrics by Gershwin).

VOCAL WORK: American Negro Suite: Four Spirituals, a Dream, and Lullaby, 1941 (six songs for voice and piano; lyrics by Koehler).

The Life

The son of Samuel and Celia Arluck, Hyman Arluck began to follow his father's footsteps as a cantor by singing in synagogue at the age of seven. Young Arluck was given piano lessons and loved to sing, but he was much more interested in jazz than classical music. At sixteen, Arluck dropped out of school and played at cafés in Buffalo, New York, with a group called the Snappy Trio. He arrived in New York City at the age of twenty with the Buffalodians, an eleven-piece dance band for which Arluck was singer, pianist, and arranger. His first published work was the solo piano piece Minor Gaff, written with Dick George. It was during this period that he changed his name from Arluck to Arlen (AHR-luhn). Bandleader Arnold Johnson heard Arlen at the Palace Theatre and hired him to be a vocalist, pianist, and arranger for his orchestra, which was currently playing for the George White Scandals of 1928.

Arlen left the George White Scandals of 1928 in order to pursue his dream: to be a singer. As a single act in vaudeville, he was popular, but when he and Ted Koehler signed with a publishing firm as a songwriting team, Arlen realized he had to give up his singing career. Nevertheless, he occasionally recorded his own songs (usually with the Leo Reisman Orchestra) in his unique singing style.

Arlen first met the beautiful model and showgirl Anya Taranda in 1932, but the shy, soft-spoken composer did not rush into their courtship. Cantor Arluck was not pleased that his son was in love with a Catholic girl, but the happy couple finally wed in 1937 and moved to California. Friends with the Berlins, the Gershwins, the Kerns, Dorothy Fields, and Moss Hart, the attractive Arlens lived the high life. A natty dresser, Arlen was often seen with a walking cane and sporting a flower in his buttonhole.

Around 1950 Anya began to have violent outbursts, serious enough to have her institutionalized in 1953, and Arlen began to drink heavily. By 1961 Anya was well enough for the couple to move back to Manhattan. Although she refused to see a doctor concerning a nervous tic, Anya was able to resume her social life. Her condition worsened, however, in 1969; she was diagnosed with a brain tumor and died in 1970. After suffering for years from Parkinson's disease, the reclusive Arlen died of cancer in 1986 at the age of eighty-one.

The Music

Arlen's musical background gave him an unusually rich palette from which to paint as a composer. Citing his cantor father as one of the most inspired improvisers he knew, Arlen sang not only as a cantor but also with bands and in vaudeville. Along with his intimate knowledge of and respect for singers, Arlen was classically trained as a pianist and yet had a deep love of jazz. Although he thought in terms of melody, he also wrote orchestrations and did arrangements during the early part of his career. Arlen's compositions were shaped by American jazz and blues, the big band sound, and popular song. Classic Arlen embraces lush harmonic changes, unusual intervals, minor tonalities, and sweeping melody lines.

Early Works. Cast as a singer in the Broadway musical Great Day, Arlen volunteered to be the rehearsal pianist when the show's regular one did not come to work. The show's musical director encouraged him to write down a song he had been improvising at the piano. Fortunately, he was introduced to lyricist Ted Koehler, who created words for Arlen's tune. So it was that Arlen's first song composition, "Get Happy," became his first song to appear in a Broadway show, The 9:15 Revue.

Arlen and Koehler replaced the team of Jimmy McHugh and Dorothy Fields to write the Cotton Club's shows, where they created the next eight revues (1930-1934). For many years the Cotton Club was wildly popular as white audiences went to Harlem to drink bootleg liquor and see black performers. Hits from this period include "I've Got the World on a String" for Aida Ward, "Minnie the

Harold Arlen. (Library of Congress)

Moocher's Wedding Day" for Cab Calloway, "Stormy Weather" for Ethel Waters, and "As Long as I Live" for sixteen-year-old Lena Horne.

When E. Y. "Yip" Harburg broke up with Vernon Duke in 1934, he asked Arlen to join him in writing the musical revue Life Begins at 8:40, starring Ray Bolger and Bert Lahr (who would both later star in the 1939 film The Wizard of Oz). Since George Gershwin was writing Porgy and Bess, Ira Gershwin joined his college classmate Harburg as co-lyricist. The trio created "Let's Take a Walk Around the Block" and "What Can You Say in a Love Song?" Working with such thoroughbreds as Harburg and Gershwin clearly brought out his best, so Arlen ended his partnership with Koehler.

Film Work. While Arlen had been writing for film since 1931's Manhattan Parade ("I Love a Parade") and 1933's Take a Chance ("It's Only a Paper Moon"), in 1938 he decided to move to Hollywood. For the Marx brothers, Arlen and Harburg created the score for At the Circus (1939) and a song that would henceforth be associated with Groucho, "Lydia, the Tattooed Lady."

Jerome Kern was originally slated to write The Wizard of Oz, but when he had a minor stroke, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer turned to Arlen and Harburg. In only fourteen weeks the team turned out a string of memorable songs, but "Over the Rainbow" was a hard sell. The original children's book by L. Frank Baum did not mention rainbows, the sweeping ballad was perceived to be out of character for a little Kansas farm girl, and Louis B. Mayer did not like the song. Even though it had been cut repeatedly in previews, assistant producer Arthur Freed insisted it remain. The song won the Academy Award for best song in 1939, has been named the number-one Song of the Century by the Recording Industry Association of America, and tops the American Film Institute's 100 Years, 100 Songs list.

Arlen and Johnny Mercer had written a song together in 1932 for the Shubert revue Americana, so they decided to team up again in 1941. While Arlen was comfortable with the standard aaba thirty-two-bar song format, he occasionally experimented. "Blues in the Night" (written for the film Blues in the Night) is unusual in that it is fifty-eight measures long, is abcca in form, and contains two measures that are whistled. (Dinah Shore's recording was her first to sell a million units.) Mercer heard Arlen play only a sensuous seventy-two bars of "That Old Black Magic" (in the film Star Spangled Rhythm) once before he began sketching out the lyrics.

Arlen's other successful film work includes Cabin in the Sky (1943) and Here Come the Waves (1944). For the former, Arlen and Harburg wrote three new songs to add to those written by Vernon Duke for the original stage version; "Happiness Is a Thing Called Joe" was another hit for Ethel Waters. For the latter, Mercer and Arlen wrote "Ac-Cent-Tchu-Ate the Positive" (inducted in the Grammy Hall of Fame in 1998). Another great Arlen-Mercer collaboration was "One for My Baby (and One More for the Road)," which appeared in The Sky's the Limit (1943). Harburg brought more of a concert-hall sound out of the composer, while Mercer encouraged the blues and jazz.

Reunited with Judy Garland after fifteen years, in 1954 Arlen teamed with Ira Gershwin for A Star Is Born because Harburg was blacklisted, a casualty of the communist witch hunts of the time. While "The Man That Got Away" is the best-known song from this film, other standouts include "It's a New World," "Here's What I'm Here For," and "Lose That Long Face." The movie that was supposed to be Garland's big comeback almost ended her film career, and "The Man That Got Away" was nominated for but did not win the Academy Award.

More Broadway. In 1944 Arlen's Civil War-era musical Bloomer Girl, with lyrics by Harburg, book by Sig Herzig and Fred Saidy, and choreography by Agnes de Mille, hit Broadway. Following the success of Oklahoma! (1943), audiences flocked to this nostalgic show for 654 performances; "The Eagle and Me" and "Evelina" are highlights of the score. St. Louis Woman contained a terrific score by Arlen and Mercer, but Arna Bontemps and Countée Cullen's book was weak. Despite a superior cast—Pearl Bailey, Lena Horne, the Nicholas brothers—and a string of stunning songs—such as "Any Place I Hang My Hat Is Home," "Legalize My Name," "I Had Myself a True Love," "Come Rain or Come Shine," "It's a Woman's Prerogative," "I Wonder What Became of Me"—the musical had a run of only 113 performances on Broadway. Margaret Whiting's recording of "Come Rain or Come Shine" gave that song a life independent of the stage flop. Arlen and Mercer took their wonderful material and refashioned it into Free and Easy, a "blues opera," that proved to be equally unsuccessful in Europe.

With a book by Truman Capote and lyrics by Capote and Arlen, House of Flowers was notable for the excellent songs "I Never Has Seen Snow," "Don't Like Goodbyes," "Two Ladies in de Shade of de Banana Tree," and "A Sleepin' Bee." However, neither the direction of Peter Brook nor the presence of Pearl Bailey and Diahann Carroll could keep the show running past 165 performances. An Off-Broadway revival in 1968 was equally unsuccessful, but a 2003 concert version by Encores! proved the songs to be top-notch.

Arlen's last success on Broadway was Jamaica (with 557 performances), with Harburg as lyricist and starring Lena Horne. Although not as strong as House of Flowers, this score nevertheless contains "Push de Button," "Little Biscuit," "I Don't Think I'll End It All Today," and the show's finest, "Cocoanut Sweet." His last collaboration with Harburg produced the haunting ballad "Paris Is a Lonely Town" for the forgotten animated film Gay Purr-ee (1962).

Late in his career, Arlen finally had the opportunity to team up again with Mercer. Saratoga contains many fine songs—"Love Held Lightly" and "Goose Never Be a Peacock"—but it was to be his final Broadway production. After a couple more films, Arlen withdrew into retirement in the mid-1960's.

Piano Compositions. Like his idol Gershwin, Arlen was a Tin Pan Alley songwriter who also wrote "highbrow" piano compositions: Mood in Six Minutes, American Minuet, American Negro Suite: Four Spirituals, a Dream, and a Lullaby (lyrics by Koehler), Ode, and Bon-Bon.

Musical Legacy

When Lincoln Center inaugurated its American Songbook series in 1999, it chose to start with Harold Arlen. New York Times critic Stephen Holden applauded this choice, noting Arlen "is probably the most underappreciated composer as well the one most deeply connected to contemporary pop." Arlen created more shows with all-black casts—eight Cotton Club revues, St. Louis Woman, Jamaica, House of Flowers, Free and Easy—than any other major composer. Ethel Waters once remarked that Arlen was "the Negro-est white man I ever knew." When Arlen died in 1986, Irving Berlin remarked, "He wasn't as well known as some of us, but he was more talented than most of us, and he will be missed by all of us."

Bud Coleman

Further Reading

Friedwald, Will. Stardust Melodies: The Biography of Twelve of America's Most Popular Songs. New York: Pantheon Books, 2002. One chapter tells the story of Koehler and Arlen's "Stormy Weather."

Furia, Philip, and Michael Lasser. America's Songs: The Stories Behind the Songs of Broadway, Hollywood, and Tin Pan Alley. New York: Routledge, 2006. Contains the backstory and brief analysis of twenty-eight Arlen tunes.

Hischak, Thomas S. The American Musical Film Song Encyclopedia. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1999. Sixty-one of Arlen's songs are briefly described, including who originally sang them, in which film they appeared, and who subsequently recorded them.

Jablonski, Edward. Harold Arlen: Rhythm, Rainbows, and Blues. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1996. An expanded version of his 1961 biography Harold Arlen: Happy with the Blues.

Suskin, Steven. Show Tunes, 1905-1985: The Songs, Shows, and Careers of Broadway's Major Composers. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1986. According to Suskin, Gershwin used gimmicks in his writing, while the same elements were used organically in Arlen's work because of his superior imagination.

Wilder, Alec. American Popular Song: The Great Innovators, 1900-1950. Edited by James T. Maher. New York: Oxford University Press, 1972. Wilder believes Arlen surpassed Gershwin and that Arlen's talents as a singer and orchestrator gave him a range and richness as a composer that set him apart from his peers. Points out the irony that the composer's most popular song, "Over the Rainbow," is not representative of the distinctive Arlen style, although it does contain his signature octave jump.

See also: Bennett, Tony; Fitzgerald, Ella; Gershwin, George; Gershwin, Ira; Horne, Lena; Kern, Jerome; Lee, Peggy; Mercer, Johnny; Peterson, Oscar; Previn, Sir André; Streisand, Barbra; Tatum, Art; Webb, Jimmy.

Louis Armstrong

American jazz trumpeter and composer

A virtuoso trumpet player and innovative vocalist, Armstrong was an influential jazz musician who popularized the improvised solo and scat singing. With his showmanship and unquenchable determination to bring joy to the lives of others, Armstrong performed constantly throughout the United States and abroad, appeared in twenty-eight feature films, wrote dozens of articles and reminiscences, and became one of the world's most recognized and beloved Americans.

Born: August 4, 1901; New Orleans, Louisiana
Died: July 6, 1971; New York, New York
Also known as: Daniel Louis Armstrong (full name); Ambassador Satch; Satchmo

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: New Orleans Jazz, 1940; Satchmo Serenades, 1949; New Orleans Days, 1950; New Orleans Nights, 1950; New Orleans to New York, 1950; Latter Day Louis, 1954; Louis Armstrong Plays W. C. Handy, 1954; Louis Armstrong Sings the Blues, 1954; Ambassador Satch, 1955; Satch Plays Fats: The Music of Fats Waller, 1955; Ella and Louis, 1956 (with Ella Fitzgerald); Ella and Louis Again, 1957 (with Fitzgerald); Louis and the Angels, 1957; Louis Armstrong Meets Oscar Peterson, 1957; Louis Under the Stars, 1957; Porgy and Bess, 1957 (with Fitzgerald); Satchmo in Style, 1959; Louis and the Dukes of Dixieland, 1960; Paris Blues, 1960 (music by Duke Ellington); The Great Reunion, 1961 (with Ellington); The Real Ambassadors, 1961 (with Dave Brubeck, Dave Lambert, Jon Hendricks, and Annie Ross); Together for the First Time, 1961 (with Ellington); Blueberry Hill, 1962; Hello, Dolly!, 1963; Louis, 1964; Satchmo, 1964; I Will Wait for You, 1967; What a Wonderful World, 1970.

SINGLES: "Weary Blues," 1926; "Potato Head Blues," 1927; "Savoy Blues," 1927; "Willie the Weeper," 1927; "Weather Bird," 1928; "West End Blues," 1928.

The Life

Daniel Louis (LEW-ee) Armstrong was born in 1901 in New Orleans, the cradle of jazz. His father, William Armstrong, abandoned his mother, Mayann, so Louis was listed as illegitimate on his Catholic baptismal certificate. He was raised by Mayann and his grandmother Josephine in "Back o' Town," the African American section of Storyville, the prostitute district of New Orleans. Louis sang in church services from an early age.

At about the age of seven, Armstrong began working for the Karnoffsky family, Jewish immigrants who owned a junkyard and treated him kindly. They gave Armstrong a tin horn, which he would blow from the top of their junk wagon to attract business. At some point, Morris Karnoffsky bought Armstrong a used B-flat cornet. Armstrong dropped out of school in the fifth grade and began singing and playing his cornet on street corners.

On January 1, 1913, Armstrong fired a pistol in a New Year's street celebration, for which he was arrested and sent to the Colored Waifs' Home, a juvenile detention facility. While there, Armstrong assiduously practiced the bugle and cornet, advancing to bandleader. Upon his release on June 16, 1914, Armstrong began performing at New Orleans events, while working odd jobs. In 1918 Armstrong was invited to play cornet in Edward "Kid" Ory's popular band, the Brown Skinned Babies. He also married Daisy Parker, a prostitute, and took on the responsibility of raising his unwed cousin's child, Clarence Hatfield.

After starring in various New Orleans bands and Fate Marabel's Mississippi River steamboat band, Armstrong joined Joe "King" Oliver's band in Chicago in 1922, the same year Armstrong and Daisy divorced. Armstrong recorded his first songs with Oliver's band and married jazz pianist Lil Hardin in 1924. Over the next few years, Armstrong performed in Chicago and New York with such stars as Fletcher Henderson, Sidney Bechet, Ma Rainey, Alberta Hunter, Bessie Smith, and Fats Waller, in the process switching from the cornet to the trumpet. His recordings as Louis Armstrong's Hot Five and Hot Seven from 1925 to 1928 revolutionized jazz.

By then the most famous jazz musician in America, he formed his own big band in Chicago. In 1931 Armstrong made his film debut in Hollywood, where he was convicted of possession of marijuana. He also developed chronic lip ailments as a result of his hard-blowing style.

In 1934 Joe Glaser became his manager, starting a lifetime partnership. In 1938 Armstrong divorced Lil to marry his mistress Alpha Smith. In 1942 Armstrong divorced Alpha to marry chorus girl Lucille Wilson. In 1947 Glaser formed the "All Stars" band, with which Armstrong would perform the rest of his life. Showing no interest in the advent of bebop, Armstrong stayed with traditional and popular favorites in some three hundred concerts a year.

In 1960 the U.S. State Department made Armstrong a goodwill ambassador, prompting him to conduct musical tours of Africa and Asia. Although sometimes maligned for his easygoing spirit, Armstrong did speak out against segregation, most notably in 1957, when he criticized President Dwight Eisenhower for his inaction in the Little Rock, Arkansas, school integration controversy.

Declining health began to interfere with Armstrong's frenetic concert schedule, and in 1971 he died of heart failure. His funeral was broadcast throughout the world to international mourning.

The Music

Louis Armstrong completed the transformation of New Orleans ragtime and Dixieland music into twentieth century jazz. He became a unique musical personality, endowing each performance with trumpet mastery, heartfelt singing, and infectious enthusiasm.

Hot Five and Hot Seven Recordings. Although jazz legends such as Charles "Buddy" Bolden began the process, Armstrong completed the evolution of New Orleans rag music into modern jazz. This transformation can be heard in Armstrong's revolutionary Hot Five and Hot Seven recordings made in Chicago, birthplace of the new style. The classic New Orleans format consisted of ensemble playing in 2/2 time, during which the musicians played variations of the melody, collectively and one by one. Armstrong transformed this pattern in three ways. First, in the ensemble introduction, Armstrong's trumpet soared above the other musicians, with the melody a platform for his imaginative attacks in syncopated 4/4 time. In "Struttin' with Some Barbecue," Armstrong began with a bold twelve-bar melodic introduction that flew over the traditional New Orleans counterpoint of clarinet and trombone before surging ahead with ascending triplet notes. In the closing ensemble, his trumpet embellished the melody with his exuberant tone.

Second, and even more daringly, Armstrong liberated the solo from mere repetition of the arranged melody into an improvisational piece capable of telling a dramatic story. His innovative solos from these recordings opened with beautiful flights, developed with tension and anticipation, and were resolved in climaxes of soaring high notes and swooping harmonic changes. In "Potato Head Blues," Armstrong's stop-time solo chorus discarded the melody entirely as his trumpet cascaded though brilliant chord progressions (explorations of the underlying harmonies) before rejoining the ensemble in a poignant close. Likewise in the minor-key "Tight Like This," Armstrong built on a suggestive vocal dialogue with a dramatic three-chorus trumpet solo that began with ominous growls before ascending into an explosive climax that the vocalists proclaimed to be "tight like that." Third, Armstrong in "Heebie Jeebies" added a new element to jazz: scat, which consisted of nonsense-syllable, rhythmic singing.

Louis Armstrong. (Library of Congress)

All of these new elements can be heard in the celebrated "West End Blues," which began with Armstrong's inspired nine-measure trumpet cadenza, filled with rapid and difficult glissandi. This introduction was followed by a duet between the clarinet and Armstrong's vocal, in which Armstrong's lilting scat syllables reached a new level of expressiveness. He concluded his second solo with tense and sustained high notes that swept the length of the song beneath it. The brilliance of "West End Blues" was equaled by the more contemplative interplay of the duet "Weatherbird," which Armstrong recorded with Earl "Fatha" Hines one year later.

Louis Armstrong and His Orchestra. Capitalizing on the rise of big band swing, Armstrong began fronting his own big band in 1929, eventually to be known as Louis Armstrong and His Orchestra. These polished recordings from 1929 to 1931 showed Armstrong at his finest. His fierce staccato blasts, alternating with a high C note sustained for ten measures, in "Mahogany Hall Stomp," his blistering arpeggios in "St. Louis Blues," his bravura vocal and trumpet solos in "Ain't Misbehavin'" (which regularly stole the show in the revue Hot Chocolate), and his haunting opening cadenza in "Blue Again," all displayed the power and imagination of his Hot Five and Hot Seven sessions without their occasional mistakes and rawness. During the 1930's and 1940's, Armstrong continued to play jazz classics such as "St. James Infirmary" and "When the Saints Go Marching In" but also added novelty numbers such as "I'm a Ding Dong Daddy (from Dumas)" and "I'll Be Glad When You're Dead, You Rascal You." Most significantly, he gravitated to popular standards that he would make his own, such as his inspired recording of Hoagy Carmichael's "Stardust" in 1931. He also performed his trademark biographical numbers at nearly every concert, such as "Shine," "Black and Blue," and "When It's Sleepy Time Down South." Armstrong endowed his trumpet with the expressiveness and narrative capability of the human voice and his singing with glissandi, obligatos, and vibratos that attain the quality of a musical instrument.

The big band era ended with World War II, and following a successful Town Hall concert in New York City on May 17, 1947, Glaser formed Louis Armstrong and His All-Stars as a six-piece band. With a succession of all-stars over the succeeding decades, including Hines, Jack Teagarden, Barney Bigard, Sid Catlett, Trummy Young, Billy Kyle, Milt Hinton, Danny Barcelona, and vocalist Velma Middleton, Armstrong recorded such popular hits as "Blueberry Hill," "Mack the Knife," and "Hello, Dolly!" (which hit number one on the Billboard chart on May 9, 1964).

"What a Wonderful World." Perhaps Armstrong's most emblematic recording was "What a Wonderful World," written specifically for him and recorded shortly before his death. It is a sentimental number with strings, as Armstrong forgoes his trumpet to sing joyously of life. It sold fewer than a thousand records in the United States but was a major hit in England and other international markets. With its relentlessly upbeat lyrics, it might be considered saccharine, but it showcased Armstrong's sincerity, as his gravelly voice glided over each syllable and embraced it with moving vibrato. The exuberant cheerfulness of "What a Wonderful World" made it both a Christmas-season favorite and an ironic touch in such film sound tracks as Good Morning, Vietnam (1987).

Musical Legacy

Armstrong's impact on jazz has never been disputed. He revolutionized the solo, thereby transforming Dixieland collective playing into modern jazz featuring improvised composition. Elements of swing, bebop, and even free jazz were prefigured in his soaring trumpet harmonics. With a unique vocal style, he popularized scat singing and influenced generations of pop, jazz, and swing singers. Although some critics accuse Armstrong of commercially misusing his talents for the last three decades of his life, in fact he was expanding, not abandoning, his New Orleans roots. The incredible musical environment of early New Orleans—with its extravagant mix of spirituals, blues, funeral marches, quadrilles, field hollers, work songs, physical clowning, even Voodoo influences—contributed to Armstrong's unique musicality and showmanship. Armed with his trademark white handkerchief, mugging joyfully at the top of the stage, Armstrong brought his exuberant New Orleans spirit to each performance.

Armstrong is one of the few American musicians to become an international icon. In spite of his deprived Storyville upbringing and the oppression that African Americans suffered, Armstrong focused on the affirmative, joyful, wonderful experiences of life. In that way he was truly an ambassador of jazz and American culture.

Howard Bromberg

Further Reading

Armstrong, Louis. Satchmo: My Life in New Orleans. New York: Da Capo Press, 1986. Reprint of Armstrong's 1954 memoir of his gritty and colorful youth.

Bergreen, Laurence. Louis Armstrong: An Extravagant Life. New York: Broadway Books, 1997. In-depth portrait by a talented biographer of other American twentieth century figures such as Al Capone, James Agee, and Irving Berlin.

Boujut, Michael. Louis Armstrong. New York: Rizzoli International, 1998. Originally published in France, includes time line, photographs, interview with contemporary trumpeter Wynton Marsalis, discography, and filmography.

Brothers, Thomas. Louis Armstrong's New Orleans. New York: W. W. Norton, 2006. Biography of Armstrong's early years, emphasizing the lifelong influence that New Orleans's heady mix of African American musical culture would exert on Armstrong. Draws on extensive archives and interviews.

_____, ed. Louis Armstrong in His Own Words: Selected Writings. Oxford, England: Oxford University Press, 1999. Collection of Armstrong's prolific writings.

Collier, James Lincoln. Louis Armstrong: An American Genius. New York: Oxford University Press, 1983. Insightful analysis of early Armstrong recordings, but assesses Armstrong's later musical career as too commercial.

Giddins, Gary. Satchmo: The Genius of Louis Armstrong. New York: Da Capo Press, 2001. A noted jazz critic analyzes Armstrong's influence on twentieth century musical development.

Meckna, Michael. Satchmo: The Louis Armstrong Encyclopedia. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2004. A comprehensive reference work with more than fifteen hundred entries and appendixes including discography, chronology, filmography, bibliography, and Web listings.

Panassié, Hugues. Louis Armstrong. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1971. A leading French critic of jazz incisively analyzes Armstrong's recordings.

Ratliff, Ben. Jazz: A Critic's Guide to the Hundred Most Important Recordings. New York: Henry Holt, 2002. This volume in The New York Times' Essential Library Series includes chapters on Armstrong's "Complete Hot Five and Hot Seven Recordings" (1925-1929) and "Complete RCA Victor Recordings" (1930-1956), highlighting Armstrong's originality as soloist and vocalist.

See also: Basie, Count; Bechet, Sidney; Beiderbecke, Bix; Cole, Nat King; Cooke, Sam; Crosby, Bing; Domino, Fats; Fitzgerald, Ella; Gillespie, Dizzy; Goodman, Benny; Gordon, Dexter; Hampton, Lionel; Handy, W. C.;

Hawkins, Coleman; Henderson, Fletcher; Holiday, Billie; Hunter, Alberta; Jefferson, Blind Lemon; Johnson, Lonnie; Jordan, Louis; Lee, Peggy; Lewis, John; Masekela, Hugh; Mingus, Charles; Peterson, Oscar; Piaf, Édith; Rainey, Ma; Rodgers, Jimmie; Smith, Bessie; Waits, Tom; Waller, Fats; Whiteman, Paul; Williams, Mary Lou.

Eddy Arnold

American country guitarist, vocalist, and songwriter

Arnold had a significant impact on country-western music, scoring 147 singles on the country charts, twenty-eight of which reached number one. In addition, his recordings from the mid-1960's on made him a pop star who transcended genres.

Born: May 15, 1918; Madisonville, Tennessee
Died: May 8, 2008; Nashville, Tennessee
Also known as: Richard Edward Arnold (full name); Tennessee Plowboy

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Anytime, 1955; The Chapel on the Hill, 1955; Wanderin', 1955; A Little on the Lonely Side, 1956; My Darling, My Darling, 1957; When They Were Young, 1957; Praise Him, Praise Him, 1958; Have Guitar, Will Travel, 1959; Thereby Hangs a Tale, 1959; More Eddy Arnold, 1960; You Gotta Have Love, 1960; Christmas with Eddy Arnold, 1961; Let's Make Memories Tonight, 1961; One More Time, 1961; Our Man Down South, 1962; Cattle Call, 1963; Faithfully Yours, 1963; Folk Song Book, 1964; Sometimes I'm Happy, Sometimes I'm Blue, 1964; The Easy Way, 1965; My World, 1965; I Want to Go with You, 1966; The Last Word in Lonesome, 1966; Somebody Like Me, 1966; Lonely Again, 1967; Turn the World Around, 1967; The Everlovin' World of Eddy Arnold, 1968; The Romantic World of Eddy Arnold, 1968; Walkin' in Love Land, 1968; Songs of the Young World, 1969; The Glory of Love, 1969; The Warmth of Eddy, 1969; Love and Guitars, 1970; Standing Alone, 1970; Loving Her Was Easier, 1971; Portrait of My Woman, 1971; Welcome to My World, 1971; Eddy Arnold Sings for Housewives and Other Lovers, 1972; Lonely People, 1972; The World of Eddy Arnold, 1973; I Wish That I Had Loved You Better, 1974; She's Got Everything I Need, 1974; The Wonderful World of Eddy Arnold, 1975; Eddy, 1976; I Need You All the Time, 1977; Many Tears Ago, 1985; Hand Holdin' Songs, 1990; You Don't Miss a Thing, 1991; After All These Years, 2005.

SINGLES: "Cattle Call," 1945; "Each Minute Seems a Million Years," 1945; "I'll Hold You in My Heart (Till I Hold You in My Arms)," 1947.

The Life

Richard Edward Arnold was born in 1918 on his father's two-hundred-acre farm in Henderson, Tennessee. The family fell from prosperity, however, when in 1924 Arnold's father put up the farm as collateral to ease the debt of an older son by a previous marriage. The father's failing health in the late 1920's led to default, and in the depths of the Great Depression of the 1930's, Arnold lost both his father and his family homestead.

Later, Arnold made a name for himself by playing his guitar at local dances, and when a salesman from the Jackson Sun newspaper heard Arnold play, he arranged an audition with radio station WTJS, which was owned by the newspaper, in 1937. Arnold played first on WTJS, then on KWK in St. Louis in 1938, and finally he joined Pee Wee King's Golden West Cowboys in Nashville, becoming a popular radio singer known as the Tennessee Plowboy. He began recording country-western hits in 1945, and a decade later he attempted to get into the New York market with a more fully orchestrated sound. He finally succeeded in crossing over to the popular music charts in the mid-1960's. With sales of more than eighty-five million records over his lifetime, he became one of the best-selling recording artists in history. Arnold died on May 8, 2008, just a few days before his ninetieth birthday.

The Music

Despite his radio origins as the Tennessee Plowboy, Arnold endeavored from the start of his recording career to appeal to a wider audience. His first recording, "Each Minute Seems a Million Years," reached number five on the country charts, but two years later he made a significant impact on the popular music world. Of the top twenty country songs of 1947-1948, thirteen were Arnold's; six of those reached number one on the country charts, and of those six, four crossed over to the pop side. Arnold totally dominated the country charts at this time, his three number-one hits of 1947 staying at the top. "I'll Hold You in My Heart (Till I Hold You in My Arms" was on the country charts a staggering forty-six weeks, remaining number one nearly half that time (twenty-one weeks). In 1948 Arnold's singles were in the number-one position a total of forty weeks. This phenomenal success led country impresario Colonel Tom Parker (later the promotional genius behind Elvis Presley) to become Arnold's manager.

New York and Rock and Roll. Arnold's determination to succeed outside the world of country music brought mixed reactions from his fans. He had been one of the catalysts who made Nashville a major center of the recording industry, so when he went to New York in 1955 to record with the Hugo Winterhalter Orchestra, many fans called it selling out. However, the lush arrangements with full orchestra made songs such as "Cattle Call" and "That Do Make It Nice"—both number-one country hits—sell beyond the country market (though only "Cattle Call" charted on the pop side, reaching number forty-two). In addition, television widened Arnold's appeal; he appeared on a number of shows, and in 1954 he hosted Eddy Arnold Time, a music variety show. Just as he was catching on in the mass market, however, rock and roll revolutionized popular music, cutting into the sales of all other types of music, Arnold's included. As a result, Arnold's manager, Parker, began paying more attention to Presley.

New Management. In the early 1960's Arnold slowly began to regain his stature on the country charts—though never the top spot and never crossing over to the pop list, now known as the Top 40. In 1964 he changed management, signing with Jerry Purcell and working with producer Chet Atkins. Floyd Cramer, who five years earlier had taken a country instrumental, "Last Date," to number two on the Top 40, supplied his "slip-note" piano style, and the Anita Kerr Singers sang background for what would become Arnold's biggest hit: "Make the World Go Away." It brought Arnold back to the top of the country charts, and it reached number six on the popular side. In fact, another song from the same session reached number one the same year: "What's He Doing in My World?" For the next four years, all of Arnold's country hits would also make the pop charts, though some barely made it into the Top 100. In 1966 Arnold was inducted into the Country Music Hall of Fame, which persuaded the singer to publish his autobiography—though some of his biggest hits were still to come. Arnold continued to score country hits into the 1970's and 1980's, before retiring in 1999, the year his remake of "Cattle Call" with seventeen-year-old LeAnn Rimes hit number eighteen in the country market. In mid-May of 2008, a week after Arnold's death, RCA released Arnold's "To Life," which two weeks later hit number forty-nine on the country charts.

Eddy Arnold. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Musical Legacy

Arnold's influence on American popular music can be measured by his popularity. Only George Jones had more country hits than Arnold, although Arnold's hits had more staying power. Another part of Arnold's legacy is the number and quality of artists in and out of country music who recorded his music. His signature tune, "Make the World Go Away," was recorded in 1971 by Presley, in 1975 by Donny and Marie Osmond (their version peaked at number forty-four), and in 2005 by Martina McBride. At the 2008 Country Music Awards show, Carrie Underwood and Brad Paisley sang a duet of the song as a tribute to Arnold. In 2003 Country Music Television chose the Forty Greatest Men of Country Music, ranking Arnold at number twenty-two. Although his crossover success was considered controversial, it was largely responsible for creating the string-sweetened Nashville sound that remans vital in country music.

John R. Holmes

Further Reading

Arnold, Eddy. It's A Long Way from Chester County. Old Tappan, N.J.: Hewitt House, 1969. A readable autobiography capturing Arnold's gentle personality. Includes photographs.

Kosser, Michael. How Nashville Became Music City, USA: 50 Years of Music Row. Milwaukee, Wis.: Hal Leonard, 2006. A history of the revolution in country-music recording that Arnold helped to foment.

St. John, Lauren. Walkin' After Midnight: A Journey to the Heart of Nashville. London: Picador, 2000. A British view of the Nashville sound that is Arnold's legacy.

Streissguth, Michael. Eddie Arnold: Pioneer of the Nashville Sound. New York: Schirmer Books, 1997. A detailed biography that includes a thorough sessionography and discography of Arnold's recordings.

See also: Atkins, Chet; Jones, George; Monroe, Bill; Presley, Elvis.

Vladimir Ashkenazy

Russian classical composer, pianist, and conductor

Born and educated in the Soviet Union, Ashkenazy forged an international career as a pianist and conductor, and he is renowned for his immense body of recorded repertoire in several genres.

Born: July 6, 1937; Gorki, Soviet Union (now Russia)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (as conductor): Mozart: Piano Concertos Nos. 20, 21, 23, 24, 25, 1989; Tchaikovsky: Nutcracker; Glazunov: The Seasons, 1992; Brahms: Symphony No. 1; Dvořák; Othello Overture, 1993; Essential Tchaikovsky, 1993; Borodin: Symphonies 1 and 2, In the Steppes, 1994; Rachmaninov: Piano Concerto No. 2; Paganini: Rhapsody, 1994; Shostakovich: Symphony No. 2, October, Etc., 1994; Szymanowski: Symphonies, Etc.; Lutosławski, 1997; Sibelius: The Symphonies Nos. 1, 2, and 4, Etc., 1998.

ALBUMS (as pianist): Prokofiev: Five Piano Concertos, 1975; Études, 1984; Prokofiev: Piano Concertos, 1989; Rachmaninov: Piano Concertos, 1989; Scriabin: Piano Sonatas, 1989; Chopin Favourites, 1990; Beethoven: Piano Concertos 4 and 5, "Emperor," 1991; Favourite Rachmaninov, 1992; Ten Waltzes; Seven Nocturnes, 1992; Brahms: Piano Trios, 1994; Violin Sonatas Nos. 9 and 10, 1994 (with Itzhak Perlman); Piano Concertos Nos. 1-4, 1995 (with André Previn and the London Symphony Orchestra); Twenty-four Préludes; Piano Sonata No. 2, 1995; Eine Alpensinfonie; Don Juan; Salome's Dance, 1996 (with the Cleveland Orchestra); Capriccio Italien; The Tale of Tsar Sultan; Polovtsian Dances, Etc., 1996 (with the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra; Philharmonia Orchestra); Chopin: Mazurkas, 1996; Symphony No. 7, 1997 (with the St. Petersburg Philharmonic Orchestra); Chopin for Lovers, 1998; The Art of Ashkenazy, 1999; Twenty-four Preludes and Fugues, 1999; Waltzes; Scherzos; Preludes, 1999; Four Ballades; Four Scherzi, Etc., 2000.

The Life

Vladimir Ashkenazy (VLA-dih-mihr ash-keh-NAH-zee) was born in Gorki, the first child of pianist David Ashkenazy and actress-singer Evstolia Plotnova. The family moved to Moscow in 1940, but it was forced to evacuate the following year because of the Nazi invasion. While his father supported the family by traveling and performing with the national Estrada entertaining troupe, Ashkenazy and his mother wandered throughout the Soviet Union as evacuees, settling in Tashkent for several months before returning to Moscow in 1943. His sister, Elena, was born in 1949.

In 1945 Ashkenazy entered the Central School of Music in Moscow, where he studied with Anaida Sumbatian until 1955. In his final year, he placed second in the fifth International Frédéric Chopin Competition in Warsaw. Shortly after, he entered the studio of Lev Oborin at the Moscow Conservatory, where he remained until his immigration to London. During his years at the conservatory, Ashkenazy took first prize at the 1956 Queen Elizabeth Competition in Brussels and joint first prize at the 1962 Tchaikovsky Competition in Moscow. He defected to London in 1963 during a concert tour, although, because of his celebrity status, he was able to retain his Soviet citizenship while living abroad.

In 1968, after approximately five years in London, Ashkenazy relocated to Reykjavík, Iceland, where he became a naturalized citizen in 1972. In Reykjavík, Ashkenazy became increasingly involved with the musical community, serving as artistic adviser to the Reykjavík Music Festival, while he continued to concertize throughout Europe. During this time, he launched his conducting career with a position as volunteer conductor of the Iceland Symphony Orchestra. Engagements as guest conductor followed, with orchestras such as the Royal Liverpool Philharmonic and the Swedish Radio Orchestra.

In 1978 Ashkenazy left Iceland to settle in Lucerne, Switzerland. From 1978 to 1982, he conducted the Philharmonia Orchestra of London regularly and almost exclusively, serving as principal guest conductor from 1981 to 1983.

Ashkenazy married Thorunn (Dody) Johannsdottir in 1961. They would have five children: Vladimir, Nadia, Dimitri, Sonia, and Sascha.

The Music

Performance. Ashkenazy's pianistic repertoire concentrates on music of the classical and Romantic eras, particularly the works of Ludwig van Beethoven, Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, Frédéric Chopin, and Aleksandr Scriabin. He orchestrated his own version of Modest Mussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition (1874), conducting it to much acclaim with the Royal Liverpool Philharmonic at the Royal Festival Hall in 1982.

Conducting. As a conductor, Ashkenazy has noticeably favored repertoire of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Beginning in the 1970's, his conducting career incorporated an extensive repertoire with a large number of prolific orchestras, including the Concertgebuow Orchestra (guest conductor, 1979), Royal Philharmonic Orchestra (principal conductor and music director, 1987-1994), Berlin Radio Symphony Orchestra/ Deutches Symphonie-Orchester (chief conductor, 1988-1994; chief conductor and music director, 1994-1996), Czech Philharmonic Orchestra (chief conductor, 1998-2003), Cleveland Orchestra (principal guest conductor), and NHK Symphony Orchestra (music director). He was appointed conductor laureate of the Philharmonia Orchestra (2000), the Iceland Symphony Orchestra (2002), and the NHK Symphony Orchestra (2007).

Recordings. In 1962 Ashkenazy began to record exclusively for Decca Records, as both pianist and conductor. His piano recordings include the complete concerti of Beethoven, Chopin, Mozart, Béla Bartók, Johannes Brahms, Sergei Prokofiev, and Sergei Rachmaninoff. In addition, he has recorded complete collections of Johann Sebastian Bach's The Well-Tempered Clavier (1722), Beethoven's sonatas, the Chopin solo-piano works, and Dmitri Shostakovich's preludes and fugues. His chamber music recordings include complete sets of the Beethoven piano trios and the songs of Rachmaninoff and Peter Ilich Tchaikovsky. As a conductor, he has recorded the symphonies of Beethoven, Prokofiev, Rachmaninoff, and Jean Sibelius. His recordings have received numerous Grammy Awards: in 1979, 1982, and 1988 for Best Chamber Music Performance and in 1986 and 2000 for Best Instrumental Solo Performance.

Educational Endeavors. Ashkenazy's television projects, designed to appeal to children and adult audiences, include Music After Mao (1979), a program centered on his experiences visiting and teaching in Shanghai; the Ashkenazy in Moscow series, documenting his first return to Moscow in 1989; a Superteachers (1999) educational program, about children in inner-city London; and a documentary inspired by his Prokofiev and Shostakovich Under Stalin concert series. He has collaborated regularly with producer Christopher Nupen to produce more than twenty music-themed intimate portrait films, among them We Want the Light (2005), which depicts the linkage between German music and the Jewish prisoners incarcerated in Nazi concentration camps.

Musical Legacy

As a pianist, Ashkenazy has performed to critical acclaim throughout the world, especially in England, in Scandinavia, and in the Low Countries. His recording repertory spans more than one hundred recordings for piano alone, predominantly eighteenth and nineteenth century works, and it encompasses a number of complete, large-scale sets, such as the thirty-two sonatas of Beethoven and the complete symphonies Sibelius.

In the community, Ashkenazy has worked with broadcast media to promote traditional classical music to a mainstream audience, through documentaries and educational youth programs. He has developed orchestral concert projects such as Prokofiev and Shostakovich Under Stalin (performed in London, Cologne, New York, Vienna, Moscow in 2003) and Rachmaninoff Revisited (in New York in 2002). Since its inception in 1991, he served as president of the Rachmaninoff Society.

Siu-Yin Mak

Further Reading

Dumm, Robert. "The Teachers and Artists of Russia: Of Russian Music and Pianists." Clavier (July, 2000): 28. This article discusses Russian technique and training with Ashkenazy and other pianists.

Ho, Allan, Dmitry Feofanov, and Vladimir Ashkenazy. Shostakovich Reconsidered. London: Toccata Press, 1998. An analysis of Shostakovich and his music, co-authored by Ashkenazy.

Mach, Elyse. "Vladimir Ashkenazy." In Great Contemporary Pianists Speak for Themselves. New York: Dover, 1980. Ashkenazy offers a discussion about piano technique.

Noyle, Linda. Pianists on Playing: Interviews with Twelve Concert Pianists. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1987. Contains an interview with Ashkenazy about the personal and professional aspects of life as a concert artist.

Parrott, Jasper, and Vladimir Ashkenazy. Beyond Frontiers. New York: Atheneum, 1985. Biographical memoirs of Ashkenazy, with significant focus on the general mentality of life within the former Soviet Union.

Sadie, Stanley, and Vladimir Ashkenazy. The Billboard Illustrated Encyclopedia of Classical Music. New York: Watson-Guptill, 2000. An illustrated reference text jointly compiled by Sadie and Ashkenazy. Brief introductions of topics throughout the classical music genre.

See also: Perlman, Itzhak; Prokofiev, Sergei; Shostakovich, Dmitri.

Chet Atkins

American country guitarist, vocalist, and songwriter

Perhaps the best technical guitarist of his generation, Atkins was instrumental in making country music mainstream.

Born: June 20, 1924; Luttrell, Tennessee
Died: June 30, 2001; Nashville, Tennessee
Also known as: Chester Burton Atkins (full name)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Chet Atkins' Gallopin' Guitar, 1953; Stringin' Along with Chet Atkins, 1953; A Session with Chet Atkins, 1954; Chet Atkins in Three Dimensions, 1955; Finger Style Guitar, 1956; Chet Atkins at Home, 1957; Hi Fi in Focus, 1957; Chet Atkins in Hollywood, 1959; Hum and Strum Along with Chet Atkins, 1959; Mister Guitar, 1959; The Other Chet Atkins, 1960; Teensville, 1960; Chet Atkins' Workshop, 1961; Christmas with Chet Atkins, 1961; The Most Popular Guitar, 1961; Caribbean Guitar, 1962; Down Home, 1962; The Guitar Genius, 1963; Our Man in Nashville, 1963; Teen Scene, 1963; Travelin', 1963; The Early Years of Chet Atkins and His Guitar, 1964; Guitar Country, 1964; My Favorite Guitar, 1964; Progressive Pickin', 1964; Chet Atkins Picks on the Beatles, 1965; More of That Guitar Country, 1965; From Nashville with Love, 1966; Music from Nashville, My Hometown, 1966; The Pops Goes Country, 1966; Chet Atkins, 1967; Class Guitar, 1967; It's a Guitar World, 1967; Hometown Guitar, 1968; Solid Gold '68, 1968; Solo Flights, 1968; Chet Atkins and C. E. Snow, 1969; Chet Picks on the Pops, 1969; Lover's Guitar, 1969; Solid Gold '69, 1969; C. B. Atkins and C. E. Snoe by Special Request, 1970; Me and Jerry, 1970; Solid Gold '70, 1970; Yestergroovin', 1970; For the Good Times and Other Country Moods, 1971; This Is Chet Atkins, 1971; Chet Atkins Picks on the Hits, 1972; Alone, 1973; Strum Along Guitar Method, 1973; Atkins-Travis Traveling Show, 1974; Chet Atkins Picks on Jerry Reed, 1974; The Night Atlanta Burned, 1975; Chet Atkins Goes to the Movies, 1976; Guitar Monsters, 1976; Chester and Lester, 1977 (with Les Paul); Me and My Guitar, 1977; First Nashville Guitar Quartet, 1979; Reflections, 1980; Country After All These Years, 1981; East Tennessee Christmas, 1983; Great Hits of the Past, 1983; Work It out with Chet Atkins, 1983; Stay Tuned, 1985; Street Dreams, 1986; Sails, 1987; C. G. P., 1988; Neck and Neck, 1990; Sneakin' Around, 1991; Read My Licks, 1994; Almost Alone, 1996; The Day Finger Pickers Took Over the World, 1997; Discover Japan, 2002; Solo Sessions, 2003.

The Life

Chester Burton Atkins was born into a musical farm family in rural Union County, Tennessee. His first instruments were the ukulele and violin, and in 1932 he got a budget Silvertone guitar from his brother, for which he traded a year's worth of milking chores.

Atkins was about fifteen when he first heard guitarist Merle Travis on the radio. Travis's style of playing bass notes with the thumb and of rolling the first three fingers over the other strings, picking individual notes, produced a sound that impressed the fledgling musician, and it gave Atkins the direction he needed to perfect his style. By the time he left high school, he was quite musically accomplished, and in 1942 he got his first professional job on WNOX in Knoxville, playing fiddle. When the station manager heard Atkins playing guitar in the back of the tour bus, he immediately appointed Atkins WNOX staff guitarist. For the next three years, this position required Atkins to master a new song every day, which rapidly boosted his repertoire and his technique.

Later, Atkins moved to KWTO in Springfield, Missouri, where he picked up the nickname Chet (instead of Ches). His style, however, seemed too polished and sophisticated for that audience, and he was soon let go. In 1948 Atkins returned to Knoxville to play with Homer and Jethro and with the Carter Sisters (the group Maybelle Carter formed after the Carter Family broke up). They joined the Grand Ole Opry in Nashville in 1950. Once in Nashville, Atkins's talents as a sideman became in demand.

Atkins's own records were selling well by the mid-1950's. From 1957 to 1982, Atkins worked as producer and manager at RCA Records. His production skills became critical as rock and roll had eroded country music's audience. In 1982 Atkins left RCA to resume his performing career, creating what came to be known as the Nashville sound and collaborating with others to transform country music. Atkins died of cancer in Nashville, his longtime home, on June 30, 2001.

The Music

In an effort to gain broad appeal, Atkins changed the arrangements of much of the country canon, replacing the traditional instrumentation and harmonies of country music (such as fiddles, banjos, steel guitars, mandolins, and brother duets) with orchestra string sections or vocal choruses. This so-called Nashville sound diluted much of the difference between country and pop music until the 1990's.

Early Works. Atkins's first hit record was his instrumental version of the pop song "Mister Sandman," which reached number thirteen on the charts in 1955. This was followed closely by his guitar duet with Hank Snow, "Silver Bell." Seminal albums appeared, including Finger Style Guitar, Mister Guitar, Chet Atkins' Workshop, and Guitar Country.

Chet Atkins. (AP/Wide World Photos)

"Yakety Axe." By 1965 Atkins's career was well established. After an appearance at the Newport Jazz festival, Atkins took Nashville studio musician Boots Randolph's jazz saxophone standard, "Yakety Sax," and made it a signature piece. Calling it "Yakety Axe"—axe being guitarists' slang for their instrument—the song became a Top 5 hit in 1965.

Stay Tuned. Atkins left RCA in the 1980's because the label was reluctant to let him make a jazz album. With Stay Tuned, a jazz-rock fusion project, Atkins's wish was fulfilled. The record featured duets with the next generation of guitarists, such as George Benson, Earl Klugh, Mark Knopfler, Brent Mason, and Steve Lukather. Songs included "Sunrise" and "Quiet Eyes." When he premiered the album, newspaper headlines proclaimed that Atkins had transformed Nashville once again. Atkins and Knopfler received the Grammy Award for Best Country Instrumental Performance for the track "Cosmic Square Dance" in 1985.

Neck and Neck. In November, 1990, Atkins released an album of duets with Dire Straits' guitarist Mark Knopfler. This was his biggest success since 1966, and it introduced Atkins's new renditions on a number of classic country and pop standards, some new material, and a rather different version of "Yakety Axe." The track "So Soft, Your Goodbye" won Atkins and Knopfler a country instrumental Grammy Award, while "Poor Boy Blues" won the Best Country Vocal Collaboration Award.

Solo Sessions. After his death in 2001, twenty-eight solo songs Atkins had recorded in his home studio from 1982 to 1992 were discovered. These were released as a two-album set in 2003. They included instrumental examples of almost every genre of music, from show tunes and spirituals to jazz standards and country-bluegrass songs. There was even a cover of the 1963 Japanese hit in America, "Sukiyaki." The range of material and the way Atkins approaches it show the depth of Atkins musical sensitivity.

Musical Legacy

A master musician, Atkins left a recorded output of some one hundred forty albums and a style of playing that is still emulated. He was one of the most recorded solo instrumentalists and session players in history, appearing on hundreds of recordings, starting with Hank Williams, Sr., and Elvis Presley in the 1950's and continuing through the 1990's.

As an RCA music executive, Atkins produced such varied artists as Eddy Arnold, Bobby Bare, Perry Como, Roy Orbison, Willie Nelson, and Dolly Parton. He was the youngest person ever inducted into the Country Music Hall of Fame in 1973. He was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 2002 as a sideman. From 1967 to 1996, Atkins won fourteen Grammy Awards (most for Best Instrumental Performance and a Lifetime Achievement Award in 1993) and nine Country Music Association Awards. A street in Nashville is named after him: Chet Atkins Place. He also developed a line of signature guitars for Gibson, including the revolutionary acoustic-electric SST, which ran from 1987 to 2006.

James Stanlaw

Further Reading

Atkins, Chet, and Michael Cochran. Chet Atkins: Me and My Guitars. Milwaukee, Wis.: Hal Leonard, 2003. Part autobiography and part homage to the more than one hundred guitars he has used over the years, this is Atkins's collection of stories and anecdotes, illustrated with beautiful photographs of some of the instruments Atkins made famous.

Atkins, Chet, and Bill Neely. Country Gentleman. Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1974. Atkins's early autobiography, which is a valuable source of information on his life and his musical development.

Johnson, Chad. The Best of Chet Atkins: A Step-by-Step Breakdown of the Styles and Techniques of the Father of Country Guitar. Milwaukee, Wis.: Hal Leonard, 2004. Intended for guitarists, this book offers transcriptions and analyses of a dozen Atkins trademark songs, including "Mister Sandman," "Yakety Axe," "Country Gentleman," and "Galloping on the Guitar."

Kienzle, Rich. "Chet Atkins." In The Encyclopedia of Country Music: The Ultimate Guide to the Music. New York: Oxford University Press. 1998. Summary article on Atkins's life and work from a standard source.

McClellan, John, and Devan Bratic. Chet Atkins in Three Dimensions: Fifty Years of Legendary Guitar, Volumes 1 and 2. Pacific, Mo.: Mel Bay, 2004. A fascinating collection of about four dozen interviews with artists who worked with Atkins over the years, including nearly fifty transcriptions of his songs.

Wolf, Charles, and William Ivey. "The Nashville Sound." In The Illustrated History of Country Music. New York: Random House, 1995. Good discussion of Atkins's work as a music producer and executive and his creation of a crossover style that changed the face of country music.

See also: Arnold, Eddy; Carter, Maybelle; Cline, Patsy; Eddy, Duane; Everly, Don and Phil; Jennings, Waylon; Miller, Roger; Nelson, Willie; Orbison, Roy; Parton, Dolly; Paul, Les; Presley, Elvis; Pride, Charley; Travis, Merle; Watson, Doc; Williams, Hank.

Hoyt Axton

American country songwriter, guitarist, and vocalist

Singer-songwriter Axton blended elements of country, folk, pop, and rock in his music. His simple melodies and catchy hooks appealed to legions of fans.

Born: March 25, 1938; Duncan, Oklahoma
Died: October 26, 1999; Victor, Montana

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: The Balladeer, 1962; Saturday's Child, 1963; Thunder and Lightnin', 1963; Explodes, 1964; Sings Betty Smith, 1964; Greenback Dollar, 1965; Long Old Road, 1965; Mr. Greenback Dollar Man, 1965; My Griffin Is Gone, 1969; Country Anthem, 1971; Joy to the World, 1971; Less than the Song, 1973; Life Machine, 1974; Southbound, 1975; Fearless, 1976; Road Songs, 1977; Snowblind Friend, 1977; Free Sailin', 1978; Rusty Old Halo, 1979; Where Did the Money Go?, 1980; Pistol Packin' Mama, 1982; Never Been to Spain, 1986; Spin of the Wheel, 1990; American Originals, 1993; Jeremiah Was a Bullfrog, 1995; Lonesome Road, 1995.

The Life

Hoyt Axton was born in Duncan, Oklahoma, to John and Mae Boren Axton, public school teachers, and he was raised in Jacksonville, Florida. His songwriting was influenced by his mother, who, with lyricist Tommy Durden, composed Elvis Presley's first number-one single, "Heartbreak Hotel." Axton studied classical piano as a child, but he soon switched to guitar. A talented football player, he attended Oklahoma State University on a football scholarship, but he left school to join the Navy in 1958. While in the Navy, he remained athletically active as a boxer, becoming the heavyweight champion for his fleet.

After his discharge in 1961, Axton was drawn to the folk and coffeehouse scenes in San Francisco and Los Angeles. In 1962 the folk group the Kingston Trio recorded Axton's "Greenback Dollar," leading him to consider seriously a career in music. By the end of the 1960's, Axton was touring as the opening act for Three Dog Night. In the 1970's, based on the success of the songs he had written for other artists, his musical career began to soar. In 1979 he established his own record label, Jeremiah Records.

A talented artist, Axton published three books of drawings. A talented character actor, he appeared in numerous roles, in such television series as Bonanza, McCloud, Murder, She Wrote, and WKRP in Cincinnati. He was featured in the films The Black Stallion (1979), Gremlins (1984), and We're No Angels (1989).

A man of strong social conscience, Axton contributed to many causes, including the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) and programs supporting drug and alcohol rehabilitation, the environment, prison-inmate welfare, and animal rights. He suffered a stroke in 1996, after which he was confined to a wheelchair and his health steadily declined. Axton died after a series of heart attacks in 1999 at the age of sixty-one.

The Music

Axton's voice was a rich baritone that he could infuse with a throaty, gravelly sound. His fairly narrow singing range and his slight Oklahoma twang fit the mood of his songs. Axton wrote mostly narrative songs, with clearly defined characters and situations. His chord progressions were simple, fusing elements of country, folk, rock, and pop, and his songs featured catchy hooks and memorable melodies. Though many of his songs are humorous, he also wrote serious songs about the dangers of substance abuse, including "The Pusher," "Snowblind Friend," "Boozers Are Losers," and "No No Song."

Songwriter. Although a talented singer, Axton is best known for his songs that were recorded by others. Axton's first big hit was "Greenback Dollar," cowritten with Ken Ramsey and recorded in 1962 by the folk group the Kingston Trio. His antiheroin song, "The Pusher," was recorded in 1968 by the hard-rock group Steppenwolf on its self-titled first album; the song was also featured prominently on the sound track to the film Easy Rider (1969). Steppenwolf then recorded Axton's anticocaine song, "Snowblind Friend," on the album Steppenwolf 7 (1971). While opening for Three Dog Night in 1969, Axton offered the group the song "Joy to the World," which rose to the number-one spot on the Billboard pop chart. The group later recorded Axton's song "Never Been to Spain," which hit the Top 20. Ringo Starr recorded Axton's "No No Song" for his album Goodnight Vienna; and the single placed on the Billboard Top 20 chart.

Albums. Axton's development as a songwriter can be traced through his numerous recordings. His earliest were on small labels and demonstrated his folk style of writing. In 1962 he signed on with Horizon Records, which released The Balladeer (with his version of "Greenback Dollar"), Thunder and Lightnin', and Saturday's Child. He signed to Vee-Jay Records in 1964 and released Explodes and Greenback Dollar. He moved to Surrey Records the next year to release Mr. Greenback Dollar Man. Axton later signed with Columbia Records for the album My Griffin Is Gone and recorded Joy to the World and Country Anthem for Capitol Records.

In 1973 Axton signed with A&M Records and released a series of successful recordings: Less than the Song, Life Machine, Southbound, Fearless, and Road Songs. Life Machine contained the songs "When the Morning Comes" and the humorous "Boney Fingers," both of which hit the Top 10 on the Billboard country-music chart. He signed to MCA Records and released Snowblind Friend and Free Sailin'. In 1979 Axton started his own label, Jeremiah Records, the name and logo taken from the opening line of his huge hit "Joy to the World." He released the album Rusty Old Halo, which was immensely popular, remaining on the country-album chart for a year. Also popular were the singles "Della and the Dealer" and "Rusty Old Halo," both Top 20 hits. He followed Rusty Old Halo with Where Did the Money Go? (including the hit singles "Where Did the Money Go?" and "Evangelina") and Pistol Packin' Mama. In between his numerous film and television appearances, Axton toured in the 1980's and early 1990's, until his death in 1999.

Musical Legacy

On stage, Axton defied categorization: He was not just a country singer or a folksinger or a rock performer. He managed to combine all these traditions in his popular performances. He is better known for the songs he wrote that were recorded by others, especially "Joy to the World," which is heard frequently in film sound tracks and on television commercials. As a songwriter, he created works that spanned a number of different styles: folk, folk-rock, rock, country, and pop. He worked with a variety of musicians, from Johnny Cash and Linda Ronstadt to Elvis Costello. His face is recognizable from his many appearances on television and in films.

Stephen Valdez

Further Reading

Clifford, Mike. The Illustrated Encyclopedia of Rock. New York: Harmony Books, 1976. Brief entry on Axton, with selective discography of Axton's recordings.

McCloud, Barry. Definitive Country. New York: Perigree Books, 1995. This encyclopedia of country music contains a short but informative entry on Axton, with brief discography.

See also: Cash, Johnny; Costello, Elvis.

Charles Aznavour

French pop and cabaret vocalist, songwriter, and film-score composer

A major figure in French popular music, Aznavour continued the tradition of the chanson, expanding the art form by incorporating musical elements of various ethnic traditions.

Born: May 22, 1924; Paris, France
Also known as: Shahnour Varenagh Aznavourian (birth name)

Principal works

FILM SCORES: Délit de fiute, 1959; Gosse de Paris, 1961; Zarte Haut in Schwarzer Seide, 1961; Le Diable et les dix commandments, 1962; Les Quatre Vérités, 1962; Caroline chérie, 1968.

MUSICAL THEATER (music and lyrics): Lautrec, 2000 (libretto by Shaun McKenna).

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: La Mamma, 1963; '65, 1965; The World of Charles Aznavour, 1965; Of Flesh and Soul, 1969; A Tapestry of Dreams, 1974; Charles Aznavour, 1983; Aznavour, 1986; Aznavour, 1990; En Español, Vol. 1, 1991; En Español, Vol. 2, 1991; En Español, Vol. 3, 1991; Memento si, momenti no, 1991; '92, 1992; Old Fashioned Way, 1992; Yesterday When I Was Young, 1992; Tu te laisses aller, 1992; Toi et moi, 1994; La Bohème, 1995; Hier encore, 1995; Idiote je t'aime, 1995; Il faut savior, 1995; Je m'voyais déjà, 1995; Aznavour, 2000; Charles Aznavour/Pierre Roche, 2003; Je voyage, 2003; Plus bleu que tes yeux, 2003 (Bluer than Your Eyes); Qui?, 2004; Insolitement votre, 2005; Premiéres chansons, 2006; Colore ma vie, 2007.

SINGLES: "Sur ma vie," 1955; "Les Deux Guitars," 1962 ("Two Guitars"); "Je bois," 1965; "La Bohème," 1965; "Comme ils disent," 1972; "Hier encore," 1972; "Les Plaisirs démodés," 1972; "She," 1974; "Tous les visages de l'amour," 1974; "Pour toi Armenie," 1989.

WRITINGS OF INTEREST: Aznavour by Aznavour, 1972; Yesterday When I Was Young, 1979.

The Life

Shahnour Varenagh Aznavourian, later to be known as Charles Aznavour (az-nuh-vohr), was born into an artistic family: His father was a singer, and his mother was an actress. Through his parents, Charles and his sister, Aïda, were introduced to the theater. Aznavour's first appearance was at the Champs Élysées Studio at the age of nine in the play Emil and the Detectives, based on a 1929 book for children. After that, he worked as an extra in various films, and he appeared in plays at the performing school for boys that he attended. At one of the rehearsals for Ça c'est Marseille, Aznavour encountered Charles Trenet, a singer-songwriter, who became his role model.

During the German occupation of France in the early 1940's, Aznavour met pianist Pierre Roche, and they formed a duo, often performing at Club de la Chanson in Paris. Because Aznavour could not find enough suitable songs and Roche was not motivated enough to look for them, Aznavour started writing himself. First he would write the lyrics, and then he would compose the melody, to which Roche would add the harmonies. In 1941 Aznavour and Roche wrote the song "J'ai bu," which brought them to the attention of Édith Piaf. She recognized a great talent in Aznavour, and she took the singer and pianist on a tour throughout France as her opening act. Eventually, the duo followed Piaf to the United States, where they first performed at the Society Room in New York. However, Aznavour and Roche were laughed at because the audience thought they were trying to imitate French singers. When they went on to Montréal, they enjoyed success. Influenced by Piaf, Aznavour stopped working with Roche, and Aznavour returned to Paris to become Piaf's secretary and companion. During this period he made several successful stage appearances.

At the same time, Aznavour appeared in many films, among them Adieu, Cherie (1946), Une Gosse Sensass (1957), Paris Music Hall (1957), and La Tête contre les murs (1959). His most notable role was that of a piano player, Charlie Kohler/Edouard Saroyan, in François Truffaut's adaptation of David Goodis's novel Tirez sur le pianiste (1960). This film became a box-office hit in France and in the United States. For many films Aznavour also served as a composer and arranger: Gosse de Paris, Les Quatre Vérités, and Caroline chérie. In 1986 he cowrote and provided music for the film Yiddish Connection (1986), and he starred in the Canadian-French film Ararat (2002).

An advocate for his parents' homeland, Armenia, Aznavour founded a charity organization, Aznavour pour Armenie. Following the devastating 1988 earthquake in Armenia, Aznavour and his brother-in-law Georges Garvarentz wrote the song "Pour toi Armenie."

In the autumn of 2006, Aznavour started his global farewell tour, which continued into 2007 with concerts in Japan and Asia. During the second half of 2007, Aznavour returned to Paris for twenty concerts at Le Palais des Congrés.

Charles Aznavour. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The Music

Known for his interest in various musical styles, Aznavour has pursued a diverse career. He collaborated with opera singer Plácido Domingo and Norwegian soprano Sissel Kyrkjebø in a Christmas in Vienna concert in the 1994. Aznavour recorded a song from the eighteenth century Armenian poet Sayat Nova, and in 2006 he recorded with Cuban pianist Chucho Valdes in the album Colore ma vie. Aznavour appeared in the musical Monsieur Carnaval (1965), featuring his hit "La Bohème," and he wrote the music and lyrics for the musical Lautrec (2000).

Despite his untrained voice and noncommercial style, Aznavour maintained a successful career. His songs are usually written with a simple melody and basic harmonies. The early songs, written with Roche in swing style, responded to the musical trends of the time. Later, he wrote self-reflective ballads, many based on everyday experiences. "Hier encore," written in 1961, was inspired by the romance between Piaf and actor Eddie Constantine.

"Les Deux Guitars." Written on a Russian tune, the song consists of five verses with short refrains, in which one line is repeated. Aznavour uses this form often for his songs; other examples are "La Bohème" and "Comme ils disent." In addition to the text inspired by Gypsy music, the arrangement recalls the group Hot Five Club of France, which was popular in the 1930's.

"Les Plaisirs démodés." Written in 1972 by Garvarentz and Aznavour, this song is a mix of the modern rock sound and the French chanson of the 1930's. Both correspond with the text. In the rock section, Aznavour uses words such as trance, spectacle, curious propriety, and psychedelic. The second section has more intimate language, and it becomes tender and elegant, describing the mood of lovers dancing in a quiet setting. In this way it corresponds to the title, which translates to "Old Fashioned Way." This song, along with "She," brought Aznavour international acclaim.

"Fado." On Colore ma vie, Aznavour combines Cuban traditional music with French prose. Songs present short stories, and this particular track juxtaposes an element of fado music, the urban folk music of Portugal, with a lyrical nostalgia.

Musical Legacy

Aznavour wrote close to a thousand songs. Some were great successes for Piaf, including Il Pleut (1949), C'est Un Gars (1949) and Il y avait (1950). He wrote Je hais les dimanches in 1950 for Piaf. When she refused it, the song went to Juliette Greco, who made it a hit. In his work Aznavour followed the style of the chanson genre: sentimental lyrics that are more important than the melody. He often used instruments such as the accordion to evoke a sense of nostalgia. His influence is felt in the continuing art of French song, which incorporates elements such as rap, world music, and rock.

Daniela Candillari

Further Reading

Aznavour, Charles. Memories of My Life. London: Omnibus, 2005. Accounting of Aznavour's life in a series of sketches.

Crosland, Margaret. Piaf. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1985. Biography of Piaf includes information about her relationship with Aznavour.

See also: Domingo, Plácido; Piaf, Édith; Reed, Jimmy.

B

Milton Babbitt

American classical composer

A progenitor of integral serialism, Babbitt is a pioneer in the field of electroacoustic music. His work has had a profound influence on composers in Europe and America, and his compositions reflect his philosophy that music is an evolving, increasingly complex, and specialized art form.

Born: May 10, 1916; Philadelphia, Pennsylvania
Also known as: Milton Byron Babbitt (full name)

Principal works

CHAMBER WORKS: Composition for Four Instruments, 1948; Woodwind Quartet, 1953; All Set, 1957; Sextets, 1966 (for violin and piano); Arie da capo, 1974; Dual, 1980 (for cello and piano); The Head of the Bed, 1982 (for soprano, wind, and strings); The Joy of More Sextets, 1986 (for violin and piano); The Crowded Air, 1988; Consortini, 1989; Soli e Duettini, 1989 (for flute and guitar); Soli e Duettini, 1990 (for violin and viola); None but the Lonely Flute, 1991; Swan Song No. 1, 2003 (for wind and strings).

INSTRUMENTAL WORKS: Three Compositions for Piano, 1947; Partitions, 1957 (for piano); Composition for Synthesizer, 1961 (for synthesizer and four-track tape); Reflections, 1975 (for piano and synthesized tape); My Ends Are My Beginnings, 1978 (for clarinet); Beaten Paths, 1988 (for marimba); Play It Again, Sam, 1989 (for viola).

MUSICAL THEATER (music): Fabulous Voyage, 1946 (lyrics by Richard S. Childs; libretto by Richard Koch; based on Homer's Odyssey).

ORCHESTRAL WORKS: Composition for Twelve Instruments, 1948; Relata I, 1965; Relata II, 1968; Ars combinatoria, 1981; Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, 1985; Concerto for Orchestra, 2004.

VOCAL WORKS: Philomel, 1964 (for soprano and four-track tape); Phonemena, 1970 (for soprano and piano); Phonemena, 1975 (for soprano and tape); A Solo Requiem, 1977 (for soprano and two pianos).

WRITINGS OF INTEREST: Milton Babbitt: Words About Music, 1987 (edited by Stephen Dembski and Joseph N. Straus); The Collected Essays of Milton Babbitt, 2003 (edited by Stephen Peles).

The Life

Milton Byron Babbitt (BAB-biht) was born in Philadelphia, but he grew up in Jackson, Mississippi. The members of his immediate family were active in both music and mathematics, two fields whose influences are readily apparent in Babbitt's career and compositional output. He began his musical studies at an early age on the violin and later the clarinet and saxophone. While his compositions and writings are rooted primarily in the world of classical music, his knowledge of American popular music and his formidable skills in jazz are widely known. Early in his career he composed both jazz and popular music.

Babbitt began his college career as a mathematician at the University of Pennsylvania. However, he soon changed both the location and the focus of his studies, transferring to New York University and taking up music composition under the tutelage of Marion Bauer and Philip James. He took an early interest in the music of Igor Stravinsky, Edgard Varèse, and the composers of the Second Viennese School (Arnold Schoenberg, Anton von Webern, and Alban Berg). He earned the bachelor of arts in 1935, after which he began studying with Roger Sessions privately. He continued his studies with Sessions at Princeton University, earning a master of fine arts in 1942. While his dissertation for the Ph.D. was completed in 1946, the degree was not conferred until 1992. Apocryphal accounts assert that the dissertation was so complex that it lay unread on the desk of Oliver Strunk, the music faculty member involved in its consideration.

Babbitt's first academic post was at Princeton in 1943, not as a member of the music faculty but rather in the mathematics department. He later joined the music faculty in 1948 and the composition faculty at the Juilliard School in 1973. In addition to writing compositions during this time, some using electronic instruments, he composed theoretical works involving the development of the twelve-tone system.

Babbitt's interest in the electronic medium is of significant historical importance as he was instrumental in the establishment of the Columbia-Princeton Electronic Music Center, one of the most important institutions of its kind. It was originally founded as the Columbia University Studio in 1952 by Otto Luening and Vladimir Ussachevsky. The merger occurred in 1959 and was facilitated by the acquisition of the RCA Mark II synthesizer, an instrument that Babbitt had a hand in developing.

His numerous awards include a Guggenheim Fellowship (1960-1961), a Pulitzer Prize Special Citation in 1982 for "his life's work as a distinguished and seminal American composer," and a MacArthur Foundation Fellowship in 1986. He was also appointed Conant Professor of Music at Princeton (succeeding Sessions in this post). His students include many prominent composers, such as Paul Lanky, Peter Westergaard, and Stephen Sondheim.

The Music

Three Compositions for Piano. Completed in 1947, this stands as the earliest work in which the relationships of a twelve-tone row are applied systematically to other musical parameters. Many of Babbitt's European contemporaries (Olivier Messiaen, Pierre Boulez, and Karlheinz Stockhausen) did the same, but this piece is the first completed work. It stands as evidence supporting Babbitt's assertion that the first steps toward integral serialism, as it became known, were taken in America. Schoenberg's twelve-tone method ordered a row oftwelve pitches and expressed their various transformations (transposition, inversion, retrograde, and combinations of these, such as retrograde inversion), which kept their intervallic content largely intact. Integral serialism (heretofore referred to simply as serialism) applied the properties of the row to musical parameters other than just pitch (such as rhythm, dynamics, articulation, and instrumentation).

In this piece, Babbitt serialized a set of rhythms throughout. The sequence 5-1-4-2 is inverted (in this case. by subtracting the number from 6) to get 1-5-2-4. The retrograde is simply the sequence backward, or 2-4-1-5, and the retrograde inversion is the inversion backward, or 4-2-5-1. These four combinations are used in the different "voices" of the work. For example, the first phrase in the lowest voice in the piano has a statement of five pitches, then one, then four, and then two, each grouping separated with tied notes or rests. Each variant is also imbued with a different character using other musical parameters such as articulation and dynamics.

In this work Babbitt also utilized combinatoriality, a technique created by Schoenberg, which gives the work a high degree of chromaticism. This technique is utilized in nearly every work of Babbitt since and is discussed in many of his theoretical publications.

Composition for Four Instruments and Composition for Twelve Instruments. These works display Babbitt's progression to a system where the materials are all inherently related. Both significantly advanced and refined the method by which Babbitt would derive rhythms from the pitch material in the twelve-tone row. After Three Compositions for Piano, 1948's Composition for Four Instruments displays a technique that Babbitt referred to as partitioning, splitting the musical material of the row into different voices. Each voice so derived then exhibits a certain character as determined by other musical parameters. His Composition for Twelve Instruments explores the use of a duration scale. These explorations led to his development of the time-point system.

Milton Babbitt. (© Oscar White/CORBIS)

All Set. Babbitt was fond of puns, and the title of this piece represents several. Written for jazz ensemble, it is often what the bandleader asks of the band before beginning (many conductors of this piece cannot resist the temptation to do so in good humor). Jazz ensembles also often perform their numbers in sets, with breaks in between. The title also refers to the twelve-tone set used by Babbitt in its construction. All Set is one of the first of Babbitt's works to use his time-point system, in which rhythms are derived explicitly from the intervals of the twelve-tone set and relationships are directly proportional. Partitioning is used here as well, dividing the six solo instruments into voices (alto saxophone, tenor saxophone, trumpet, trombone, vibraphone, and piano). The piano, bass, and drums form the rhythm section, as is typical in a traditional jazz tune (although this is not). The main body of the work is then followed by a drum solo and a bass solo, then a coda with all of the instruments. All Set stands as one of the first examples of third-stream music. "Third stream" was coined by Gunther Schuller in 1957 (the same year All Set was completed) to describe a new category of music that embodied basic elements of jazz and Western art music.

Philomel. Many of the most important works of the early pioneers in the field of electroacoustic music have a vocal component, and Philomel is a pivotal one. Its inclusion of a soprano is only one of the aspects that gives it a human quality one might not expect from a work in which electronic synthesis and processes are integral. It is written for soprano, recorded soprano, and synthesized sound. The soprano's voice in the recorded part is processed using various electronic enhancements, creating an unusually otherworldly effect. The synthesized part utilizes many complex serial techniques for which Babbitt is known—the electronic medium provided him with the possibility for unparalleled complexity, as the limitations of the human performer are not in effect here.

John Hollander wrote the text for this work, which is based on the sixth book of Ovid's Metamorphoses, which describes the legend of Philomel, princess of Athens. Tereus, king of Thrace, is sent by his wife, Procne, to bring her sister Philomel back from Athens. During the return, Tereus forces Philomel into the woods, where he rapes her and cuts out her tongue, rendering her unable to tell the tale. Upon their return, she weaves a tapestry that depicts the events, and the sisters exact their revenge: Tereus is served the limbs of his son for dinner. He chases them into the woods, and the gods intercede, changing them all into birds—Tereus becomes a hoopoe, Procne becomes a swallow, and Philomel is transformed into a nightingale. The work was commissioned by Bethany Beardslee, whose premiere performance of the work in 1964 and whose virtuosic recording indelibly mark this piece.

Musical Legacy

Babbitt took Schoenberg's twelve-tone method and developed it into a full-fledged system in which all of the aspects of a musical composition are intrinsically connected. Through his explorations with synthesizers, he was able to fully realize his vision of integral serialism. The impact of his music and of the Columbia-Princeton Electronic Music Center is clear: Among the list of prominent composers who have studied there are Varèse, Luciano Berio, Charles Wuorinen, Wendy Carlos, and Mario Davidovsky. Nearly all of the composers who worked there were influenced not only by Babbitt's techniques with electronic music synthesizers but also by his compositional methods and philosophies in general.

In an unfortunate turn of events, he will always be remembered as the author of an article he entitled "The Composer as Specialist." Without Babbitt's consent or knowledge, the editors of the magazine High Fidelity renamed the article "Who Cares If You Listen?" It is likely that the new title helped sell many magazines, although it did not reflect Babbitt's true message. In the article he asserted that the field of the contemporary composer had become very specialized, analogous to what had occurred in other fields, such as philosophy and mathematics. He encouraged composers to withdraw from mainstream venues, as they placed unreasonable demands and limitations on their creative expression. Just as math professors and other scholars should not edit an academic journal so that, if read aloud, it would sell a sufficient number of seats at Lincoln Center, composers should not simplify or alter their compositional vision to do the same. Babbitt's musical output and philosophy influenced and emancipated many composers, resulting in a generation whose compositions exhibit remarkable complexity.

David J. Weisberg

Further Reading

Babbitt, Milton. The Collected Essays of Milton Babbitt. Edited by Stephen Peles, Stephen Dembski, Andrew Mead, and Joseph N. Strauss. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 2003. Essays written by Babbitt himself, dating from 1949 to 1999. His writing is often extremely technical, although the topics in this collection range from highly complex descriptions of his compositional methods and analyses to heartfelt memorials.

Boretz, Benjamin. "Milton Babbitt." In Dictionary of Contemporary Music, edited by John Vinton. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1974. General article about Babbitt's life and work by a former student of the composer and cofounder of Perspectives of New Music.

Mead, Andrew Washburn. An Introduction to the Music of Milton Babbitt. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1994. Discusses Babbitt's influences, theories, and compositions. Excellent introduction to the twelve-tone method and Babbitt's development of it.

See also: Berg, Alban; Boulez, Pierre; Carlos, Wendy; Carter, Elliott; Dodge, Charles; Messiaen, Olivier; Rzewski, Frederic; Schoenberg, Arnold; Sondheim, Stephen; Stockhausen, Karlheinz; Stravinsky, Igor; Webern, Anton von.

Babyface

American rhythm-and-blues vocalist, guitarist, keyboardist, and songwriter

Babyface revolutionized the soul and rhythm-and-blues genres during the late 1980's and into the 1990's, crossing over into pop and rock spectrums with his own material and outside collaborations. In all arenas, he has found massive sales and widespread acclaim, making him a consistently sought-after talent in the studio, onstage, and behind the scenes.

Born: April 10, 1958; Indianapolis, Indiana
Also known as: Kenneth Brian Edmonds (birth name)
Member of: Manchild; the Deele

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): Lovers, 1986; Tender Lover, 1989; A Closer Look, 1991; For the Cool in You, 1993; The Day, 1996; Christmas with Babyface, 1998; Face2Face, 2001; A Love Story, 2004; Grown and Sexy, 2005; Playlist, 2007.

ALBUMS (with Manchild): Manchild 1, 1972; Power and Love, 1977; Feel the Phunn, 1978.

ALBUMS (with the Deele): Street Beat, 1984; Material Thangz, 1985; Eyes of a Stranger, 1987.

The Life

Kenneth Brian Edmonds was born in the working-class environment of Indianapolis, Indiana, the fifth of six brothers. Soul, gospel, and rhythm and blues were regular listening staples in his household, and they fostered interests in songwriting and performance as Edmonds tipped into his teenage years. Though several local projects did not blossom outside the area, the hopeful Edmonds became a prolific songwriter while attending North Central High School.

His first major break came during a stint backing Bootsy Collins, the funk-soul star who gave Edmonds the moniker "Babyface," inspired by the teen's boyish looks. After finding footing as a session player, Babyface joined the funk outfit Manchild in 1977, though after a few unsuccessful albums, they parted company. From there, he joined the funk-flanked rhythm-and-blues group the Deele, along with fellow hopeful Antonio "L.A." Reid. The pair quickly formed a songwriting partnership that led to superstardom.

Babyface and Reid found fame as songwriters outside The Deele and quickly became highly sought after, while Babyface kept a solo career going, which surged into the 1990's. During his ascent to fame, Babyface met Tracey McQuarn; they were married on September 5, 1992, and had two sons, Brandon and Dylan Michael. The couple forged a business partnership as the Edmonds Entertainment Group, Inc., which specialized in producing movies.

During the late 1990's into the 2000's, the pair's personal and professional lives flourished, but in 2005 Tracey filed for divorce. Since then Babyface has been writing, recording, and touring.

Babyface. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The Music

Babyface's career took off in the mid-1980's, starting with the 1986 solo debut Lovers, which placed four rhythm-and-blues singles moderately on the charts. A double dose of chart success came with songwriting partner Antonio "L.A." Reid and their late-1980's radio staples "Girlfriend" (recorded by dance-diva Pebbles) and "Rock Steady" (cut by vocal group The Whispers). With the momentum behind these singles, Babyface scored credits for Bobby Brown's "Every Little Step," Sheena Easton's "The Lover in Me," plus Karyn White's "Superwoman" and "The Way You Love Me."

Tender Lover. Babyface's stock continued to rise with the rhythm-and-blues-chart-topping solo singles "It's No Crime" and "Tender Lover," along with Top 5 tunes "Whip Appeal" and "My Kinda Girl," from the album Tender Lover. In 1989 Babyface and Reid started their own record label, LaFace, which soared at the turn of the decade thanks to breakout albums from Toni Braxton and TLC (both of which benefitted from the pair's songwriting skills). The early 1990's found Babyface balancing his solo career with cowriting for other established artists, including New Edition member Johnny Gill's "My, My, My," Whitney Houston's "I'll Be Your Baby Tonight" (and later "Queen of the Night" from the sound track for the film The Bodyguard, 1992), plus harmony-heavy foursome Boyz II Men's "End of the Road" (which sat at the number-one spot for an astounding thirteen weeks).

For the Cool in You. By the time 1993's solo release For the Cool in You hit stores, Babyface's hitmaking was unstoppable, and he received the Best Male R&B Vocal Grammy Award for the acoustically slanted "When Can I See You." The stylistic shift also expanded Babyface's contributions outside rhythm-and-blues contexts, quickly leading to writing and producing credits on Madonna's "Take a Bow" and Houston's "Exhale (Shoop Shoop)."

The Day. In 1996 Babyface again played both sides of the street, releasing his album The Day (featuring guests as diverse as Mariah Carey, Stevie Wonder, and Kenny G) and producing Eric Clapton's "Change the World" on the sound track for the movie Phenomenon (1996). Working with Clapton expanded Babyface's audience and earned him a Record of the Year Grammy Award. That coveted honor came in the midst of a three-year Producer of the Year Grammy streak.

Soul Food. Babyface and then wife Tracey Edmonds produced their first movie, the comedy Soul Food, in 1997. Its sound track boasted new songs by Boyz II Men and Dru Hill, with production and cowriting by Babyface. Additional diversity came courtesy of a television taping and subsequent release, MTV Unplugged NYC 1997, in which Babyface tapped into acoustic interests and produced stripped-down reworkings of "Whip Appeal," "Exhale (Shoop Shoop)," "End of the Road," and "Change the World."

Christmas with Babyface. During the late 1990's, Babyface slowed his recording, writing, and sound-track streak to concentrate on family life, though he maintained his presence across the board. In 1998 he issued Christmas with Babyface, featuring several traditional holiday favorites and the original song "You Were There."

Face2Face and Grown and Sexy. In 2001 Babyface switched to Arista Records, where Reid was an executive. His album Face2Face balanced a handful of ballads with songs rooted in soul-funk and spawned the singles "What If" and "There She Goes." In 2005 Babyface released Grown and Sexy, a testament to his personal growth and maturity.

Playlist. Despite his divorce, Babyface stayed active on the road, headlining and occasionally sharing the spotlight with Anita Baker. He also wrote the song "Not Going Nowhere" about staying close to his kids (even though split from their mother), which eventually surfaced on the 2007 album Playlist (his first for Mercury Records). Outside of that track and "The Soldier Song" (inspired by a family separated by war), the project covered several of Babyface's unexpected acoustic influences, including James Taylor, Dan Fogelberg, and Bob Dylan. Once again, the artist expanded his fan base, leaving listeners curious about the stylistic direction he would take in the future.

Musical Legacy

While Babyface is well regarded for his steady stream of singles and blockbuster album sales, versatility is his most enduring trait. His tenacity and unflinching dedication to the arts allowed him to progress from session man to solo star, songwriter, and producer. Babyface transcended style and culture lines, starting in the soul, rhythm-and-blues, and funk worlds and branching out to the pop and rock markets. His collaborations with such performers as Madonna and Eric Clapton refreshed their sounds and broke down sonic and racial stereotypes. Several like-minded stars—among them Jay-Z, Kanye West, and Timbaland—have followed Babyface's profitable formula of being simultaneously artist, writer, producer, and entrepreneur. An innovator in the late 1980's and early 1990's, Babyface continue to push the creative envelope and increasing his impact on almost every facet of music well into the twenty-first century.

Andy Argyrakis

Further Reading

Brackett, Nathan, and Christian Hoard, eds. The New Rolling Stone Album Guide. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2004. Though there are references to his work with other artists, this text also provides reviews and star ratings for Babyface's solo albums.

Collier, Aldore. "Babyface Explains the Inspiration for His Hot New Album, Grown and Sexy." Jet, August 1, 2005. Cover story featuring Babyface, discussing his career and the personal and professional maturity behind his Grown and Sexy.

_____. "Babyface: Singer/Songwriter." Ebony (April 1, 1996). Discusses Babyface's ongoing rotation between the worlds of solo singing and writing for other artists.

George-Warren, Holly, Patricia Romanowski, and Jon Pareles, eds. The Rolling Stone Encyclopedia of Rock and Roll: Revised and Updated for the Twenty-first Century. New York: Fireside, 2001. Entry relating to Babyface's musical contributions, tracking his pursuits on the front lines and behind the scenes.

Whitburn, Joel. The Billboard Book of Top 40 Hits. New York: Billboard Books, 2004. Given Babyface's wealth of singles across several genres, he appears often in this exhaustive analysis of Billboard charting hits.

See also: Blige, Mary J.; Clapton, Eric; Dylan, Bob; Madonna; Taylor, James; Wonder, Stevie.

Burt Bacharach

American pop vocalist, pianist, songwriter, film-score composer, and arranger

An innovative and prolific composer of popular music, Bacharach used new chord progressions, shifting meters, and irregular phrasing in his compositions, which captivated listeners and enticed top vocalists.

Born: May 12, 1928; Kansas City, Missouri

Principal works

FILM SCORES: What's New Pussycat?, 1965; After the Fox, 1966; Alfie, 1966; Casino Royale, 1967; Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid, 1969; Lost Horizon, 1973; Arthur, 1981; Night Shift, 1982; Love Hurts, 1991; Isn't She Great?, 2000.

MUSICAL THEATER (music): Promises, Promises, 1968 (lyrics by Hal David; libretto by Neil Simon; based on Billy Wilder's film The Apartment).

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Hit Maker! Burt Bacharach Plays His Hits, 1965; Reach Out, 1967; Make It Easy on Yourself, 1969; Burt Bacharach, 1971; Living Together, 1973; Futures, 1977; Painted from Memory, 1998 (with Elvis Costello); At This Time, 2005.

The Life

Born in Kansas City, Missouri, to nationally syndicated newspaper columnist Bert Bacharach and his wife Irma Freeman, Burt Bacharach (BAK-uh-rak) grew up in Queens, New York, where his family moved when he was four. He did not show an early affinity for music; at age twelve his mother insisted he study piano. Bacharach dreamed of playing football, a dream he was not physically adapted to fulfill. It was jazz, however, that turned his musical talent to a passion. As an underage teen with a fake identification card, he sneaked into the Fifty-second Street jazz clubs to soak up the experimental rhythms and time signatures of Charlie Parker and Dizzy Gillespie. Bacharach reproduced those sounds in his high school band, which he joined at the age of fifteen. Bacharach graduated from Forest Hills High School, and he went to McGill University in Montreal, where he studied music. Later he took classes in music theory and composition at the Berkshire Music Center and the New School of Social Research, where he studied composition with, among others, Darius Milhaud.

In 1950 Bacharach joined the Army, where his piano skills won him a comfortable billet as the featured entertainer at the officers' club on New York's Governors Island. The following year he was stationed in Germany, where he met the rising pop singing star Vic Damone. Upon his discharge in 1952, Bacharach toured with Damone as his accompanist. Tirelessly working at the nightclubs, Bacharach played for the big-name singers of the day. One young singer, named Paula Stewart, married Bacharach in 1953.

When Bacharach and Stewart divorced in 1958, the pianist, now becoming known in the music industry as a composer, joined film star and vocalist Marlene Dietrich as musical director for her world tour. He remained with Dietrich until 1962, by which time his songs were becoming popular hits for many singers. Over the next five years Bacharach wrote more than one hundred songs, many of which would continue to be performed for decades.

In 1966 he married film actress Angie Dickinson, who gave birth to their daughter Nikki later that year. Born prematurely, Nikki had fragile health, and she was later diagnosed with the autistic-spectrum disorder Asperger's Syndrome. Bacharach's instrumental composition "Nikki," which became the theme song for the ABC Movie of the Week in the 1970's, was written for his daughter.

Dickinson and Bacharach divorced in 1980, and Bacharach married lyricist Carole Bayer Sager, with whom he had written several songs. Their son Christopher was born in 1986. They divorced in 1991, and Bacharach married Jane Hanson in 1993, with whom he had a son and a daughter.

The Music

When Bacharach began writing music (he wrote his first song, "Night Plane to Heaven," while he was an undergraduate at McGill University), popular music was primarily three-chord progressions based on the twelve-bar blues structure. Bacharach's exploration of new chord progressions, shifting meters, and irregular phrasing was experimental; nevertheless, his music, accented with the heavy syncopation of jazz and pop standards, was popular. His compositions were so melodically interesting that talented vocalists favored Bacharach compositions to showcase their skill in phrasing.

Bacharach and David, 1957-1975. Bacharach paired with a number of talented lyricists over the years, but the Bacharach sound of the 1960's and 1970's was developed in collaboration with lyricist Hal David. The two met at the famous Brill Building in New York, which had been a magnet for songwriters since the 1930's. They landed immediately on the country charts with "The Story of My Life," which reached number one for Marty Robbins in 1957, and on the pop charts with "Magic Moments," which reached number four for Perry Como in 1958. At a recording session with the Drifters in 1961, one of the singers in the studio, Dionne Warwick, showed an unusual ability to articulate Bacharach's interesting chord and tempo progressions (probably because of her conservatory training), and Bacharach engaged her to record demos for the Bacharach-David songs that were accumulating. Thirty-eight of those would become popular recordings over the next decade, twenty-two of them Top 40 hits for Warwick. Almost every major singer of the late 1960's and early 1970's recorded Bacharach-David music, including the Beatles, Tom Jones, Dusty Springfield, Gene Pitney, the Carpenters, the Fifth Dimension, and Herb Alpert. A box-office, critical, and legal disaster with the Bacharach-David score for the 1973 film Lost Horizon caused the pair to split. They collaborated again in 1975, but they never equaled the success of their pre-Lost Horizon partnership.

Promises, Promises. In 1968 Broadway producer David Merrick hired Bacharach to work on a proposed adaptation of Billy Wilder's 1960 film The Apartment. Merrick had been impressed by the dramatic quality of Bacharach's music in film scores and by its commercial power in spinning off Top 40 radio hits, such as the title songs for What's New Pussycat? (a hit for Tom Jones, reaching number five), Alfie (a hit for Cilla Black in England and winner of the Academy Award for Best Song), and Casino Royale (a hit for Herb Alpert, although Bacharach's "The Look of Love" from the same film was a bigger hit for Springfield). Bacharach's instrumental sound track for Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid had won an Academy Award and a Grammy Award, and the B. J. Thomas single "Raindrops Keep Fallin' on My Head" hit number one in 1967. Bacharach and David wrote sixteen musical numbers for Merrick's show, which ran for three years on Broadway, won a Tony Award for Best Musical, and a Drama Desk for Outstanding Music, and, as Merrick had hoped, produced two Top 20 hits for Warwick: the title song (on the charts for nine weeks and peaking at number nineteen) and "I'll Never Fall in Love Again," which hit number six on the Billboard Hot 100.

Burt Bacharach. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Bacharach and Bayer Sager. In the second half of the 1970's, Bacharach did not have a single Top 40 hit ("I Don't Need You Anymore" reached number eighty-six for Jackie DeShannon). However, Bacharach's first song with lyricist Bayer Sager, the title song for the 1981 film Arthur, reached number one for Christopher Cross, and it launched a series of hits for Bacharach and Bayer Sager. Their next film theme, "That's What Friends Are For," from Night Shift (1982), was a number-one hit for Warwick when she covered it for the Disney film The Fox and the Hound, and it was the top-selling single of 1986. "Heartlight," from E.T.: The Extra-Terrestrial, was a number-five hit for Neil Diamond in 1982. Bacharach and Bayer Sager also produced non-film hits for popular vocalists, such as Patti LaBelle's "On My Own," which spent twenty-three weeks on the Billboard Hot 100 in the summer of 1986, peaking at number one, and Roberta Flack's "Making Love," which reached the number-six spot on the Billboard adult contemporary chart in 1982.

Painted from Memory. In 1995 Bacharach worked with Elvis Costello on a song for the film Grace of My Heart (1996). When the result, "God Give Me Strength," was nominated for a Grammy Award, Costello asked Bacharach to continue writing with him, resulting in Costello's 1998 album Painted from Memory, with twelve Bacharach-Costello songs (including the film hit), and in a Costello-Bacharach tour. Popularity of the album and tour received a boost from the Austin Powers 1960's spy-film spoofs, which recognized Bacharach's contribution to the genre (1967's Casino Royale) with cameo appearances for Bacharach in three of the popular films, in 1997, 1998, and 2002.

New Music from an Old Friend. In 2007 Bacharach produced an album of original songs written with a variety of popular songwriters, including Kris Kristofferson, Paul Williams, Carole King, Willie Nelson, and Brian Wilson. For each of these long-established writers, this album marked the first collaboration with Bacharach.

Musical Legacy

With more than seventy Top 40 hits in a career spanning more than half a century, Bacharach has made an important contribution to American popular music. He was inducted into the Songwriters Hall of Fame in 1971, before he had composed some of his best work. Many top songwriters have acknowledged Bacharach's influence on their compositions, particularly Jimmy Webb and Tony Banks. Bacharach's jazz influences reasserted themselves late in his career, and Bacharach recorded jazz albums with pianist McCoy Tyner in 1997 and with vocalist Trijntje Oosterhuis in 2006. Several jazz artists, notably Stan Getz and Wes Montgomery, have recorded jazz interpretations of Bacharach songs, attracted by their jazz-inspired rhythmic versatility. An all-star tribute to Bacharach at London's Royal Albert Hall in 2000 included performances by Costello, Warwick, and Petula Clark. With his more than five hundred compositions, Bacharach has reached the Top 10 forty-eight times, with nine number-one hits. His music has won three Academy Awards and seven Grammy Awards. His 2005 Grammy Award for the album At This Time marked the first time Bacharach had written his own lyrics and the first time his songs offered political and social commentary. When TNT Cable Network launched its TNT Masters Series in 1998, it selected Bacharach to be the first featured artist. Though best known as a composer, Bacharach has since the mid-1960's recorded and performed his own music.

John R. Holmes

Further Reading

Brocken, Michael. Bacharach: Maestro! The Life of a Pop Genius. New Malden, England: Chrome Dreams, 2003. This critical biography includes an extensive bibliography and fourteen pages of photographs from every stage of Bacharach's career.

Dominic, Serene. Burt Bacharach, Song by Song. New York: Schirmer Books, 2003. True to its name, this volume is both a work of criticism and a reference book, commenting on every recorded Bacharach song at the time.

Kasha, Al, and Joel Hirschhorn. Notes on Broadway: Conversations With the Great Songwriters. Chicago: Contemporary Books, 1985. This book of interviews with a dozen top songwriters opens with Bacharach.

Lohof, Bruce. "Celebrity: The Rise and Fall of Burt Bacharach." In American Commonplace: Essays on the Popular Culture of the United States. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green State University Popular Press, 1982. An essay that is representative of the many premature announcements of the waning of Bacharach's career.

O'Brien, Geoffrey. "The Return of Burt Bacharach." In Sonata for Jukebox: Pop Music, Memory, and the Imagined Life. New York: Counterpoint, 2004. This essay celebrates the later career of the songwriter, and it is a corrective to the Lohof essay above.

Platts, Robin. Burt Bacharach and Hal David: What the World Needs Now. Burlington, Ont.: Collector's Guides, 2002. A thorough study of the famous collaboration, including commentary on most of the Bacharach-David hits.

See also: Alpert, Herb; Carpenter, Karen; Costello, Elvis; David, Hal; Dietrich, Marlene; Gillespie, Dizzy; Milhaud, Darius; Parker, Charlie; Warwick, Dionne.

Erykah Badu

American rhythm-and-blues vocalist

Badu drew from jazz and soul in her instrumentals and vocal delivery, and her lyrics were often driven by narrative, in the tradition of blues and folk-singers. Expanding her musical vocabulary, she also embraced rap and hip-hop.

Born: February 26, 1971; Dallas, Texas
Also known as: Erica Abi Wright (birth name)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Baduizm, 1997; Mama's Gun, 2000; Worldwide Underground, 2003; The Kabah, 2007; Badu, 2007; New Amerykah, Part One (Fourth World War), 2008.

The Life

Erykah Badu (EH-rihk-uh ba-DOO) was born in Dallas, Texas, in 1971. Her mother, Kolleen Wright, was an actor who encouraged her daughter's interest in performance, and Badu began performing at age four in her mother's theater company. Later, Badu landed a regular spot on a Dallas-area radio station, where she met future collaborator and trumpeter Roy Hargrove. Her early ambitions focused on dance, which was her concentration at both Booker T. Washington High School, a magnet arts school in Dallas, and Grambling State University, in Louisiana. Around this time, Badu changed her name from Erica Wright, in part to replace her slave name, Wright, and in part to demonstrate her Five Percenter convictions (showing her to be in the population group that is enlightened). Before completing her degree, she left Grambling to pursue a career in music.

After touring with her cousin Robert Bradford and circulating a demo called Country Cousins, Badu landed a record deal with Universal Records and released her debut album, Baduizm, in 1997. Badu took time off from her career to spend with her child, Seven, and in 2000 she returned with the release of Mama's Gun. Worldwide Underground, The Kabah, Badu, and New Amerykah, Part One (Fourth World War) were released between 2003 and 2008.

The Music

Badu's music features a blend of soul and funk instrumentals, and her albums have been mixed to produce a crisp, clean sound heavy in bass and sparse in higher registers. The themes of her albums progressed inward, with Mama's Gun presenting more intimate lyrics than Baduizm. She won four Grammy Awards: Best Rhythm and Blues album (Baduizm), Best Female Rhythm and Blues Vocal Performance ("On and On"), Best Rap Performance by a Duo or Group ("You Got Me," with the Roots featuring Erykah Badu, from Things Fall Apart), and Best Rhythm and Blues Song ("Love of My Life," from the Brown Sugar sound track).

"On and On." Badu's first commercial hit, "On and On" (from Baduizm), features her signature sound. The instrumental track is a simple combination of drum kit, bass, and guitar, mixed with a slight echo and a bass foreground that drives the song forward. The lyrics reflect Badu's worldview of enlightenment, including references to numerology.

"Love of My Life." Subtitled "Ode to Hip-Hop," the song "Love of My Life," which Badu performed with Common, is from the sound track for the 2002 film Brown Sugar. It extends a metaphor introduced by Common (with whom Badu was romantically involved) in his 1994 song "I Used to Love H.E.R.," in which he laments the fate of hip-hop, personify-ing the musical form as a woman who has been corrupted by worldly pleasure. The music video for "Love of My Life" traces the history of hip-hop through Badu's life, including scenes that feature famous rap artists. One scene cuts away from the progression of the song to show Badu rapping alongside MC Lyte, one of hip-hop's first commercially successful female rappers. The instrumental track marries Badu's usual soul sound with a more traditional drum sample.

"I Want You." On Worldwide Underground, each song tends to bleed into the next, and in the center is the extended "I Want You." Like most of Badu's songs, "I Want You" is driven by the bass line, which throbs along to the words "I" and "you," which are repeated seven times in each iteration of the chorus's line "I want you." The lyrics describe Badu's effort to ignore her urges, but the music builds toward a climax that finally wears itself out and gasps to a halt just before giving way to a futuristic guitar riff. The song ends with Badu singing almost inaudibly, "Just because I tell you I love you don't mean I do." The song's melody, reminiscent of "Love of My Life," joins with a heavy soul sound to suggest ambivalence about her former lover.

Erykah Badu. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Musical Legacy

Blending diverse black musical styles, Badu's work expresses the independent strength of rap and an overt yet closely guarded sexuality. Her musical development has served as a template for emerging soul and rhythm-and-blues singers.

Justin D. Burton

Further Reading

Emerson, Rana. "'Where My Girls At?' Negotiating Black Womanhood in Music Videos." Gender and Society 16, no. 1 (2002): 115-135. Emerson explores the ways in which black female musicians express their womanhood in music videos, discussing several examples of Badu's work.

McIver, Joel. Erykah Badu: The First Lady of Neo-Soul. London: Sanctuary, 2002. A biography of Badu through the early years of her career.

Perry, Imani. "'Who(se) Am I?' The Identity and Image of Women in Hip-Hop." In Gender, Race, and Class in Media, edited by Gail Dines and Jean McMahon Humez. Thousand Oaks, Calif.: Sage Publications, 2003. To explain the media's perception of Badu's identity and sexuality, Perry discusses her in relation to other hip-hop artists, such as Eve, Lil' Kim, and Lauryn Hill.

Stephens, Dionne, and April Few. "The Effects of Images of African American Women in Hip-Hop on Early Adolescents' Attitudes Toward Physical Attractiveness and Interpersonal Relationships." Sex Roles 56 (2007): 251-264. Presents research on sexual images, using adolescent reactions to several hip-hop artists, including Badu.

Thomas, Greg. "Queens of Consciousness and Sex Radicalism in Hip-Hop: On Erykah Badu and the Notorious K.I.M." The Journal of Pan-African Studies 1, no. 7 (2007): 23-37. Thomas compares the sexuality displayed by Badu and Lil' Kim.

See also: Holiday, Billie; Latifah, Queen.

Joan Baez

American folksinger and songwriter

An icon for the alienated generation of the 1960's, Baez used her considerable influence to promote peace, civil rights, human rights, and the environment. Her public performances spanned fifty years, and she released more than thirty albums. She is well known for her long relationship with Bob Dylan and for interpreting his work, as well as that of Paul Simon, the Rolling Stones, the Beatles, and many others.

Born: January 9, 1941; Staten Island, New York
Also known as: Joan Chandos Baez (full name)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Joan Baez, 1960; Joan, 1967; Any Day Now, 1968; The First Ten Years, 1970; Blessed Are, 1971; Come from the Shadows, 1972; Where Are You Now, My Son? 1973; Gracias a la Vida, 1974; Diamonds and Rust, 1975; Speaking of Dreams, 1989; Play Me Backwards, 1992; Day After Tomorrow, 2008.

WRITINGS OF INTEREST: And a Voice to Sing With, 1987; Daybreak: An Intimate Journal, 1968.

The Life

The second child of Albert Baez, a physics professor, and Joan Bridge Baez, a homemaker, Joan Chandos Baez (BI-ehz) moved around frequently with her family because of her father's work with UNESCO, the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization. A key influence was the year she spent in Iran when she was ten, where she saw severe poverty and a great deal of public brutality. Another influence was her Quaker faith, to which her family converted when she was a child.

Baez attended high school in Palo Alto, California, and moved with her family in 1958 to Boston, then the center of the growing folk-music scene. She started singing locally in coffeehouses and clubs and attended the Fine Arts School of Drama at Boston University. She left the university to pursue her career at Club 47 in Cambridge, where she performed twice a week. She met the singer Bob Gibson, who invited Baez to perform with him at the 1959 Newport Jazz Festival. This performance generated a certain amount of publicity and led to Baez's signing with Vanguard Records the following year. In 1967, arrested for supporting the right to refuse military induction, Baez met David Harris in jail. They soon wed, but Harris was arrested for refusing induction in July, 1969, leaving his pregnant wife to appear at the Woodstock Festival and other events. Their son, Gabriel Harris, was born in December, 1969. On Harris's release the marriage began to fail, and the couple divorced in 1973. Baez never remarried.

In 1980 Baez received the Honorary Doctorate of Humane Letters from both Rutgers University and Antioch University for her political activism and the universal appeal of her music. She also helped with the 1985 Live Aid concert to help relieve famine in Africa and toured for many other humanitarian causes, including Amnesty International. In 1987 Baez traveled to the Middle East to sing songs of peace for Israelis and Palestinians, the same year that her autobiography, And a Voice to Sing With, appeared and became a New York Times best seller.

The Music

Early Works. Baez recorded her first album, Joan Baez, for Vanguard Records in 1960, a mix of blues, laments, and traditional folk ballads sung to her own guitar accompaniment. The album had moderate sales, but the following year her second release, titled Joan Baez, Vol. 2, was a big hit. During the next few years Baez emerged at the forefront of the American folk song revival, culminating her work at Vanguard with the Top 10 song, "The Night They Drove Old Dixie Down."

Where Are You Now, My Son? Baez switched to A&M records in 1972, where she stayed four years and recorded six albums. Among the notable ones were 1973's Where Are You Now, My Son?, which featured a twenty-three-minute title song that documented Baez's visit to Hanoi, North Vietnam, in December of 1972.

Diamonds and Rust. The political climate was beginning to change, and Baez began flirting with pop music and writing her own songs. In 1975 she released Diamonds and Rust, her first album that was not political. This album turned out to be the biggest seller of Baez's career. The title song, a sentimental piece about her relationship with Bob Dylan, became the second Top 10 hit of her career.

Joan Baez. (National Archives)

In 1983 Baez appeared on the Grammy Awards for the first time, where she sang Bob Dylan's hit "Blowin' in the Wind," a song she had first performed twenty years earlier. When her music career foundered during the 1980's, Baez acquired her first voice coach, Robert Bernard. Seeking therapy during these years, she divided her time between social activism and singing. She looked for a manager and settled on Mark Spector, who signed her with Virgin Records.

Gracias a la Vida. The title song of this Spanish-language album was written and first recorded by Chilean folksinger Violeta Para. Baez's album, released in 1974, was a success in both the United States and Latin America, a first for her. The success of Baez's album was cited by Linda Ronstadt as the inspiration to record her own Spanish-language album, 1987's Canciones de Mi Padre. In 2006, while participating in a tree sit-in on the property of South Central Farm in Los Angeles, Baez sang several songs from Gracias a la Vida to an audience that included immigrant workers from South America, activists, and celebrities. The large group was protesting the imminent eviction of the community farmers. The songs included the title track and "No nos Moveron" ("We Shall Not Be Moved"), an anthem of the Civil Rights movement of the 1960's.

Play Me Backwards. This 1992 album, her first recording with Virgin Records, was Baez's first release with a major label in more than ten years. It was critically acclaimed, sold well, and marked a new path for her. The music was sophisticated and contemporary country rock, with acoustic guitar, electric bass, and percussion accompanying Baez singing songs by Janis Ian and Mary Chapin Carpenter. Carpenter's folk-rock ballad "Stones in the Road" is included in this album, and it gave Baez a musical opportunity to criticize the generation that followed her of being selfish materialists. Baez herself wrote several of the songs with her producers Wally Wilson and Kenny Greenberg, and her singing reached a new level of maturity and expressiveness. Virgin records was sold shortly afterward, however, and Baez switched record companies again, to Guardian.

Musical Legacy

Baez had a direct influence on such artists as Emmylou Harris, Judy Collins, Bonnie Raitt, and Joni Mitchell. In 2007 Baez's live album Ring Them Bells was rereleased by Proper, a European label, with a six-page booklet and five unreleased song tracks from the original recording sessions. Also, Baez was the recipient of 2007's Grammy Lifetime Achievement Award.

Sheila Golburgh Johnson

Further Reading

Baez, Joan. And a Voice to Sing With: A Memoir. New York: Summit Books, 1987. Personal account of the singer's slide from triumph with Diamonds and Rust to the difficulties of the 1980's.

_____. Daybreak: An Intimate Journal. New York:

The Dial Press, 1968. Not many people publish an autobiography when they are twenty-six years old, but Baez had a strong sense of her own destiny and tells about it.

Hajdu, David. Positively 4th Street: The Lives and Times of Joan Baez, Bob Dylan, Mimi Baez Fariña, and Richard Fariña. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2001. A detailed account of the love, rivalries, and jealousies among Baez, Dylan, singer-songwriter Richard Fariña, and Baez's sister Mimi, a singer and activist.

Nett, Bruno, and Helen Myers. Folk Music in the United States. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1976. The introduction gives a complete overview of folk music, culminating with Baez and Dylan.

See also: Collins, Judy; Dylan, Bob; Guthrie, Woody; Hopkins, Lightnin'; Mitchell, Joni; Odetta; Robertson, Robbie; Scruggs, Earl; Travis, Merle; Watson, Doc.

Samuel Barber

American classical composer

Barber's compositions are characterized by sweeping melodies and changing meters. Audiences love his music, in part, because it is direct and easy to understand. He is best known for his Adagio for Strings.

Born: March 9, 1910; West Chester, Pennsylvania
Died: January 23, 1981; New York, New York

Principal works

BALLET (music): Medea, 1946.
CHAMBER WORK: Summer Music, Op. 31, 1955 (for wind quintet).
CHORAL WORKS: Prayers of Kierkegaard, 1954.
OPERAS (music): Vanessa, Op. 32, 1958 (libretto by Gian Carlo Menotti); A Hand of Bridge, Op. 35, 1959 (libretto by Menotti); Antony and Cleopatra, Op. 40, 1966 (libretto by Franco Zeffirelli).
ORCHESTRAL WORKS: Overture to "The School for Scandal," Op. 5, 1931; Adagio for Strings, 1936; Symphony No. 1, Op. 9, 1936; First Essay for Orchestra, 1937; String Quartet, Op. 11, 1938; Violin Concerto, Op. 14, 1939; Capricorn Concerto, Op. 21, 1944; Piano Concerto, Op. 38, 1962.
PIANO WORKS: Excursions, Op. 20, 1942-1944; Sonata for Piano, Op. 26, 1949.
VOCAL WORKS: Knoxville: Summer of 1915, Op. 24, 1947; Hermit Songs, Op. 29, 1953; Despite and Still, Op. 41, 1969.

The Life

Samuel Barber grew up in West Chester, Pennsylvania, in what was once a Quaker neighborhood. He wrote his first piece at age seven and attempted his first opera at age ten. His father, a Presbyterian minister, did not encourage Barber's musical abilities. Undeterred, Barber continued his pursuit of composition, with the encouragement of his uncle, Sidney Homer. At fourteen Barber entered the Curtis Institute, where he studied voice, piano, composition, and conducting. While at Curtis, Barber met fellow composer Gian Carlo Menotti, who would write the librettos for Barber's Pulitzer Prize-winning operas Vanessa and A Hand of Bridge. Barber's work was championed by such world-renowned artists as pianist Vladimir Horowitz and conductor Arturo Toscanini. He received many awards and prizes during his career, including the American Prix de Rome, two Pulitzer Prizes, and election to the American Academy of Arts and Letters. Barber composed throughout his life, though his output diminished greatly after his opera Antony and Cleopatra failed to gain audience or critical acclaim. Barber died in 1981 with longtime friend Gian Carlo Menotti at his bedside.

The Music

Barber's musical style remained relatively unchanged throughout his life, and he was often criticized for this lack of experimentation. He did occasionally employ some twentieth century styles such as polytonality, but overall his works are quite tonal and neo-Romantic in style. Audiences find his accessible music appealing. Throughout his career, Barber showed a particular love of composing for voice. In total, Barber composed three operas, two ballets, more than one hundred songs, several choral works, various works for orchestra, and concerti for both piano and violin.

Adagio for Strings. Perhaps Barber's best known work, Adagio for Strings, originated in his String Quartet, Op. 11, composed in 1936 and premiered in 1938 by the NBC Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Arturo Toscanini. Considered by many America's national song of mourning, it was played after the deaths of Presidents Franklin Roosevelt and John Kennedy and following the attacks of September 11, 2001. Barber later used an arrangement of the Adagio for Strings in a choral composition on the text of the Agnus Dei from the Requiem Mass. The work pervades American culture: It has appeared in movies such as Platoon (1986) and The Elephant Man (1980), in television shows such as The Simpsons, and even in a videogame sequence.

Violin Concerto. Barber wrote his Violin Concerto when he was thirty years old, a commission for fellow Curtis Institute graduate Iso Briselli. Although Briselli approved of the first two movements, he encouraged Barber to change the third movement, saying it did not match the sensibilities of the previous movements. Subsequently, Briselli did not play the premiere of the work. Instead, the concerto premiered later with the Philadelphia Orchestra. Though the third movement remains controversial to some virtuoso violinists, the work ranks as a favorite among American audiences and is one of the most frequently performed concerti in the modern repertoire.

Samuel Barber. (Library of Congress)

Knoxville: Summer of 1915. This song cycle, based on the poetry of James Agee, tells the story of life in small-town America. The work mimics the simplicity of everyday activities and opens with the description of sitting on a porch swing in early evening. Within the work Barber moves freely among American music idioms—folk, jazz, and blues—and evokes nostalgia for early America. Eleanor Steber commissioned and premiered the work in 1948 with the Boston Symphony. Though often performed with voice and piano, the original score was for voice and orchestra, then later transcribed for voice and chamber orchestra. Its imagery and text make this perhaps Barber's most American composition.

Hermit Songs. This ten-song cycle uses texts found in the margins of manuscripts copied by Irish monks of the eighth to twelfth centuries. The poems range from boisterous to humorous to deeply religious, and, indicative of Barber's style, the pieces move freely between meters, always conforming to the rhythm of the texts. Each song is quite different in mood and style, but together they create one of the greatest song cycles of the twentieth century. It was first performed by American soprano Leontyne Price, then relatively unknown, with Barber at the piano. This collaboration led to a lifelong friendship, and later Barber composed for her the song cycle Despite and Still. She also starred in his last major work, the opera Antony and Cleopatra.

Vanessa. This 1958 opera earned Barber his first Pulitzer Prize. Neo-Romantic in style, it shows Barber's deft ability to move between meters and write melodies that conform to the speaking rhythm of the English language. With libretto by Gian Carlo Menotti, the opera is about Vanessa, a woman tortured by the memory of a past love. She is determined to relive the past instead of accepting the reality of her unhappy situation. The characters in the opera are emotionally flawed, and Barber's music captures that mood expertly. Overwhelming sadness is especially evident in the beloved aria "Must the Winter Come So Soon." This haunting aria has become part of the standard repertoire for mezzo-sopranos. Though Barber originally conceived the role of Vanessa for Maria Callas, the role eventually went to Steber. The opera was a great success and led to a commission for the 1966 opening of the Lincoln Center.

Piano Concerto. The publishing company G. Schirmer commissioned Barber to write a piano concerto to commemorate its hundredth year. The work premiered on September 24, 1962, with pianist John Browning and the Philadelphia Orchestra. The concerto is in three movements, and though Barber completed the first two movements in 1960, Browning received the third movement just fifteen days before the premiere. The work was critically acclaimed, and for it Barber received the 1963 Pulitzer Prize (his second) and a Music Critics Circle Award in 1964.

Antony and Cleopatra. Riding the success of his second Pulitzer Prize, Barber accepted a commission from the Lincoln Center to celebrate the opening of the Metropolitan Opera's stage. Barber's opera opened on September 16, 1966, but failed to win the audience approval that Vanessa had, despite its all-star cast, including Price as Cleopatra. Though the opera exhibits some of his most dramatic writing, the production was marred by director Franco Zeffirelli's staging, which was too grand for Barber's sensitive musical style. This imbalance seems to have been its downfall. The failure of the opera greatly affected Barber, and although Antony and Cleopatra had some later success on smaller stages, the composer never regained the success he had prior to the premiere of Vanessa. He continued to compose, but his output was greatly diminished. He wrote a relatively small number of compositions between 1966 and his death from cancer in 1981.

Musical Legacy

Though Barber composed in the heart of the twentieth century, his style rarely reflected many of the trends of the era. Barber's music was always lyrical and expressive and loved by audiences for beautiful melodies. Whether writing for strings, as in the famous Adagio for Strings, or for voice in his songs, Barber always displayed a refined taste. His music showed a love of lyricism and simplicity that wooed American audiences and made Barber one of the most beloved classical composers of the twentieth century. Though sometimes criticized for not being as experimental and forward-thinking as some of his contemporaries—namely Igor Stravinsky and Arnold Schoenberg—Barber remained committed to the composition of beautiful melodies. He received many awards for his music, including the American Prix de Rome Award, the Pulitzer Prize, a Guggenheim Fellowship, and election to the American Academy of Arts and Letters. His love of poetry created a legacy of melodic and lyrical writing.

Diane M. Ricks

Further Reading

Bredeson, Carmen, and Ralph Thibodeau. Ten Great American Composers. Berkeley Heights, N.J.: Enslow, 2002. A collection on American composers, with useful information on Barber and his contemporaries.

Felsenfeld, Daniel. Britten and Barber: Their Lives and Their Music. Pompton Plains, N.J.: Amadeus Press, 2005. Interesting comparison of English composer Benjamin Britten and American composer Samuel Barber.

Heyman, Barbara B. Samuel Barber: The Composer and His Music. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992. Most comprehensive book about Barber and his life, including anecdotes about his childhood and early aspirations to become a composer. Supplemented with articles, interviews, letters, and original manuscripts.

Lee, Douglas A. Masterworks of Twentieth Century Music: The Modern Repertory of the Symphony Orchestra. New York: Routledge, 2002. Discusses the standard repertoire of modern-day orchestras and considers Barber's rarely discussed contributions to orchestral repertoire.

Simmons, Walter. Voices in the Wilderness: Six American Neo-romantic Composers. Lanham, Md.: Scarecrow Press, 2006. Comprehensive assessments of composers who created significant, artistically meaningful bodies of work without abandoning traditional principles, forms, and procedures. Biographical overview, assessment of body of work and current place in the pantheon of American composers.

See also: Burton, Gary; Horowitz, Vladimir; Kander, John; Menotti, Gian Carlo; Price, Leontyne; Rota, Nino; Schoenberg, Arnold; Serkin, Rudolf; Solti, Sir Georg; Stravinsky, Igor; Toscanini, Arturo.

Daniel Barenboim

Argentine Israeli classical conductor and pianist

Pianist and conductor Barenboim became a fixture on world stages soon after his European debut in 1952, performing and recording most of the best-known works in the pianistic, operatic, and symphonic repertoire. Barenboim's passion for music and its power to unite people have also promoted peace by bringing young Israeli and Palestinian musicians together in concert.

Born: November 15, 1942; Buenos Aires, Argentina

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (as conductor): Boulez: Notations 1-4/ Rituel/Messagesquisse, 1992; Bruckner: Symphony 7, 1995; Franz Liszt: A Faust Symphony, 1999; Wagner: Overtures, Preludes, and Great Scenes, 2000.

ALBUMS (as pianist): Beethoven: Piano Sonatas, 1990; Mozart: Complete Piano Concertos, 1990 (with English Chamber Orchestra); Liszt: Dante Symphony, 1994 (as pianist and conductor; with Berliner Philharmoniker); Chopin: The Complete Nocturnes, 1998; Beethoven: Piano Concertos Nos. 1-5; Choral Fantasia, 2002 (with New Philharmonia Orchestra).

WRITINGS OF INTEREST: A Life in Music, 1991.

The Life

Daniel Barenboim (BAHR-ehn-boym) began piano lessons at the age of five with his mother and continued his musical education with his father as his only teacher until he was seventeen. He gave his first public recital in Buenos Aires in 1950 at the age of seven. Barenboim's parents immigrated to Israel in 1952. Two years later the family traveled for the summer to Salzburg, where young Daniel took conducting lessons from Igor Markevitch. It was during this summer that Barenboim met the legendary conductor Wilhelm Furtwängler, whose letter stating that "the eleven-year-old Barenboim is a phenomenon" served as the young pianist's letter of introduction for the next twenty years.

In 1955 the family traveled to Paris, where Barenboim studied composition with Nadia Boulanger. By age sixteen, Barenboim could boast of an international career with annual concert tours in Europe and the United States. In 1967 he married the uniquely talented British cellist Jacqueline du Pré.

Few musicians can lay claim to the political importance that Barenboim's career continues to command. In 2001 he angered some Israelis by conducting the overture to Richard Wagner's Tristan und Isolde (1859) in Jerusalem; Wagner was and remains a controversial figure among Jews for his philosophy and the Nazis' use of his music to further their cause. Together with Edward Said, the famous Palestinian-American literary theorist and cultural critic, Barenboim founded the West-Eastern Divan Workshop, a program for young musicians from the Middle East that provides a forum on neutral ground for cultural exchange and mutual understanding through music and discussion.

Barenboim believes this unique arrangement will promote a peaceful future for both Israelis and Palestinians. He became the first Israeli citizen to receive honorary Palestinian citizenship, in 2008.

The Music

Few musicians have combined pianistic and conducting careers as successfully as Barenboim, and he has emerged in both areas as one of the most important performers of the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries.

Paris Debut. Barenboim made his Paris debut playing Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's Jeunnehomme piano concerto (Köchel listing 271) in 1955 and his New York debut with Sergei Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No. 1 (1912) in 1956. In 1960, he performed the complete cycle of Ludwig van Beethoven sonatas in Tel Aviv. His conducting debut took place in 1962 with the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra.

The English Chamber Orchestra and Bayreuth. In 1964, Barenboim initiated a long-lasting relationship with the English Chamber Orchestra during which he toured the world with the ensemble, performing both as a pianist and as a conductor. The Edinburgh Festival provided Barenboim his operatic conducting debut in 1973 with a performance of Mozart's Don Giovanni (1787). He first conducted the Bayreuth Festival in 1981 with Wagner's Tristan und Isolde and would return regularly thereafter, notably for a production of Wagner's Der Ring des Nibelungen (comprising Das Rheingold, 1869; Die Walküre, 1870; Siegfried, 1871; and Götterdämmerung, 1874), which ran from 1988 to 1992.

Conducting and Performing. In 1991, Barenboim officially succeeded George Solti as the music director of the Chicago Symphony and kept the post for fifteen years. He also accepted the position of music director at the Staatsoper in Berlin in 1992. Barenboim undertook the extraordinary feat of performing the complete cycles of Beethoven's piano sonatas and symphonies in London in 1998 and, two years later, in Vienna, Berlin, and New York.

Barenboim has performed and recorded much of the mainstream piano, symphonic, and operatic works and has had greater success than many musicians who have attempted dual careers in performing and conducting. Although he sometimes cedes the piano to another soloist and simply conducts a concerto, Barenboim more commonly leads the orchestra from the piano bench.

Musicianship. Barenboim is especially noted for his mastery of the German repertoire, for his sensitivity to musical structure, and for his interest in harmonic nuance. He shows little interest in the performance practice movement, which seeks fidelity, based on historical evidence, to particular instruments, dynamics, tempi, and other aspects of music as originally performed. He believes that the traditions of performance that grew around music are valid and interesting in their own right and that it is not necessary to imitate music as it might have been heard around the time it was composed.

Some critics have taken issue with Barenboim's "overly Romantic" phrasings, slow tempi, or his overuse of pedal in works by Johann Sebastian Bach, but he is far from radical in this regard, and many of these choices reflect a mainstream, early twentieth century tradition. Nevertheless, Barenboim's performances are always personalized, never dull or trite, and they generally provoke strong reactions, either positive or negative, from his listeners. Overall, Barenboim is widely viewed as a meticulous musician with sensitive instincts and a keen intelligence that is evident in his interpretations as a conductor and as a pianist.

Barenboim is an advocate of new music and does not limit himself to the standard repertoire. During his tenure at the Chicago Symphony he especially championed the music of Elliott Carter. Barenboim also conducted the premieres of works by Luciano Berio, Pierre Boulez, Alexander Goehr, and Hans Werner Henze and expanded his repertoire to include African American music, Argentinian tango, jazz, and Brazilian music.

Recordings. Throughout his career, Barenboim has recorded both as a conductor and a pianist for many labels including Westminster, EMI, Deutsche Grammophon, Decca, Philips, Sony Classical (CBS Masterworks), BMG, Erato Disques, and Teldec Classics International. He began recording in 1954, and he soon recorded complete cycles of the piano sonatas and concertos of Beethoven and Mozart. He signed an exclusive contract with Warner Classics International in 1992, which led to more than 130 discs. His recording of Wagner's Tannhäuser won a Grammy Award in 2002.

Musical Legacy

Performances by Daniel Barenboim are greeted with wild enthusiasm by his audiences, and his appearances have been known to evoke a response similar to that of a religious event. His acclaim as a "cultural messiah" is undoubtedly due in part to his musicianship but also to his role as an ambassador of peace who uses music as his means of communication.

In 2006, Barenboim accepted the title of Maestro Scaligero at the Teatro La Scala in Milan, and he was named conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra's New Year's Day Concert for 2009. An active chamber musician, his recordings include collaborations with the best performers, such as Pinchas Zukerman, Isaac Stern, Yo-Yo Ma, Maxim Vengerov, and Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau. He won Grammies for violin sonatas by Johannes Brahms performed with Itzhak Perlman (1990) and for his Mozart quintets (1994).

As one of the most influential and talented musicians of his time, Barenboim continues to move the world through his performances both on the podium and at the piano. His ability to bring music as an effective and universal language of peace to war-stricken countries has brought hope to musicians and audiences worldwide.

Lisa de Alwis

Further Reading

Barenboim, Daniel. A Life in Music. Rev. ed. New York: Arcade, 2002. Although it does not include much about his personal life, this autobiography covers Barenboim's career in his own words and includes both photographs and philosophical musings.

Barenboim, Daniel, and Edward Said. Parallels and Paradoxes: Explorations in Music and Society. New York: Pantheon Books, 2002. The best source in print for understanding Barenboim's views on music, culture, and politics. Said lends his thoughts on Barenboim and the "Wagner taboo" in Israel.

See also: Argerich, Martha; du Pré, Jacqueline; Perlman, Itzhak; Poulenc, Francis.

Ray Barretto

American Latin jazz percussionist, bandleader, and songwriter

Barretto was the first musician to integrate the African conga drum into jazz performances, and he is widely considered to be the most important and influential Latin percussionist in the history of jazz; he is also considered the "godfather" of Latin jazz in America.

Born: April 29, 1929; Brooklyn, New York
Died: February 17, 2006; Hackensack, New Jersey
Member of: The Fania All Stars; New World Spirit

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Barretto para bailar, 1961; Charanga moderna, 1962; Concinando suave, 1962; La moderna & el watussi, 1962; Pachanga, 1962; Latino!, 1963; On Fire Again (Encendido otra vez), 1963; The Big Hits Latin Style, 1963; Guajira y guaguanco, 1964; Swing la moderna & los cueros, 1964; Viva watusi!, 1965; El Ray criollo, 1966; Señor 007, 1966; Alma alegre, 1967; Soul Drummer, 1967; Acid, 1968; Fiesta en el barrio, 1968; Hard Hands, 1968; Together, 1970; From the Beginning, 1971; Barretto Power, 1972; Carnaval, 1972; Concinando, 1972; Head Sounds, 1972; The Message, 1972; The Other Road, 1973; Barretto, 1975; Energy to Burn, 1977; Eye of the Beholder, 1977; Can You Feel It?, 1978; Gracias, 1978; La cuna, 1979; Rican/Struction, 1979; Giant Force, 1980; Que viva la musica, 1982; Rhythm of Life, 1982; Todo se va poder, 1984; Aqui se puede, 1987; Irresistible, 1989; Ray Barretto, 1990; Ritmo en el corazón, 1990; Handprints, 1991; Soy dichoso, 1991; Ancestral Messages, 1992; Latino con soul, 1994; Taboo, 1994; Descarga criolla, 1995; Moderna de siempre, 1995; My Summertime, 1995; Contact!, 1997; Portraits in Jazz and Clave, 2000; Trancedance, 2001; Bomba bomba, 2002; Homage to Art, 2003; Time Was—Time Is, 2005; Standards Rican-ditioned, 2006.

The Life

Ray Barretto (bah-REHT-toh) was born in New York City of parents who were recent immigrants from Puerto Rico. His father left when Barretto was four years old, leading his mother to relocate Barretto and her two other children from Spanish Harlem to the South Bronx. While his mother worked and went to school, Barretto, an asthmatic, listened to radio broadcasts of the music of big bands led by Duke Ellington, Count Basie, Benny Goodman, and Glenn Miller. In 1946, at the age of seventeen, he joined the Army to escape the confines of school and the racial intolerance of the streets, and while stationed in Germany he was inspired by the album Manteca, by bebop trumpeter Dizzy Gillespie. Determined to become a jazz musician, Barretto chose percussion because, lacking previous musical training, he believed that he could master its technique most easily. Discharged from military service in 1949, Barretto returned to

New York and joined jam sessions in Harlem with established musicians; he went on to achieve recognition as a major artist in his own right, rising from the barrio to stardom in the world of jazz and Latin music.

In 1978 Barretto married Annette "Brandy" Rivera, with whom he had a son; an earlier marriage had produced three other children. After his death in 2006, Barretto's body was flown to Puerto Rico, where he was memorialized with official honors by the Institute of Puerto Rican Culture.

Ray Barretto. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The Music

Barretto first learned to play drums in the style of the American swing and bebop bands, beginning his career working with jazz musicians in New York. Reconnecting with his roots in the New York Latin music of the same period, Barretto became an early crossover artist, fusing Afro-Caribbean rhythms with bebop's revolutionary improvisatory style.

"El Watusi." "El Watusi," from Barretto's Charanga moderna album, was his first and only major commercial hit. One of the earliest Latin songs to become a success in the United States, "El Watusi" featured the violins and flutes associated with charanga music but foregrounded the new boogaloo rhythm, an infectious blend of Caribbean rhythms and African American soul music that appealed to both Latin and rhythm-and-blues audiences. Written to accompany the popular Watusi dance of the day, the vocal featured an amusing macho rodomontade of street Spanish over a background of unbridled party sounds, clapping hands, and a catchy Latin beat. A high-spirited convergence of Cuban and Puerto Rican rhythms and African American soul, "El Watusi" remains a song that defined a cultural moment and introduced new energies into American music.

Acid. In 1967 Barretto joined Fania Records, the legendary New York record company synonymous with the blend of traditional Latin dance music and American jazz known as salsa. In 1968 he became a member of the Fania All Stars orchestra, composed of the leading Latin jazz artists of the day, eventually becoming its music director. He remained associated with the Fania All Stars for the rest of his life and is credited with helping form the group's musical identity as well as helping create the distinctive identity of the Fania label itself.

The move to Fania Records gave Barretto the opportunity to take his jazz-oriented percussive style beyond popular dance music into greater improvisation and more musically sophisticated compositions. He also began to infuse other musical currents into salsa and to experiment with electronic music and unusual instrumental combinations. The first example of Barretto's new musical direction was his highly successful 1968 album Acid, considered perhaps his most influential work. An innovative blend of soul, Latin, and jazz music, Acid has been praised as the best of all Latin jazz albums and was considered by Barretto himself a major advance, even a rebirth, of his musical identity.

Between 1968 and 1975, Barretto made eight more adventurous and eclectic albums for Fania, including Carnaval, Rican/Struction, and 1975's Barretto, his most popular album. His work during these years came to be considered the very life and soul of Latin jazz in America, Latin America, and the world.

New World Spirit. Throughout his career, Barretto played on recording sessions for many different kinds of musicians, especially major jazz musicians such as Sonny Stitt, Wes Montgomery, Kenny Burrell, Art Blakey, Cal Tjader, Lou Donaldson, Cannonball Adderly, and the musician who had first inspired him, Dizzy Gillespie. Barretto achieved the distinction of becoming the jazz world's most widely recorded conga player. Having always considered himself at heart a jazz musician, in 1992 Barretto turned from his salsa-based work to form the jazz sextet New World Spirit. This later period of Barretto's musical career produced such highly regarded albums as 1992's Ancestral Messages and 1994's Taboo, which blended Latin soul, salsa, and Afro-Cuban music with the genres with which Barretto most closely identified, hard bop and bebop.

Musical Legacy

Ray Barretto is considered one of the most influential Latin musicians of all time, not only a major presence in all of the developments in Latin music in the last half of the twentieth century but also a significant force in the integration of Latin music with such American idioms as bebop, rock, soul, funk, and dance music. His interpretive drumming pioneered the role of the conga in jazz, establishing its legitimacy as a jazz instrument. Instrumental in the flowering of fusion music such as boogaloo and salsa, Barretto fostered a multicultural cross-fertilization between American jazz and Latin American/Afro-Cuban music. With Puerto Rican roots but steeped in New York's bebop music, Barretto also made a major place for himself in the world of mainstream American jazz.

Barretto won many awards, including a Grammy for the album Ritmo en el corazón (with vocals by Cuban salsa legend Celia Cruz). He was inducted into the International Latin Music Hall of Fame in 1999, and in 2006, the National Endowment for the Arts gave Barretto its Jazz Masters Award for lifetime achievement.

Margaret Boe Birns

Further Reading

Alava, Silvio H. Spanish Harlem's Musical Legacy, 1930-1980. New York: Arcadia, 2007. Addresses Barretto's contributions to Spanish Harlem's musical development from the 1930's and 1980's in New York City.

Flores, Juan. From Bomba to Hip-Hop. New York: Columbia University Press, 2000. This examination of the progression of Puerto Rican culture in the United States over the past half century discusses Barretto among other artists.

Morales, Ed. The Latin Beat: The Rhythms and Roots of Latin Music, from Bossa Nova to Salsa and Beyond. New York: Da Capo Press, 2003. Includes a discussion of Barretto in the context of the roots of Latin music in Africa, Europe, and Latin America.

Roberts, John Storm. The Latin Tinge: The Impact of Latin American Music on the United States. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999. Includes Barretto in an examination of the role Latin American rhythms, musical forms, and musicians have played in shaping American culture.

Waxer, Lise. Situating Salsa: Global Markets and Local Meanings in Latin Popular Music. New York: Routledge, 2002. A comprehensive consideration of salsa music and its global social impact.

See also: Blades, Rubén; Cruz, Celia.

Béla Bartók

Hungarian classical composer and ethnomusicologist

Bartók was the first Western composer to scientifically collect folk music. His innovative composition style fused established Western techniques and rigorously organized formal patterns with traditional folklike structures. Bartók had an active career as a virtuoso pianist in both Europe and the United States and was a fervent advocate of new music.

Born: March 25, 1881; Nagyszentmiklós, Austro-Hungarian Empire (now in Sânnicolau Mare, Romania)

Died: September 26, 1945; New York, New York

Principal works

BALLETS (music): A fából faragott királyfi, 1917 (The Wooden Prince); A csodálatos mandarin, 1926 (The Miraculous Mandarin).

CHAMBER WORKS: String Quartet No. 1, 1910; String Quartet No. 2, 1918; Violin Sonata No. 1, 1921; Violin Sonata No. 2, 1922; String Quartet No. 3, 1929; String Quartet No. 4, 1929; String Quartet No. 5, 1935; Sonata for Two Pianos and Percussion, 1938; Contrasts, 1939 (for violin, clarinet, and piano); String Quartet No. 6, 1939; Sonata for Violin Solo, 1944.

OPERA (music): A Kékszakállú herceg vára, 1918 (Bluebeard's Castle; libretto by Béla Balázs).

ORCHESTRAL WORKS: Kossuth, 1904; Fourteen Bagatelles, Op. 6, 1908; Violin Concerto No. 1, 1908; Románian kolinda-dallamok, 1915 (Romanian Christmas Songs); Román népi tánccock, 1915 (Romanian Folk Dances); Suite, Op. 14, 1918; Four Orchestral Pieces, Op. 12, 1921; Táncszit, 1923 (Dance Suite); Three Village Scenes, 1926; String Quartet No. 3, 1927; Rhapsody No. 1, 1929 (for violin and orchestra); Rhapsody No. 2, 1929 (for violin and orchestra); Music for Strings, Percussion, and Celesta, 1937; Violin Concerto No. 2, 1939; Divertimento, 1940 (for strings); Concerto for Orchestra, 1944.

PIANO WORKS: For Children, 1910; Improvisations on Hungarian Peasant Songs, 1918; Out of Doors, 1926 (suite); Piano Sonata, 1926; Mikrokosmos, 1926-1939 (6 volumes); Nine Small Piano Pieces, 1926; Piano Concerto No. 1, 1926; Piano Concerto No. 2, 1931; Suite, Op. 4, 1941; Piano Concerto No. 3, 1945.

VOCAL WORK: Cantata profana, 1934.

WRITINGS OF INTEREST: "The Influence of Peasant Music on Modern Music," 1931 (essay).

The Life

Béla Bartók (BEH-lah BAHR-tok) was born to Béla and Paula in the small town of Nagyszentmiklós, Hungary (today's Sânnicolau Mare, Romania). After a series of short-term residencies in various areas of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, the family settled in 1894 in Bratislava, where the young Bartók frequented the Catholic Gymnasium. In 1899, upon being admitted to the Academy of Music in Budapest, he became the piano pupil of István Thóman, who had studied under Franz Liszt. Concurrently, he took composition with Hans Koessler.

Seen as a brilliant young pianist by his contemporaries, Bartók launched upon a concert career while still a student of the Academy, from which he graduated in 1903. Notable performances were those given in Spain and Portugal in the spring of 1906, when he had the opportunity to play a few Hungarian czardas at the request of the Spanish queen.

In the fall of the same year, he was appointed as a piano teacher at the Budapest Academy of Music. Although he was granted tenure in 1909 and occupied the position until 1934, he found composing, performing, and collecting folk music more rewarding than teaching. His didactic efforts materialized not so much in turning out a string of virtuoso pupils as in producing educational editions of Johann Sebastian Bach's Well-Tempered Clavier, Ludwig van Beethoven's piano sonatas, and Frédéric Chopin's waltzes and in composing original piano works of pedagogical scope, of which the most notable is the six-volume Mikrokosmos.

Bartók's career as a composer was intricately linked with his ethnomusicological activities, which required frequent travel. From 1906 through 1917 he devoted his summers to collecting, recording, transcribing, and analyzing folk music from Central and Eastern Europe as well as North Africa. His interest in this area led to his taking a position—which he occupied well into the mid-1920's—with the ethnographic section of the Hungarian National Museum. In 1909 he married Márta Ziegler, a former piano student who became his close assistant in the enormous task of transcribing and systematizing the collected folk material; their son Béla was born in 1910.

After World War II Bartók's concert career took off: Solo and chamber recitals and orchestral concerts, many of which promoted his own works, were scheduled between 1918 and 1938 in most European countries, including the Soviet Union. His first contact with the United States was occasioned by an extended lecture-recital and concert tour in 1927-1928 and was renewed in the spring of 1940.

By the autumn of that year, disgusted with the nazification of Europe in general and of Hungary in particular, and pained by the recent death of his mother, Bartók decided to emigrate: He left for New York in October, in the company of his second wife, Ditta Pásztory, an excellent pianist in her own right, whom Bartók had married in 1923 and with whom he had a son, Peter, born in 1924.

Béla Bartók. (Library of Congress)

He spent the remaining years of his life in the United States, where he was awarded an honorary doctorate by Columbia University, whose collection of Serbo-Croatian music he had worked on in 1941-1942. In 1943 Harvard University engaged his expertise as an ethnomusicologist. Concurrently, he performed piano recitals across the country and completed work on his volumes of Romanian folk music. Suffering from leukemia and ailing rapidly during the American years, he died in New York in September, 1945.

The Music

In 1931 Bartók described his own music as stemming from three sources—Hungarian, Romanian, and Slovakian—and suggested that "it might be regarded as the embodiment of the very concept of integration so much emphasized in Hungary today."

Collecting Folk Songs. Field research begun in the summer of 1907 among the Székelys of the Eastern Transylvanian area of Csík led to the discovery of "examples of tunes which," Bartók wrote, "I had believed were now lost." These revealed that the most ancient layer of Hungarian folk music rested on pentatonic modes with no semitones and displayed characteristics of what Bartók termed the "old" style, free tempo (parlando rubato) and form, as opposed to the "new" style, possessed of rigorous tempo (tempo giusto) and clear formal structures.

In August, 1909, under the auspices of the Hungarian Ethnographic Museum, Bartók engaged in yet another collecting campaign among the Romanians of the Mezőség district. Writing enthusiastically about the "most exotic Wallachian (Romanian) songs" and their "striking melismas," he likened these melodies to "real coloratura arias." In a letter sent in 1910 to Romanian composer Dumitru G. Kiriac, Bartók put the total of the Romanian songs collected by then at six hundred. By January, 1912, he was again in Bihor to record and transcribe dances, ceremonial music, and instrumental performances. The following year, his book of Romanian folk songs from Bihor county was published under the auspices of the Romanian Academy.

Further field research was performed in 1913 on Arab and Berber music from Biskra in North Africa, where Bartók noticed the complicated rhythmic patterns executed on percussion instruments as well as the limited range of most songs and the "peculiar scales" of wind instruments. Bartók took his phonograph—a tool he had not used since his previous exploration of Romanian music in 1917—to Turkey in the fall of 1936. This was his last field trip; from then on he devoted his efforts to the systematic analysis of what he had already collected, meanwhile giving talks on the Budapest radio on the body of songs assembled in Anatolia.

A meticulously devised, original system of musical notation enabled Bartók to transcribe minuscule variations in pitch, tone, and vocal or instrumental color. By September, 1937, he had revised all the transcriptions from more than a thousand phonograph cylinders and had systematized, for comparative purposes, the song material collected from Bulgarians, Serbs, Croatians, Slovaks, Poles, and Ukrainians. He anticipated 1940 as the date of completion for the colossal compendium of twelve thousand.

Style. In Bartók's youth, late Romanticism was the style of choice: In 1903 the composer detailed the project of a ten-part orchestral work inspired by Hungarian history; this was the symphonic poem Kossuth, with a program based on the figure of the national hero and the music influenced by Richard Strauss's A Hero's Life, which Bartók had earlier transcribed for piano.

By 1931 Bartók had for more than twenty years distilled, absorbed, and remolded the melodic contours, rhythms, and meters of folk songs into original compositions of increasing sophistication: thus a progression can be seen in his works from simple piano arrangements (For Children, on Slovak and Hungarian tunes) to overt use of pentatonic themes (the fourth movement of the Suite, Op. 4 for small orchestra; the final movement of the String Quartet No. 1, Op. 7); direct quotations from Hungarian and Slovak folk songs alongside a highly unorthodox treatment of the seventh as a consonance (Fourteen Bagatelles, Op. 6 for piano); characteristic melodic and rhythmic patterns of Romanian vocal colinde (Romanian Christmas Songs for piano) and instrumental music (Romanian Folk Dances for piano); elements of North African music (the inner movement of the String Quartet No. 2; the third movement of the Suite, Op. 14). Still from this period, Allegro barbaro for piano adopts a percussive, abrasive treatment of the instrument.

Debussy's influence on Bartók's music is quite obvious in the Four Orchestral Pieces, Op. 12, as well as the one-act opera Bluebeard's Castle, Op. 11; in addition, and alongside brilliant orchestration indebted to Strauss, the latter makes consistent use of a Wagnerian leitmotif (a device Bartók had already exploited in the incomplete "First" Violin Concerto dedicated to Stefi Geyer and reworked in 1908 as Two Portraits, Op. 5).

The overall formal design as well as more minute structural details employed in works from the second through the fourth decades of the century relied heavily on symmetry, especially of the mirror kind: For instance, the last section of the one-act ballet The Wooden Prince, Op. 13 is designed as a retrograde reiteration of thematic material from the first. Symmetry extends to encompass the spectrum of modal relationships in the opening and closing of the Cantata profana, and that of key relationships among the movements of the Music for Strings, Percussion, and Celesta. In addition, it permeates the architecture of String Quartet No. 4 and String Quartet No. 5. In the latter, the first two and last two movements are strategically arranged with respect to the third, which provides the axis of symmetry. The five parts of Piano Concerto No. 2 display a similar formal outline.

Compositions of the 1920's involving subtly distilled folk-song traits were the orchestral Dance Suite (an assortment of structures invoking Arab chromaticism, as well as Hungarian and Romanian folk tunes) and the five-song cycle Village Scenes (on Slovak themes). In sharp contrast with these works, Bartók described his Cantata profana as "a setting to music of a Romanian colinda (Christmas song) text" whose music did not in involve imitation of folk music.

In the late 1920's and early 1930's the composer adopted an idiom that—within the general framework of Expressionism while preserving traces of tonal thinking and folk-derived structures—promoted a more overtly atonal language. Thus the pantomime The Miraculous Mandarin, Op. 19, the Piano Sonata, Piano Concerto No. 1, and String Quartet No. 3 involve the persistent use of dissonant layers to create harmonic tension that is never resolved.

A marked change in style is noticeable in works of the late 1930's; this is especially true about the Violin Concerto No. 2, dedicated to violinist Zoltán Székely, who gave it its 1939 world premiere in Amsterdam. Bartók's lyrical treatment of both the violin and orchestra has a Romantic quality foreign to his works of the previous decade, and while the concerto's second theme is based on a twelve-tone row, the whole movement revolves within a quasi-pentatonic, quasi-modal framework reminiscent of old Hungarian folk music. The composer's own description of such an approach as "polymodal chromaticism" is perhaps the best encapsulation of this newly found synthesis, arguably best represented in the modally derived, chromatic fugal theme employed in the opening of the Music for Strings, Percussion, and Celesta.

In a different vein, the 1930's were also devoted to the writing of piano pieces that would form the six-volume Mikrokosmos; these were arranged in increased order of difficulty and designed to cover a variety of technical skills. Concurrently, several of the 153 pieces involved both folk-based material and some of Bartók's preferred compositional devices, such as canon (a form of symmetry), variations, and ostinato.

Musical Legacy

More than once in his life Bartók expressed displeasure at the lack of receptivity of his music by Budapest audiences and performing ensembles, and so he vowed to keep his original works on his desk while dedicating all his energies to collecting folk music. Yet abroad he was revered as the quintessential Hungarian composer. His merits were recognized when, in 1930, he was elected to the International Committee of Cultural Cooperation of the League of Nations and was the recipient of the French government's Legion of Honor. Still, in 1930, the Hungarians did accord him the Corvin Wreath.

His legacy endures as one who skillfully forged a completely new musical style from traditions as different as ancient folk song, German and Italian Baroque counterpoint, nineteenth century Romantic lyricism, and twentieth century polytonality, chromaticism, and dissonance. Bartók did not initiate or lead a new, cohesive school of composition; rather, he traversed a variety of different styles and experimented with a variety of structures and techniques. His compositional excursions led to the complete artistic maturity achieved in works of the 1930's and influenced to a great extent the music of another prominent twentieth century composer, György Ligeti.

Luminita Florea

Further Reading

Bartók, Béla. Letters. Collected, selected, edited and annotated by János Demény. Translated by Péter Balabán and István Farkas. Revised by Elisabeth West and Colin Mason. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1971. Selection of letters by and to Bartók, representative of several significant periods in the composer's life. Includes correspondence penned during Bartók's years in the United States. List of works, bibliography, and general index.

Bartók, Péter. My Father. Homosassa, Fla.: Bartók Records, 2002. Bartók's second son's memoir, involving personal recollections and including hitherto unpublished letters written by his parents from the United States. Illustrations.

Bayley, Amanda, ed. The Cambridge Companion to Bartók. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press, 2001. Discusses works and their reception. Of special interest is the article on Bartók's recorded piano performances. Musical examples, five-page bibliography and index.

Frigeysi, Judit. Béla Bartók and Turn-of-the-Century Budapest. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998. Explores Hungarian modernism and Bartók's own aesthetic system. Discusses Bluebeard's Castle from the perspective of its literary sources. Illustrations, musical examples, bibliography, index.

Laki, Peter, ed. Bartók and His World. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1995. Especially important are the articles originally published in Hungarian—now made accessible to the English-language reader—including interviews with the composer, as well as a selection of his travel letters from Europe, Asia, and North America.

Schneider, David E. Bartók, Hungary, and the Renewal of Tradition: Case Studies in the Intersection of Modernity and Nationality. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2006. With a focus on nationalism, examines the dynamics of tradition and innovation in works inspired from the "Hungarian style" of the nineteenth century and the style of peasant music.

See also: Argerich, Martha; Ashkenazy, Vladimir; Beecham, Sir Thomas; Berio, Luciano; Carter, Elliott; Chávez, Carlos; Chung, Kyung-Wha; Crumb, George; Debussy, Claude; Fleck, Béla; Glass, Philip; Goldsmith, Jerry; Golijov, Osvaldo; Grusin, Dave; Hindemith, Paul; Ives, Charles; Janáček, Leoš; Karajan, Herbert von; Kodály, Zoltán; Leonhardt, Gustav; Ligeti, György; Lutosławski, Witold; Menuhin, Sir Yehudi; Nielsen, Carl; Norman, Jessye; Parker, Charlie; Piazzolla, Astor; Rózsa, Miklós; Schnittke, Alfred; Shaw, Artie; Solti, Sir Georg; Strauss, Richard; Szigeti, Joseph; Watts, André; Williams, Mary Lou; Xenakis, Iannis; Zappa, Frank.

Count Basie

American jazz composer and pianist

As the leader of one of the most renowned jazz swing bands, Basie showed a graceful touch on piano, created blues-oriented compositions, demonstrated a perpetual sense of swing, and displayed the talent for developing great jazz musicians.

Born: August 21, 1904; Red Bank, New Jersey
Died: April 26, 1984; Hollywood, Florida
Also known as: William Basie (full name)
Member of: The Barons of Rhythm

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Dance Parade, 1950; Count Basie at the Piano, 1950; Dance Session, 1952; Count Basie and His Orchestra Collates, 1952; King of Swing, 1953; Basie, 1954; Basie Jazz, 1954; Blues Backstage, 1954; Count Basie Big Band, 1954; Count Basie Dance Session, Vol. 1, 1954; The Count Basie Sextet, 1954; April in Paris, 1955; Basie, 1955; Basie's Back in Town, 1955; Count Basie Dance Session, Vol. 2, 1955; Count Basie Swings—Joe Williams Sings, 1955; Jazz Royalty, 1955; Lester Leaps In, 1955; Let's Go to Prez, 1955; The Old Count and the New Count, 1955; Rock the Blues, 1955; The Band of Distinction, 1956; Basie Bash, 1956; Basie Rides Again, 1956; Basie Roars Again, 1956; The Count, 1956; Count Basie Sings Standards, 1956; The Swinging Count, 1956; Switzerland, 1956; Atomic Mr. Basie, 1957; Basie Plays Hefti, 1958; Basie Swings, Bennett Sings, 1958; Chairman of the Board, 1958; Memories Ad-Lib, 1958; One More Time, 1958; Sing Along with Basie, 1958; Basie and Eckstine, Inc., 1959; Breakfast Dance and Barbecue, 1959; Dance with Basie, 1959; Every Day I Have the Blues, 1959; Hall of Fame, 1959; Strike up the Band, 1959; Benny Carter's Kansas City Suite, 1960; Count Basie and Sarah Vaughan, 1960; Easin' It, 1960; Just the Blues, 1960; Kansas City Suite, 1960; Not Now—I'll Tell You When, 1960; String Along with Basie, 1960; Back with Basie, 1962; Count Basie and the Kansas City 7, 1962; Lil' Ol' Groovemaker, 1962; On My Way and Shoutin' Again, 1962; Basie Land, 1963; Frankly Basie: Count Basie Plays the Hits of Frank Sinatra, 1963; Pop Goes the Basie, 1964; The World of Count Basie, 1964; Basie Meets Bond, 1965; Basie Picks the Winners, 1965; Basie's Beat, 1965; Basie's Beatle Bag, 1966; Basie's Swingin', Voices Singin', 1966; Count Basie with Arthur Prysock, 1966; Inside Basie Outside, 1966; Showtime, 1966; Hollywood . . . Basie's Way, 1967; Straight Ahead, 1967; Basie's in the Bag, 1968; Basic Basie, 1969; Afrique, 1970; Basie on the Beatles, 1970; High Voltage, 1970; Have a Nice Day, 1971; Loose Walk, 1972; Basie Jam, 1973; The Bosses, 1973; For the First Time, 1974; Satch and Josh, 1974; Basie and Zoot, 1975; The Basie Big Band, 1975; For the Second Time, 1975; Basie Jam 2, 1976; Basie Jam 3, 1976; I Told You So, 1976; The Gifted Ones, 1977; Kansas City 5, 1977; Prime Time, 1977; Satch and Josh . . . Again, 1977; Big Bands, an Old Manuscript, 1978; Count Basie Meets Oscar Peterson, 1978; Milt Jackson and Count Basie and the Big Band, Vol. 1, 1978; Night Rider, 1978; The Timekeepers, 1978; Yessir, That's My Baby, 1978; Get Together, 1979; Milt Jackson and Count Basie and the Big Band, Vol. 2, 1979; On the Road, 1979; Kansas City Shout, 1980; Kansas City, Vol. 7, 1980; Kansas City Vol. 6, 1981; Warm Breeze, 1981; Farmer's Market Barbecue, 1982; 88 Basie Street, 1983; Fancy Pants, 1983; Me and You, 1983; Mostly Blues . . . and Some Others, 1983; Long Live the Chief, 1986; Blues for Basie, 1991; Kansas City, 1991; Basie's Bag, 1992; Corner Pocket, 1992; Big Bank Basie, 1995; Count Basie Encounters Oscar Peterson, 1998; Swing Shift, 1999; Blue Skies, 2002; Good Time Blues, 2004; On the Sunny Side of the Street, 2006.

SINGLES: "One o'Clock Jump," 1937; "Jumpin' at the Woodside," 1938; "Lester Leaps In," 1939; "Taxi War Dance," 1939; "Twelfth Street Rag," 1939.

The Life

William "Count" Basie (BAY-see) was born William Basie in 1904 to coachman Harvey Lee Basie and his wife Lillian Ann Childs, who were also musicians. Basie took piano lessons from an early age, and his knowledge of music was also influenced by the vaudeville shows, carnivals, and films he saw in New Jersey and in New York City. Basie did not attend high school, working at various jobs while developing his musical talents.

At about the age of twenty, he moved to Harlem, which was experiencing a musical renaissance. Pianists such as Willie "The Lion" Smith, James P. Johnson, and Fats Waller were developing the stride style of piano playing. Basie learned from them, receiving informal lessons from Waller and eventually replacing him as an accompanist in the vaudeville show Kate Crippen and Her Kids. As Basie traveled the country with various bands, he was accorded the nickname "Count." In 1928 he joined Walter Page's Blue Devils in Kansas City, and in 1929 he was invited to be the pianist with the Bennie Moten band. During this time, Basie briefly fronted his first big band, Count Basie and His Cherry Blossom Orchestra. After Moten died in 1935, Basie formed a big band composed largely of Moten's band musicians. The Basie band was one of the star performers in John Hammond's From Spirituals to Swing concerts in 1937, bringing the band national recognition. The Basie band played extended engagements in such famous New York venues as the Apollo Theater, the Roseland Ballroom, the Savoy Ballroom, and the Famous Door Nightclub. After a brief first marriage, Basie wed Catherine Morgan on August 21, 1942, and they moved to Queens, New York. They had a daughter, Diane.

With its popular recordings and its national tours, the Basie band became one of the most popular in the nation. Nevertheless, the postwar period saw the decline of big band and swing jazz, and Basie disbanded his band, and for several years he performed in small combos. In 1952 Basie reformed his big band, which would perform continually for the rest of his life. The Basie band became internationally famous, and many preeminent musicians passed through its ranks. Basie suffered a heart attack in 1979 that slowed but did not stop his performing career. His wife died in 1983, and the following year Basie died of pancreatic cancer in Hollywood, Florida.

Count Basie at the piano. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The Music

Basie's characteristics as a musician were developed early in his life, and they remained remarkably consistent throughout his career. As a pianist, his style was noted for its spare, simple, understated technique. As a composer and bandleader, he was noted for blues-oriented, Kansas City-based rhythms, exemplifying an inimitable sense of swing.

Basie learned his piano style in New York City and his big band swing in Kansas City. In Harlem in the 1920's, Basie studied with the creators of the stride style, especially the inimitable Waller. The complexities of stride piano had evolved from ragtime music, and Basie further developed the technique in his own fashion. His piano playing was oriented toward accompaniment rather than soloing. Economical and light-fingered, his style emphasized only a few but absolutely critical notes.

In the Kansas City bands of Page and Moten, Basie learned the techniques of blues-inflected big band style. Jazz flourished in Kansas City in the 1920's in highly competitive jam and "cutting" sessions. Kansas City jazz was indebted to the new phrasing and rhythms pioneered by Louis Armstrong that had come to be called swing, and it added an infectious, fast-paced jumping meter originating in the rhythm section and echoing in the horns. That sound would be a trademark of the Count Basie Barons of Rhythm, formed from alumni of the Bennie Moten Band in 1935, and would continue through all the incarnations of the Count Basie bands. Characteristically, the Basie band based its music on "head" arrangements, in which the band would play a chorus of the main theme at the beginning and end of the song. The soloists would play extended improvisations, and the band sections would accompany with swinging riffs (repeated short, melodic variations of the head).

The first Basie band featured top-rate jazz musicians and vocalists, a trait that continued for all Basie bands. The rhythm section that provided the propulsive power of the Basie swing sound consisted of Jo Jones on drum, Freddie Greene on guitar, and Page on bass. Horn players included Herschel Evans and Lester Young on saxophone, Buster Smith and Earl Warren on alto saxophone, Buck Clayton and Harry "Sweets" Edison on trumpet, and Benny Morton and Dickie Wells on trombone. The extraordinary blues singer Jimmy Rushing was the vocalist, and Basie's piano provided contrapuntal accents for the soloists. The extraordinary quality of these musicians and the infectious "jumping" beat that Basie coaxed from them were noted by legendary jazz promoter John Hammond, who heard the Basie band on radio. Hammond arranged in the latter half of the 1930's for the Basie band to make its first recordings, for it to travel to New York to engage in a legendary January 16, 1938, swing showdown with the Chick Webb band, and for it to appear in the nationally known Carnegie Hall concerts From Spirituals to Swing.

"One o'Clock Jump." During this period the Basie band recorded such artistic gems as "Jumpin' at the Woodside," "Taxi War Dance," and "Lester Leaps In." The band's first national hit was Basie's composition, "One o'Clock Jump." The original July 7, 1937, recording featured a blues-oriented riff suggested by lead saxophonist Buster Smith, which was derived from Fats Waller's song "Six or Seven Times." Basie plays the opening riff, which is the head arrangement around which the soloists improvise, for eight bars followed by a two-chorus solo. Evans solos in the fourth chorus with his strong, large tone contrasting with the thinner trumpets and trombones. Young solos on the fifth chorus, his horizontal, lyrical, relaxed improvisation contrasting with that of Evans. Clayton provides an outstanding solo on the sixth chorus before Basie choruses in a restrained duet with bassist Page. "One o'Clock Jump," which would become the Basie band's theme song, perfectly illustrates the band's Kansas City swing style, with its alteration of creative solos and up-tempo ensemble riffs by the different sections of the band. The Basie band also recorded a live version of "One o'Clock Jump" at the From Spirituals to Swing concert of December 23, 1938.

The extraordinary quality of the Basie band continued in the 1940's, when such talented jazz musicians as saxophonists Don Byas, Buddy Tate, Illinois Jacquet, and Paul Gonzales played with the band, along with trumpeters Joe Newman and Emmett Berry and trombonist Vic Nickerson. Certainly the most influential of Basie musicians, however, was Young. (Acclaimed vocalist Billie Holiday sang with the Basie band only in the year 1937.) Young's light, airy, floating tenor saxophone sound is the typical cool sound in jazz; his influence on jazz saxophonists is exceeded only by that of Charlie Parker.

"Twelfth Street Rag." The classic "Twelfth Street Rag" was recorded by the Basie band on March 19, 1939. It exemplifies the flexibility with which Basie accompanied his musicians' solos as well as the opportunity his band provided a great musician such as Young to shine. The Basie band introduces the "Twelfth Street Rag" in an old-fashioned manner. However, the song is not arranged in a rag or in a stride format, which developed from ragtime, but in a classic four-beat Basie swing. Young and Edison solo, and Basie provides exquisite accompaniment, alternating between sharp treble chords over an ostinato bass and staccato patterns. Basie's solid support provides the perfect accompaniment for his stars to take extended improvisations. Here Young's imaginative solo exemplifies his linear, spacious style of saxophone play, which would have such a great influence on jazz.

The decline of big band swing forced Basie to disband his group in 1950 and to perform in smaller combos. Basie reformulated his big band in 1952, going on to new artistic and commercial success. The Basie band moved from an emphasis on the riff—the repetition of short, highly swinging phrases—for a newfound focus on precise ensemble playing, disciplined preparation, and arranged charts by such talented composers as Neal Hefti. Its best-known recordings include "April in Paris" (with multiple false endings), "Shiny Stockings," "L'il Darling," and "Corner Pocket." The tradition of great Basie vocalists continued with the versatile Helen Humes.

"Every Day I Have the Blues." Another talented Basie singer was Joe Williams, who, while not as profound a vocalist as Rushing or Holiday, was able to bring both a blues earthiness and a flexible, nimble styling. Williams's biggest hit with the Basie band was his March 17, 1955, recording of "Every Day I Have the Blues." Its commercial success brought an even wider audience to the reconstituted Basie band. Basie begins the song with a stride-like piano introduction, before the horns take over in a brassy Ernie Wilkins arrangement. Williams delivers a bold, brassy vocal of his own, bringing virtuosic blues inflections to key phrases of his lyric.

In the 1960's the Basie band had become a fixture of the international jazz scene. If no longer reaching the dazzling artistic heights of earlier years, the Basie band never lost the driving, beat-oriented sound that had made it famous. The Count Basie band appeared numerous times on television, and it recorded popular tunes in big band arrangements. Basie remained an inspiring bandleader, and his restrained, attenuated piano stylings remained as poignant and supportive as ever. Displaying his abilities as a piano soloist and as an accompanist, Basie made numerous well-received recordings with small groups and with famous jazz musicians and singers.

Musical Legacy

Basie left an outstanding legacy as both a pianist and a bandleader. The hallmark of both legacies is his simplicity, as Basie highlighted the essence of his music in a straightforward, rhythm-oriented manner. As a pianist, he was a minimalist, choosing the few notes that brought out the blues essence of his melodies and accentuated the excellent musicians he was accompanying. As a bandleader, he eschewed the complex orchestral arrangements increasingly popular in swing for the infectious, swinging rhythms of Kansas City, allowing for extended improvisations by band members. This blues-oriented style was organized around short, melodic patterns known as riffs, played by the lead or head, and rhythmically repeated by the band, often in a call-and-response format. Basie's talent for accommodating and developing great talent made his band a progenitor of great jazz musicians. Certainly, Young and Holiday stand out at the top of the list, but other jazz musicians and singers were nourished by Basie's generous playing and his managerial effectiveness.

Howard Bromberg

Further Reading

Basie, Count, and Albert Murray. Good Morning Blues: The Autobiography of Count Basie. New York: Da Capo Press, 2002. This oral history is based on conversations with Basie.

Dance, Stanley. The World of Count Basie. New York: Da Capo Press, 1985. This resource features chapters on Basie, his band members, and other contemporaries.

Gridley, Mark. Jazz Styles: History and Analysis. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 1994. Informative textbook with numerous examples of Basie's music to illustrate blues-oriented swing music and the use of riffs.

Orgill, Roxanne. Dream Lucky: When F.D.R. Was in the White House, Count Basie Was on the Radio, and Everyone Wore a Hat. New York: HarperCollins, 2008. This book recounts the years 1936 to 1938, focusing on Basie's move from Kansas City to New York.

Schuller, Gunther. The Swing Era: The Development of Jazz, 1930-1945. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991. An in-depth and analytical jazz history, this second volume of Schuller's comprehensive coverage of jazz offers extensive treatment of Basie.

Williams, Martin. Jazz Heritage. New York: Oxford University Press, 1985. Various chapters on jazz musicians by an insightful musical critic explore the extraordinary jazz developments in Kansas City in the 1920's and 1930's and the changing course of the Basie band in the 1950's.

See also: Barretto, Ray; Bennett, Tony; Carter, Benny; Davis, Sammy, Jr.; Ellington, Duke; Fitzgerald, Ella; Garner, Erroll; Getz, Stan; Gillespie, Dizzy; Goodman, Benny; Hampton, Lionel; Holiday, Billie; Jones, Hank; Jones, Quincy; Lee, Peggy; Lewis, John; Lucier, Alvin; Parker, Charlie; Peterson, Oscar; Reed, Jimmy; Sinatra, Frank; Tormé, Mel; Turner, Big Joe; Vaughan, Sarah; Waller, Fats; Wilson, Jackie; Young, Lester.

Amy Beach

American classical composer

Beach is credited with being the first American female to compose a symphony and a piano concerto and have her music performed by Boston's prestigious Handel and Haydn Society. Her music reflects the conservative European styles of the late Romantic era, the prevailing style in Boston at that time.

Born: September 5, 1867; Henniker, New Hampshire
Died: December 27, 1944; New York, New York

Principal works

CHAMBER WORKS: Sonata for Violin and Piano in A Minor, Op. 34, 1897.
CHORAL WORK: Mass in E-Flat, 1892.
OPERA (music): Cabildo, Op. 149, 1945 (libretto by Nan Bagby Stephens).
ORCHESTRAL WORKS: Symphony in E Minor, Op. 32, 1897 (Gaelic Symphony); The Canticle of the Sun, Op. 123, 1928.
PIANO WORKS: Piano Concerto in C-sharp Minor, 1900; Piano Quintet in F-sharp Minor, Op. 67, 1907; The Hermit Thrush at Eve, 1922; The Hermit Thrush at Morning, 1922; Piano Trio, Op. 150, 1939.

The Life

Amy Marcy Cheney was born into a musical family of some social status and as a youth took up the piano as a "socially acceptable" instrument for a young lady. She began playing the piano at age four and published her first musical composition at age thirteen: "The Rainy Day," a song based on Henry Wadsworth Longfellow's poem of the same name.

Her precocious talent propelled her through several concert appearances, including a debut with the Boston Symphony in 1885 at age eighteen, performing Frédéric Chopin's F Minor Concerto. In Victorian America, however, it was still a woman's role to be a wife, and so that year she married Dr. H. H. A. Beach, a respected Boston physician twenty-five years her senior. By most accounts this marriage was somewhat stifling to Beach, in part because her husband expected her to limit her public piano performances to one annual recital with proceeds given to charity, even though critics had been unanimous in praise for her pianism up to that point. She still managed to compose and perform in a curtailed manner until her husband died in 1910.

Her husband's curtailment of her active musical life can be seen both as a negative and a positive for Beach. While it temporarily stopped her public success as a pianist, it gave her more time to absorb the elements of compositional style and almost certainly enhanced her abilities as a composer, for which she is most remembered.

Following her husband's death, Beach scheduled a three-year tour of Europe as a performing pianist and returned to greater compositional activity as well, ultimately leaving behind a corpus of approximately three hundred compositions in the genres of song, solo piano pieces, sonatas, chamber music, symphony, choral music, and opera. Additionally, she became the first president of the Society of American Women Composers, and this role, combined with her compositional ability, established the almost heroic aura she held among women of her day. Beach retired in 1940 and died of heart disease in 1944.

The Music

Beach was largely self-taught, though in her youth she studied harmony for one year with composition teacher Junius W. Hill. Her musical education evolved in large part from her individual study of other composers' music and especially her translation of Hector Berlioz's Treatise on the Art of Orchestration (1843-1844). Social mores of her day dictated that she keep a lower profile and emphasize her role as a wife over music and career. It was a common belief at the end of the nineteenth century in New England that women made poor composers because they were too emotional and not cerebral enough. While Beach's music is emotive, it manifests great skill in structure, style and content, easily rising to or above that of her peers. Beach's first recognition as a composer may have come from her inclusion of several of her piano character pieces in adolescent recitals, but her Mass in E-Flat, performed by the Handel and Haydn Society of Boston in 1892, was her first unqualified success.

Amy Beach. (Library of Congress)

Gaelic Symphony. Beach began work on one of her most important instrumental works, her Symphony in E Minor, Op. 32—subtitled Gaelic Symphony because of its reliance on four Irish melodies as themes—in 1894 at age twenty-seven. She completed the work in 1896, when it received its premiere by the Boston Symphony, an orchestra with which she had had a long-standing affiliation. She embarked upon its composition in part as a response to a challenge issued by Antonìn Dvořák while he was in America from 1892 to 1895 that American composers turn to their folk music (by which he meant principally African American spirituals and slave music) as a source for their classical compositions, in much the same way that European composers from Modest Mussorgsky and Edvard Grieg to Bedřich Smetana and Dvořák himself used their national folk melodies as the basis for many of their important compositions.

Beach took the challenge in a broader light. The immigrant folk population in Boston was mostly Irish, and so she turned toward Irish melodies for inspiration. In so doing, she placed herself in a large historical group of American composers (including Stephen Foster) who relied to some extent upon Irish tunes—going back to 1808, when Thomas Moore published the first American collection of Irish melodies.

Beach described the Gaelic Symphony in loosely programmatic terms, indicating that it represented multiple facets of the lives and struggles of the Irish—"the laments of a primitive people, their romance and their dreams"—who in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries were one of the largest immigrant groups in America and, especially on the East Coast, one of the most oppressed. Irish folk tunes from an 1841 collection can be found in the first three movements of this symphony. The fourth movement's melodies, though Irish in style, are original. Of the melodies themselves, she wrote:

> Their simple, rugged and unpretentious beauty led me . . . to develop their ideas in symphonic form. Most of the themes are actual quotations from this collection of folk music, and those which are original I have tried to keep in the same idiom and spirit.

The second movement's theme is a particularly lovely and lilting Irish melody entitled "The Little Field of Barley." It is presented first in the oboe but later heard in a rhythmically diminished variant at a faster tempo in the strings as the central section of the ternary movement.

This symphony follows a four-movement design Beach frequently used to advantage and demonstrates in part her reliance on instrumental models of such earlier composers as Felix Mendelssohn, Robert Schumann, and Grieg. Her Violin Sonata, also in four movements and similar in style to the symphony, represents another excellent alternative to the earlier European composers' music. It is well crafted, melodious, technically challenging, and in every way a worthy composition.

Cabildo. As she matured as a composer, Beach's style changed subtly, adding chromaticism, modulations by thirds, and increased use of secondary dominants and modal harmonies. She retained her nationalist leanings throughout her career, however, quoting later from Inuit melodies for her String Quartet and Creole melodies for her one-act opera Cabildo. Some of her last pieces verge on atonality and explore the complete nonresolution of chords, particularly dominant sevenths. Such a move was bold for her, yet in the context of history, her music still seems more tied to older models when compared to the music of Franz Liszt, then later Arnold Schoenberg, Igor Stravinsky, Aaron Copland, and others who were her contemporaries.

Cabildo, on a libretto by Nan Bagby Stephens, concerns pirate Pierre Lafitte, who was imprisoned at the Cabildo in New Orleans and mysteriously escaped. Beach composed it in 1932, yet it was not performed until 1945. It was revived in 1995 by the "Great Performers at Lincoln Center" in New York. Ransom Wilson, who organized its revival, stated that the opera exhibited "the same vocal graciousness and solid word setting" that Beach brought to her individual songs and shows clear unity with the use of motifs "which are largely derived from Creole folk tunes."

Piano Works. Two piano pieces, The Hermit Thrush at Eve and The Hermit Thrush at Morning, deserve mention. These character pieces have a quasi-improvisational mood evoking a personal experience with nature at both ends of the day. The harmonic language is largely tonal, but modal inflections bring a post-Impressionist aura to moments within the pieces. One hears references to Edward MacDowell's Woodland Sketches (1896) and the harmonic language of Charles Tomlinson Griffes.

Musical Legacy

Beach's greatest legacy remains her songs, of which she composed more than a hundred. Her larger works, including the Gaelic Symphony, Piano Concerto in C-sharp Minor, and the Violin Sonata, are experiencing a modest revival. In the year 2000 her name was added to the granite wall of the Hatch Shell in Boston alongside those of Johann Sebastian Bach, Ludwig van Beethoven, Frédéric Chopin, and composers of similar musical stature. It remains the only female name on the wall.

Jonathan A. Sturm

Further Reading

Ammer, C. Unsung: A History of Women in American Music. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1980. Textbook devoted to women in music, in which Beach is featured.

Block, Adrienne Fried. Amy Beach, Passionate Victorian: The Life and Work of an American Composer, 1867-1944. Oxford, England: Oxford University Press, 1998. A leading authority on Beach presents a thorough biography.

Brown, Jeanell Wise. Amy Beach and Her Chamber Music: Biography, Documents. Style. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1994. Within the context of a biography, Beach's chamber music is analyzed theoretically and discussed historically.

Jenkins, Walter S. The Remarkable Mrs. Beach, American Composer: A Biographical Account Based on Her Diaries, Letters, Newspaper Clippings, and Personal Reminiscences. Edited by John H. Baron. Warren, Mich.: Harmonie Park Press, 1994. Portrait of Beach from the vantage point of another composer, which includes primary sources for Beach, especially relating to her time at the MacDowell Colony.

Jezic, Diane Peacock. Women Composers: The Lost Tradition Found. 2d ed. New York: The Feminist Press, 1994. From a feminist perspective on many female composers, including Beach.

See also: Copland, Aaron; Schoenberg, Arnold; Stravinsky, Igor.

Sidney Bechet

American jazz composer, clarinetist, and saxophonist

Bechet was a jazz soloist with an expressive but forceful style, and his interpretations of repertoire from blues to ragtime and jazz to Tin Pan Alley were valued as stylistic benchmarks.

Born: May 14, 1897; New Orleans, Louisiana
Died: May 14, 1959; Paris, France

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Port of Harlem Jazzmen, 1939; Bechet, Bunk, and Boston, 1945; Jazz Nocturne, Vol. 1, 1945; Jazz Nocturne, Vol. 2, 1945; Jazz Nocturne, Vol. 3, 1945; Jazz Nocturne, Vol. 4, 1945; Jazz Nocturne, Vol. 5, 1945; Jazz Nocturne, Vol. 6, 1945; Jazz Nocturne, Vol. 7, 1945; Jazz Nocturne, Vol. 8, 1945; Jazz Nocturne, Vol. 9, 1945; Jazz Nocturne, Vol. 10, 1945; Jazz Nocturne, Vol. 11, 1945; Jazz Nocturne, Vol. 12, 1945; Masters of Jazz, Vol. 4, 1945; Giants of Jazz, 1949; We Dig Dixieland, 1949; Sidney Bechet's Blue Note Jazzmen, 1950; Days Beyond Recall, 1951; The Fabulous Sidney Bechet and His Hot Six, 1951; His Way, 1951; Sidney Bechet, Vol. 1, 1951; Sidney Bechet, Vol. 2, 1951; Immortal Performances, 1952; New Orleans Style, Old and New, 1952; Sidney Bechet Solos, 1952; Sidney Bechet, 1952; Wally Bishop's Orchestra, 1952; Dixie by the Famous Sidney Bechet, 1953; Jazz at Storyville, 1953; New Orleans Feetwarmers, 1954; Jazz á la Creole, 1955; King of the Soprano Saxophone, 1955; La Nuit est une sorcière, 1955; Back to Memphis, 1956; Creole Reeds, 1956; Grand Master of the Soprano Sax and Clarinet, 1956; Sidney Bechet Duets, 1956; Sidney Bechet with Sammy Price's Bluesicians, 1956; When a Soprano Meets a Piano, 1957; Young Ideas, 1957; Sammy Price and Sidney Bechet in Paris, 1958; The Fabulous Sidney Bechet, 1958; Parisian Encounter, 1958; Sidney Bechet and Friends, 1972; Perdido Street Blues, 2002; Sidney Bechet et Claude Luter, 2007.

The Life

Sidney Bechet (beh-SHAY) was one of ten children born to Omar and Josephine Michel Bechet in New Orleans's Seventh Ward. As African American Creoles, the Bechets spoke French at home, and they had aspirations of social advancement, reflected in their love of music. Bechet's older brother Leonard was active as a trombonist, and he encouraged Bechet, who as a boy surreptitiously learned to play on Leonard's discarded clarinet.

After acquiring his own instrument, Bechet practiced diligently, although mostly without traditional instruction. Possessing a remarkable ear, he learned by listening to established clarinetists in the New Orleans idiom, such as Lorenzo Tio, Jr., and George Baquet. It was in the playing of Louis "Big Eye" Nelson, however, that Bechet found his inspiration. Nelson was also self-taught, and he played with a more bluesy, vocalized style than did other clarinetists. Bechet later recalled being influenced by music he heard during trips to the New Orleans Opera House and to the circus and from street bands.

Even as a youth, Bechet was considered influential. Clarinetists of his generation—such as Jimmie Noone, Albert Nicholas, and Barney Bigard—recalled being impressed with his development and paying attention to his style. At this time, Bechet began playing cornet, earning renown for his range and volume, although he shortly ceased playing the instrument. By the early 1910's, Bechet was playing in top-tier bands, and he was a fixture on the musical landscape of New Orleans. He also had developed a reputation for an explosive temper, hedonistic lifestyle, and disregard for authority.

Bechet began traveling in 1916, going first to Texas for a short tour. In 1917 he left home for good, going to Chicago to work with other New Orleans expatriates, including Joe Oliver and Freddie Keppard. By this time, New Orleans-style jazz had become tremendously popular across the country, largely because of the white Original Dixieland Jazz Band recordings and of the vaudeville tours by black groups such as the Creole Jazz Band. Bechet steadfastly refused to learn to read music, but his improvisational abilities were recognized, and he never wanted for work.

In June, 1919, Bechet was engaged by Will Marion Cook to go to England with his Southern Syncopated Orchestra. This large group, which played little jazz, was more along the lines of a pops orchestra. Following the breakup of the group in 1920, Bechet performed with a small band called the Jazz Kings. It was during this period that he bought his first soprano saxophone, although in New Orleans he had apparently experimented with a C-melody saxophone owned by a friend. Other than a short trip to Paris in 1921, Bechet remained in London until he was convicted of assault in November, 1922, and he was deported back to New York.

Once in New York, Bechet was almost immediately engaged to play and to act in a black stage show called How Come?, with which he toured until April, 1923. Several other shows followed, suggesting Bechet was valued for his acting as well as his musical abilities. It was during this time that he began making recordings, mostly produced by New Orleans pianist Clarence Williams.

In September, 1925, Bechet sailed for Paris with the Revue Negre, and later he went to Russia, where he remained until May, 1926. Following this was an extended period of travel around Europe as a soloist. In Paris, Bechet again ran afoul of the law, and he was jailed after a gun battle in December, 1928. He stayed in prison for a year, moving to Berlin in December, 1929, to play and to appear in several films.

By the end of 1930, Bechet was back in New York, featured with Noble Sissle and His Orchestra. Sissle used him as a soloist on clarinet and soprano saxophone and as a member of the rhythm section, playing bass saxophone. In early 1932, Bechet decided to strike out on his own, and he played numerous freelance jobs throughout the New York area, including several weeks featured with Duke Ellington, before forming a sextet with former Sissle trumpeter Tommy Ladnier. Calling themselves the New Orleans Feetwarmers, they played for a few months and made several recordings before the lack of work and the realization that their New Orleans-styled music was out of fashion compelled them to disband. For an unsuccessful period the two ran a tailoring establishment, but Bechet returned to Sissle's band in May, 1934.

Bechet remained with Sissle until October, 1938, before deciding to become a leader himself. After a series of short engagements, he freelanced on numerous recordings, and he performed at various establishments in the New York and the Philadelphia area for the rest of the decade.

The 1940's represented more freelancing around New York, but often Bechet was called on to be a guest soloist with other bands. Bandleader Eddie Condon thought highly of him, using him frequently on his radio and early television broadcasts. Bechet was also a regular visitor to jazz clubs in both Philadelphia and Boston, and his efforts are well preserved by location recordings.

By the late 1940's, Bechet was looking beyond New York. In November, 1947, he began a long engagement as featured artist at Jazz Ltd. in Chicago, extending with some interruptions through January, 1949. He made a brief trip to Paris that May, and he resolved to return permanently. In this last phase of his career, Bechet found almost universal adulation among European jazz fans. Except for a few short visits to America in 1950 and 1951, he remained in Europe until his death, playing and recording as often as he wished.

Bechet's musical influence is his recorded legacy, which began in the 1920's. These early works announced his abilities to the public, and they served as influences for many musicians who were not able to hear him in person. While he had some success composing songs such as "Ghost of the Blues" and "Pleasure Mad," it was the application of his improvisational abilities to popular tunes of the day, blues, and jazz standards that gained him attention. The same was true in the 1930's and 1940's when he recorded frequently under his own name and as a sideman with various leaders. Although he recorded compositions of his own, such as "When the Sun Sets Down South" and "Blackstick" (and occasionally took credit for work composed by others), it was in his recordings for Blue Note (of Dixieland repertoire) and for Victor (of jazz tunes) from the 1920's that he became known.

After Bechet repatriated to France, he began featuring his own compositions more. Works such as "Les Oignons" and "Si tu vois ma mere" are tributes to the jazz style of his early years. During this time Bechet also experimented with composing longer forms. La Colline du Delta was a rhapsody for soprano sax and orchestra left incomplete at his death, and La Nuit est une sorcière was a ballet score that Bechet recorded featuring himself.

The Music

"Wild Cat Blues." Bechet's first appearance on record was "Wild Cat Blues," on Clarence Williams's Blue Five. From the first note, Bechet's passionate soprano dominates the record, pushing the cornet and the trombone into the background. While not containing any formal solo passages, this recording features numerous two-bar breaks, which Bechet carries off with a rhythmic security and flair for the dramatic usually associated with Louis Armstrong on his later pieces, such as "Cornet Chop Suey." This recording was made exactly one year before Armstrong appeared in New York to nationalize his reputation playing with Fletcher Henderson and His Orchestra.

"Maple Leaf Rag." "Maple Leaf Rag" probably began as a reminder of the repertoire Bechet had played in New Orleans in his youth. Eventually, it became an expression of his volcanic power with his soprano, again overwhelming the other members of the front line. Except for a short piano solo, the performance is driven by Bechet, culminating in a long, pulsating high note over an ensemble riff.

"Characteristic Blues." Of the many recordings Bechet made during his time with Sissle, "Characteristic Blues" is the closest example of straight-ahead jazz. Accompanied by only the rhythm section, Bechet (on clarinet) produces a passionate blues statement. Beginning at a languid tempo, the performance ends with Bechet quoting from the traditional "High Society" clarinet solo as the arrangement moves into double-time for the final chorus.

"Summertime." Although not released under his name, "Summertime" is one of Bechet's most famous recordings. The George Gershwin tune had previously been recorded by others, but here it found its definitive version. Bechet had been playing the number for some time, evolving a series of soprano variations that he featured for the rest of his life. His approach is both melodic and harmonic, the latter suggesting what Coleman Hawkins supposedly pioneered with his record of "Body and Soul" of nine months later. "Summertime" also marks the beginning of his association with Blue Note, which would continue for the next fourteen years.

"Egyptian Fantasy." Although credited to Bechet, this number was in fact "Egyptia," an Abe Olman tune featured by the Creole Jazz Band as early as 1914. Well adapted to Bechet's affection for exotic themes, "Egyptian Fantasy" features his low-register clarinet at its most atmospheric. This recording is representative of the higher degree of organization generally to be found on his Victor series, which ran concurrently with his Blue Note output in 1940 and 1941.

Musical Legacy

Swiss conductor Ernest Ansermet, who heard Bechet with the Southern Syncopated Orchestra in 1919, called him a "clarinet virtuoso" who "composed perfectly formed blues on the clarinet." It was through the blues that Bechet initially came to music, although his natural lyricism marked him as a melodist first and foremost. Numerous strands of influence combined within him to create, with Armstrong, the first prototype of the jazz soloist. During the 1920's, Bechet's influence on musicians was largely confined to New York. While he undoubtedly had his admirers in Europe, his circle there was limited, and so were his opportunities to play jazz. His American recordings and personal appearances advanced his fame, and so did his personal reputation. Ellington was generous in praising Bechet for helping to develop the "jungle" style of his early band, with which he played briefly in 1925. It was perhaps only his combative nature and his lack of reading ability (a key to playing popular music at the time) that kept Bechet's influence from being as pervasive as that of Armstrong.

Nevertheless, Bechet maintained a remarkable degree of consistency over the course of his career. He never ceased trying new techniques, new instruments, new repertoire, and new musical associates. His voice on clarinet and especially soprano saxophone was intensely personal, demonstrating a highly vocalized tone with a completely individual concept of sound and vibrato. Bechet's playing was imitated by scores of musicians, though his originality was not easily reproduced.

John L. Clark, Jr.

Further Reading

Bechet, Sidney. Treat It Gentle: Sidney Bechet, an Autobiography. New York: Da Capo Press, 1978. While this is a highly entertaining and anecdotal account of his life, this book is also self-serving and somewhat unreliable on dates and chronology.

Chilton, John. Sidney Bechet: The Wizard of Jazz. New York: Oxford University Press, 1987. This source is meticulously researched and presented. The early chapters are the most important contribution, while the post-1930's sections are overly dependent on recordings.

Lyttleton, Humphrey. The Best of Jazz: Basin Street to Harlem. New York: Penguin Books, 1980. The chapter devoted to Bechet is restricted to the 1920's, but it is valuable for its perspective from another performing jazz musician.

Williams, Martin. Jazz Masters of New Orleans. New York: Da Capo Press, 1979. The chapter on Bechet is a thorough examination of his career, with six pages being a transcribed interview with his student, Bob Wilber.

See also: Armstrong, Louis; Ellington, Duke; Gershwin, George; Hawkins, Coleman; Henderson, Fletcher; Hunter, Alberta; Kirk, Rahsaan Roland.

Beck

American rock singer, guitarist, and songwriter

Using influences from blues, hip-hop, country, and funk, Beck coupled his music with clever and witty lyrics to create a unique alternative rock sound.

Born: July 8, 1970; Los Angeles, California

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Mellow Gold, 1994; One Foot in the Grave, 1994; Stereopathetic Soul Manure, 1994; A Western Harvest Field by Moonlight, 1995; Odelay, 1996; Deadweight, 1998; Mutations, 1998; Midnite Vultures, 1999; Maximum Beck, 2000; Steve Threw Up, 2001; Sea Change, 2002; Guero, 2005; Guerolito, 2005; Remix EP #1, 2005; Venom Confection, 2005; The Information, 2006; Timebomb, 2007.

The Life

Beck Hansen was born to David Campbell and Bibbe Hansen, who were living in downtown Los Angeles, where Campbell worked as a bluegrass street musician. His mother, once associated with Andy Warhol's Factory in New York, worked in an office. The family moved to a declining neighborhood in Hollywood, and thereafter Beck spent his childhood and adolescence staying with different members of his extended family. He spent time with his paternal grandparents in Kansas; he visited his maternal grandfather Al Hansen, an artist who lived in Europe; and, after his parents separated, he lived in a Salvadoran neighborhood in the Los Angeles area. Beck dropped out of school, which was located in an unsavory area, in ninth grade to work as a busker, playing music for money on the streets. At age eighteen he took a bus trip from Los Angeles to New York, where he participated in the antifolk movement on the Lower East Side. A year later, tired of being cold and having no place to live, he moved back to Los Angeles. There he worked in a video store and played regularly in local punk dives.

In 1994 his song "Loser," released by Bong Load Custom Records, became an immediate success, making the Top 40 and getting continuous play on MTV. Two years later he experienced even greater success with the album Odelay, earning three Grammy nominations and winning two Grammy Awards. In 2004 he married Marissa Ribisi, and they had a son, Cosimo Henri. He and his wife became members of the Church of Scientology.

The Music

The places Beck spent his childhood influenced his music: Kansas, where he heard down-home church hymns; Los Angeles, where he experienced the 1980's punk culture; and Germany, where he was exposed to the artistic philosophy of his grandfather, Al Hansen, a member of the avant-garde Fluxus art movement. Often mislabeled as a spokesperson for the so-called slacker generation of the 1990's, Beck claimed he never had time to sit around and complain about being miserable. Instead, he produced music that was positive and life-affirming. Taking to heart the philosophy of his grandfather, who often created art out of disposable objects, Beck transformed musical ideas and styles of the past into something entirely new.

Early Works. At an early age, Beck was impressed by the blues music of Mississippi John Hurt, and Beck taught himself how to play Hurt's songs on an acoustic guitar he had found. Once he had mastered the music, he improvised lyrics and forced himself to perform on city buses in order to overcome the shyness he felt playing in public. After returning to Los Angeles from New York, Beck's talent was noticed by Tom Rothrock of Bong Load Custom Records. Rothrock saw potential in Beck as a recording artist and put him in touch with hip-hop producer Karl Stephenson. In Stephenson's living room one afternoon, Beck improvised "Loser," with a looped slide-guitar riff over a hip-hop beat and rap lyrics in the style of Public Enemy that made fun of Beck's poor rapping skills. Bong Load Custom Records released only five hundred copies of "Loser," but soon radio stations everywhere were playing it. Although Beck was unhappy with the way people misinterpreted the song as a "slacker anthem," its success led to major record labels bidding for his services. He chose to work with David Geffen's DGC label, which gave him an unusual contract that allowed him to produce other records on independent labels. He made Mellow Gold for DGC Records in 1994, shortly followed by One Foot in the Grave and Stereopathic Soul Manure on independent labels.

Odelay. Beck's second release for DGC was produced in 1996 by the Dust Brothers. Making the Billboard Top 200, where it peaked at number sixteen, the album went platinum, selling a million units. Videos for its songs "Where It's At," "Devil's Haircut," and "The New Pollution" were staples on MTV's playlist. A fusion of hip-hop, rock, country-western, blues, reggae, punk, funk, and polka, the album had a remarkable continuity despite its many styles. Beck earned two Grammy Awards for this album: Best Alternative Music Performance and Best Male Vocal Performance for "Where It's At." Rolling Stone named Odelay its 1996 Album of the Year, and Beck was Spin magazine's Artist of the Year.

Guero. Released in March of 2005 by DGC Records and produced by the Dust Brothers, this album incorporates Brazilian pop influences and a healthy dose of the multiple styles featured on Odelay. Beck used new keyboard and percussion instruments that he would add to his regular repertoire. Noteworthy on this album is a forehead-slap solo by actress Christina Ricci on the song "Hell Yes." The album title refers to a Mexican slang term that Beck was called in his childhood, and it means a pale-skinned person, usually a white American. The album track "Qué Onda Guero" translates as "What's up, blond boy?"

Musical Legacy

Beck's genius lies in taking traditional music styles and melding them into something fresh. Seeking to perform for the pleasure of his audience rather than for self-glorification, he won the appreciation of lovers of all musical styles. His albums reflected a constant search for new ways to be creative.

Beck. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Staci A. Spring

Further Reading

Beck, and Al Hansen. Beck and Al Hansen: Playing with Matches. Santa Monica, Calif.: Smart Art Press, 1998. A look at the personal and professional relationship between Beck and his grandfather, showing the influence of Hansen's artistic philosophy on Beck's music and artwork.

Jovanovic, Rob. Beck! On a Backwards River: The Story of Beck. London: Virgin, 2000. Full-length biography recounts Beck's early life and dedicates a chapter to each of the four major-label albums released up to the date of publication.

Kemp, Mark. "Beck." Rolling Stone, April 17, 1997, 58. Insightful interview with Beck after the success of his album Odelay. Includes comments on his professional history, family, lyrics, influences, and musical style.

Martell, Nevin. Beck: The Art of Mutation. New York: Pocket Books, 2001. This comprehensive portrait explores Beck's childhood, musical history, performances, and recording sessions. Includes complete discography, with listings of rare collaborations and appearances.

Palacios, Julian. Beck: Beautiful Monstrosity. London: Boxtree, 2000. In-depth look at Beck's music and his extraordinary life.

See also: Hurt, Mississippi John; Mitchell, Joni.

Jeff Beck

English rock guitarist and songwriter

Influenced by the sonic experimentations of guitarist Les Paul, Beck is noted for his use of distortion and controlled feedback, presaging the sounds of psychedelic rock and fusion.

Born: June 24, 1944; Wallington, Surrey, England
Member of: The Yardbirds; the Deltones

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): Truth, 1968; Beck-Ola, 1969; Rough and Ready, 1971; Jeff Beck Group, 1972; Shapes of Things, 1972; Beck, Bogert, and Appice, 1973; Blow by Blow, 1975; Wired, 1976; There and Back, 1980; Flash, 1985; Jeff Beck's Guitar Shop, 1989; Frankie's House, 1992; Crazy Legs, 1993; Up, 1995; Who Else!, 1999; You Had It Coming, 2001; Jeff, 2003.

ALBUMS (with the Yardbirds): For Your Love, 1965; Having a Rave Up, 1965; Roger the Engineer, 1966; Over Under Sideways Down, 1966; Blow-Up, 1967; Little Games, 1967; Birdland, 2003; Little Games, 2003.

The Life

Jeff Beck began learning piano at age eight, and he later studied violin and cello before discovering rock and roll. At thirteen, he built his first electric guitar; at fifteen, he joined his first band, the Deltones. Beck was influenced by rock-and-roll guitarists of the late 1950's, and he discovered the blues in 1962 after listening to recordings by Chicago bluesmen Otis Rush and Buddy Guy.

Beck briefly attended Wimbledon Art College before turning his attention full time to music. He was a sideman for Screaming Lord Sutch before joining the Tridents in 1963. While with the Tridents, Beck began to experiment with distortion and feedback. He joined the Yardbirds in 1965, replacing Eric Clapton as lead guitarist. Beck continued his sonic experiments with the Yardbirds and remained with that group until December, 1966.

Continuing Beck's quest for a new sound, the Jeff Beck Group was formed in 1967 with singer Rod Stewart and bassist Ronnie Wood. The group released two albums before Stewart and Wood left to join Faces. Beck reorganized the group in the early 1970's, and it released two albums before Beck dissolved that collaboration. In the process of forming a power trio with ex-Vanilla Fudge rhythm section Tim Bogert (bass) and Carmine Appice (drums), Beck was injured in a car accident that stalled his career for eighteen months. When he recovered, the trio released only one album, Beck, Bogert, and Appice (1973).

Drawn to the sounds of jazz fusion, Beck released the critically acclaimed albums Blow by Blow and Wired. His work with keyboardist Jan Hammer led to more experimentation with electronics. A fairly reclusive individual, Beck took lengthy sabbaticals throughout his career, releasing albums sporadically.

The Music

Beck's guitar style, while inspired by sonic experimentation with distortion and feedback, was not dependent on electronic devices. Instead, Beck preferred to work with the natural physics of the electric guitar. He plucked the strings with his fingers and nails and produced a variety of sounds on his Stratocaster. Along with the Stratocaster, Beck frequently played a Fender Telecaster and a Gibson Les Paul. He used the volume and tone control knobs to shape his notes and employed the vibrato (whammy) bar for extensive string bends. He was also one of the first to experiment with two-handed fretting, or tapping technique.

Early Influences. When first introduced to rock and roll, Beck was influenced by guitarists Hank Marvin of the Shadows; Cliff Gallup, the lead guitarist for Gene Vincent; and James Burton, lead guitarist for Ricky Nelson. Discovering the blues in the early 1960's, Beck was impressed by the guitar work of Chicago bluesmen Guy and Rush. He was also familiar with the overdubbing effects used by Paul. His exposure to Paul's sonic experiments led Beck, while a member of the Tridents, to try his hand at distortion and feedback. When he moved to the Yardbirds, he continued his experiments and defined what is perhaps the most successful period of the Yardbirds' career. Beck's use of fuzz tone, controlled feedback, the whammy bar, and other distortion devices can be heard on the songs "Heart Full of Soul" and "Shapes of Things" (later reworked in 1967 with a heavy psychedelic sound by the first Jeff Beck Group). For a brief time, the Yardbirds enjoyed a lead guitar duo: Beck and Jimmy Page (originally hired as bass player). Only two recordings with both guitarists were released: "Happenings Ten Years' Time Ago" and "Psycho Daisies."

Blow by Blow and Wired. After the breakup of the second Jeff Beck Group, Beck worked for a brief time in the early 1970's as a session guitarist for Stevie Wonder. Already inspired by the rhythmic quality of Bo Diddley's music, Beck found that his work with Wonder clarified the importance of a strong rhythmic groove for the guitarist. Particularly influential was the rhythm groove on "Superstition," a song originally composed for Beck and recorded with Bogert and Appice. In 1975, with the release of Blow by Blow, Beck began to fuse the sound of hard rock with the freedom of jazz improvisation. With this album and its follow-up, Wired, Beck opened the door for such rock instrumentalists as Steve Vai and Joe Satriani. Wired featured a solid approach to jazz, especially with the covers of jazz bassist Charles Mingus's "Goodbye Pork Pie Hat" and Narada Michael Walden's "Love Is Green." Beck's interest in electronics was enhanced by his collaboration with Hammer on these two albums and on Live with the Jan Hammer Group (1977).

Later Works. Following a brief hiatus, Beck returned to music in 1980 with the release of There and Back. This was followed by another hiatus, which Beck broke with the release of Flash. After another period of inactivity in the later 1980's, Beck released Jeff Beck's Guitar Shop. In the 1990's Beck recorded in the studio and composed sound-track music. He created the sound track for BBC Television's film Frankie's House (1992) and performed on several sound tracks. He guested as a session guitarist for numerous performers. He released the solo albums Crazy Legs, Jeff Beck Session Works, Who Else!, You Had It Coming, and Jeff.

Musical Legacy

Beck influenced guitarists, particularly instrumental-oriented soloists, with his forays into jazz fusion. With the Yardbirds, Beck introduced several novel sounds to rock, including fuzz distortion and overdriving amplifiers, and he employed such devices as the wah-wah pedal and guitar knobs to control feedback. He earned Grammy Awards for Best Rock Instrumental for the songs "Escape" from Flash and "Dirty Mind" from You Had It Coming and Best Rock Instrumental for the album Jeff Beck's Guitar Shop. He was awarded Guitar Player magazine's Lifetime Achievement Award in 1995 and was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 1992 as a member of the Yardbirds.

Stephen Valdez

Further Reading

Carson, Annette. Jeff Beck: Crazy Fingers. San Francisco: Backbeat Books, 2001. Although unauthorized, this biography is thoroughly researched and readable.

Clifford, Mike, ed. The Harmony Illustrated Encyclopedia of Rock. New York: Harmony Books, 1992. A brief entry on Beck contains a discography from the first Jeff Beck Group through 1989's Jeff Beck's Guitar Shop.

DeCurtis, Anthony, and James Henke with Holly George-Warren. The Rolling Stone Illustrated History of Rock and Roll. New York: Random House, 1992. Several articles mention Beck's career.

Hedges, Dan. British Rock Guitar. New York: Guitar Player Books, 1977. This book contains coverage of Beck drawn from articles previously published in Guitar Player magazine.

See also: Clapton, Eric; Diddley, Bo; Dixon, Willie; Eddy, Duane; Guy, Buddy; Howlin' Wolf; Mingus, Charles; Page, Jimmy; Paul, Les; Plant, Robert; Rush, Otis; Sibelius, Jean; Stewart, Rod; Sting; Van Halen, Eddie; Vaughan, Stevie Ray; Vincent, Gene.

Sir Thomas Beecham

English classical conductor and arranger

A leading conductor of classical music in Britain, Beecham promoted English composers within the classical repertoire.

Born: April 29, 1879; St. Helens, England
Died: March 8, 1961; London, England

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Atterberg: Symphony No. 6, 1928; Mozart: Symphony No. 34, 1928; Gounod's Faust, 1929; Chabrier's España, 1932; Mozart: Symphony No. 31 in D Major, 1939; Handel: The Faithful Shepherd Suite, 1943; Famous Overtures, 1946; Handel: Messiah, 1947; Handel: The Gods Go A-Begging, 1947; Sibelius: Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Op. 43, 1947; Sibelius: Symphony No. 6 in D Minor, Op. 104, 1947; Sibelius: Tapiola, Op. 112, 1947; Strauss: Ein Heldenleben, 1947; Sir Thomas Beecham Conducts Music from the Eighteenth Century, 1948; Delius: Brigg Fair: An English Rhapsody, 1948; Handel: The Great Elopement, 1951; Royal Festival Hall Concert, 1959; Handel: Love in Bath, 1961; Handel: Solomon, 1969; Sir Thomas Beecham Conducts Rossini, 1979; Beecham Plays Strauss, 1980; Sir Thomas Beecham Conducts Classical Symphonies, 1981; Thomas Beecham and the London Philharmonic Orchestra, 1996; Beecham Conducts, 1997; Beecham Conducts Sibelius, 1998; Sibelius: Symphony No. 4; Pelléas et Mélisande; Tapiola, Swanwhite; Symphony No. 7, 2000.

WRITINGS OF INTEREST: A Mingled Chime, 1943 (autobiography); Frederick Delius, 1959.

The Life

Thomas Beecham (BEE-chuhm) came from a family that prized music as an avocation but did not practice it professionally. His father, Sir Joseph Beecham, a chemist and pill manufacturer, was made a baronet by Queen Victoria. Beecham grew up in Huyton, near Liverpool, but at the age of thirteen, he was sent to the newly founded Rossall School in Lancashire, a rigorous but experimental school that pioneered a modern approach to education. Beecham then attended Wadham College of the University of Oxford, from which he withdrew after a year to study music in Paris. Beecham studied music composition in England, with Irish composer Charles Wood, and in France, with exiled Polish-Jewish pianist Moritz Moszkowski. This combination of insular and Continental influences was a hallmark of Beecham's versatile and inclusive approach to the repertoire. Although Beecham had no formal training as a conductor, he founded his own symphony orchestra, named after himself, in 1909. He recruited young instrumentalists and used his verve and business acumen to put the fledgling orchestra on the musical map. He also became interested in conducting opera and ballet, performing frequently at Covent Garden in London as a prelude to founding his own opera company in 1915. This eventually became the British National Opera Company.

In 1903 Beecham married an American woman, Utica Wells; they had two children. In 1911 Beecham separated from his wife. When she refused to grant him a divorce, he had a widely publicized relationship with the noted socialite Maud Alice (Emerald) Cunard, and this brought him in touch with much of the British avant-garde and intelligentsia. As his children matured, Beecham was limited financially because his father, for reasons of spite, had cut off the flow of family money. His own idiosyncratic taste, which put his preferences ahead of the ticket-buying public's, rendered his musical ventures often short of cash.

In 1916, at the height of the carnage of World War I, he was knighted by King George V, becoming Sir Thomas. Ironically, he would have become that anyway later that year when his father died, bequeathing to Beecham the baronetcy (in which, unlike a knighthood, the title of Sir can be inherited). Beecham was particularly noted for his busy schedule during the war years, and he declined fees for many appearances. In the 1920's he became known as the man who brought serious music to England's provinces, especially the British industrial city of Manchester, for whose Hallé Orchestra he had made one of his first appearances. A cultured man who took the arts seriously, Beecham made it his mission to bring the best of classical music to the ordinary middle- and working-class Englishman, establishing him as a well-known and popular figure among a broad audience. Despite this fame and the considerable estate left to him by his wealthy father, Beecham faced fiscal problems, as his multiple commitments often left his financial affairs in a confusing tangle.

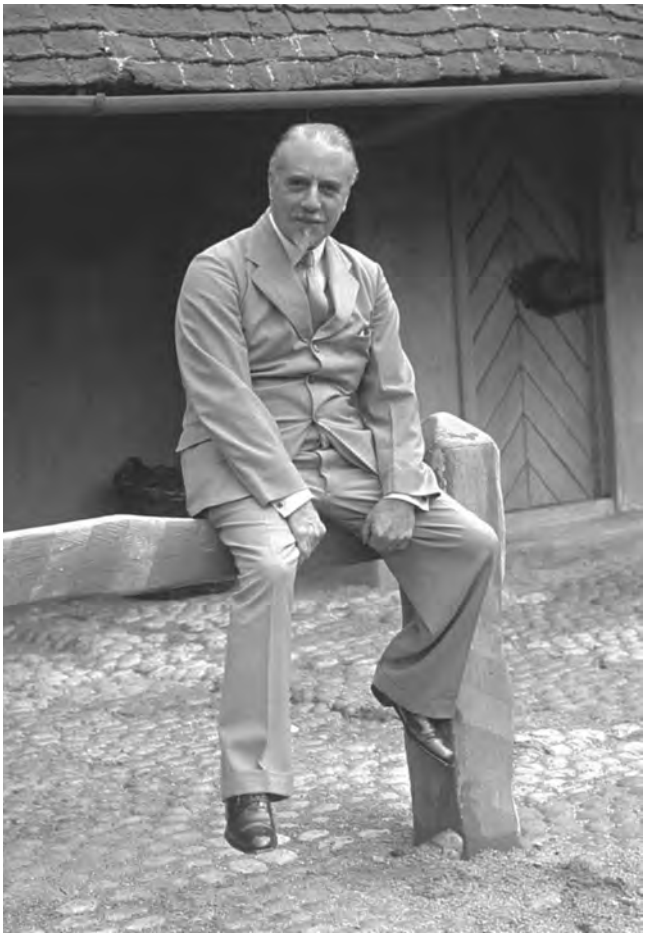
In the 1930's Beecham's interests once again focused on symphonic music. With funding from the prominent Courtauld family, he founded the London Philharmonic Orchestra in 1932 and returned to Covent Garden as principal opera conductor. Controversially, Beecham toured Nazi Germany in 1936, during which he played the works of the anti-Semitic opera composer Richard Wagner (to whose works Beecham became increasingly dedicated in the 1930's) while complying with a Nazi request not to play the Jewish German composer Felix Mendelssohn. However, after meeting Adolf Hitler, Beecham was repelled. His detestation of the Nazi leader nullified any attempt to use his visit as propaganda. The onset of war in 1939 and the heavy German bombing of England that started a year later hindered most London cultural institutions, so Beecham spent most of World War II in the United States, conducting the Metropolitan Opera in New York and spending time in Seattle, and even crossed the Pacific to Australia. He was not much criticized for choosing to leave England to pursue his career elsewhere during the war; indeed, his service in New York as a cultural ambassador, undertaken before the United States and Britain were allied in the war, was perceived as an important advertisement for Britain's cause in the war within the American cultural sphere. During these years Beecham's wife, Utica, finally agreed to divorce him. In 1943 he married the concert pianist Betty Thomas, who was born in 1900.



Sir Thomas Beecham. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Beecham's energy was still undiminished in his sixties, and upon returning to London Beecham undertook the task of founding a new orchestra, the Royal Philharmonic. His relations with the London Philharmonic had cooled in his absence, during which the personnel had experienced more artistic independence and were then intolerant of Beecham's martinet-style management. In 1957 Queen Elizabeth II made him a Companion of Honour. Beecham made one last ambitious tour in 1958, conducting operas at the Teatro Colón in Buenos Aires, Argentina. That same year Betty died, and Beecham married his secretary, Shirley Hudson, the following year. He visited the United States and Canada the last time in 1959. Beecham was able to experience many tributes accorded him on his eightieth birthday before dying in 1961.

The Music

Beecham did not see music as merely a technical or virtuoso exercise—it was simply a part of culture. He lectured on music, making many public appearances that increased the visibility of classical music, and he championed such British composers as Charles Villiers Stanford, Ethel Smyth (a rare instance of a woman composer being widely performed in this era), Joseph Holbrooke, and especially Frederick Delius. As impresario and entrepreneur, Bee-cham was a pivotal figure in English culture whose erudition and high standards brought the grandeur of the nineteenth century in touch with the rigor and complexity of the twentieth.

Frederick Delius. Delius's lush, chromatic work depends crucially on tempo for its effects, and Beecham delighted in his interpretive role as its conductor. In the second movement of Delius's 1887 Florida Suite, "By the River," for example. Beecham used a persistent set of beats, about a second apart, to establish the natural and folk-culture milieu of the piece, and then accelerated the rhythm, leading to a thunderous clash of joy and release. Strongly programmatic, Delius's music depicted a specific scene or historical setting, and Beecham excelled at using it to paint pictures for the audience, achieving, more simplistically, the sort of total artistic effect aimed for by Wagnerian opera.

Beecham and Delius became close friends, both rooted in the north of England (Delius was from Yorkshire) but cosmopolitan with significant Continental influences and (unusually for cultured Englishmen of their generation save Winston Churchill) a great love of the United States. Beecham was far more sociable and business-minded than Delius and found surer footing in the salons of metropolitan London. It could be argued, however, that Delius's friendship strengthened Beecham's intellectual side. Delius influenced Beecham to read the works of Friedrich Nietzsche (whose Also Sprach Zarathustra provided the text for Delius's 1905 A Mass of Life).

Other Composers. Beecham's empathetic advocacy was not restricted to Delius. Such Continental composers as Mendelssohn and Camille Saint-Saëns were among his favorites, and he argued for the importance of less conspicuous French composers such as Vincent d'Indy, Emmanuel Chabrier, and André Gretry. Beecham also put effort into performing works by more renowned composers such as Ludwig van Beethoven, though his interpretations of Beethoven did not meet with universal praise. This was also true of his performances, castigated as too enthusiastic, of Finnish composer Jean Sibelius. More lauded were his performances of Hector Berlioz, whose Romanticism and intelligence found their perfect expositor in Beecham. Beecham was famed as a conductor of Mozart operas and tried also to give the French opera tradition, as exemplified by comparative unknown Étienne Méhul, a beachhead among a generally unreceptive English audience.

An opera and ballet as well as a symphonic conductor, Beecham promoted a pioneering composer not necessarily associated with conventional ideas—Richard Strauss, whose major operas all received their British premieres under Beecham's direction. He also conducted the first British appearance of Serge Diaghilev's Ballets Russes, an important moment in legitimating modern approaches to the arts in the United Kingdom. He also sponsored the first British appearance of the Russian opera singer Feodor Chaliapin, one of the most iconic musical figures of the early twentieth century.

Beecham's musical tastes, however, were not ecumenical. He paid little or no attention to such giants as Igor Stravinsky, Arnold Schoenberg, and Béla Bartók, and Baroque music was not accorded much of his attention.

Conductor and Writer. Part of Beecham's success as a conductor lay in winning the loyalty, admiration, and, most of all, involvement of his musicians. His often capricious temperament was exacting, but Beecham's musicians found him challenging and provocative and worthy of their effort. This is all the more compelling given that Beecham's outsize ego—in many ways emblematic of nineteenth century musical tradition—had the potential to alienate people.

Beecham linked music to the other arts, especially literature, one of his great interests. He was more than just a student of literature; he was an author as well, although his memoir is not as colorful as his legendary hilarious aphorisms.

Musical Legacy

Beecham was so active and mercurial a force on the musical scene that inevitably his influence would fade with his death. His recordings are still listened to today, and his reintroduction of British music into the standard classical repertoire has had a permanent impact. Sir Thomas Beecham societies in the United States and the United Kingdom still pay tribute to and study the great conductor's achievements.

Nicholas Birns

Further Reading

Beecham, Sir Thomas. A Mingled Chime. New York: G. P. Putnam, 1943. Lacking the sparkle of his treasured aphorisms, Beecham's memoir is nonetheless a skillfully written and informative account of most of his career. Especially useful in establishing the contours of Beecham's musical tastes.

Cairns, David. "Sir Thomas Beecham: A Lifetime—and a Fortune—Devoted to Music." Gramophone, the Classical Music Magazine 78 (May, 2001): 8-11. Compact but informative overview of Beecham's career as a conductor and a philanthropist.

Fenby, Eric. Delius as I Knew Him. London: G. Bell and Sons, 1936. Memoir of Delius by his young amanuensis gives key details of the Beecham friendship.

Jefferson, Alan. Sir Thomas Beecham: A Centenary Tribute. London: Macdonald's and Jane, 1979. Full survey of Beecham's career, including copious illustrations and photographs.

Melior, David. "A Healthy Dose of Beecham." The Mail on Sunday, April 29, 2001, p. 75. A look at Beecham's contributions to musical culture.

Reid, Charles. Thomas Beecham: An Independent Biography. London: Gollancz, 1961. Published the year of his death, an objective and comprehensive study of Beecham.

See also: Björling, Jussi; Melchior, Lauritz; Schoenberg, Arnold; Strauss, Richard; Stravinsky, Igor.

Bix Beiderbecke

American jazz cornetist

Beiderbecke forged his own legend as an early and influential white jazz musician of the 1920's. His symphonic tone and melodic approach to improvisation were a precursor to the cool era of jazz.

Born: March 10, 1903; Davenport, Iowa
Died: August 6, 1931; New York, New York
Also known as: Leon Bismark Beiderbecke (full name)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Bix Beiderbecke and the Chicago Cornets, 1924; Bix Beiderbecke and the Wolverines, 1924; Riverboat Shuffle, 1924; Davenport Blues, 1925; Bix Beiderbecke, Volume 1: Singin' the Blues, 1927; Bix Beiderbecke, Volume 2: At the Jazz Band Ball, 1927; Bixology, 1927; Jazz Me Blues, 1927; Bix Beiderbecke with Paul Whiteman, 1927-1928, 1928.

The Life

Leon Bismark "Bix" Beiderbecke (BI-dur-behk) was born in Davenport, Iowa. His father, Bismark Herman Beiderbecke, supported the family by operating a fuel and lumber business. His mother, Agatha Jane Hilton, was an accomplished pianist who gave Beiderbecke piano lessons.

Although highly intelligent, Beiderbecke never applied himself in his high school studies, and consequently his parents enrolled him in Illinois's Lake Forest Academy. Because of poor grades, he was dismissed in 1922. From 1923 to 1925 he drifted from one orchestra to another, then enrolled at the University of Iowa in 1925 in an attempt to major in music. His college career lasted just eighteen days because he failed to comply with academic requirements.

Beiderbecke then traveled with various jazz bands around the country, ultimately joining the famous Paul Whiteman Orchestra in 1927. For two years he and his saxophonist friend Frankie "Tram" Trumbauer toured the country with small groups. Although his personal life was in disorder, he was enjoying increasing popularity. While playing college engagements, Bix met many notable jazz musicians, including Benny Goodman, Jimmy and Tommy Dorsey, Artie Shaw, and Gene Krupa. His last years were consumed with hospital stays because of his alcoholism and his deteriorating health. In August, 1931, an ailing Beiderbecke moved to Queens and died from his lifelong excess intake of bootleg liquor and pneumonia.

The Music

At a time when the rage was hot jazz with energetic tempi and forceful beat, Beiderbecke offered an alternative with his expressive tone and style based on European classical traditions. During a brief twelve-year career, he established a new sound in his improvisations, heavily influenced by composer Claude Debussy. Beiderbecke chose restraint, clean technique, and a mellow tone while still delivering powerful musical statements.

Hot Jazz. Beiderbecke's first exposure to jazz was a recording of "Tiger Rag" by the all-white Original Dixieland Jass (after 1917 spelled Jazz) Band. He was particularly influenced by trumpet player Nick La Rocca. By 1919 he owned his own Conn Victor cornet and was playing on a truck with his high school band at football games. Two years later he formed his first band, the Bix Beiderbecke Five.

The early 1920's was the era of hot jazz with a driving beat, featuring individual and collective improvised solos at incredibly quick tempi. Hot jazz ignited careers of such luminaries as Louis Armstrong and Jelly Roll Morton. The Benson Orchestra personified hot jazz, and in 1923 Beiderbecke performed with it professionally. A year later Beiderbecke became the featured soloist with the newly formed Wolverine Orchestra housed at the Stockton Club in Hamilton, Ohio. The Wolverines completed their first recordings in 1924 with "Fidgety Feet" on one side and the classic "Jazz Me Blues" on the other. Several more recordings followed, which further enhanced his reputation among jazz musicians.

Departing the Wolverines in 1924, Beiderbecke joined the Jean Goldkette Orchestra. His tenure with this group was a frustrating experience because this orchestra employed trained musicians who could read music, a skill in which Beiderbecke never gained proficiency. After two months he was fired and then remarkably rehired. Goldkette valued his improvised solos, and by then Beiderbecke had learned some of the music by memory.

On the Road. Beiderbecke then drifted around the country from one prominent orchestra to another, performing with Red Nichols and the Five Pennies, the California Ramblers, the Charlie Straight Orchestra, and the Breeze Blowers. In late 1926 Beiderbecke rejoined the Goldkette Orchestra, which now employed arranger Bill Challis. Challis's arrangements proved to be a catalyst for Beiderbecke because they provided space for his gifted improvisations, showcasing Beiderbecke's lyrical and mellow tone and his considerable technique tempered by subtlety.

In 1927, a productive period in his life, Beiderbecke performed in ballrooms, on radio broadcasts, and in recordings for the Victor Company. On February 4, Beiderbecke recorded the critically acclaimed "Singin' the Blues"; the other side featured the classic "Clarinet Marmalade," with his friend Tram. Another series of recordings followed, with different combinations of musicians producing "Way Down Yonder in New Orleans," "Riverboat Shuffle," "Royal Garden Blues," and "Jazz Me Blues."

Bix Beiderbecke. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The Goldkette Orchestra was in financial ruin by the middle of 1927 and disbanded. Beiderbecke briefly experimented with the New Yorkers, but after a few weeks that group disbanded as well. In October, Beiderbecke joined the famous Paul Whiteman Orchestra. Although Whiteman was nicknamed the King of Jazz, he was the leader of a commercial brand of jazz, far removed from the hot jazz so popular a few years earlier. (Whiteman was renowned for commissioning George Gershwin to compose and perform the epic Rhapsody in Blue.)

Beiderbecke achieved a significant milestone of his own when his composition for solo piano, "In a Mist," was recorded by the Okeh Record Company and performed with the Whiteman Orchestra at Carnegie Hall in October, 1928.

His body ravaged by alcohol, Beiderbecke was still able to perform with Whiteman on the Old Gold radio broadcasts and for a few more recordings. Fittingly, his last Whiteman recording in September, 1929, was "Waiting at the End of the Road," presaging Beiderbecke's death. His final endeavors were recording "I'll Be a Friend with Pleasure"—one of his best, according to critics, which also hinted at the emerging swing style of the 1930's—and copyrighting "Candlelights," "Flashes," and "In the Dark" with the Robbins Music Company in 1930 and 1931. They were published in 1938.

Musical Legacy

Some jazz historians maintain that Beiderbecke was the only cornet player ever to rival the proficiency and popularity of Louis Armstrong during the decade of the 1920's. Some even assert that Beiderbecke surpassed Armstrong. Comparisons are inevitable but unnecessary. Ultimately, a jazz musician's legacy is defined by influences, contributions, and innovations. Beiderbecke's improvisations provided a foundation for the cool movement in jazz, popularized in the 1950's, with its uncluttered textures and lighter approach.

Douglas D. Skinner

Further Reading

Berton, Ralph. Remembering Bix: A Memoir of the Jazz Age. New York: Harper and Row, 1974. The author met Bix as a boy. Berton's interpretive memoir includes photographs, bibliography, and discography.

Evans, Philip R., and Linda K. Evans. Bix: The Leon Bix Beiderbecke Story. New York: Prelike Press, 1998. An in-depth probe of his life, with numerous photographs and a collection of letters written by Beiderbecke.

James, Burnett. Bix Beiderbecke. London: Cassell, 1959. Biography of Beiderbecke and analysis of his jazz cornet style. Photographs and a short discography.

Sudhalter, Richard M., and Philip R. Evans. Bix: Man and Legend. New Rochelle, N.Y.: Arlington House, 1974. Photographs, diary, and discography. Nominated for a National Book Award.

Tirro, Frank. Living with Jazz. Orlando, Fla.: Harcourt Brace, 1996. A textbook for jazz history courses.

Wareing, Charles, and George Garlick. Bugles for Beiderbecke. London: Sidgwick and Jackson, 1958. Life and music of Beiderbecke in a biographical format with a discography.

See also: Armstrong, Louis; Debussy, Claude; Dorsey, Thomas A.; Goodman, Benny; Nichols, Red; Shaw, Artie; Whiteman, Paul.

Harry Belafonte

American calypso and folk vocalist, arranger, and songwriter

Belafonte popularized the integration of traditional folk melodies into the pop music lexicon when his 1956 album, Calypso, sold a million copies and launched the craze for calypso music.

Born: March 1, 1927; Harlem, New York
Also known as: Harold George Belafonte, Jr. (full name)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Mark Twain and Other Folk Favorites, 1955; Three for Tonight, 1955; Belafonte, 1956; Calypso, 1956; Belafonte Sings of the Caribbean, 1957; Belafonte Sings the Blues, 1958; Presenting the Belafonte Singers, 1958; Belafonte at Carnegie Hall, 1959; Cheers: Drinking Songs Around the World, 1959; Love Is a Gentle Thing, 1959; Porgy and Bess, 1959; Belafonte Returns to Carnegie Hall, 1960; My Lord What a Mornin', 1960; Swing Dat Hammer, 1960; At Home and Abroad, 1961; Jump Up Calypso, 1961; The Many Moods of Belafonte, 1962; The Midnight Special, 1962; To Wish You a Merry Christmas, 1962; Streets I Have Walked, 1963; Ballads, Blues, and Boasters, 1964; Calypso in Brass, 1966; In My Quiet Room, 1966; Belafonte on Campus, 1967; Belafonte Sings of Love, 1968; Homeward Bound, 1969; By Request, 1970; Calypso Carnival, 1971; The Warm Touch, 1971;

Play Me, 1973; Turn the World Around, 1977; Loving You Is Where I Belong, 1981; Paradise in Gazankulu, 1988; Belafonte '89, 1989; The Tradition of Christmas, 1991; American Wintertime, 2006; An Evening with Miriam Makeba, 2006.

The Life

Harold George Belafonte, Jr. (behl-uh-FON-tee) was born in the Harlem section of New York City to immigrant parents. His father, Harold Belafonte, Sr., was a chef from Martinique, and his mother, Melvine, was a domestic from Jamaica. Because his parents were struggling to make ends meet, Belafonte went to live with his grandmother in Kingston, Jamaica, from 1935 to 1940. In 1943 Belafonte dropped out of high school to join the U.S. Navy and fight in World War II. Following his return from World War II in late 1945, Belafonte emulated the jazz crooning style of Frank Sinatra and the contemporary pop style of Perry Como. Belafonte spent the early part of his career surrounded by jazz musicians, often sharing the stage with Charlie Parker, Miles Davis, and Max Roach. Belafonte enrolled in acting classes at Erwin Piscator's famous dramatic workshops at the New School for Social Research. Belafonte honed his craft as an actor alongside such legendary figures as Marlon Brando, Sidney Poitier, Tony Curtis, and Walter Matthau, and he performed with the American Negro Theater. However, it was his success as a singer that catapulted Belafonte's career as an entertainer. In 1949 Belafonte signed with Jubilee Records, a relationship that yielded little success. Later that year Belafonte teamed with guitarist Millard Thomas, and they performed jazz-influenced pop tunes and folk music in many New York jazz clubs, including the Village Vanguard.

Belafonte debuted on the music scene with a successful engagement at the Royal Roost, a popular nightclub in New York. In his first singing engagements, the fledgling Belafonte was backed by jazz legends Parker, Roach, and Davis, and the young singer's early repertoire consisted primarily of jazz and pop standards. Between late 1949 and 1950 Belafonte became interested in tunes from the Archive of American Folk Song in the Library of Congress. Intrigued by African, Asian, American, and, most important, West Indian folk music, Belafonte abandoned pop and jazz music to focus on hybrid versions of folk music. He secured a recording contract with RCA in 1952, and he enjoyed success with the single "Matilda," followed by bigger success with his album Calypso in 1956.

Belafonte's popularity on the music scene paved the way for lead roles in films and Broadway shows. His acting performance in Island in the Sun (1957) solidified his status as a viable leading man, and his 1959 television special, Tonight with Belafonte, earned him an Emmy Award, the first for an African American man. Throughout his life, Belafonte has been an outspoken activist, and he was deeply involved in the Civil Rights movement of the 1950's and 1960's.

The Music

Belafonte's career took off when he recorded the single "Matilda," so he began to focus on folk tunes, especially from the West Indies. His Calypso album, which followed in 1956, combined the gentle, floating West Indian melodies of calypso patois with the infectious West Indian dance beats of limbo. Belafonte stripped the traditional expository song style from calypso as sung by Lord Kitchener and Mighty Sparrow, taming the lyrics. He delivered them in a smooth, crooning voice, in contrast to the percussive sound favored by most West Indians. Finding his niche, Belafonte made few changes to this style throughout the rest of his career, and his later albums of the 1970's and 1980's are similar in style to the ones of the 1950's.

Harry Belafonte. (Library of Congress)

Calypso Albums. Despite his early work singing jazz and pop standards from 1949 to 1951, Belafonte never felt truly comfortable in those styles. Although Belafonte had a string of engagements in 1951 as a balladeer singing British folk songs, winning acclaim from critics, he slowly began including "ditties," as he called them, which were calypsos and other up-tempo West Indian songs such as "Hold 'Em Joe."

Calypso. Building on the muscle of the RCA label following the success of "Matilda" and the self-titled album Belafonte, the singer collaborated with William Attaway on Calypso. The sound Belafonte created for this album would define his career and establish a musical phenomenon. Several songs on the album became instant classics, such as "Brown Skin Girl," "Jamaica Farewell," "Man Smart (Women Smarter)," and the ever-popular "Banana Boat Song (Day-O)," a West Indian version of the John Henry legend. Instead of driving steel, the black workmen toiled through the evening loading ships with fruit. Interestingly, only two songs from the album were traditional calypsos in form. However, the album's intense popularity led to any English-language Caribbean-influenced song being labeled a calypso. The Calypso album was on the Billboard Top 100 for ninety-nine weeks, spending thirty-one weeks at number one.

Musical Styles. Belafonte released several other calypso-flavored albums during the late 1950's and early 1960's. These included Belafonte Sings of the Caribbean, Swing Dat Hammer, and Jump Up Calypso, all stylistically similar to Calypso. However, during these years, Belafonte released several albums reflecting a broad and eclectic spectrum of blues, folk, pop, and gospel music influences, including Belafonte Sings the Blues, Porgy and Bess, The Midnight Special, and The Many Moods of Belafonte. These albums paled in comparison to the commercial and critical success of two live concert recordings, Belafonte at Carnegie Hall and Belafonte Returns to Carnegie Hall.

Later Releases. After the decline of the calypso craze, Belafonte explored different musical projects, including extended collaborations and film and television sound tracks. During the late 1960's and 1970's, he collected songs recorded by various African American artists in order to produce The Long Road to Freedom: An Anthology of Black Music. The critically acclaimed packaged set was released in 2001.

Musical Legacy

By integrating traditional folk melodies with popular musical styles of the 1950's, Belafonte set a precedent for a new style of songwriting. He tapped his island musical heritage and created a popular genre. The cross-appeal of Belafonte's music to white audiences furthered the integration of African American music into American popular music. He received the National Medal of Arts, two Grammy Awards, and a Grammy Lifetime Achievement Award.

Andrew R. Martin

Further Reading

Attaway, William. Hear America Singing. New York: Lion Press, 1967. This book is a collection of lyrics and includes several songs made popular by Belafonte. Belafonte wrote the introduction.

Fogelson, Genia. Harry Belafonte: Singer and Actor. New York: Holloway House, 1997. Thorough coverage of Belafonte's career in the 1960's, including his work in film and television.

Funk, Ray, and Donald Hill. "Will Calypso Doom Rock and Roll?" In Trinidad Carnival: The Cultural Politics of a Transnational Festival, edited by Garth L. Green and Philip W. Scher. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2007. Traces the arrival of calypso music in the United States, showing how the genre reached into the American social fabric.

Shaw, Arnold. Belafonte: An Unauthorized Biography. Philadelphia: Chilton, 1960. This biography covers Belafonte's personal life, including details on two early marriages, and chronicles the rise and fall of the calypso craze.

Steirmen, Hy. Harry Belafonte: His Complete Life Story. New York: Hillman, 1957. This work tracks Belafonte's rise to stardom, leaving off at the release of the Calypso album.

See also: Davis, Miles; Fender, Freddy; Jordan, Louis; Lewis, John; Makeba, Miriam; Masekela, Hugh; Odetta; Parker, Charlie; Roach, Max; Seeger, Pete; Sinatra, Frank.

Tony Bennett

American vocalist

A popular singer of standard and jazz music, Bennett has entertained generations of listeners with his easy, down-to-earth style since the 1940's.

Born: August 13, 1926; Queens, New York
Also known as: Anthony Dominick Benedetto (birth name); Joe Bari

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: The Beat of My Heart, 1957; Basie/Bennett, 1958 (with Count Basie and His Orchestra); Because of You, 1959; Blue Velvet, 1959; In Person!, 1959; A String of Harold Arlen, 1960; To My Wonderful One, 1960; I Left My Heart in San Francisco, 1963; I Wanna Be Around, 1963; When Lights Are Low, 1964; The Movie Song Album, 1966; Tony Sings the Great Hits of Today, 1970; The Rodgers and Hart Songbook, 1973; Life Is Beautiful, 1975; Tony Bennett with the McPartlands and Friends Make Magnificent Music, 1977; The Art of Excellence, 1986; Bennett/Berlin, 1987; Astoria, 1990; Perfectly Frank, 1992; Steppin' Out, 1993; MTV Unplugged, 1994; Here's to the Ladies, 1995; Isn't It Romantic?, 1995; My Romance, 1995; Tony Bennett on Holiday, 1997; The Playground, 1998; Bennett Sings Ellington: Hot and Cool, 1999; Playin' with My Friends: Bennett Sings the Blues, 2001 (duets with others); A Wonderful World, 2002 (with K. D. Lang); The Art of Romance, 2004; Duets: An American Classic, 2006.

WRITINGS OF INTEREST: The Good Life, 1998 (autobiography).

The Life

Tony Bennett was born Anthony Dominick Benedetto, the son of Italian immigrants Giovanni and Anna Benedetto. Bennett's father, a grocer, died when he was ten years old, and his mother, Anna, took a job as a seamstress to support her children. Bennett attended New York City's School of Industrial Art (now known as the High School of Art and Design), where he trained as a painter. He dropped out of school at sixteen to help support his family by working a series of jobs, including as an elevator operator and a copyboy for the Associated Press. He did not last long at these jobs, and they only reinforced his desire to become a professional singer. He gave himself the stage name of Joe Bari and did whatever he could to start his career.

In 1944, at eighteen, Bennett was drafted into the Army and served in the infantry until the Germans surrendered to the Allies at the end of World War II. He found combat difficult and was glad to be reassigned to a division that provided entertainment for the troops. He performed with many talented musicians, singers, and arrangers, some of whom helped Bennett later in his career.

Bennett returned home from the military in 1946 determined to make it as a singer. He used his G.I. Bill benefits to go back to school, attending the American Theatre Wing. In 1952 Bennett married a young art student from Ohio named Patricia Beech. Together they had two sons, D'Andrea (Danny) and Daegal (Dae). The marriage suffered from Bennett's spending too much time on the road, and they separated in 1965. The divorce was made final in 1971.

While portraying the role of Hymie Kelly in the movie The Oscar in 1965, Bennett met Sandra Grant. Eventually they married and had two daughters, Joanna and Antonia. He moved the family to Hollywood, but the lifestyle began to takes its toll. He and Sandra fell behind in taxes, and the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) prepared to take away their home. Bennett's mother died, his own record label folded, and Bennett became depressed. A near-fatal drug overdose propelled him to reexamine his life and career. He called his sons, Danny and Dae, for help. In their twenties and familiar with the business side of the music industry, they came to Bennett's aid, Danny taking over as his manager. Unfortunately, Bennett and Sandra divorced.

This was a turning point for Bennett professionally and personally. With his second marriage over, he moved back to New York and revived his singing career. In addition to his musical success, Bennett gained acclaim as an artist. Painting under his birth name of Anthony Benedetto, he exhibited his works in art galleries across the country. He published an art book featuring many of his paintings, Tony Bennett: What My Heart Has Seen (1996).

The Music

Bennett's early years were spent listening to such greats as Al Jolson, Bing Crosby, and Maurice Chevalier. From these talented artists he learned a relaxed attitude that would appeal to every audience. At thirteen he developed a love for jazz, and at sixteen he dropped out of school to help support his family. He tried several jobs but ended up working as a singing waiter in an Italian restaurant, where he learned the standard songs from the other waiters and deduced what it took to be a performer.

During World War II Bennett served in the infantry, then was transferred to the 255th Regiment Band and the 314th Army Special Services Band of the European Theater, traveling around Germany entertaining the troops, often in the trenches. This experience provided Bennett with a great deal of artistic freedom since he could sing any song in any style, such as the new bebop. Many of the songs he performed in Germany—such as "Body and Soul" and "Sunny Side of the Street"—remained part of his repertoire for years.

After returning from the war, Bennett spent his days knocking on the doors of booking agents, club owners, and promoters. He received many rejections, which was a shock after the success he had experienced in the Army. At night he frequented clubs, singing for free and hoping someone would hear him. Performers such as Milton Berle and Jan Murray helped by arranging for him to sing when agents were in the audience.

"Boulevard of Dreams." Bennett's first demonstration disc featured "Crazy Rhythm" and "Boulevard of Dreams." The recording was not a huge success, but it attracted the attention of entertainment columnist Walter Winchell and singer Frank Sinatra. Mitch Miller of Columbia Records also found the disc interesting and offered Bennett a contract. Getting signed with a label was a positive step in Bennett's career. "Boulevard of Dreams" became his first Top 10 hit.

The songs recorded after "Boulevard of Dreams" were not as successful, and he was told that if he did not get a hit soon he would be dropped from the label. In 1951 he recorded "Because of You." It was not aired immediately on the radio, but it was a popular jukebox choice. Soon listeners from all over the country were calling their radio stations requesting the song. It was Bennett's first number-one hit on the Billboard pop chart, ultimately selling a million copies. It stayed on the chart for thirty-two weeks, ten at number one.

"Cold, Cold Heart." Bennett's second number-one hit was "Cold, Cold Heart," written by country singer Hank Williams. This was the first time a country song had crossed over to the Top 40 mainstream chart before becoming an international hit. Bennett was invited to perform it on the Grand Ol' Opry television show to pay tribute to Williams after his death.

Cloud 7. By 1955 Bennett had become dissatisfied with trying to beat the other pop singers for the number-one spot on the charts. He wanted to record a long-playing disc of jazz songs. Miller initially said no, but after the success of "Cold, Cold Heart," he finally agreed. Cloud 7 was one of the first concept albums and one of Columbia's first twelve-inch long-playing discs. It featured jazz and classical inspiration, such as "My Reverie," based on classical composer Claude Debussy's Reverie. Cloud 7 was not a smash hit, but it proved that Bennett was capable of doing something beyond singles and that he was ready for major changes in his career.

Mr. Broadway. The producers of the Broadway play Kismet asked Bennett to record "Stranger in Paradise" as a way to promote the play during a newspaper strike. It worked so well that several years later he was asked to record "Just in Time" from Bells Are Ringing. He eventually recorded enough songs for his 1962 album release Mr. Broadway.

"In the Middle of an Island." At first Bennett refused to record "In the Middle of an Island," which he did not like. He and Miller argued about it, but Bennett finally gave in, managing to get through it in one take. Surprisingly, the song made the Top 10. Although the experience reinforced Bennett's belief that he should sing only songs that he liked in order to give the best he had to give to his listeners, giving in to Miller allowed him the freedom to record something more ambitious.

The Beat of My Heart. Bennett's next project was a compilation of standard songs using different kinds of rhythm, performed by all the great drummers Bennett could find. The Beat of My Heart attracted a whole new audience of jazz fans. With the success of the album, Bennett was allowed to make albums regularly.

"I Left My Heart in San Francisco." While preparing for his first concert in the city of San Francisco, Bennett's piano player, Ralph Sharon, handed him a song written by two unknown songwriters. Bennett liked the tune immediately, and so did audiences all over the country. It quickly became his signature song. The album of the same name was a Top 5 hit, and in 1962 the single won a Grammy Award for Record of the Year and Best Male Solo Vocal performance.

Tony Sings the Great Hits of Today. In 1967 rock and roll became the mainstay of most record labels. Columbia was no different and embraced the new sound, insisting all their artists record rock-and-roll tunes. Once again Bennett protested. He could not understand why he should sing songs that were definitely not his style. Bennett gave in again and recorded Tony Sings the Great Hits of Today. He was glad that his success in the 1950's had already established his career.

Improv. Bennett left Columbia in 1972 and signed with Polygram Records. His albums were released on the Philips label in England and on MGM/Verve in America. Two years later he started Tobill Enterprises and the record label Improv with Bill Hassett. Bennett produced four albums using different styles, something he would never have been able to do with a major label. The venture proved to be more difficult than they had expected, and it folded.

The Art of Excellence. Bennett's career began to slip in the 1970's. He was in debt from closing the record company and was having trouble with the IRS. He had been performing in Las Vegas but did not want to be labeled a Vegas act. He moved back to New York, and with Danny's help he refocused his career on a younger generation of music fans by booking shows at colleges and small theaters. The response was better than they had expected, without Bennett having to change his style of singing, his songs, or his trademark tuxedo. He re-signed with Columbia Records and recorded his first album with the label in fourteen years. The Art of Excellence was created with state-of-the-art digital equipment. A great album, it also attracted the attention of high-tech enthusiasts.

MTV Generation. Bennett and his son found another way to attract the attention of younger listeners. They convinced Columbia that he should do an MTV video. "Steppin' Out" was shot in black and white and featured all styles of dance with visual editing cut on the beat. Response to the video was so positive that Bennett was asked to co-present an award at that year's MTV Video Awards, and in 1994 he was invited to appear on MTV Unplugged. An album of the evening's performance became one of the top sellers of his career. With guest appearances by K. D. Lang and Elvis Costello, it won Grammy's Album of the Year in 1995.

Musical Legacy

By studying masterful entertainers, Bennett learned how to attract and maintain the public's interest. Keeping great songs alive and providing quality entertainment for all ages are significant parts of his legacy. As a representative of a beloved line of American vocalists, such as Frank Sinatra, Dean Martin, and Andy Williams, Bennett has preserved their art for a twenty-first century audience who revere him for his music and his enduring youthfulness.

Maryanne Barsotti

Further Reading

Bennett, Tony. The Good Life. New York: Pocket Books, 1998. Autobiographical account of Bennett's rise as one of the world's most enduring pop and jazz singers. Includes anecdotes, photographs, and discography.

Bennett, Tony, and Robert Sullivan. Tony Bennett in the Studio: A Life of Art and Music. New York: Sterling, 2007. A reflection of Bennett's careers as singer and painter. Includes memories, inspirations, and illustrations of his artwork.

Hoffman, Matthew. Tony Bennett: The Best Is Yet to Come. New York: MetroBooks, 1997. Describes Bennett's rise from singing waiter to international sensation. Includes photographs of Bennett at every stage of his career.

See also: Arlen, Harold; Basie, Count; Burke, Johnny; David, Hal; Ellington, Duke; Evans, Bill; Hart, Lorenz; Lang, K. D.; McFerrin, Bobby; Newley, Anthony; Rodgers, Richard; Streisand, Barbra; Webb, Jimmy; Williams, Hank.

Alban Berg

Austrian classical composer

Berg was one of the influential trio of Austrian composers known as the Second Viennese School. He artfully combined Romanticism with atonal and twelve-tone compositional techniques.

Born: February 9, 1885; Vienna, Austro-Hungarian Empire (now in Austria)
Died: December 24, 1935; Vienna, Austria

Principal works

CHAMBER WORKS: String Quartet, Op. 3, 1911; Kammerkonzert, 1925 (Chamber Concerto; for piano, violin, and thirteen wind instruments); Lyrische Suite, 1927 (Lyric Suite; for string quartet).

OPERAS (music): Wozzeck, Op. 7, 1924 (libretto by Berg; based on Georg Büchner's play Woyzeck); Der Wein, 1930 (libretto by Berg; based on Charles Beaudelaire's collection of poems translated by Stefan George, Die Blumen des Bösen); Lulu, 1937, revised and expanded 1979 (libretto by Berg; based on Frank Wedekind's play Erdgeist).

ORCHESTRAL WORKS: Piano Sonata, Op. 1, 1911; Drei Orchesterstücke, Op. 6, 1923 (Three Orchestral Pieces); Violin Concerto, 1936 (To the Memory of an Angel).

VOCAL WORKS: Sieben Frühe Lieder, 1908 (Seven Early Songs; for voice and piano, or orchestra); Vier Lieder, Op. 2, 1910 (Four Songs); Fünf Orchesterlieder nach Ansichtkartentexten von Peter Altenberg, 1913 (Five Songs on Picture Postcard Texts by Peter Altenberg).

The Life

In his youth, Alban Berg (AL-bahn behrg), the third of four children in an affluent Viennese family, studied piano and, without formal training, composed songs. His father's death in 1900 caused a downturn in the family's fortunes, but an aunt assisted, permitting Alban to continue his education. Academic, health, and romantic difficulties (he had recently fathered an illegitimate child) led him to attempt suicide in 1903.

In 1904 Berg began compositional studies with Arnold Schoenberg, who was a respected leader of the Viennese avant-garde. Anton von Webern, a fellow student, was the third member of the triumvirate dubbed the Second Viennese School. The synergy among these three musicians was crucial to Berg's artistic life, and by the age of twenty-one he was devoting himself to composition full time.

By the time he composed his String Quartet, Op. 3, his music was completely atonal in nature. He dedicated the quartet to Helene Nahowski, whom he wed in 1911. Schoenberg left Vienna for Berlin shortly thereafter, and Berg inherited some of his master's students.

Berg's first work after the apprenticeship with Schoenberg was Five Songs on Picture Postcard Texts by Peter Altenberg, which demonstrated Berg's orchestrational prowess and at times hinted at twelve-tone techniques that were still a decade away. The 1913 Vienna premiere (conducted by Schoenberg) was marred by audience disruptions—not unlike the furor that would greet Igor Stravinsky's The Rite of Spring two months later—and only two of the five movements were attempted. Berg found the experience disheartening.

In 1914 Berg attended the Vienna premiere of Georg Büchner's play Woyzeck, about a hapless soldier brutalized to the point of madness. Compelled to create an operatic version of the story, Berg began to edit the script into a libretto.

After his own miserable military experiences in the Austrian army during World War I, he found new inspiration to complete Wozzeck, dedicating most of the next five years to the work. Premiered in Berlin in 1925, Wozzeck nearly caused a riot, but unlike the orchestral songs, the opera was soon recognized as a masterwork. With its condemnation of society and authority, Wozzeck was eventually banned by both the Nazis and the Communists but continued to receive regular performances in the West.

Following the success of Wozzeck, Berg completed his Lyric Suite, delving further into twelve-tone technique, first in a string-quartet version, then in one for string orchestra. The Lyric Suite was the first of several works to conceal cryptic references to Berg's love affair with Hanna Fuchs-Robettin.

In 1929 Berg began to develop the libretto for his second opera, Lulu, which dominated his efforts for the next six years (with a short break to fulfill a commission for a concert aria, Der Wein). In 1935 Berg again interrupted his work on Lulu for a commission—a violin concerto dedicated to the recently deceased daughter of Gustav Mahler's widow. With this inspiration, Berg wrote at an uncharacteristic rate of speed, creating the concerto (To the Memory of an Angel) in only four months. In the meantime, however, he failed to complete the orchestration of the third act of Lulu.

Only days after finishing the concerto, Berg suffered an insect bite that resulted in blood poisoning. Berg's health began a steady decline, and he died four months later, even before the premiere of the violin concerto and leaving Lulu incomplete. His widow refused to allow the completion of the third act during her lifetime, and so the full opera was not premiered until 1979, more than forty years after the composer's death.

Alban Berg. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

The Music

Berg's compositions following the theories of the Second Viennese School are more accessible than Schoenberg's or Webern's and thus offer the listener a better window on these important aspects of twentieth century musical innovation. Nevertheless, some critics favor Schoenberg for his invention of the twelve-tone system and for Sprechstimme (the cross between singing and speech) and Webern for the miniaturization of form and the development of Klangfarbenmelodie (literally, tone-color-melody, a succession of notes characterized by rapid timbre changes). However, Berg's superior craftsmanship and attention to detail best demonstrate the potential of these techniques as expressive tools.

Early Works. Before his study with Schoenberg, Berg was primarily a songwriter in the style of Hugo Wolf. Berg's one-movement Piano Sonata, Op. 1, considered extremely mature for an initial offering, is occasionally performed. His Three Orchestral Pieces, Op. 6, combined the atonal compositional techniques of Schoenberg with the expansive orchestration and deep emotional expression of Mahler.

Wozzeck. Büchner's play Woyzeck (1836) was an account based on the true story of a beleaguered army private and his disintegration into madness. As father of an illegitimate child, as a harassed underling in the military, and as a troubled soul, Berg must have felt sympathy for the main character. Based on the atonal techniques Berg learned from Schoenberg, Wozzeck is the first opera to succeed without relying on tonality to organize the harmonic language.

The opera, in aba form, consists of three acts, each divided into five scenes and connected by instrumental interludes. The five character pieces forming act 1 demonstrate the relationships Wozzeck has with the other main characters. Act 2 is a symphony in five movements illustrating the deterioration of his relationship with Marie, his common-law wife and mother of his child. Act 3 consists of five variations on ostinatos, creating the climax of the opera. Berg's complex method of organizing the opera allowed him to create a unity and structure for an extended work without the use of tonal landmarks.

The opera uses three distinct vocal techniques to portray different aspects of the characters: dialogue underscored by the orchestra, direct song, and Sprechstimme. The range of musical styles is equally broad, including passages that sound post-Romantic and sections that are clearly atonal juxtaposed with folk elements and popular music. Berg even employed a honky-tonk piano to snatch the audience out of the mesmerizing "Invention on the Note B."

The opera's carefully devised structure employs fugal techniques, inventions, symphonic form, and passacaglias, but it was never Berg's intention that the formal organization be the focus. He wanted the music to underscore the dramatic themes in Büchner's text, and the results are indisputable. Despite initial criticism of the demanding score both in the theater and in the press, the power of the opera overcame the objections, and the revenue from performances of Wozzeck provided Berg with a comfortable income for the rest of his life.

Lulu. Berg first developed interest in the drama of Frank Wedekind in 1905. It was not until 1928, however, that Berg began combining two Wedekind scripts into the libretto of Lulu. After an interruption to compose Der Wein, Berg dedicated most of the next six years to writing this opera about the rise and fall of Lulu. Although he completed the libretto and a piano score through the end of the third act, the orchestration was completed only through the end of the second act at the time of Berg's death. Because of objections from his widow, the final section was not orchestrated until after her death in 1976.

In act 1 Lulu is entangled in affairs with every male character, and most of them meet ignominious ends. When Dr. Schön hands Lulu his gun and orders her to kill herself, she shoots him instead, precipitating her imprisonment—the climax and turning point of the opera. The entire work is a large palindrome and hinges on a remarkable scene. The director is instructed to prepare a silent film of Lulu's trial and incarceration. This scene is accompanied by two minutes of frighteningly expressionistic score, which then, at the peak of the palindrome, turns around and reverses upon itself. In the second half of the opera, double-casting brings back the actors who played Lulu's lovers in the first half, now as progressively more disturbing partners, until finally the actor who played Dr. Schön portrays Jack the Ripper and murders Lulu. The opera has come full circle.

The music of Lulu was created entirely by manipulation of the twelve-tone system. Experts debate the exact way the tone rows are used, and whether there are multiple rows or a single row. Berg's sketches for the opera suggest that, while he used Schoenberg's system as a departure point, he adapted it to his own purposes, employing it to create music that met his dramatic needs.

Violin Concerto: To the Memory of an Angel. In 1935, when he was struggling to complete Lulu despite continual health problems, Berg was approached by a young American violin virtuoso, Louis Krasner, to compose a concerto. Berg, who had turned down other commissions in his effort to complete Lulu, was reticent at first. Krasner suggested that Berg's lyricism might help overcome the impression that music created using the twelve-tone system was cerebral and dry. Progress was slow, however, until the emotional impetus arrived in a tragic fashion.

Berg and his wife, Helene, were good friends with Mahler's widow, Alma. Alma's daughter, Manon Gropius, had contracted polio and succumbed to the disease in April, 1935. Berg asked Alma's permission to dedicate the concerto "to the memory of an angel." Berg now had the inspiration to create an expressive twelve-tone violin concerto that would disprove any assumption that such music was without passion.

Berg worked feverishly on the concerto, putting aside his work on Lulu, creating a tone row that gave the music tonal references, using a series of triads followed by a fragment of the whole-tone scale.

When properly manipulated, the row allowed for inclusion of various tonal materials: the sound of the open strings of the violin, quotes from Viennese folk song, and passages from Johann Sebastian Bach's harmonization of the chorale Es ist genug (It is enough). The four-movement concerto shows the full range of emotion—sorrow, anger, resignation—achieving the purpose that Krasner had suggested to Berg and at the same time achieving Berg's purpose of memorializing Gropius. The result is a tour de force that many consider the most significant violin concerto of the twentieth century and a fitting tribute to Berg's masterful fusion of technique and art.

Musical Legacy

While several other works, like the Chamber Concerto and the Lyric Suite, are occasionally performed, the bulk of Berg's reputation rests on Wozzeck, Lulu, and his violin concerto To the Memory of an Angel. Clearly the most significant works of Berg's career, they are often performed and recorded. Berg demonstrated the lyrical and expressive possibilities inherent in the use of atonality and of Schoenberg's twelve-tone system in ways that neither Webern nor even Schoenberg himself was able to achieve. His music influenced generations of composers to come.

William S. Carson

Further Reading

Adorno, Theodor W. Alban Berg: Master of the Smallest Link. Translated by Juliane Brand and Christopher Hailey. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press, 1991. Adorno's study of his mentor is primary source material for those who wish to learn about the great composer and his music.

Hall, Patricia. A View of Berg's Lulu Through the Autograph Sources. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1996. Hall's scholarly volume, based primarily on Berg's sketches, analyzes the technical aspects of his second opera. Musical examples, bibliography.

Jarman, Douglas. Alban Berg: Lulu. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press, 1991. Historical, analytical, but not overly technical information about Berg's opera. Illustrations, bibliography.

_____. Alban Berg: Wozzeck. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press, 1989. Detailed introduction to Wozzeck, in accessible language. Illustrations, bibliography.

Pople, Anthony. Berg: Violin Concerto. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press, 1991. Like the Jarman studies (and part of the same series of Cambridge Music Handbooks), Pople's guide to the Violin Concerto introduces the work in language appropriate for concertgoers and students.

Simms, Bryan R. Alban Berg: A Guide to Research. New York: Garland, 1996. Thorough annotations aid the reader in locating and selecting materials.

See also: Babbitt, Milton; Berio, Luciano; Boulez, Pierre; Britten, Benjamin; Crumb, George; Fischer-Dieskau, Dietrich; Gould, Glenn; Hindemith, Paul; Mahler, Gustav; Nono, Luigi; Poulenc, Francis; Schoenberg, Arnold; Schreker, Franz; Solti, Sir Georg; Webern, Anton von.

Alan Bergman

American film and musical-theater composer/lyricist

In writing lyrics for stage and motion-picture songs, Bergman focused on drama, using the words to tell the story as well as depict the mood and the action.

Born: September 11, 1925; Brooklyn, New York

Principal works

MUSICAL THEATER (lyrics): Something More!, 1964 (with Marilyn Bergman; music by Sammy Fain; libretto by Nate Monaster); Ballroom, 1978 (with Marilyn Bergman; music by Billy Goldenberg; libretto by Jerome Kass).

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Lyrically, Alan Bergman, 2007.

SONGS (lyrics; written with Marilyn Bergman): "Yellow Bird," 1966 (music and lyrics); "Bowlegged Polly," 1967; "In the Heat of the Night," 1967; "It Sure Is Groovy," 1967; "The Windmills of Your Mind," 1968; "What Are You Doing for the Rest of Your Life?," 1970 (music and lyrics); Theme from Maude, 1972; "The Way We Were," 1973; Theme from Good Times, 1974; "You Don't Bring Me Flowers," 1977; "How Do You Keep the Music Playing?," 1982 (music and lyrics); "If We Were in Love," 1982 (music by John Williams); "It Might Be You," 1982 (music by David Grusin); "No Matter What Happens," 1983; "No Wonder," 1983; "Papa Can You Hear Me?," 1983; "A Piece of Sky," 1983; "This Is One of Those Moments," 1983; "Tomorrow Night," 1983; "The Way He Makes Me Feel," 1983; "Where Is It Written?," 1983; "Will Someone Ever Look at Me That Way?," 1983; "I Knew I Loved You," 1984 (music and lyrics).

The Life

Alan Bergman (BURG-man) began writing music at the age of eleven. His strongest musical influence was Johnny Mercer, who became his mentor. While in high school Bergman wrote shows that were original works or parodies. Later, Bergman studied music and theater at the University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, and continued his studies at University of California, Los Angeles, where he met Mercer. They worked together for two years, and Bergman said this was the most significant part of his education. Mercer taught him to understand the craft of singing and how to use words to create specific images.

During World War II Bergman started writing and directing shows for the Army's Special Services, and from 1945 to 1953 he directed television shows for CBS in Philadelphia. During this time he wrote musical production numbers for singer Jo Stafford's shows as well as songs for Fred Astaire, for revues, and for nightclub acts.

In 1958 Bergman married Marilyn Keith, who became his career partner. Marilyn and Alan were born in the same hospital in Brooklyn and raised in the same neighborhood, but they did not meet until they both had relocated to Los Angeles.

The Music

Bergman's lyrics are connected to and drawn from the dramatic context for which he is writing. As an exercise he would find specific scenes in short stories to illustrate with his lyrics. This prepared him for professional film work. Bergman would prefer to write the lyrics once the melody has been created, because lyrics are on the tip of the melody. While writing, he would always sing the lyrics aloud in order to diagnose problems in the text. He found it easier to write for someone with an established performance character, for example, Frank Sinatra.

"The Windmills of Your Mind." This was one of Bergman and his wife's first big successes. With music by Michel Legrand, it was written for the 1968 film The Thomas Crown Affair. The film's director, Norman Jewison, asked Legrand to write both the score and the theme song. Initially, Legrand approached composer-arranger Quincy Jones to write the lyrics to the song. Instead, Jones recommended a young couple, with whom he had just finished working. After meeting with Legrand and deciding on the style of the song, Bergman and his wife watched the motion picture with the director and discussed the point of the song as well as its function in the film. The crucial scene for the song was the protagonist flying in a glider as he plans the robbery. Jewison shot six minutes of the scene with only the sound of the wind, no dialogue and no sound effects. He did not want a song that would depict part of the plot or identify the character; rather, he wanted a stand-alone song that would enhance the character's restlessness. Initially, Legrand wrote six different melodies from which to choose, and the Bergmans, captivated by one, started the lyrics with just a line or phrase. The melody they chose had a circular quality, reflecting the action on the screen and portraying a mood with rhyming words, such as wheel and reel, spinning and running, sweeping and whirling. It earned the first Academy Award for the Bergmans and for Legrand.

"The Way We Were." In "The Way We Were," from the motion picture of the same title directed by Sydney Pollack, composer Marvin Hamlisch wanted to depict the life cycle of the main characters in the film: how they met, fell in love, started a life together, and finally separated. Following the story line, Hamlisch wanted to express a feeling of hope in what became a tragic development. Bergman and his wife were recommended to Hamlisch by film producer Ray Stark, and at this point the Bergmans already had a long-standing relationship with Barbra Streisand, who starred in the film and sang the theme song. When they initially presented the song to Streisand, Bergman suggested that he and his wife could improve it. Before the film was finished, Streisand and the Bergmans crafted a second version of the song, which the singer preferred. Pollack decided to put both songs on the sound track to compare them in the context of the scene. The original version seemed to work better, with its change in rhythm as it moves through three sections. The movement of the melody is enhanced by the text: On the chromatic change, Bergman sets the word color; in the B section, the stress of the words falls when the melody ascends. In 1973 Hamlisch and the Bergmans won the Academy Award for Best Song for "The Way We Were."

Musical Legacy

Bergman's career started rising as Broadway and Hollywood musicals were beginning their decline. His writing style belonged to a new generation of songwriters, whose roots were not set deeply in the Broadway musicals or the New York music scene. Bergman and his wife created a new school of writing lyrics and influenced a younger generation of composers of film music and of musicals.

In 1983 Bergman and his wife wrote an unprecedented three of the five songs that were nominated for an Academy Award for Best Song: "How Do You Keep the Music Playing?" (with Legrand, from the 1982 motion picture Best Friends); "It Might Be You" (with Dave Grusin, from the 1982 motion picture Tootsie); and "If We Were in Love" (with John Williams, from the 1982 motion picture Yes, Giorgio). Over the span of their careers, Bergman and his wife have been nominated for many Academy Awards. Among their main collaborators have been Legrand, Grusin, Hamlisch, Lew Spence, and Henry Mancini.

Bergman was inducted into Songwriters Hall of Fame in 1980, and in 1995 he was awarded an honorary doctorate from Berklee College of Music. In 2007 Bergman and the Berlin Big Band and Radio Orchestra recorded an album, Lyrically, Alan Bergman, featuring his and his wife's songs.

Daniela Candillari

Further Reading

Furia, Philip, and Michael Lasser. America's Songs:. The Stories Behind the Songs of Broadway, Hollywood, and Tin Pan Alley. New York: Routledge 2006. The book presents some of the most popular songs from 1910 to 1977 and provides a short history of each one. Featured are songs by Alan Bergman.

Hamlisch, Marvin, and Gerald Gardner. The Way I Was. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1992. Hamlisch talks about his life and career, and he includes information about his main collaborators, Alan and Marilyn Bergman.

Pohly, Linda. The Barbra Streisand Companion: A Guide to Her Vocal Style and Repertoire. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2000. A discussion of Streisand's interpretive style of singing, with references to songs by the Bergmans. Includes discography and bibliography.

See also: Fain, Sammy; Hamlisch, Marvin; Legrand, Michel; Mancini, Henry; Mercer, Johnny.

Luciano Berio

Italian classical composer

An important avant-garde and electronic composer, Berio is best known for the quotation, the deconstruction, and the transformation of preexisting musical materials.

Born: October 24, 1925; Imperia, Oneglia, Italy
Died: May 27, 2003; Rome, Italy

Principal works

BALLETS (music): Linea, 1974 (for two pianos, vibraphone, and marimba; choreography by Félix Blaska); Per la dolce memoria di quel giorno, 1974 (choreography by Maurice Bejart).

CHAMBER WORKS: Toccata, 1939 (for two pianos); Divertimento, 1946 (for string trio); Tre pezzi, 1947 (for three clarinets); Différences, 1959 (for flute, clarinet, harp, viola, cello, and tape); Sincronie, 1964 (for string quartet); Memory, 1970 (for electric piano and electric harpsichord); Musica leggera, 1974 (for flute, viola, and cello); Duetti, 1983 (thirty-four pieces for two violins); Accordo, 1981 (for four groups of wind instruments); Voci, 1984 (for viola and instrumental ensemble); Call, 1985 (for brass quintet); Naturale, 1986 (for viola, tam-tam, and tape); Ricorrenze, 1987 (for wind quartet); String Quartet No. 3, 1993 (Notturno).

OPERAS (music): Mimusique No. 2, 1955 (libretto by Roberto Leydi); Allez-Hop!, 1959 (libretto by Italo Calvino); Esposizione, 1963 (libretto by Edoardo Sanguineti); Passaggio, 1963 (libretto by Sanguineti); Opera, 1970 (libretto by Alban Berg); Diario immaginario, 1975 (radio opera for chorus, orchestra, and tape; libretto by Vittorio Sermonti); Duo (teatro immaginario), 1982 (radio opera for baritone, two violins, choir, and orchestra; libretto by Calvino); La vera storia, 1982 (libretto by Calvino); Un re in ascolto, 1984 (libretto by Calvino); Outis, 1996 (libretto by Dario del Corno); Cronaca del luogo, 1999 (libretto by Talia Pecker-Berio).

ORCHESTRAL WORKS: Preludio a una festa marina, 1944; Concertino, 1949; Nones, 1954; Variazioni, 1954; Allelujah I, 1955; Variazioni "Ein Mädchen oder Weibchen," 1956; Serenata I, 1957 (for flute and fourteen instruments); Allelujah II, 1958; Sequenza series, 1958-2002; Tempi concertati, 1959; Quaderni I, 1959; Quaderni II, 1961; Quaderni III, 1962; Chemins I, 1964; Chemins II, 1967; Chemins III, 1968; Concerto, 1973 (for two pianos and orchestra); Still, 1973; Eindrücke, 1974; Points on the Curve to Find, 1974; Chemins IV, 1975; Corale on Sequenza VIII, 1975 (for violin, two horns, and strings); Il ritorno degli snovidenia, 1977; Encore, 1978; Chemins V, 1980; Fanfara, 1982; Requies, 1985; Formazioni, 1987; Concerto II, 1989 (Echoing Curves); Continuo, 1989; Festum, 1989; Rendering, 1989; Alternatim, 1997 (for clarinet, viola, and orchestra); SOLO, 1999 (for trombone and orchestra).

PIANO WORKS: Wasserklavier, 1965; Luftklavier, 1985; Feuerklavier, 1989; Brin, 1990; Leaf, 1990; Sonata, 2001.

INSTRUMENTAL WORKS: Gesti, 1966 (for recorder); Comma, 1987 (for clarinet); Psy, 1989 (for double bass).

TAPE WORKS: Mimusique No. 1, 1953; Ritratto di città, 1954 (with Bruno Maderna; for one-track tape); Mutazioni, 1955 (for one-track tape); Perspectives, 1957 (for two-track tape); Thema: Omaggio a Joyce, 1958 (for two-track tape); Momenti, 1960 (for four-track tape); Visage, 1961 (for two-track tape); A-Ronne, 1975 (radio documentary for five actors; based on Edoardo Sanguineti's poem).

VOCAL WORKS: O bone Jesu, 1946 (for chorus); Tre canzoni popolari, 1947 (for female voice and piano); Tre liriche greche, 1948 (for solo voice and piano); Due pezzi sacri, 1949 (for two sopranos, piano, two harpsichords, timpani, and bells); Magnificat, 1949 (for two sopranos and orchestra); Opus Number Zoo, 1951 (for speakers, wind instruments, and French horn; lyrics by Rhoda Levine); El mar la mar, 1952 (for two sopranos and instruments; based on texts by Rafael Alberti); Chamber Music, 1953 (for female voice, cello, clarinet, and harp; based on James Joyce's poetry); Circles, 1960 (for female voice, harp, and percussion; based on texts by E. E. Cummings); Epifanie, 1961 (for female voice and orchestra; based on texts by Marcel Proust, James Joyce, Antonio Machado, Claude Simon, Bertolt Brecht, and Edoardo Sanguineti); Folk Songs, 1964 (for soprano and seven instruments); Traces, 1964 (for soprano, mezzo-soprano, two actors, chorus, and orchestra); Laborintus II, 1965 (for voices and orchestra; libretto by Sanguineti); Rounds, 1965 (for solo voice and harpsichord); O King, 1967 (for solo voice and instruments); Air, 1969 (for soprano and orchestra; libretto by Alessandro Striggio); Questo vuol dire che, 1969 (for three female voices, small chorus, instruments, and tape); Sinfonia, 1969 (for eight solo voices and orchestra); Agnus, 1971 (for two female voices, three clarinets, and a drone); Bewegung, 1971 (for baritone and orchestra); E vo', 1972 (for soprano and instruments); Recital I, 1972 (for solo voice and instruments; libretto by Berio, Andrea Mosetti, and Sanguineti); Folk Songs, 1973 (for soprano and orchestra); Calmo, 1974 (for soprano and instruments; based on texts by Homer); Cries of London, 1974 (for six solo voices); Chants parallèles, 1975; Coro, 1976 (based on folk texts by Pablo Neruda); Ofanim, 1988 (for female voice, children's chorus, instruments, and electronics); Canticum novissimi testamenti, 1989 (for voices, four clarinets, and four saxophones).

The Life

Luciano Berio (lew-CHYAH-noh BEH-ree-oh) was born in Oneglia, Italy on October 24, 1925. His father and grandfather were organists, and Berio received both formal and informal music training. Studying piano, Berio performed in chamber settings from the age of nine, and though he began composing in his teens, he remained primarily a pianist until young adulthood. Forced into military service in Italian leader Benito Mussolini's army, Berio injured his hand in an explosion during his military training, ending his career prospects as a pianist.

After the war, Berio returned to study composition at the Milan Conservatory. Accompanying provided a small income for him, and it was while accompanying a voice class that he met Cathy Berberian, an American studying voice in Milan on a Fulbright Fellowship. They were married in 1950, and she was extremely influential on his compositional development, premiering several of his most important works in the 1960's.

After Berio returned from a trip to the United States in 1951, where he studied with Luigi Dallapiccola at the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, he took on work at RAI, an Italian radio and television network. In 1955, along with Bruno Maderna, he cofounded Studio Fonologia, and he invited important composers such as John Cage to work there. In 1960 Berio returned to the United States to teach at Tanglewood. Later he substituted for Darius Milhaud at Mills College in Oakland, California, and in 1965 he began teaching at the Juilliard School, where he remained until 1972. He was an important teacher, and his students included Louis Andriessen, Steve Reich, and Bernard Rands.

While teaching, Berio also maintained an active traveling schedule, attending premieres around the world. Divorced from Berberian, Berio married an American psychologist, Susan Oyama, in 1965, with whom he had two children. Eventually his busy traveling schedule caused him to stop teaching, and he returned to Italy in 1972. He was the director of IRCAM, the institute for the scientific study of music and sound, in Paris from 1974 to 1980, at the invitation of Pierre Boulez. Berio founded the Tempo Reale studio in Florence in 1987 after he and his third wife, the musicologist Talia Pecker, settled outside Siena. Though he served as the Distinguished Composer in Residence at Harvard University from 1994 until 2000, it was primarily at his Italian home that he composed until his death in 2003.

The Music

Berio actively composed from the 1950's until his death in 2003, and he remained intellectually curious throughout his life. Berio held a lifelong fascination with reinterpretation and transformation, both in individual pieces as well as between pieces. Parts of works reappear in later works, and many works were later revised, reorchestrated, or arranged for different performance mediums. Ideas or themes from electronic works influenced his acoustic ones and vice versa. He composed fourteen Sequenzas for solo instruments from 1958 through 2002. For each one he fastidiously studied the physical components and requirements of performance on each instrument. Thus, many embody the extreme possibilities of performance virtuosity.

Early Works. At the Milan Conservatory, Berio was a member of the composition class of Giorgio Federico Ghedini, an Italian composer who proved a major influence on him. Berio studied the works of Igor Stravinsky, Béla Bartók, Arnold Schoenberg, and Sergei Prokofiev, among others, and he experimented with serialism. As was the case for many other young Italian composers, Dallapiccola served as the model for serial composition. After Berio studied with him at Tanglewood, many of his works displayed Dallapiccola's influence. Chamber Music is the most well known of these. In the early 1950's, Berio also began to experiment with electronic music, and Mimusique No. 1 for tape was his first electronic work. However, the three most important stylistic works from the 1950's are Thema: Omaggio a Joyce for tape, in which Berio electronically manipulated the words of James Joyce and Cathy Berberian's voice to provide an aural parallel to Joyce's textual world; Sequenza No. 1 for flute and the first of fourteen Sequenzas for solo instruments; and Différences for flute, clarinet, harp, cello, and tape, in which Berio manipulated recordings of the instruments to merge the tape with the acoustic instruments rather than juxtaposing the two.

Circles. Written for Berberian in 1960, Circles takes its text from three poems by E. E. Cummings. Employing the same compositional techniques used two years earlier in the tape work Thema: Omaggio a Joyce, but using only acoustic instruments, Berio scored this for female voice, harp, and two percussionists. The work stands as a testament to Berio's fascination with cycles, symmetry, and intertextuality.

As the detailed performance notes specify, the singer is positioned at the front of the stage for the beginning of the piece, but, as the song cycle progresses, the singer gradually recedes into the ensemble. The vocalist is asked to play various percussion instruments, such as finger cymbals and claves, and the instrumentalists are asked to imitate the voice throughout, blurring the division between the singer and the players. As is found in later Berio works, the text is broken into phonemes that the singer is asked to sing, whisper, or speak. Eventually the line between poetry and music, singer and instrumentalist has been erased as the percussionists sing and the singer is simply a member of the ensemble.

Luciano Berio. (© Christopher Felver/CORBIS)

Composed as an abcb'a' arch, the musical material is recycled throughout. When the second poem reappears, it is accompanied by fragments from the first song, and musical themes are interwoven. This type of intertextuality is an important aspect of Berio's style, a technique he used throughout his life. For example, the Sequenzas were recycled and transformed into another series, Chemins, and in his opera La vera storia, the text from one act is musically reinterpreted in another.

Sinfonia. Having established himself as an important composer through his work in the 1950's and 1960's, Berio received many commissions in the late 1960's. Sinfonia was commissioned by the New York Philharmonic on the occasion of its 125th anniversary, and it was dedicated to its conductor, Leonard Bernstein. The first four movements premiered on October 10, 1968, with the Swingle Singers, the New York Philharmonic, and Berio conducting. It was originally written in four movements, and a fifth movement was added in 1969.

Throughout the five movements, Berio quotes not only text but also music from earlier composers, such as Hector Berlioz, Ludwig van Beethoven, and Gustav Mahler, as well as Berio's contemporaries, such as Pierre Boulez and Karlheinz Stockhausen. The second movement is an earlier work, O King, written in 1967 in memory of Martin Luther King, Jr., and using the vowels and consonants from his name. Sinfonia is often called the first postmodern work because the most salient features of the piece are its references to preexisting musical sources rather than the resultant harmony or texture. The music of Arnold Schoenberg may be heard with text from the theorist Claude Levi-Strauss, and the singers sometimes seem to comment on the musical references themselves. Whereas Berio engages in textual deconstruction in Circles and the tape work Visage, here he deconstructs the music, creating not a pastiche or collage so much as a transformation of the sonic elements. In doing so, Berio calls into question the definition of an original musical work.

Points on the Curve to Find. With Sinfonia, Berio received unusually wide popularity for a contemporary composer. However, many of Berio's works from the 1970's emphasize less his deconstructionist techniques and more his interest in musical process and static harmonic fields. Points on the Curve to Find is scored for piano and twenty instruments. The title refers to a geometric curve, and in the work, the piano functions as the curve.

The piece lasts just more than eleven minutes, and the piano part features rapid thirty-second notes and other figures that Berio designates should be played as quickly as possible. The other instruments resonate aspects of the piano's curve, by doubling it in spots, echoing it in others, and frequently passing it back and forth among themselves. The piano part consists entirely of a ten-note musical sequence that cycles throughout. During each cycle, different pairs of the sequence are trilled, so that different harmonic fields are emphasized. What emerges is a constantly evolving, fanciful work, full of frenetic energy and ornamentation. It is often linked to other works from this period, such as Linea, for two pianos, vibraphone, and marimba, because of its emphasis on limited pitch material, musical process, and static harmonic fields. Berio remained committed to traditional formal structures, and this work exhibits a remarkable ability to fuse strict compositional methods with traditional dramatic formal shape.

Sequenzas I-XIV. Beginning in 1958 with Sequenza I for solo flute, Berio finished his last Sequenza, written for cello, in 2002. The fourteen Sequenzas provide a rare insight into the wide-ranging compositional interests and styles of the composer over an almost forty-five-year period. Each is intended as a study in what is possible on the instrument, and all require virtuosic performers. For each, Berio fastidiously studied the possibilities for performance. For Sequenza III for solo voice, Berio mapped out various resonant spots inside the mouth, and he requires the soloists to perform octave jumps, arpeggios, glissandi, and trills. Sequenza XII for bassoon solo requires circular breathing, among other extended techniques. The last cello Sequenza has a melancholy quality and folklike pizzicato rhythms.

Musical Legacy

Berio's intellectual curiosity led him in many stylistic directions over his career, but throughout he recognized the theatricality inherent in any musical performance. He sought to blur boundaries, using serialism if it suited the work, but he never prescribed to a specific orthodoxy. Credited with being hugely influential in electronic music, not only because of his work in founding his own electronic studios but also because of his employment of new electronic techniques to musical ends, he also influenced later generations of composers through his refusal to restrict his music to a singular style. Rather than capitalizing on the huge success of Sinfonia by continuing to write music that deconstructed the musical canon, he turned to more traditional compositional concerns, such as harmony and economy of musical means. Though he was the Italian representative of the Darmstadt School generation in the late 1950's, he was not part of the political infighting that characterized many composers from that period. He actively collaborated with other composers, and his work will forever be linked with his intellectual contemporaries in other fields, such as Bertolt Brecht, Levi-Strauss, and Umberto Eco.

Mary J. King

Further Reading

Berio, Luciano. Remembering the Future. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 2006. This short work provides Berio's insights into his works and the works of other composers.

Osmond-Smith, David. Berio. Oxford, England: Oxford University Press, 1991. A thorough overview of Berio's life and works, including a description of his musical language, his use of computers at IRCAM and Tempo Reale, the importance of folk music, and more.

See also: Babbitt, Milton; Barenboim, Daniel; Bartók, Béla; Berg, Alban; Bernstein, Leonard; Boulez, Pierre; Cage, John; Milhaud, Darius; Nono, Luigi; Reich, Steve; Schaeffer, Pierre; Schnittke, Alfred; Stockhausen, Karlheinz; Stravinsky, Igor; Watts, André.

Irving Berlin

Russian American musical-theater composer and lyricist

Composer of fifteen hundred songs, Berlin wrote in many styles—ragtime, swing, waltz, country, and classic Broadway—with an ear attuned to popular melody and lyrics and finding favor with generations of listeners.

Born: May 11, 1888; Mogilyov, Russia (now in Belarus)
Died: September 22, 1989; New York, New York
Also known as: Israel Baline (birth name)

Principal works

MUSICAL THEATER (music and lyrics): Ziegfeld Follies of 1911, 1911; Watch Your Step, 1914 (libretto by Harry B. Smith); Stop! Look! Listen!, 1915 (libretto by Smith); The Century Girl, 1916; Yip, Yip, Yaphank, 1918; Ziegfeld Follies of 1919, 1919; Ziegfeld Follies of 1920, 1920; Music Box Revue of 1921, 1921; Music Box Revue of 1922, 1922; Music Box Revue of 1923, 1923; Music Box Revue of 1924, 1924; The Cocoanuts, 1925 (libretto by George S. Kaufman); Ziegfeld Follies of 1927, 1927; Face the Music, 1932 (libretto by Moss Hart); As Thousands Cheer, 1933 (libretto by Hart); Louisiana Purchase, 1940 (libretto by Morrie Ryskind); This Is the Army, 1942; Annie Get Your Gun, 1946 (libretto by Herbert Fields and Dorothy Fields); Miss Liberty, 1949 (libretto by Robert E. Sherwood); Call Me Madam, 1950 (libretto by Howard Lindsay and Russell Crouse); Mr. President, 1962 (libretto by Lindsay and Crouse).

SONGS (music and lyrics): "Marie from Sunny Italy," 1907; "Alexander's Ragtime Band," 1911; "When I Lost You," 1913; "God Bless America," 1918; "Lazy," 1924; "Always," 1925; "Blue Skies," 1927; "Puttin' on the Ritz," 1929; "How Deep Is the Ocean (How High Is the Sky)," 1932; "Say It Isn't So," 1932; "Maybe It's Because I Love You Too Much," 1933; "Cheek to Cheek," 1935; "Top Hat, White Tie, and Tails," 1935; "I'm Putting All My Eggs in One Basket," 1936; "Let's Face the Music and Dance," 1936; "White Christmas," 1942; "Love and the Weather," 1947.

The Life

The youngest of eight children born to Moses and Leah Lipkin Baline in western Siberia, young Israel moved with his family to America in 1893 when their village was destroyed in a pogrom. Moses was unable to find work as a cantor, so he supported his large family as a kosher meat inspector and teacher. Life was hard in the shadow of the Manhattan Bridge and got worse when Moses died in 1901. Israel dropped out of school, left home, and supported himself as a street performer when he was just thirteen years old. With his innate musical talent, he was hired to be a singing waiter at Chinatown's Pelham Café. When the owner requested an Italian song, eighteen-year-old Israel Baline supplied the lyrics and house pianist Mike Nicholson the music in order to create "Marie from Sunny Italy." While the song was not a success—the lyricist earned thirty-seven cents—it was published and gave the wordsmith a new name: I. Berlin. The young songwriter embraced the Berlin typo and decided that the "I" would become Irving, replacing Israel and his nickname Izzy.

As songwriting clearly did not pay, Berlin returned to being a singing waiter, graduating to Jimmy Kelly's on Union Square in 1908. Publisher Ted Snyder was so impressed by Berlin's parodies of popular songs that in 1909 he signed the performer for twenty-five dollars a week as staff lyricist. Almost immediately, a Berlin/Snyder creation ("She Was a Dear Little Girl") was put into the Broadway musical The Boys and Betty. Berlin went from homeless street urchin to professional lyricist in only seven years, evidence of a fierce work ethic that was to serve him for the rest of his life.

After some success in popular music and on Broadway, Berlin had financial stability for the first time in his life. He married Dorothy Goetz in 1912, but she caught typhoid while on their honeymoon in Cuba and died five months after their wedding. Berlin channeled his grief into "When I Lost You," a heartrending ballad that went on to sell two million copies. Berlin was a private man, and this is the only lyric he ever acknowledged to have come from direct personal experience.

Plunging himself into work, Berlin became the most prolific Broadway composer from 1914 to 1926. He allowed himself to be distracted when he met journalist Ellin Mackay in 1924. Ellin's Catholic father was not going to lose his daughter to a Jewish immigrant, Tin Pan Alley musician—albeit an amazingly successful one—so he shipped his daughter off to Europe. The two lovers were not deterred, however, and eloped on January 4, 1926. Enraged, Mackay cut his daughter out of his will; Berlin responded by signing over to his bride the copyright (and royalties) of his newly minted "Always," a song that made a small fortune. The loving couple had four children.

The 1920's were very good to Berlin personally and professionally, but with the death of his son, the looming Great Depression, and a growing insecurity about this own talent, he became depressed, a condition that would plague him for the rest of his life. It was in evidence much later, in the 1960's, when the relative failure of his last Broadway show, Mr. President, and Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's cancellation of the film Say It with Music prompted Berlin to remark, "It was as if I owned a store, and people no longer wanted to buy what I had to sell." After singing "God Bless America" at the White House for prisoners of war returning from Vietnam in 1973, Berlin never made another public appearance. He kept in touch with friends and conducted business affairs by phone and lost his beloved wife Ellin in 1988, after sixty-two years of marriage. Berlin died in his sleep at his home in Beekman Place, New York City, a year later at the age of 101.

The Music

A chronic insomniac, Berlin wrote primarily at night. He set a personal goal of writing at least five songs a week, freely admitting that most were not good, estimating that only one song out of ten would be a success. This relentless motivation to work on his craft resulted in more than eight hundred high-quality songs copyrighted by Berlin. He never learned to read or write music, so he employed music secretaries to write down what he played (or sang to them over the phone).

Early Works. When ragtime was popular, Berlin turned out more than two dozen rags, including "That Mesmerizing Mendelssohn Tune," "Yiddle on Your Fiddle Play Some Rag Time," "That Beautiful Rag," "Everything in America Is Ragtime," and "That Revolutionary Rag." Ironically, his "Alexander's Ragtime Band" is not a rag but a song about ragtime. Nevertheless, with its syncopated rhythms and vernacular syntax, it was completely American in tone and became an international hit. It sold two million copies of sheet music in its first eighteen months, before the age of radio.

Influenced by his mentor and idol, George M. Cohan, Berlin set out to write songs that were accessible, succinct, and conversational in tone. His work added another Cohan dimension in 1918, when patriotism became a major theme in his lyrics. That year he was naturalized as a U.S. citizen, was drafted into the Army, and wrote the Army fund-raiser Yip, Yip, Yaphank. In the cast of three hundred servicemen (and one woman), Sergeant Berlin stopped the show every night with "Oh! How I Hate to Get Up in the Morning." During World War II, Berlin wrote a new fund-raiser, This Is the Army (for stage and film), which reprised "Oh! How I Hate to Get Up in the Morning" and introduced "I'm Getting Tired So I Can Sleep" and "I Left My Heart at the Stage Door Canteen." (The show's racially integrated cast of military personnel was the first such unit in World War II.) This Is the Army raised more than $15 million for the Army Relief Emergency Fund to aid wives and parents of U.S. servicemen.

Irving Berlin. (Library of Congress)

Music Business. While most songwriters find managing their career to be the extent of their interest in business, Berlin established a music publishing firm, built and managed a theater, was a theatrical producer, and in 1914 helped establish the American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers (ASCAP).

From World War I to 1943, Berlin partnered with Saul Bornstein to create and run Irving Berlin, Inc., which published thousands of songs by others, including Buddy DeSylva, Lew Brown, Ray Henderson, and scores from early Disney films. The company was reorganized in 1943 to only publish songs by Berlin; the Berlin catalog was turned over to the Rodgers and Hammerstein Organization by his daughters after his death in 1989.

In 1921 Berlin (in conjunction with producer Sam Harris) built the Music Box Theatre on 45th Street in New York City. Elegant and intimate, this was the first theater built exclusively to showcase revues written by one composer. Even though there were only four editions of the Music Box Revues, these lavish, intricately crafted shows put the theater in the black within a year and yielded another collection of Berlin standards: "Say It with Music," "Lady of the Evening," "I'm Looking for Daddy Long Legs," "What'll I Do?," and "Don't Send Me Back to Petrograd." Before 1940 Berlin preferred the revue format over book musicals and revolutionized the form with Face the Music and As Thousands Cheer. The former introduced "Let's Have Another Cup of Coffee," while the latter showcased "Easter Parade" and three numbers for Ethel Waters: "Harlem on My Mind," "Supper Time," and "Heat Wave." Berlin was involved as a producer with shows booked into his Music Box Theatre, and he also coproduced some of his own shows. As successful in business as he was in art, he made another fortune in this arena.

In publishing, the standard practice is that the lyricist gets 25 percent, the composer 25 percent, and the publisher 50 percent—so songs sold through Irving Berlin, Inc., collected 100 percent of their sales. He was also the first Hollywood songwriter to get a percentage of a film's gross.

Even though "Blue Skies" was written as a pop song, it soon found its way into the Broadway musical Betsy (the rest of the score was by Richard Rodgers and Lorenz Hart) and was sung by Al Jolson in the first sound film, The Jazz Singer (1927). Other independent blockbusters include "Lazy," "How Deep Is the Ocean (How High Is the Sky)," "Say It Isn't So," and "Love and the Weather." It had been originally written (but never used) for Yip, Yip, Yaphank, but Berlin rewrote "God Bless America" for Kate Smith in 1938. He gave the copyright of the country's "unofficial national anthem" to the Boy Scouts and Girl Scouts of America, who continue to benefit from its royalties ($500,000 in 2004). Celine Dion's recording of "God Bless America" reached number one in 2001.

Hollywood and Broadway. Berlin spent the bulk of the 1930's and 1940's in Hollywood, where "White Christmas" won the Academy Award. Bing Crosby's original recording of "White Christmas" became the best-selling single in history, and, encompassing all versions of the song, it has sold more than one hundred million units. Other standards written for the silver screen include "Puttin' on the Ritz," "Maybe It's Because I Love You Too Much," "Top Hat, White Tie, and Tails," "Cheek to Cheek," and "Let's Face the Music and Dance." Responding to the introduction of the integrated book Broadway musical, Berlin wrote Louisiana Purchase, Annie Get Your Gun, Miss Liberty, Call Me Madam, and Mr. President. Demonstrating that he could write for character and story, Berlin moved past Tin Pan Alley and proved he belonged in the golden age of American musical theater. Even though some critics were unimpressed with the production, Annie Get Your Gun surprised even the most dedicated of Berlin fans. Almost every song became a classic, and "There's No Business Like Show Business" is now the unofficial anthem of show business. Averaging 450 productions annually in the United States and Canada, the musical enjoyed a rousing Broadway revival in 1999 (with an altered book).

For a composer who worked hard to make a song sound simple, once in a while Berlin wrote a quodlibet or "double" song. "Play a Simple Melody" was his first polyphonic duet in which two melodies are introduced in separate stanzas, and then are sung together. Other counterpoint songs include "You're Just in Love," "Empty Pockets Filled with Love," and "An Old Fashioned Wedding," written for the 1966 Lincoln Center revival of Annie Get Your Gun. Berlin continued to copyright new songs until 1987, two years before his death.

Musical Legacy

The songwriter who personified Tin Pan Alley pop songs, helped define the Broadway musical and revue, and gave eighteen Hollywood film musicals many classic songs could not read or write music, could play in only one key at the piano, and yet knew the strength of his lyrics was appealing to emotions rather than intellect. In his twenty-one Broadway scores (books and revues), Berlin set out not to revolutionize the Broadway musical but to continue the trend started by Cohan, moving it away from its European roots and embracing the musical melting pot that was New York. Nearly three hundred of his songs—from Tin Pan Alley, Broadway, and Hollywood—made the Top 10 on the pop charts. The Berlin catalog earned seven million dollars in royalties in 2004. His songs have pleased the public for decades.

Showered with awards, Berlin received the Congressional Medal of Honor in 1954, a Grammy Lifetime Achievement Award in 1968, and the Medal of Freedom in 1977. Composer Jerome Kern commented that Berlin > honestly absorbs the vibrations emanating from the people, manners, and life of his time and, in turn, gives these impressions back to the world—simplified, clarified, glorified. In short . . . Irving Berlin has no place in American music, he is American music.

>
> Bud Coleman

Further Reading

Barrett, Mary Ellin Berlin. Irving Berlin: A Daughter's Memoir. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1994. Berlin's oldest child reveals her father's doubts, depressions, and nervous breakdowns, as well as celebrating the artist in him.

Berlin, Irving. The Complete Lyrics of Irving Berlin. Edited by Robert Kimball and Linda Emmet. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2001. Contains lyrics to twelve hundred Berlin songs written over eighty years, including four hundred songs never before published.

Gottlieb, Robert, and Robert Kimball. Reading Lyrics. New York: Pantheon Books, 2000. Brief appraisal of Berlin's career; includes lyrics to thirty-nine of his songs.

Hill, Tony L. "Irving Berlin." In American Song Lyricists, 1920-1960. Vol. 265 in Dictionary of Literary Biography, edited by Philip Furia. Detroit: Gale, 2002. Succinct chapter on Berlin the composer, lyricist, and businessman.

Hischak, Thomas S. The American Musical Film Song Encyclopedia. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1999. Fifty-six of Berlin's songs are briefly described, including who originally sang them, which film they appeared in, and who subsequently recorded the song.

_____. "As Thousands Cheered: Irving Berlin." Word Crazy: Broadway Lyricists from Cohan to Sondheim. New York: Praeger, 1991. Concise chapter on Berlin the lyricist.

Leopold, David. Irving Berlin's Show Business. New York: Harry N. Abrams, 2005. Explores Berlin's influence on American popular culture.

Wilder, Alec. American Popular Song: The Great Innovators, 1900-1950. Edited by James T. Maher. New York: Oxford University Press, 1972. Thoroughly analyzes Berlin's work as a composer. Marveling at Berlin's endless inventiveness and lack of ego, Wilder argues that Berlin always put the integrity of the song first (its mood, its idea, its sound) rather than making his output recognizable by stylistic conformity.

See also: Arlen, Harold; Armstrong, Louis; Burke, Johnny; Cohan, George M.; Crosby, Bing; Fields, Dorothy; Fitzgerald, Ella; Goodman, Benny; Grappelli, Stéphane; Guthrie, Woody; Hammerstein, Oscar, II; Hart, Lorenz; Henderson, Fletcher; Herbert, Victor; Kern, Jerome; Kreisler, Fritz; Lee, Peggy; Lerner, Alan Jay; Mercer, Johnny; Merman, Ethel; Newman, Alfred; Peterson, Oscar; Porter, Cole; Rodgers, Richard; Ronstadt, Linda; Smith, Kate; Steiner, Max; Tiomkin, Dimitri; Vaughan, Sarah; Whiteman, Paul; Williams, Mary Lou.

Elmer Bernstein

American film-score and musical-theater composer

One of Hollywood's most prolific and versatile composers, Bernstein wrote music for more than two hundred film and television productions, pioneering the use of jazz and electronic music.

Born: April 4, 1922; New York, New York
Died: August 18, 2004; Ojai, California

Principal works

FILM SCORES: Saturday's Hero, 1951; Boots Malone, 1952; Sudden Fear, 1952; Cat-Women of the Moon, 1953; Robot Monster, 1953; The Man with the Golden Arm, 1955; The Ten Commandments, 1956; The Magnificent Seven, 1960; To Kill a Mockingbird, 1962; The Making of the President 1960, 1963; The Hallelujah Trail, 1965; Hawaii, 1966; Thoroughly Modern Millie, 1967; I Love You, Alice B. Toklas!, 1968; True Grit, 1969; Blind Terror, 1971; Cahill U.S. Marshal, 1973; From Noon Till Three, 1976; Animal House, 1978; Little Women, 1978; Airplane!, 1980; An American Werewolf in London, 1981; Stripes, 1981; Ghost Busters, 1984; ¡Three Amigos!, 1986; The Good Mother, 1988; My Left Foot, 1989; The Grifters, 1990; Cape Fear, 1991; Rambling Rose, 1991; The Age of Innocence, 1993; Lost in Yonkers, 1993; Devil in a Blue Dress, 1995; The Rainmaker, 1997; Wild Wild West, 1999; Far from Heaven, 2002; The Rising of the Moon, 2002.

MUSICAL THEATER: How Now, Dow Jones, 1967 (lyrics by Carol Leigh; libretto by Max Shulman); Merlin, 1983 (lyrics by Don Black; libretto by Richard Levinson).

The Life

Elmer Bernstein (BURN-steen) received encouragement from his family to pursue the arts. He performed as a professional dancer, won prizes for painting, and received a piano scholarship at age twelve. He represented the United States as a pianist and conductor from 1939 through 1950, performing in concerts throughout the world. During World War II, he did arrangements for American folk music and wrote dramatic scores for military-broadcast radio shows. This led to writing music for two United Nations radio shows, and Bernstein's compositions drew the interest of Sidney Buchman, a vice president at Columbia Pictures.

Buchman hired him to compose scores for Saturday's Hero and Boots Malone. His score for Sudden Fear in 1952 drew even more attention. Bernstein's career stalled, however, during the blacklisting of Hollywood celebrities by the supporters of U.S. Senator Joseph McCarthy, because Bernstein was identified with some left-wing causes. Consequently, Bernstein found himself reduced to scoring low-budget science-fiction films, although he set new trends in this capacity with his use of electronic music. Hired to compose dance music for Cecil B. DeMille's blockbuster The Ten Commandments, he ended up scoring the entire motion picture and went on to an award-winning career. He died of cancer in 2004.

The Music

The amazing variety of Bernstein's motion-picture scores makes him one of the most recognized composers of Hollywood's golden age. Nominated for fourteen Academy Awards plus many Emmy, Tony, Golden Globe, Western Heritage, and Grammy Awards, he had one of the longest careers of any composer in Hollywood history. He also helped establish many musical trends in film as he moved from one form to another. He was not related to composer Leonard Bernstein, but the two became known as "Bernstein West" (Elmer) and "Bernstein East" (Leonard).

Cat-Women of the Moon. Because he was swept up in the anti-Communist witch hunts of the early 1950's, Bernstein was blacklisted from scoring major motion pictures, and he was forced to find work on such films as this 3-D science-fiction adventure released in 1953. Despite the film's plot holes, the bad acting, and the low-budget production values, Bernstein's score generally gets high marks from critics. It helped meld science fiction with electronic music.

The Man with the Golden Arm. Once again, Bernstein's composing set a trend with this all-jazz score (utilized by other composers in many films that followed and in such television series in the late 1950's and early 1960's as Peter Gunn). The film, in which Frank Sinatra plays a heroin addict, received an Academy Award nomination in 1955 for Best Original Score.

The Ten Commandments. This score brought Bernstein back to the top rank of film composers. The 1956 epic was the last film directed by DeMille, who sought a composer who could achieve the Richard Wagner opera concept of blending action, setting, and dialogue through the background music. He hired Bernstein, who composed symphonic themes for each of the biblical events depicted.

The Magnificent Seven. If Bernstein had scored no other film, this 1960 Western would have assured his fame. One of the most recognized scores in cinema, it ranks in familiarity with the Lone Ranger, a popular radio and television cowboy, and his accompanying music, Gioacchino Rossini's overture to his opera William Tell (1829). For The Magnificent Seven, Bernstein was nominated for an Academy Award, and he won the Western Heritage Award for Best Original Score. The music was used in commercials for Marlboro cigarettes and Victoria Bitter beer, in three film sequels, and in a television series, further cementing its place in popular culture. Bernstein also scored the 1986 parody of this film, ¡Three Amigos! He went on to score other popular Westerns, including many starring John Wayne, but he never eclipsed the popularity of the music from The Magnificent Seven.

Thoroughly Modern Millie. This 1967 musical comedy brought Bernstein an Academy Award for Best Original Score, even though he did not write all the music. This musical comedy featured tunes from other sources, such as Jazz Baby (1919), which had been acquired and adapted by General Mills to advertise the Wheaties breakfast cereal. However, the original scoring for the comedic and dramatic events of the story, ranging from love stories to white slavery kidnappings, is what earned the award.

Animal House. This raucous 1978 National Lampoon comedy gave Bernstein another challenge, composing musical themes reflecting the time in which the story is set (1962). One piece of background music begins like "A Summer Place" (the theme of the 1952 film of the same name), but then it goes off into a comedic spree. Bernstein used other sly musical tricks to punch up the goofiness that made the picture so popular.

Cape Fear. When the composer learned that director Martin Scorsese was going to do a remake of Cape Fear, Bernstein wanted to adapt Bernard Herrmann's score from the 1962 original for the 1991 version. Bernstein estimated that he wrote about six minutes of original music in this suspense thriller; the rest was a rearrangement of Herrmann's music to fit the revised script.

Musical Legacy

One of Hollywood's most innovative composers, Bernstein utilized all styles of music in his work, and his innovations often changed the direction of other composers' music. Even his scoring of low-budget science-fiction films helped pave the way for the genre's electronic-style music, just as his work in Man with the Golden Arm did for jazz scores. The Magnificent Seven score is one of the most famous Western films scores. Bernstein's half-century career, among Hollywood's longest running, covered many forms of music, ranging from the ballet music in the 1954 stage production of Peter Pan to the score for the 2002 drama of social taboos of the 1950's, Far from Heaven. That was his last film score, and it was nominated for the Academy Award and the Golden Globe for Best Original Score.

Paul Dellinger

Further Reading

Bernstein, Elmer. Elmer Bernstein: An American Film Institute Seminar on His Work. Glen Rock, N.J.: Microfilming Corporation of America, 1977. Presents views from various scholars of film music on Bernstein's work and his influence on cinema.

Faulner, Robert R. Music on Demand: Composers and Careers in the Hollywood Film Industry. Piscataway, N.J.: Transaction, 2003. An overview of the careers of various composers for motion pictures, including a discussion of Bernstein.

McGilligan, Patrick, and Paul Buhle. Tender Comrades: A Backstory of the Hollywood Blacklist. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1999. Collection of interviews with Hollywood figures affected by the proceedings of the 1947 House Un-American Activities Committee and its blacklist, which for a time included Bernstein.

Morgan, David. Knowing the Score: Film Composers Talk About the Art, Craft, Blood, Sweat, and Tears of Writing for Cinema. New York: HarperEntertainment, 2000. Interviews and discussions with well-known film composers, including Bernstein.

See also: Andrews, Dame Julie; Diamond, Neil; Green, Adolph, and Betty Comden; Grusin, Dave; Herrmann, Bernard; Mancini, Henry; Sinatra, Frank; Waxman, Franz.

Leonard Bernstein

American classical, musical-theater, and film-score composer and conductor

Conductor, composer, pianist, and educator, Bernstein was passionate about sharing his enthusiasm about music with all ages. He discussed music in terms people could easily understand and encouraged in young people an appreciation of music with a series of well-regarded televised concerts.

Born: August 25, 1918; Lawrence, Massachusetts
Died: October 14, 1990; New York, New York
Also known as: Lenny Bernstein

Principal works

BALLETS (music): Fancy Free, 1944; Facsimile, 1946; Dybbuk, 1974.

CHORAL WORKS: Chichester Psalms, 1965 (for boy soloist, chorus, and orchestra); Songfest, 1977 (for six singers and orchestra).

FILM SCORES: On the Waterfront, 1954.

MUSICAL THEATER (music): On the Town, 1944 (lyrics by Betty Comden and Adolph Green); Peter Pan, 1950 (music and lyrics by Bernstein; based on James M. Barrie's play); Wonderful Town, 1953 (lyrics by Comden and Green); The Lark, 1955 (incidental music; libretto by Lillian Hellman; based on Jean Anouilh's play L'Alouette); West Side Story, 1957 (lyrics by Stephen Sondheim; libretto by Arthur Laurents); The Firstborn, 1958 (incidental music; based on Christopher Fry's play); Mass, 1971 (lyrics by Bernstein and Stephen Schwartz); 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, 1976 (lyrics and libretto by Alan Jay Lerner); The Madwoman of Central Park West, 1979 (lyrics by various composers; libretto by Phyllis Newman and Laurents).

OPERAS (music): Trouble in Tahiti, 1952 (libretto by Bernstein); Candide, 1956 (lyrics by Richard Wilbur, John La Touche, Bernstein, Dorothy Parker, and Lillian Hellman; libretto by Hellman); A Quiet Place, 1983 (libretto by Stephen Wadsworth).

ORCHESTRAL WORKS: Symphony No. 1, 1942 (Jeremiah); Symphony No. 2, 1949 (The Age of Anxiety; based on W. H. Auden's poem); Prelude, Fugue and Riffs, 1949 (for solo clarinet and jazz ensemble); Serenade, 1954 (based on Plato's Symposium); Fanfare I, 1961; Fanfare II, 1961; Symphony No. 3, 1963 (Kaddish); Slava! (A Political Overture), 1977; Divertimento, 1980; A Musical Toast, 1980; Halil, 1981; Jubilee Games, 1986; Concerto for Orchestra, 1989 (revision of Jubilee Games).

WRITINGS OF INTEREST: The Joy of Music, 1959; Young People's Concerts, 1962; The Infinite Variety of Music, 1966; The Unanswered Question, 1976.

The Life

On August 25, 1918, Louis Bernstein (BURN-stin) was born into a family of Russian immigrants. His parents, Samuel and Jesse Resnick Bernstein, had fled the anti-Semitism and pogroms that threatened Jews in Russia. One of three children, Bernstein was raised in a fervently religious, not notably musical family, although the family participated in the singing, clapping, and dancing that were part of the worship ceremonies at their synagogue. Bernstein, whose parents always called him Lenny, changed his name to Leonard at age sixteen.

His first exposure to music was accidental. His Aunt Clara was moving and needed a place to store her piano. The Bernsteins let her leave it with them.

Intrigued by this instrument, Bernstein immediately began to play it and soon got his parents to arrange piano lessons.

Although fascinated by music, Bernstein was expected to work at the family wholesale beauty-supply business when he finished high school rather than seek a career in music, which his father strongly opposed. By this time, the family had moved from Lawrence, Massachusetts, where Bernstein had been born, to Boston, where he entered the prestigious Boston Latin School. Upon graduation, he qualified for entrance to Harvard University, from which he graduated in 1939. He then went to Philadelphia, where he studied music with Frederick "Fritz" Reiner at the Curtis Institute of Music.

In 1940 Bernstein attended the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood in Massachusetts, where he first met and favorably impressed legendary conductor Serge Koussevitzky, who recommended to music director Artur Rodzinski that he offer the young man a then-vacant post as assistant conductor for the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, an awesome position for one not yet twenty-five.

Leonard Bernstein. (AP/Wide World Photos)

On November 14, 1943, conductor Bruno Walter, felled by influenza, was unable to conduct the orchestra, so Bernstein was brought in on short notice. Trembling from stage fright, Bernstein soon transfixed the audience with the virtuosity of his performance. The following day, a front-page account in The New York Times heaped lavish praise on his conducting. Such approbation led to Bernstein's receiving invitations from practically every major symphony orchestra in the United States to be guest conductor.

In 1957 Bernstein was appointed co-conductor with Dimitri Mitropoulos of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra; in 1958 he became its first full-fledged American conductor. He remained in this position until 1969, when, to the dismay of many, he resigned to devote more time to composing and engaging in work that would introduce young people to music. Bernstein remained fully engaged in musical activities for the rest of his life, conducting a concert at Tanglewood in August, 1990, just two months before he died in New York City on October 14.

The Music

Few musicians in the twentieth century possessed the versatility and enthusiasm that characterized Bernstein. An outstanding orchestral conductor, he was also a gifted and multifaceted composer, a pianist who sometimes played the piano portions in works he was conducting, and a musical educator who taught at such institutions as Harvard and Brandeis and wrote and performed for general audiences. Bernstein sought passionately to awaken in young people an appreciation for music and teach them the benefits of participating in and understanding it. Not only did he write books and compose musical pieces specifically directed at young people, but he also spent a great deal of time organizing and conducting a series of young people's concerts.

The Conductor. Bernstein started at the bottom rung of the musical ladder: as assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, though the job had more to do with paperwork and organizational skills than with music making. Nevertheless, Bernstein persevered, realizing that the position could lead to the creative work he fervently yearned to do.

As an assistant, Bernstein knew that he could be called upon to fill in for the conductor on short notice. He took that responsibility seriously, renting an apartment directly above the concert hall so that he could be available almost instantly were he called upon to fill in for a scheduled conductor. He studied the scores that were slated for performance and went so far as to buy himself a tuxedo, prescribed conductor attire.

Finally, in November, 1943, twenty-five-year-old Leonard Bernstein was called upon to replace an ailing Bruno Walter in an intricate program at Carnegie Hall. He had less than twenty-four hours' notice.

Although Walter's special performance was to be broadcast all over the United States, there was not enough time for his replacement to rehearse the program. A nervous Bernstein was backstage, trembling and perspiring, when the audience was told that he was to replace the celebrated Walter.

Instead of being discouraged when the audience groaned, Bernstein was energized. Coming on stage determined to win the audience's adulation, he proceeded to do so. That performance established Bernstein as an outstanding talent and led to his being invited by almost every major orchestra in the United States to guest-conduct.

Despite his initial success, it was not until 1958, fifteen years later, that Bernstein was named musical director of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, where he served as conductor until 1969, when he resigned to devote his energies to proselytizing for music among a broad range of audiences.

As conductor of the New York Philharmonic, Bernstein introduced new and imaginative concert programs to audiences. He catered to popular tastes, often to the dismay of more conservative concertgoers, but by doing so he attracted vast new audiences. He became the internationally acknowledged specialist on Gustav Mahler, bringing Mahler's major works before American audiences and reviving enthusiasm for his music all over the world.

The Composer. When he was just twenty-six, Leonard Bernstein wrote On the Town, his earliest musical-theater piece. He followed it with Wonderful Town in 1953 and Candide in 1956, which he revised in 1973. His first resounding hit, however, a Broadway production more successful than Wonderful Town, was his redaction of William Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet, which Bernstein moved from Shakespeare's Verona, Italy, to the streets of New York, where the star-crossed lovers are not from noble families but involved with opposing street gangs.

West Side Story was remarkable for its ability to intermingle a modern musical genre such as jazz with serious opera and to deal simultaneously with such contrasting emotions as hatred and love. More than any other Bernstein production, this musical demonstrated how entertaining and moving such a marriage can be.

Bernstein's religious roots are found in many of his compositions, most notably in his Symphony No. 3 (titled Kaddish), the Chichester Psalms, and Mass. He also incorporated ballet into many of his compositions, including Fancy Free, West Side Story, and Facsimile. His incidental music for the film of Peter Pan (1953), which was made after Bernstein's stage production of the J. M. Barrie play, also capitalized on his understanding of dance.

His technical knowledge of opera is easily discernible in his short operas Trouble in Tahiti and A Quiet Place. Among his film scores, the incidental music for Peter Pan and the score for On the Waterfront are the most celebrated and reflect the scope of his musical knowledge.

The Performer and Educator. Bernstein dazzled audiences with his ability to perform in some of the concerts he conducted, leaving the podium to position himself at the keyboard and play piano in the work he was conducting. Although he is better known as a conductor, his performances were impressive. From the beginning of his musical career, however, Bernstein was most committed to sharing with others his enchantment with music. From the day he first struck the keys of his Aunt Clara's piano, this enchantment became a integral part of his being.

After he established himself as a notable in musical circles, Bernstein worked actively to spread his enthusiasm to diverse audiences of all ages. He was especially concerned with young people and reached out to them in seminars at Brandeis University from 1952 until 1957.

During this period, while still teaching at Tanglewood, he was preparing material for television programs he began offering in the mid-1950's and gathering material for his 1959 book, Joy of Music, which was directed at lay people. His liveliness and ability to discuss music in terms they could easily understand appealed to huge audiences, particularly in the Young People's Concerts he conducted around the country. A book that grew out of his television presentations, The Infinite Variety of Music, followed in 1966. In 1973 Bernstein delivered six Norton Lectures at Harvard University, which were gathered in a volume, The Unanswered Question, published in 1976.

Musical Legacy

Leonard Bernstein almost single-handedly democratized music in ways that increased its public acceptance. His early association with Koussevitzky, who brought music to the masses through the famed Boston Pops Concerts, made Bernstein realize the value of involving as many people as possible in musical adventures. Bernstein will probably be best remembered for his humanity and for his ability to reach audiences of every age. His musical compositions will also be long remembered for their versatility and breadth of impact, and his musical theater—particularly the timeless West Side Story—will endear him to young audiences always.

R. Baird Shuman

Further Reading

Burton, Humphrey. Leonard Bernstein. New York: Doubleday, 1994. Comprehensive study of Bernstein with valuable information gleaned from extended interviews with family and friends.

Ewen, David. Leonard Bernstein. London: W. H. Allen, 1967. Early consideration of Bernstein, his work, and his contributions to music.

Myers, Paul. Leonard Bernstein. London: Phaidon Press, 1998. Focuses on how he democratized music by adapting it for the masses.

Peress, Maurice. Dvořák to Duke Ellington: A Conductor Explores America's Music and Its African American Roots. New York: Oxford University Press, 2004. Chapter 9 offers a brief biographical sketch of Bernstein; chapter 14 provides a fifteen-page analysis of Bernstein's Mass.

Peyser, Joan. Bernstein: A Biography. Rev. and updated ed. New York: Billboard Books, 1998. Interesting psychological insights into Bernstein's relationship with his father who initially opposed his career in music.

Venezia, Mike. Leonard Bernstein. New York: Children's Press, 1997. This book, with pleasant illustrations, is directed toward young readers. Despite some unfortunate inaccuracies, it provides a readable starting point for youths unfamiliar with Bernstein and his work.

See also: Anderson, Leroy; Berio, Luciano; Bernstein, Elmer; Boulanger, Nadia; Copland, Aaron; Elliot, Cass; Gould, Glenn; Green, Adolph, and Betty Comden; Ives, Charles; Koussevitzky, Serge; Lerner, Alan Jay; Ma, Yo-Yo; McPartland, Marian; Mahler, Gustav; Messiaen, Olivier; Nielsen, Carl; Previn, Sir André; Rampal, Jean-Pierre; Rota, Nino; Shaw, Artie; Sondheim, Stephen; Stern, Isaac; Thomas, Michael Tilson; Tippett, Sir Michael; Watts, André; Weill, Kurt; Willson, Meredith.

Chuck Berry

American singer, guitarist, and songwriter

Berry is an early architect of the rock-and-roll sound. To the three-chord Delta blues on which he grew up, he ingeniously added the drive, rhythm, and spirit that have come to define rock and roll.

Born: October 18, 1926; St. Louis, Missouri
Also known as: Charles Edward Anderson Berry (birth name)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: After School Session, 1958; One Dozen Berrys, 1958; St. Louis to Liverpool, 1964; Chuck

Berry in London, 1965; From St. Louis to Frisco, 1968; San Francisco Dues, 1971; Bio, 1973; Chuck Berry '75, 1975; Rockit, 1979.

WRITINGS OF INTEREST: Chuck Berry: The Autobiography, 1987.

The Life

Charles Edward Anderson Berry (BEH-ree) grew up in St. Louis, Missouri, spending most of his formative years attending school during the day and in his spare time working in his father's carpentry business. While still in junior high he developed a liking for the blues, eventually performing a racy but well-received version of Jay McShann's "Confessin' the Blues" for his classmates at a school assembly. Legend has it that from this point he was hooked on performing and quickly learned the basic guitar chords and licks that would later propel him to international stardom.

Chuck Berry. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Berry embarked on a long history of run-ins with authority when he was arrested and jailed for armed robbery while still a teenager. He served a three-year sentence, got married, and started a family within a year after his release.

In 1952 a St. Louis pianist invited Berry to perform at a New Year's Eve gig at a local nightspot, the Cosmopolitan Club. The gig led to a three-year stint at the popular St. Louis Club, which attracted hundreds of people excited to see Berry perform his unique hybrid of high-energy rhythm-and-blues and onstage antics such as the notorious "duck walk."

In 1955 Berry traveled to Chicago to watch his idol Muddy Waters perform. After the show, Berry asked Waters for advice on how to further his professional career. Waters told Berry to arrange an audition with Leonard and Phil Chess of the famous Chess Records. Impressed by Berry's youthful, original sound, the Chess brothers later that year released Berry's first hit, "Maybellene." By 1961 he had amassed ten more Top 10 hits and become one of the most popular and influential guitarists in rock and roll.

At the height of his popularity, Berry ran into legal trouble. Convicted in 1962 of taking an underage girl across state lines for immoral purposes under a statute known as the Mann Act, he spent the better part of 1962 and 1963 in prison in Springfield, Missouri. Berry publicly denied his incarceration for years. However, later he acknowledged it in his autobiography and claimed that he wrote some of his most memorable hits, including "Nadine" and "No Particular Place to Go," behind bars.

When Berry left prison and resumed his musical career, he was amused to find that younger artists were recording successful covers of his songs. Several American acts released Chuck Berry compositions in the early 1960's, earning him enormous recognition and lucrative songwriting royalties. During the British invasion of 1964 through 1967, major artists such as the Rolling Stones and the Beatles paid homage to their favorite American rock-and-roll artist by covering many of Berry's hits.

Berry continued to perform actively throughout the 1960's, 1970's, and 1980's. He had several hit albums during this period, and a number-one single,

"My Ding-a-Ling," in 1972. Hail, Hail Rock 'n' Roll, a documentary about his life and legacy, was released in 1987.

The Music

Chuck Berry's songs are characterized by a simple but relentlessly driving three-chord structure and insightful, witty lyrics. He developed his unique style by emulating the techniques of great Chicago bluesmen such as Howlin' Wolf and Muddy Waters, but substituting their woeful, ponderous approach with danceable, upbeat rhythms. Berry played the juke joints of St. Louis for nearly a decade for mere dollars a night honing the signature sound that the world would soon know as rock and roll.

"Maybellene." The first single Berry recorded for Chess Records in July, 1955, "Maybellene" was originally a country-flavored number entitled "Ida Red." The Chess brothers suggested the title change, along with a few minor alterations in instrumentation, and a rock-and-roll classic was born. The song laments the actions of an unfaithful lover, a theme that proved to be a staple for Berry throughout his career. A stripped-down but infectiously propulsive rhythm also defines the track.

"Roll Over, Beethoven!" This song, another signature Berry classic released by Chess in June, 1956, both commemorates and lampoons classical music. Initially its lyrics seem to deride the music of such sacred cows as Peter Ilich Tchaikovsky and Ludwig van Beethoven as hopelessly stuffy and obsolete, but a closer listening reveals that the song's incisive lyrics acknowledge the indisputable debt that rock and roll and other contemporary genres of music—including modern jazz and pop—owe to traditional classical music. This fresh and provocative message in the confines of a three-chord rock song makes "Roll Over, Beethoven!" an unforgettable standard.

"School Days (Ring! Ring! Goes the Bell)." When it comes to Berry's songwriting, his obvious strength is an uncanny ability to connect with his audience. Recognizing and commiserating with teens with such humor and verve as Berry does in "School Days (Ring! Ring! Goes the Bell)" made this tune one of his biggest early hits. Released in March, 1957, it depicts the typical day of high school as a bothersome, yet somehow worthwhile series of obstacles. Its engaging rhythm and stellar guitar work contribute to its appeal.

"Sweet Little Sixteen." Unlike "Maybellene," "Sweet Little Sixteen" (released in January, 1958) presents a playful, tender, and at times rollicking view of young women. The heroine of its tongue-in-cheek lyrics worships two things above all else: rock-and-roll music and rock-and-roll musicians. The song is personal and anthemic, upbeat and tender, and one of the first of Berry's hits to appeal directly to the concerns of his target audience: American teenagers.

"Johnny B. Goode." Deemed by critics and musicians the world over as Berry's masterpiece, "Johnny B. Goode," released in April, 1958, with its memorable and often imitated opening guitar riff, is one of the most widely recognized rock-and-roll tunes ever written. Lyrically, the song narrates the tale of a young boy—implicitly modeled after Berry—whose talent for music brings him fame and fortune. Catchy and ebullient, "Johnny B. Goode" can be called a rock-and-roll classic.

"Almost Grown." Similar to "School Days," "Almost Grown" directs Berry's playful lyrics at a different teenage nemesis: parents. More than a one-dimensional rant against parental authority, the song depicts adulthood as a time of hope and promise.

"C'est la Vie." Although it may not have been intended as a sequel to "Almost Grown," "C'est la Vie" provides an affirmative view of the young adult world that is alluded to but never reached in "Almost Grown." In the song's endearing narrative, "Pierre" and his "mademoiselle" marry at a young age but, to the surprise of everyone, go on to lead an exceptionally happy married life. Granted, the lifestyle they pursue is fueled by a rock and jazz sound track, but Berry's lyrics suggest that the rock-and-roll generation can thrive and positively reshape tomorrow's world.

Musical Legacy

Fittingly, in 1986, Berry was one of the first musicians to be inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame. The unique shuffle rhythm and guitar hooks that characterize "Johnny B. Goode" and "Sweet Little Sixteen" made them some of the most popular rock-and-roll songs in history. Berry's innovative musicianship, lighthearted lyrics, and irresistible showmanship make him a giant of twentieth century pop. Although Berry's disdain for authority led him to several skirmishes with the law, this rebellious spirit enlivens his rock-and-roll lyrics. Echoes of his guitar style can be heard in the work of Eric Clapton, George Thorogood, Albert Lee, and scores of other guitarists. The vitality evoked in his lyrics is present in the songs of artists as diverse as the Beach Boys, the Beatles, the Clash, the Sex Pistols, and Green Day. Even today those who pick up a guitar to try their hand at rock and roll undoubtedly want to master Berry's arsenal of licks.

Gregory D. Horn

Further Reading

Berry, Chuck. Chuck Berry: The Autobiography. London: Faber & Faber, 2001. Filled with interesting anecdotes and facts about Chuck Berry's life—professional and otherwise—this book remains a primary source.

Collis, John. Chuck Berry: The Biography (Illustrated). London: Aurum Press, 2002. Biography has lots of photographs and provides an informative and unbiased account of the major events of his musical career.

DeWitt, Howard. Chuck Berry: Rock 'n' Roll Music. 2d ed. Ann Arbor, Mich.: Pierian Press, 1985. A straightforward, readable biography of Berry, concentrating primarily on his musical career.

Pegg, Bruce. Brown-Eyed Handsome Man: The Life and Hard Times of Chuck Berry. London: Routledge, 2002. An unflinching and sometimes less-than-flattering portrait of Berry, this focuses primarily on the more unfortunate incidents—financial, social, and otherwise—that Berry experienced throughout his checkered career.

Ward, Ed, Geoffrey Stokes, and Ken Tucker. Rock of Ages: The Rolling Stone History of Rock and Roll. New York: Summit Books, 1986. Includes an extensive analysis of Berry's influence on the early development of the genre.

See also: Blackwell, Otis; Clapton, Eric; Diddley, Bo; Dixon, Willie; Domino, Fats; Eddy, Duane; Garcia, Jerry; Howlin' Wolf; Jagger, Sir Mick; James, Etta; Jett, Joan; Jordan, Louis; Lennon, John; McCartney, Sir Paul; Memphis Minnie; Neville, Aaron; Richards, Keith; Stanley, Ralph; Tosh, Peter; Van Halen, Eddie; Waters, Muddy; Wilson, Brian.

Jussi Björling

Swedish opera singer

As a singer gifted with a voice of unsurpassed beauty and impeccable technique, Björling set a high standard for operatic tenors.

Born: February 2, 1911; Stora Tuna, Sweden
Died: September 9, 1960; Siarö, near Stockholm, Sweden
Also known as: Johan Jonaton Björling (full name)

Principal works

CHORAL WORKS: Tenor soloist in Requiem, 1939 (by Giuseppe Verdi); tenor part in Ludwig van Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, 1940.

OPERATIC ROLES: Don Ottavio in Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's Don Giovanni, 1930; Lamplighter in Giacomo Puccini's Manon Lescaut, 1930; Romeo in Charles Gounod's Romeo et Juliette, 1933; Duke of Mantua in Giuseppe Verdi's Rigoletto, 1937; Rodolfo in Puccini's La Bohème, 1938; Manrico in Verdi's Il trovatore, 1939; King Gustav III in Verdi's Un ballo in maschera, 1940; Don Carlo in Verdi's Don Carlo, 1950.

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Romeo et Juliette, 1947; Operatic Duets, 1952; Il Trovatore, 1952 (with Zinka Milanov); Cavalleria Rusticana, 1953 (with Milanov); Verdi: Aida, 1955; La Bohème, 1956 (with Victoria de Los Angeles); Verdi: Rigoletto, 1956; Tosca, 1957; Verdi's Requiem, 1960 (with Leontyne Price and Giorgio Tozzi).

WRITINGS OF INTEREST: Med bagaget i strupen, 1945 (autobiography).

The Life

Johan Jonaton "Jussi" Björling (JUH-see BYUR-lihng) was born into a musical family in Sweden in 1911. His father, David, was a singer, and Björling's older brother, Olle, and his younger brother, Gosta, both pursued musical careers within their native Sweden. Baptized as Johan, Björling became known personally and professionally as Jussi. His voice can be heard in an early recording by the Björling Male Quartet, and he made his first solo recordings in 1929. From then, until his premature death in 1960, he produced a steady stream of recordings of operatic arias, Swedish art songs and popular tunes, and complete operatic recordings with the finest international casts.

He made his stage debut in the small role of the Lamplighter in Giacomo Puccini's opera Manon Lescaut (1893), at the Swedish Royal Opera in 1930. His international operatic debuts came in swift succession in the mid-1930's: the Vienna Staatsoper in 1936, in New York and in Chicago in 1937, and at the Metropolitan Opera in 1938, in one of his signature roles, Rodolfo in Puccini's La Bohème (1896). He was awarded his first opening night at the Metropolitan Opera in 1940, when he portrayed King Gustav III in Giuseppe Verdi's Un ballo in maschera (1859), but then he returned to his native Sweden for the duration of World War II.

His choice of repertory was conservative, and even in an era of cautious and unimaginative stage productions he was known as a stolid stage performer. Nevertheless, he was a hardworking and conscientious performer, and he had fifty-five leading roles in his repertory. He most frequently appeared as Rodolfo in La Bohème, as title role in Charles Gounod's Faust (1859), and as Manrico in Verdi's Il trovatore (1853). He commanded an impressive one thousand dollars for a performance in the 1950-1951 season.

In 1957 Björling was diagnosed with serious heart problems, probably the result of his longtime chronic alcoholism, and he died suddenly of a massive heart attack during the summer of 1960, at age forty-nine. Despite his severe alcoholism, he was said never to have given a bad performance.

The Music

Among the great operatic tenors of his generation, including Richard Tucker, Jan Peerce, and Mario del Monaco, Björling was recognized for the purity of his vocal production, his thoroughness of technique, and his sheer beauty of voice. Anna-Lisa Björling, in her biography Jussi (1997), compares the sound of her husband's voice to "a silver bell struck by a crystal hammer," and enthusiasts of Björling's artistry, who often evoke the metaphors of silver and velvet, have always marveled at the purity of his technique.

Performance. His reputation for hard work is proven by his activities in November, 1950. He sang six performances, in New York and Philadelphia, of the title role of Verdi's Don Carlos (1867), in a spectacular new production at the Metropolitan Opera under the auspices of its new general director, Rudolf Bing; he sang at a memorial concert for the king of Sweden; and he appeared in a live television performance on The Voice of Firestone, a half-hour showcase for opera singers. On the television show, Björling sang Franz Schubert's "Was Ist Sylvia?" (1826), Georges Bizet's "Flower Song" from Carmen (1875), and a song by Victor Herbert, as well as the show's opening and closing maudlin theme songs, which show how uncomfortable he was singing in English. Björling shows effortless charm, as when he spontaneously awards the rose he held during the "Flower Song" to a woman in the chorus. As one of the relatively few visual records of Björling on stage, the videotape of this performance confirms Björling's astonishing vocal technique and personal appeal.

Recordings. Björling's most endearing album is probably a set of operatic duets with the American baritone Robert Merrill; the duet from Bizet's The Pearl Fishers (1863) on that album still turns up in movies and television commercials. Björling's final complete operatic recording, of Puccini's Turandot (1926), with the Swedish soprano Birgit Nilsson (who was then at the beginning of a great international career), shows no diminution of the tenor's ability, except for an uncharacteristic avoidance of a couple of high C's.

Jussi Björling. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

Björling was comfortable singing in Italian, French, and German. He recorded one of his signature arias, known as "Lenski's Aria" from Peter Ilich Tchaikovsky's Eugen Onegin (1879), in Swedish rather than Russian. For some listeners, Björling's greatest musical legacy lies in his recordings of Swedish songs by such composers as Jean Sibelius, Hugo Alfven, Wilhelm Stenhammer, and Tűre Rangstrom.

Musical Legacy

Because of the great number of his recordings, Björling is widely cherished by opera enthusiasts, and his musical excellence sets a high standard for operatic tenors. His complete operatic recordings are his most enduring legacy. He recorded Puccini's La Bohème and Madama Butterfly (1904) with the Spanish soprano Victoria de Los Angeles, with Sir Thomas Beecham conducting. Both recordings retain their immense charm and youthful energy. This moving ardor is plentifully on display in Björling's live-performance recording in 1947 from the Metropolitan Opera Saturday broadcast of Gounod's Romeo et Juliette (1867), where he is partnered by the Brazilian soprano Bidu Sayão. Björling is a dashing Duke of Mantua, with Roberta Peters as Gilda, in a recording of Verdi's Rigoletto (1851). Best of all, perhaps, are the complete recordings of Verdi's Il trovatore and Aida (1871) with the Yugoslavian soprano (and Met mainstay of the 1950's) Zinka Milanov. The Aida boasts possibly the most impressive top-to-bottom cast of any operatic recording, with every singer at his or her peak: Milanov, Fedora Barbieri, Björling, Leonard Warren, and Boris Christoff. As Radamès, the doomed young Egyptian commander, Björling conveys the utter collapse into despair of his character in the pivotal third act, when he discovers the true identity of his lover, Aida, and the full extent of his inadvertent betrayal of his country.

Björling capitalized on the tradition set by an earlier generation of tenors, such as Enrico Caruso, John McCormack, and Leo Slezak, to record great operatic arias as well as popular songs and ballads. However, the latter have not retained much musical interest, although they are still worth hearing for the integrity of their performance. The greatest legacy of Björling lies in his recordings of complete operas, individual arias, and Swedish art songs. Few singers have ever matched the thoroughness of his vocal technique, and listeners continue to marvel at the purity of Björling's voice.

Byron Nelson

Further Reading

Bing, Rudolf. Five Thousand Nights at the Opera. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1972. Filled with gossipy stories of life in the Metropolitan Opera of the 1950's.

Björling, Anna-Lisa, and Andrew Farkas. Jussi. Portland, Oreg.: Amadeus Press, 1997. Provides an insider's affectionate view of the Swedish tenor, although it is frank about Björling's shortcomings as a stage actor and about his difficult struggle with alcoholism.

Steane, J. B. The Grand Tradition: Seventy Years of Singing on Record, 1900 to 1970. London: Duckworth, 1974. Celebrates the splendor of Björling's voice, while showing less enthusiasm for his dramatic skills.

See also: Beecham, Sir Thomas; Caruso, Enrico; Herbert, Victor; Price, Leontyne; Puccini, Giacomo.

Otis Blackwell

American blues pianist, singer, and songwriter

A prolific songwriter during the early years of rock and roll, Blackwell wrote many classics, including Elvis Presley's "Don't Be Cruel" and Jerry Lee Lewis's "Great Balls of Fire."

Born: February 16, 1932; New York, New York
Died: May 6, 2002; Nashville, Tennessee

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Singin' the Blues, 1956; These Are My Songs, 1978; All Shook Up, recorded 1976, released 1995; They Called It Rock 'n' Roll, 2003.

The Life

Otis Blackwell's introduction to music was gospel songs his family sang at home. While working as an usher in a Brooklyn motion-picture theater, Blackwell took an interest in the career of his favorite singer, Tex Ritter, a singing cowboy of the 1940's. Later, Blackwell won a talent contest at the legendary Apollo Theater in Harlem. While working as a presser in a Brooklyn tailor shop, he began singing, in New York clubs, songs that had been recorded by Larry Darnell and Chuck Willis. He was signed by RCA Victor in 1952, switching to Joe Davis's Jay-Dee label the following year and recording the hit "Daddy Rollin' Stone." Because Davis paid him only twenty-five dollars a week, Blackwell augmented his income by writing songs for other singers.

On December 24, 1955, Blackwell sold six songs for $150. When one, "Don't Be Cruel," became a hit for Elvis Presley in 1956, the demand for Blackwell's writing skills increased. Few of those who kept "Don't Be Cruel" and its flip side, Jerry Leiber and Mike Stoller's "Hound Dog," at number one on the pop charts for eleven weeks suspected that its creator was an African American.

Though the two never met because the songwriter feared their working relationship would collapse if he did not like Presley, Blackwell wrote for the popular singer such hits as "All Shook Up," "Paralyzed," and "Return to Sender." As stipulated in the contract, Presley received cowriting credit for those songs. Many of Blackwell's songs were written with others, and some were composed under pseudonyms, because of his contract with Jay-Dee, and that complicates compiling an accurate account of his work. One of his most lasting songs, "Fever," was cowritten with Eddie Cooley under the name John Davenport, after Blackwell's stepfather. In addition to Cooley, Blackwell collaborated with Jack Hammer and Winfield Scott.

Blackwell's other hits during the 1950's and early 1960's included "Great Balls of Fire" and "Breathless" for Jerry Lee Lewis, "Just Keep It Up" for Dee Clark, and "Handy Man" for Jimmy Jones. He wrote Clark's "Hey Little Girl" for his childhood sweetheart, Josephine Peoples, who became his wife and the mother of his seven children.

Others who recorded Blackwell's songs included Pat Boone, Solomon Burke, the Coasters, Bobby Darin, Ben E. King, Clyde McPhatter, and Gene Vincent. Blackwell also produced recordings by Connie Francis and Mahalia Jackson, and he even gave actor Sal Mineo a hit song. When rock groups, inspired by the Beatles, began writing their own songs, Blackwell's influence diminished.

In 1976 Blackwell recorded All Shook Up, a collection of his hits, and toured. Because he recorded frequently in Nashville, he moved there in 1988, opened an office, and provided free advice for struggling songwriters. Shortly after marrying his second wife, Mamie Wiggins, in 1991, Blackwell suffered a stroke, leaving him paralyzed and having to communicate through a computer. He was inducted into the Songwriters Hall of Fame in 1991 and received a Pioneer Award from the Rhythm and Blues Foundation in 1994. Blackwell died of a heart attack in Nashville in 2002.

The Music

Blackwell combined elements of country music and rhythm and blues, particularly in the songs he wrote for Presley and Lewis, with driving tempi and simple, catchy lyrics. The songs were essentially more danceable variations of country songs.

"Don't Be Cruel." "Don't Be Cruel" was a perfect match for Presley's alternately snarling and smooth style. With a greater vocal range than most of the singers of Blackwell's songs, Presley easily shifted from a high pitch to a smooth baritone on "Don't Be Cruel." Blackwell's lyrics perfectly matched rock and roll, the music of youthful rebellion.

As was the practice of the day, Blackwell recorded demonstration versions of the songs he wrote for Presley, and some sources, such as Stoller, claim that Presley, as well as Lewis and others, copied the songwriter's vocal inflections. Blackwell said Presley had him record demos of songs written by others, such as "Teddy Bear," in order to imitate Blackwell's styling.

"All Shook Up." One of Presley's biggest hits, "All Shook Up," was a prime example of the rock and country merger known as rockabilly. In this song Presley constantly altered the tempo—speeding up, slowing down, and pausing—and mingled nonverbal sounds with the lyrics. The song's broad appeal resulted in its climbing to number one on the pop, country, and rhythm-and-blues charts. "All Shook Up" embodied both the physical gyrations made famous by Presley and the powerful emotional and sexual effect he had on his fans. Blackwell created a perfect song for the king of rock and roll.

"Great Balls of Fire." "Great Balls of Fire" is arguably Blackwell's greatest rock anthem. With Lewis's patented pumping piano style, "Great Balls of Fire" demonstrated that love songs had entered a new age. The sedate "moon" and "June" love-song lyrics were replaced by a rampaging passion, threatening, as with "All Shook Up," to consume the singer. Just as "All Shook Up" conveys the image of the hip-shaking Presley, "Great Balls of Fire" captures Lewis's hair-flopping, keyboard-pounding intensity.

"Handy Man." Blackwell's "Handy Man" was a hit three times: for Jimmy Jones in 1959, for Del Shannon in a raucous version in 1964, and for James Taylor as a tender ballad in 1977. Such style flexibility shows the genius of Blackwell's songwriting.

"Fever." Blackwell's most famous song is closer to jazz than rock and roll. "Fever" was first recorded by Little Willie John in 1956, hitting number one on the rhythm-and-blues charts. However, when Peggy Lee gave it her distinctive sultry spin two years later, the song became a pop classic. In the conservative 1950's, "Fever" was notable for its sexual suggestiveness.

Musical Legacy

By blending an array of influences, Blackwell enriched the burgeoning genre of rock and roll. Along with Chuck Berry and Sam Cooke, he was one of a handful of black songwriters who paved the way for such genres as soul and rap. Accepting an award in 1976, Stevie Wonder acknowledged his debt to Blackwell. The versatility of Blackwell's music is illustrated by the diverse performers who have recorded his songs: Michael Bublé, Cheap Trick, Rita Coolidge, Budd Guy, Billy Joel, Madonna, Dolly Parton, the Who, and Johnny Winter. A 1994 tribute to Blackwell, Brace Yourself, included new recordings by Dave Edmunds, Debbie Harry, Chrissie Hynde, Kris Kristofferson, Graham Parker, Jon Spencer, Ronnie Spector, and others.

Michael Adams

Further Reading

Giddins, Gary. "Just How Much Did Elvis Learn from Otis Blackwell?" In Riding on a Blue Note: Jazz and American Pop. New York: Oxford University Press, 1981. Examines Presley's debt to Blackwell as songwriter and singer and explains how Blackwell's style grew out of the minstrel tradition. Includes an interview with Blackwell.

Strauss, Neil. "Otis Blackwell." Rolling Stone (June 20, 2002): 35. Overview of Blackwell's life, with a discussion on the origins of "All Shook Up."

Tosches, Nick. Country: Living Legends and Dying Metaphors in America's Biggest Music. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1985. Brief assessment of Presley's debt to Blackwell.

See also: Berry, Chuck; Cooke, Sam; Lewis, Jerry Lee; Presley, Elvis; Ritter, Tex.

Rubén Blades

Panamanian Latin jazz and salsa guitarist, singer, and songwriter

Blades revolutionized salsa music by incorporating into his compositions new instrumentation, adventurous arrangements, other world music, and socially and politically relevant lyrics.

Born: July 16, 1948; Panama City, Panama
Also known as: Rubén Blades Bellido de Luna (full name)
Member of: Rubén Blades y Seis del Solar; Rubén Blades y Son del Solar

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): From Panama to New York, 1970 (with Pete Rodriguez); Bohemio y poeta, 1979; Maestra vida: Primera parte, 1980; Maestra vida: Segunda parte, 1980; Buscando América, 1984; Mucho mejor, 1984; Antecedente, 1988; Nothing but the Truth, 1988; Doble filo, 1992; El que la hace la paga, 1992; Rubén Blades with Strings, 1992;

Joseph and His Brothers, 1993 (with Jorge Strunz and Ardeshir Farah); Rosa de los vientos, 1996; Tiempos, 1999; Mundo, 2002; Salsa caliente de Nu York, 2002; Una década, 2003; O Melhor, Vol. 1, 2004; O Melhor, Vol. 2, 2004.

ALBUMS (with Seis del Solar): Escenas, 1985; Agua de luna, 1986.

ALBUMS (with Son del Solar): Caminando, 1991; Amor y control, 1992.

ALBUMS (with Willie Colón): Willie Colón Presents Rubén Blades, 1977; Siembra, 1978; Canciones del solar de los aburridos, 1981; The Last Fight, 1992; Sembra y otros favoritos salsa para siempre, 2001.

The Life

Rubén Blades Bellido de Luna (rew-BEHN blaydz) was born in the barrio of San Felipe in Panama City, the second of five children in a family of immigrants. His mother, Anoland Bellido de Luna, was a Cuban singer and pianist, and his father, Rubén Blades, Sr., was a Colombian percussionist, basketball player, and detective. Blades's paternal grandfather was an English citizen from Saint Lucia who migrated to Panama to work on the canal. Although Blades and his family use the English pronunciation of their last name, the Spanish pronunciation (BLAH-dehs) is widely used.

His upbringing in a musical family proved fruitful for the development of Blades's skills and sensitivity, which were also nurtured by the diverse musical environment present in Panama City. While growing up, Blades lived through the height of rock and roll, listening not only to Elvis Presley and the Beatles but also to such jazz performers as Dizzy Gillespie and Duke Ellington. Blades was exposed to many popular Latin American musicians, such as Benny Moré, Perez Prado, Cheo Feliciano, and the Joe Cuba Sextet, all of whom proved influential to his career.

Blades performed onstage for the first time as a teenager, substituting for the vocalist in his brother's rock band, the Saints. The 1964 Panama Canal riots had an enduring effect on Blades, leading him to pursue his interests in politics and law over music. He decided to seek degrees in law and political science at the University of Panama, while singing with fellow university students in Los Salvajes del Ritmo (the rhythm savages) and working as a guest composer-singer for the professional Latin music group Bush y sus Magnificos (Bush and his magnificents). The University of Panama closed in 1969 because of political unrest, and Blades used this time to travel to New York, where he recorded his first album, From Panama to New York, with the popular orchestra of Pete Rodriguez. The album was a commercial failure, and, as soon as the University of Panama reopened, Blades returned to continue his studies, graduating in 1972.

After his father was accused by the Panamanian government of working as a spy for the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), Blades's family moved to Miami in 1973. In 1973 and 1974 Blades worked as an attorney for the National Bank of Panama, but he became dissatisfied with his law career and moved to New York after visiting his family in Florida. In New York Blades worked for the Panamanian consulate and in the mail room of Fania, a salsa record label. There he auditioned as a singer and composer and began singing for the band of Ray Barretto, debuting at Madison Square Garden in 1974. After that, his musical career soared. He composed more hits for the Fania label and joined forces with trombone player, producer, and bandleader Willie Colón.

The collaboration of Blades and Colón was sensational, uniting Blades's compositional and poetical skills and Colón's amazing ear for arranging and producing albums. They began to compose salsa conciente, a type of salsa that communicated social and political issues through outspoken lyrics, stimulating both thought and dancing. Together, Blades and Colón recorded many albums for the Fania label, including Siembra (sow) and Canciones del solar de los aburridos (songs from the tenement of the bored).

During the early 1980's, Blades ended his artistic collaboration with Colón and went on to have a successful solo career as a musician and as an actor. He signed with Elektra Records, and in 1984 he released the album Buscando América (looking for America), which became a big hit. Blades's social activism, reflected in his lyrics, persevered throughout the 1980's. He continued his law career and earned a master's degree in international law from Harvard University in 1985.

Blades had a productive film career in the 1980's and 1990's. He appeared in Robert Redford's 1988 film The Milagro Beanfield War, and he collaborated on the sound track for Spike Lee's 1989 film Do the Right Thing. In 1994 Blades became a candidate for president of Panama. With 18 percent of the vote, he finished in third place. Continuing his successful career as a musician, Blades recorded albums through the 1990's and into the 2000's, including Amor y control (love and control) and Mundo (world). In 2004 Blades became Panama's minister of tourism.

Rubén Blades. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The Music

Blades was a pioneer in blending intricate salsa arrangements with socially aware lyrics, creating salsa conciente. Addressing issues such as poverty, exploitation, sovereignty, and pan-Americanism, his music had much in common with Latin American nueva canción (new song, often protest songs). However, in contrast to nueva canción artists, who often perform solo, Blades used salsa orchestras or small Latin jazz ensembles to deliver his songs. Although he is largely an autodidact, Blades's compositions demonstrate great harmonic, melodic, and rhythmic understanding. Throughout his career he would tastefully incorporate a diverse palette of styles and genres into his compositions, including jazz, rumba, Cuban son, Puerto Rican bomba, bossa nova, reggae, and Celtic. Blades's independent and innovative spirit is evident in his music, which defies the limitations of genres by breaking with compositional and performance stereotypes.

"Plástico." An example of salsa conciente, "Plástico" (plastic) opened the best-selling album Siembra, and its inventive arrangement and lyrics reflect the multicultural environment present in 1970's New York. "Plástico" satirizes and condemns the vanity, materialism, racism, and superficiality that threaten to overpower the moral values of the Latin communities. In format and rhythm, the song presents the listener with surprises, beginning with an instrumental disco-funk section and switching to Afro-Cuban patterns and Puerto Rican bomba backing up Blades's verses. Typical of salsa, after the verses is a coro y soneo (chorus and lead singer) section, during which Blades improvises lyrics. The coda uses a bomba pattern, while Blades sends an outspoken pan-American message.

"Pedro Navaja." Also from Siembra, "Pedro Navaja" (Peter Pocketknife) became a top-selling salsa single. A subtle tribute to Bertolt Brecht's "Mack the Knife," this song is a masterpiece of narrative. With a tight arrangement by Luis Ortíz, "Pedro Navaja" uses studio effects (sirens and police radio) to support the story surrounding Navaja's death, the song portraying the life of the Latin barrios in New York and the Caribbean cities, where criminal activity is a constant threat. The song brilliantly balances tragedy and humor, while supporting the album's motto, "you reap what you sow." It was a huge hit that, seven and half minutes in length, defied radio format. After a full-orchestra introduction, the narrative starts with congas and voice, adding more instruments in subsequent stanzas, until all instruments join in the chorus and leader section. This song was a breakthrough for Blades as a singer and lyricist.

"Tiburón." With its expressed disapproval of U.S. intervention in Latin American affairs, "Tiburón" (shark) produced some enemies for Blades, especially in the community of Cuban exiles who approve U.S. efforts to stamp out communism. Nevertheless, "Tiburón" was a hit in many Latin American countries and remains one of Blades's emblematic compositions. Opening the 1981 album Canciones del solar de los aburridos, "Tiburón" uses studio effects to its advantage. Blades sings over a traditional guaguancó pattern through the verses, while the chorus and leader section presents the usual salsa son montuno pattern, both examples of Afro-Cuban rhythms.

"El Padre Antonio y el Monaguillo Andrés." A song from the 1984 album Buscando América, "El Padre Antonio y el Monaguillo Andrés" (Father Anthony and altar boy Andrew) is another of Blades's great narrative songs. Based on the assassination of Oscar Romero, a priest in El Salvador, it tells the story of a government's repression of justice and the innocent casualties of civil war. Like the rest of the album, this song pushes the boundaries of salsa by using synthesizers in place of horns. The introduction and ending present an unusual musical pattern, reminiscent of Cuban bembe and Venezuelan gaitas, patterns rarely heard on salsa arrangements. With its adventurous instrumentation and arrangement, this innovative song hinted at the musical direction that Blades would follow for the next two decades.

"Primogenio." An experiment in world music, "Primogenio" (beginnings) successfully combined Celtic melodies played by Scottish pipes and fiddles with the sounds of a small Latin jazz ensemble. "Primogenio" appeared on Mundo, the album that won the Grammy Award for Best World Music Album in 2002. In it, Blades consolidates music from Brazil, North Africa, Spain, Great Britain, the United States, and the Caribbean. For "Primogenio" Blades uses the tumbao, the constant rhythmic relation between congas and bass typical of salsa. He also adds the Cuban rumba pattern in the middle and ending sections. Rumba patterns are often used to honor Cuban deities from the Yoruba pantheon, such as Eleguá, the deity Blades praises in "Primogenio." An impressive work of world-music juxtaposition, "Primogenio" serves as a great example of musical multiculturalism.

Musical Legacy

Following Blades's lead, many musicians in salsa and related genres, such as merengue, incorporated thought-provoking lyrics that address socially relevant issues. This significantly expanded the audience for these genres, inviting both dancers and non-dancers alike to listen, think, and enjoy. Beyond the lyrics, the elegant and sometimes unusual compositions of Blades have influenced such musicians as Mark Anthony, Juan Luis Guerra, Gilberto Santa Rosa, and Ricky Martin. Beyond salsa, Blades's influence was seen in his varied collaborations with such musicians as Sting, Lou Reed, Los Fabulosos Cadillacs, Guerra, Maná, and Sun City.

After years of working under contract with record labels such as Fania and Elektra, Blades went independent, pioneering new ways to promote and sell records and encouraging younger generations of Latin musicians to follow his path. In the early 2000's Blades explored the idea of selling records on the Internet for a price determined by the listener-consumer, a practice later popularized by bands such as Radiohead.

Daniel Nuñez

Further Reading

Bordowitz, Hank. Noise of the World: Non-Western Musicians in Their Own Words. New York: Soft Skull Press, 2004. Contains a short section by Blades, offering insight into his background and his opinions about the music industry and salsa in general.

Cruz, Bárbara. Rubén Blades: Salsa Singer and Social Activist. Springfield, N.J.: Enslow, 1997. Biography of Blades up to 1997 written for a juvenile audience. It deals with Blades's life as a musician, actor, and politician.

Randel, Don Michael. "Crossing Over with Rubén Blades." Journal of the American Musicological Society 44, no. 2 (Summer, 1991): 301-323. An insightful musicological analysis of the innovative aspects of Blades's music and the source of his crossover appeal.

Wald, Elijah. Global Minstrels: Voices of World Music. New York: Routledge, 2007. A short chapter discusses Blades's character, ideas, and impact.

See also: Colón, Willie; Cruz, Celia; Ellington, Duke; Gillespie, Dizzy; Presley, Elvis; Price, Leontyne; Simon, Paul; Sting.

Eubie Blake

American jazz pianist and composer

A virtuoso ragtime pianist, Blake cowrote and produced in 1921 the all-black show Shuffle Along, which helped establish the legitimacy of black actors on the Broadway stage.

Born: February 7, 1887; Baltimore, Maryland
Died: February 12, 1983; New York, New York
Also known as: James Hubert Blake (full name)

Principal works

MUSICAL THEATER (music): Shuffle Along, 1921 (lyrics by Noble Sissle; libretto by Flournoy Miller and Aubrey L. Lyles); Elsie, 1923 (with Alma M. Sanders; lyrics by Sissle; libretto by Charles W. Bell); The Chocolate Dandies, 1924 (lyrics by Sissle; libretto by Sissle and Lew Payton); Lew Leslie's Blackbirds, 1930 (lyrics by Andy Razaf; libretto by Miller); Swing It, 1937 (with Milton Reddie; lyrics by Cecil Mack and Reddie; libretto by Mack); Eubie!, 1978 (lyrics by Sissle, Razaf, Johnny Brandon, Miller, and Jim Europe).

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Sissle and Blake: Early Rare Recordings, Vol. 1, 1920 (with Noble Sissle); Sissle and Blake: Early Rare Recordings, Vol. 2, 1920 (with Sissle); The Wizard of Ragtime Piano, 1958; The Marches I Played on the Old Ragtime Piano, 1959; Golden Reunion in Ragtime, 1962; The Eighty-six Years of Eubie Blake, 1969; Eubie Blake and His Friends, 1973 (with others); Eubie Blake Introducing Jim Hession, 1973 (with Jim Hession); Eubie Blake and His Protégés, 1974 (with others); Eubie Blake Song Hits, 1976.

The Life

James Hubert "Eubie" (YEW-bee) Blake was born in Maryland to John and Emma Blake, one of eight children and the only one to survive to adulthood. His parents were freed slaves, and his father worked at the Baltimore docks, while his mother was a washerwoman. Blake manifested an early talent for music, and, after some early keyboard lessons from a neighbor, he began playing the piano at local brothels in Baltimore at age fifteen (first at Aggie Shelton's bordello and later at Annie Gilly's sporting house), gaining skill, repertoire, and a reputation as a keyboard wizard. In these positions, Blake listened to and was strongly influenced by other pianists, such as Jesse Pickett, C. Luckeyeth Roberts, and One Leg Willie.

Both of these jobs were done surreptitiously, without the knowledge of his parents. Blake recalled in interviews that he would typically go upstairs to bed, then sneak out his bedroom window, rent a pair of long pants from a man for twenty-five cents to cover the youthful shorts he wore, and play piano into the night for a small salary and generous tips. He also remembered that, one morning at his home, he was practicing the music he performed while his religious mother had left home for several hours. When she returned unexpectedly, she heard his music and threw him out of the house, stating, "Get that ragtime out of my house!" It was the first time he had heard the word ragtime.

Blake was married twice: first in 1910 at age twenty-three, to Avis Lee, who died in 1938; and second in 1945 to Marion Tyler. At age sixty-three, Blake enrolled in New York University's composition program, graduating in 1950 with a music degree. He continued to perform, to great adulation from audiences, until the 1980's. Suffering from pneumonia, Blake died in 1983.

The Music

Blake's musical career divides into three recognizable units—he began as a ragtime pianist, in his early twenties he became an important Broadway composer-producer, and he concluded his life as a musical legend.

Ragtime. Blake's music sprang from the sounds of the sporting house, or brothel. His energetic ragtime style, often approaching boogie-woogie—especially in the bass line patterns—was captivating to audiences, and it was impressive to other musicians. Blake's large hands could span the interval of a tenth, enabling voicing possibilities that other pianists could not manage. Additionally, he composed music with more complex harmonies than some of the less-inventive tonic-dominant-based rags, and his rhythms were buoyant and infectious. Improvisation was integral to the style and practice of ragtime in the early 1900's, and many rags were not written down at the moment of composition. Blake once stated that he composed his "Charleston Rag" in 1899, yet he wrote it down in 1915 when he had learned to write musical notation. Its original name was "Sounds of Africa," and it was renamed "Charleston Rag" in 1917 at its publication, four years before it became a staple number in Shuffle Along.

Broadway. When Blake met Noble Sissle (a lyricist and vocal performer who also conducted an early twentieth century dance orchestra) in 1915, his career shifted toward Broadway composing and producing for twelve years. Sissle and Blake first formed a vaudeville act called the Dixie Duo that initiated Blake's stage career, gave him a working knowledge of the stage, and created his first hit song: "It's All Your Fault." In 1921 Blake composed the songs (set to Sissle's lyrics) for Shuffle Along, a Broadway show for an all-black cast. Shuffle Along created such a sensation with its numerous hit songs (among them "I'm Just Wild About Harry," "Charleston Rag," "Bandana Days," and "Love Will Find a Way") that it required three touring companies to present it across the country. Its performance run extended to nearly five hundred nights, broke through racial barriers on the theater stages, presented the first love song between black characters in stage history, and helped establish the singing careers of Josephine Baker, Florence Mills, and Paul Robeson. Shuffle Along was successful in part because its infectious rhythms and melodies set it apart from the more traditional, stereotyped revues to which Broadway audiences were accustomed.

Sissle and Blake collaborated on several other shows, including Elsie and The Chocolate Dandie, and their work together continued until about 1927, when they parted ways. Blake composed for several shows without Sissle's involvement, including Swing It, Lew Leslie's Blackbirds, and Eubie! (a retrospective revue of his songs that premiered in 1978).

Legend. Blake retired from performing around 1946, but he returned to make an album in 1969 entitled The Eighty-six Years of Eubie Blake, a retrospective of his life. He toured the world following its release, talking about ragtime and his career. By the 1970's, he had become a musical legend, appearing in numerous concerts and as a guest on television, on The Tonight Show with Johnny Carson several times and on Saturday Night Live.

Musical Legacy

Blake's life coincided with a time when ragtime was a national rage in music, and it lasted through two resurgences of interest in the style in the 1950's and 1970's. His name as a performer and composer is best known to aficionados of early jazz and Broadway history. In the broader spectrum of ragtime and jazz, his name is mentioned along with Fats Waller and Jelly Roll Morton. Blake's important legacy rests in his bold efforts in the 1920's to compose music for African American performers and audiences on African American topics and to create Shuffle Along, which broke the racial barrier on Broadway by moving black Americans and their music into the entertainment mainstream in New York.

For his musical accomplishments, he received an honorary doctorate from Brooklyn College in 1973, followed by honorary degrees from Dartmouth College, Rutgers University, the New England Conservatory, and the University of Maryland. He received the Presidential Medal of Freedom in 1981. He was inducted posthumously into the American Theater Hall of Fame, he had his likeness placed on a U.S. postage stamp, and he had his recording from 1969 entered in the Library of Congress National Recording Registry.

Eubie Blake. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Jonathan A. Sturm

Further Reading

Kimball, Robert, and William Bolcom. Reminiscing with Noble Sissle and Eubie Blake. New York: Cooper Square Press, 2000. Extensive interviews with ragtime pianist Blake and his lyricist for Shuffle Along, Sissle. Includes photographs.

Rose, Al. Eubie Blake. New York: Schirmer Books, 1979. A comprehensive biography of Blake's personal life that puts him in context with the popular musicians of the early twentieth century. Includes photographs, discography, piano rollography, and filmography.

Southern, Eileen. "Blake, Eubie." The New Grove Dictionary of Jazz. 2d ed. Edited by Barry Kernfeld. London: Macmillan, 2002. A brief encyclopedia entry on Blake, with a few additional details and bibliography.

See also: Cole, Nat King; Goodman, Benny; Hunter, Alberta; Morton, Jelly Roll; Robeson, Paul; Still, William Grant; Waller, Fats.

Art Blakey

American jazz composer and drummer

A leading drummer of the modern jazz movement, Blakey was influential in developing the hard-bop style. His band, the Jazz Messengers, was a training ground for musicians, from Clifford Brown to Wynton Marsalis.

Born: October 11, 1919; Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania
Died: October 16, 1990; New York, New York
Member of: Art Blakey and the Jazz Messengers

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (with the Jazz Messengers): Art Blakey and the Jazz Messengers, 1953; Art Blakey Quintet, Vol. 2, 1954; Blakey with the Jazz Messengers, 1954; Jazz Messengers, 1954; Art Blakey and the Jazz Messengers, 1956; Art Blakey with the Original Jazz Messengers, 1956; Drum Suite, 1956; Hard Bop, 1956; Hard Drive, 1956; The Jazz Messengers, 1956; Originally, 1956; Art Blakey and His Rhythm, 1957; Art Blakey Big Band, 1957; Art Blakey and the Jazz Messengers, 1957; Art Blakey/John Handy: Messages, 1957; Art Blakey's Jazz Messengers with Thelonious Monk, 1957; Cu-Bop, 1957; Dawn on the Desert, 1957; Jazz Messengers Play Lerner and Loewe, 1957; Midnight Session, 1957; Mirage, 1957; Night in Tunisia, 1957; Once Upon a Groove, 1957; Orgy in Rhythm, Vol. 1, 1957; Orgy in Rhythm, Vol. 2, 1957; Reflections on Buhania, 1957; Ritual: The Modern Jazz Messengers, 1957; Theory of Art, 1957; Second Edition, 1957; Art Blakey and the Jazz Messengers, 1958; Des femmes disparaissent, 1958; Drums Around the Corner, 1958; Holiday for Skins, Vol. 1, 1958; Moanin', 1958; Africaine, 1959; Les Liaisons dangereuses, 1959; A Night in Tunisia, 1960; The Big Beat, 1960; Lausanne 1960, Pt. 1, 1960; Like Someone in Love, 1960; A Jazz Hour with Art Blakey's Jazz Messengers: Blues March, 1961; Art Blakey, 1961; Art Blakey!!!!! Jazz Messengers!!!!!, 1961; Buhaina's Delight, 1961; The Freedom Rider, 1961; Mosaic, 1961; Pisces, 1961; Roots and Herbs, 1961; The Witch Doctor, 1961; The African Beat, 1962; Caravan, 1962; Thermo, 1962; Three Blind Mice, Vol. 1, 1962; A Jazz Message, 1963; Selections from the Film Golden Boy, 1963; Blues Bag, 1964; Free for All, 1964; Indestructible, 1964; Kyoto, 1964; 'S Make It, 1964; Soul Finger, 1965; Buttercorn Lady, 1966; Hold On, I'm Coming, 1966; Tough!, 1966; Art Blakey and the Jazz Messengers, 1970; For Minors Only, 1971; Anthenagin, 1973; Buhaina, 1973; Backgammon, 1976; Percussion Discussion, 1976; Gypsy Folk Tales: Art Blakey and the Jazz Messengers, 1977; In My Prime, Vol. 1, 1977; Reflections in Blue, 1978; A Night in Tunisia, 1979; One by One: Art Blakey and the Jazz Messengers, 1979; Album of the Year, 1981; Killer Joe: Art Blakey and George Kawaguchi, 1981; Straight Ahead, 1981; Art Blakey and the All Star

Messengers, 1982; Oh, by the Way, 1982; New York Scene, 1984; Blue Night, 1985; Buhaina: The Continuing Message, 1985; Farewell, 1985; Hard Champion: Art Blakey and the Jazz Messengers, 1985; Feeling Good, 1986; I Get a Kick out of Bu, 1988; Not Yet, 1988; Standards: Art Blakey and the Jazz Messengers, 1988; Feel the Wind, 1989; Art Blakey and Clifford Brown, 1990; Chippin' In, 1990; Jazz Messengers, 1990; One for All, 1990; Hot Licks: One by One, 1993; Are You Real, 1995; Art Blakey and the Jazz Messengers, 1997; Jazz in Paris: Jazz and Cinéma, Vol. 2, 2002; Recuerdo, 2002; Workshop, 2002.

ALBUMS: A Night at Birdland, Vols. 1-3, 1954.

Art Blakey. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The Life

Art Blakey (BLAY-kee) was born in 1919 in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. His father had abandoned his mother before Blakey was born, and his mother died before his second birthday. At age fourteen, Blakey went to work in Pittsburgh's steel mills, and he played piano and led a jazz band in the evenings. The turning point in his musical life came when pianist Erroll Garner joined his band, which forced Blakey to switch to drums.

Blakey left Pittsburgh in 1939 to join Fletcher Henderson's band, and he played with Mary Lou Williams before returning to Henderson in 1943. In 1944 Blakey became the drummer for Billy Eckstine's big band, the incubator for the new bebop style. Dizzy Gillespie was the band's music director and trumpeter, and Eckstine's band included such future luminaries as Charlie Parker, Thelonious Monk, and Sarah Vaughan. With Gillespie's coaching, Blakey came of age as a bop drummer. When Eckstine's band dissolved in 1947, Blakey organized a rehearsal band called the Seventeen Messengers, and he recorded with an octet called the Messengers. When these groups proved unfeasible financially, Blakey traveled to Africa to study religion in 1948 and 1949.

In 1953 Blakey formed a cooperative group with pianist Horace Silver, saxophonist Hank Mobley, and trumpeter Kenny Dorham, and this group became the first Jazz Messengers. When Silver and the other members left in 1956, Blakey retained the name and began the legacy of the Jazz Messengers as a training ground for young musicians. Highlights of Blakey's later career include the Jazz Messengers' first tour of Japan in 1961 and the drummer's involvement in the Giants of Jazz world tour in 1971. Blakey continued to lead and perform until just before his death from lung cancer in 1990.

The Music

In the mid-1950's, Blakey's collaborations with Silver resulted in a new style of jazz known as hard bop, which fused elements of bebop with rhythm and blues and black gospel. Its beginnings were inspired by artists such as Mahalia Jackson and Ray Charles, and it had a funky, earthy feel that was extremely popular and widely imitated. Throughout the thirty-five years he led the Jazz Messengers, Blakey remained faithful to the blues and to the swinging rhythms that defined hard bop.

Blakey's drumming was characterized by intense, driving rhythms and by his forceful and insistent two and four beat on the hi-hat. The influence of African drumming can be heard in Blakey's experimentations with altering the pitch of his drums and with complex polyrhythms. Blakey's best work was as leader of the Jazz Messengers, where he sought to teach and inspire through his strong leadership and tough playing.

A Night at Birdland. With A Night at Birdland, Blakey burst onto the jazz scene as a leader, and these recordings are still among the most favored by jazz fans. They were recorded live at the jazz nightclub Birdland in New York City on February 21, 1954, and they feature Blakey with Clifford Brown, trumpet; Lou Donaldson, alto saxophone; Silver, piano; and Curly Russell, bass. In addition to bop standards such as "A Night in Tunisia" and "Confirmation," A Night at Birdland includes several compositions by Silver. Highlights include Blakey's playing on "Quicksliver," the solos by Donaldson and Brown on "Wee-Dot," and Blakey's solo on "Mayreh."

At the Café Bohemia. These two volumes were made in Greenwich Village on November 23, 1955, and they feature the original group to take the name Jazz Messengers: Dorham, trumpet; Mobley, tenor saxophone; Silver, piano; Doug Watkins, bass; and Blakey, drums. The first volume features swinging tunes by Dorham, while the strength of the second volume is in its ballads. Throughout both volumes, Blakey is at his best, both as a drummer and as a leader. Notable is how Blakey perfectly complements and propels Dorham's solo on "Minor's Holiday," then explodes into a masterful solo of his own before the final chorus.

Moanin'. Considered by many to be Blakey's finest recording, Moanin' epitomizes characteristics of the Jazz Messengers that shaped the group for years to come: the hard-swinging, blues-based style, the intense solos, and the compositions by band members. The funky title track by pianist Bobby Timmons evokes gospel music, and it employs African American call-and-response refrains. Four of the five tracks of the album were composed by Messenger saxophonist Benny Golson; especially notable are his "Along Came Betty" and "Blues March." In addition to Blakey, Golson, and Timmons, the recording features Lee Morgan, trumpet, and Jymie Merritt, bass.

A Night in Tunisia. This album features one of the finest configurations of the Jazz Messengers, with Blakey joined by Lee Morgan, trumpet; Wayne Shorter, tenor saxophone; Timmons, piano; and Merritt, bass. The title track begins with Blakey accompanied by other band members on auxiliary percussion before the other instruments gradually join to state the tune. Blazing solos by Shorter and Morgan are supported by fabulous playing by Blakey, Timmons, and Merritt. After Merritt and then Blakey solo, the auxiliary percussion joins again to lead into the closing statement of the tune. The Jazz Messengers, however, are not yet done with "A Night in Tunisia": The piece continues with spectacular unaccompanied interludes first by Morgan and then by Shorter before the band joins for the closing. The remainder of this outstanding album features compositions by band members Shorter, Timmons, and Morgan.

Musical Legacy

Blakey left decades of outstanding jazz performances, many of which survive in recordings, and a long line of outstanding musicians. The list of Blakey's more than 150 Jazz Messengers sidemen reads like a "who's who" of jazz, and it includes such stars as trumpeters Brown, Dorham, Morgan, Freddie Hubbard, Chuck Mangione, Wynton Marsalis, and Terence Blanchard; saxophonists Mobley, Jackie McLean, Golson, Shorter, Bobby Watson, and Branford Marsalis; trombonist Curtis Fuller; pianists Silver, Timmons, Cedar Walton, JoAnne Brackeen, Mulgrew Miller, and Benny Green; and bassists Watkins, Merritt, and Lonnie Plaxico.

Mark A. Peters

Further Reading

Goldberg, Joe. "Art Blakey." In Jazz Masters of the Fifties. New York: Da Capo, 1965. This chapter describes Blakey's many accomplishments in the 1950's, and it gives an accurate picture of Blakey as man and musician.

Goldsher, Alan. Hard Bop Academy: The Sidemen of Art Blakey and the Jazz Messengers. Milwaukee, Wis.: Hal Leonard, 2002. An upbeat tribute to Blakey and the Jazz Messengers, with brief vignettes on many of the sidemen for the Jazz Messengers.

Gourse, Leslie. Art Blakey: Jazz Messenger. New

York: Schirmer Books, 2002. Jazz biographer Gourse presents a study of Blakey's life.

Korall, Burt. Drummin' Men: The Heartbeat of Jazz—The Bebop Years. Oxford, England: Oxford University Press, 2002. Detailed story of Blakey's life and music, with quotations about Blakey from numerous interviews conducted by the author.

Rosenthal, David H. "The Big Beat! Conversation with Art Blakey." The Black Perspective in Music 14 (1986): 267-289. In this conversation Blakey comments on a wide range of topics, including his life, his music, and the Jazz Messengers.

See also: Adderley, Cannonball; Barretto, Ray; Brown, Clifford; Charles, Ray; Garner, Erroll; Gillespie, Dizzy; Gordon, Dexter; Hancock, Herbie; Henderson, Fletcher; Jackson, Mahalia; Jarrett, Keith; Jones, Hank; Marsalis, Wynton; Monk, Thelonious; Parker, Charlie; Rollins, Sonny; Shorter, Wayne; Vaughan, Sarah.

Mary J. Blige

American rhythm-and-blues singer

A noted singer and songwriter, Blige combined rap and hip-hop in her empowering songs that center on self-esteem.

Born: January 11, 1971; Bronx, New York
Also known as: Mary Jane Blige (full name); Queen of Hip-Hop Soul

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: What's the 411?, 1992; What's the 411? Remix, 1992; My Life, 1994; Share My World, 1997; Mary, 1999; No More Drama, 2001; Dance for Me, 2002; Love and Life, 2003; The Breakthrough, 2005; Growing Pains, 2007.

The Life

Born in the Bronx, Mary Jane Blige (blij) spent her early years in Savannah, Georgia, where she had her first singing experiences in church. Soon she moved back to New York with her mother and sister, residing in a housing project since her broken family's budget was strained. Music was a positive influence in Blige's underprivileged life, though she dropped out of high school by junior year, a decision she regretted later. On a trip to a local mall, Blige recorded a cover of Anita Baker's "Caught Up in the Rapture" at a karaoke station. When that tape reached a local music industry executive, she got work as a background vocalist and a record deal with Uptown Records. Later, she was discovered by Sean "Puffy" Combs, who produced Blige's 1992 debut disc What's the 411? on Uptown/MCA. While her music career was launching, her personal life was making headlines—for several romantic relationships, including a tumultuous one with Cedric "K-Ci" Hailey (singer for soul group Jodeci), and for her abuse of drugs and alcohol. In 2000 she met music industry executive Martin Kendu Isaacs, and he helped free her from addictions. They married in 2003 in a private ceremony.

Blige has had success in other pursuits. She has acted, appearing in the television series The Jamie Foxx Show, in the independent film Prison Song (2001), and in the Off-Broadway play The Exonerated (2004). In addition, she started a record label, Matriarch Records, and she invested in the Carol's Daughter line of beauty products.

The Music

Early in her career, Blige was described as a combination of Aretha Franklin, Chaka Khan, and Patti LaBelle. In fact, Blige evolved from rhythm-and-blues and soul styles to rap and hip-hop.

Early Works. Thanks to the diverse sound offered in her debut What's the 411?, Blige attracted many listeners. The album featured the production talents of Combs, and it introduced her singular blend of hip-hop and soul, resulting in a wide array of sounds (including the danceable "Real Love" and a streetwise cover of "Sweet Thing," originally by Khan's group Rufus). Its widespread popularity paved the way for My Life, inspired in part by her stormy personal relationships, and it sold more than three million copies. Momentum continued with "Not Gon' Cry" on the sound track for Waiting to Exhale (1995) and a duet with Method Man on "I'll Be There for You/You're All I Need to Get By," for which she won her first Grammy Award for Best Rap Performance by a Duo or Group.

Share My World. On Share My World, Blige worked with such prominent producers as Jimmy Jam, Terry Lewis, R. Kelly, and Babyface Edmonds.

The project ran the stylistic gamut from rhythm and blues to hip-hop, and it included collaborators as diverse as the soulful Kelly, rapper Nas, and jazz artist George Benson. The album sold five million copies, and it won an American Music Award for Favorite Soul/Rhythm & Blues Music. The project also propelled Blige onto the concert circuit, which in 1998 resulted in another album, the sound track The Tour.

Mary. In 1999 Blige interjected pop into her urban sound, simultaneously expanding her fan base without alienating her core fans. On Mary, Blige sampled from or had direct contributions from Elton John, Aretha Franklin, Eric Clapton, and Lauryn Hill. This album showcased her vocal talents beyond the rap and hip-hop style.

No More Drama. Though Blige was never shy about sharing her personal emotions or admitting her faults (such as struggles with alcohol and in relationships), No More Drama is arguably her most forthright lyrical project. In it she sings about dismissing the harmful forces and relationships in her life, and its empowering songs (such as the title cut) became anthems for self-esteem. Besides debuting at number two on the Billboard album charts, it had a number-one single, "Family Affair." It sold more than three million copies in the United States.

Love and Life. As the title implies, this project centers on happy themes. With the involvement of producer Combs, the album reached back to her early sound stylings. She also reunited with Method Man on "Love @ 1st Sight"—which, along with the other singles, "Ooh!," "It's a Wrap," and "Not Today" (with Eve)—led to a chart-topping debut on the Billboard 200.

The Breakthrough. The Breakthrough, which found a top spot on the album charts, had several contributors, including urban superstars Jay-Z, 50 Cent, and the Game. Blige broke new ground by teaming up with U2, covering its hit single "One," recording it with the band, and trading vocal lines with front man Bono. It had eight nominations for Grammy Awards, and it won three, including Best Female Rhythm and Blues Vocal Performance, Best Rhythm and Blues Song, and Best Rhythm and Blues album.

Reflections: A Retrospective. After such a consistent and prolific album streak, the performer was due for a break, while her fans requested a career-spanning singles collection. Outside of radio hits such as "Real Love," "Not Gon' Cry," "No More Drama," and "Family Affair," it included four new tracks (including a duet with John Legend called "King and Queen").

Growing Pains. Blige returned in late 2007 with a thematic continuation of her prior two studio albums. Growing Pains discusses her lifelong struggles, and it showcases the spiritual realizations that led to her healing. The tone is old-school soul and rhythm and blues, with an occasional hip-hop and rap undercurrent. The lead single "Just Fine" was another of her odes to self-esteem. The collection was followed by an extensive concert tour with Jay-Z, which sold out several arenas across the United States.

Musical Legacy

Whether in rap, hip-hop, soul, rhythm-and-blues, or pop style, Blige's impassioned vocals are unmistakable. Her versatility has allowed her to cross over on a variety of charts. She is an inspiration to artists performing in all those styles, and she has successfully reached the success of her models, Chaka Khan and Patti LaBelle. Blige rose above her underprivileged roots and her troubles with addictions, chronicling her struggles in her songs.

Andy Argyrakis

Further Reading

Brackett, Nathan, and Christian Hoard, eds. The New Rolling Stone Album Guide. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2004. A definitive guide to Blige's many albums until 2004 includes background information on her rise to fame.

Brown, Terrell. Mary J. Blige. Broomall, Pa.: Mason Crest, 2008. In a series for juvenile readers about the hip-hop genre, the author places Blige in context and chronicles her rise to become the Queen of Hip-Hop Soul.

Hardy, Ernest. "Mary J. Blige Has Something to Tell You About Fighting AIDS, Creating a Hot New Album, and Doing the Hard Work of Living with Joy." The Advocate, December 4, 2007. A cover story interview in which Blige addresses issues for the gay community, along with anecdotes about her album Growing Pains.

Torres, Jennifer. Blue Banner Biography: Mary J. Blige. Hockessin, Del.: Mitchell Lane, 2007. A short but detailed account, tracing Blige's early struggles at home through her professional discovery and eventual international success.

Waldron, Clarence. "Mary J. Blige Roars Back with Hit CD The Breakthrough and Testifies 'You Can't Hold a Good Woman Down.'" Jet (January 23, 2006): 54-55. Timed for the release of The Breakthrough, this cover story discusses Blige's personal struggles and how she rose above her underprivileged background.

See also: Babyface; Bono; Clapton, Eric; Combs, Sean; Elliott, Missy; 50 Cent; Franklin, Aretha; Jay-Z; John, Sir Elton; LaBelle, Patti; Simone, Nina; Sting.

Kurtis Blow

American rap singer, songwriter, and keyboard player

One of the creators of the rap genre, Blow distinguished himself as a disc jockey and emcee. He was the first rapper to sign a deal with a major record label and the first rapper to have a gold record.

Born: August 9, 1959; Harlem, New York
Also known as: Curtis Walker (birth name); Kool DJ Kurt

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Kurtis Blow, 1980; Deuce, 1981; Tough, 1982; Ego Trip, 1984; Rapper in Town, 1984; America, 1985; Kingdom Blow, 1986; Back by Popular Demand, 1988; Only the Strong Survive, 1988.

SINGLES: "The Breaks," 1979; "Christmas Rappin'," 1979; "Party Time?," 1983; "The Breaks 94," 1994; "Freak Rock Til the Break of Dawn," 1995.

The Life

Kurtis Blow was born as Curtis Walker in Harlem in 1959. As a teen, he attended New York's High School of Music and Art, although he was expelled for poor attendance. At his next school he was caught selling drugs, and the dean suggested that Blow skip high school and enroll in college. Blow entered the City College of New York to study vocal performance and started programming at the radio station there. He was also working block parties as a break dancer and disc jockey, going by the name Kool DJ Kurt. Around this time he met Russell Simmons, future rap entrepreneur and cofounder of Def Jam Recordings, who persuaded him to move to Queens, another section of New York City, and change his name to Kurtis Blow.

Blow released a number of albums in the 1980's, but after his initial hits, his star waned and he began producing other rappers, such as the Fearless Four and the Fat Boys. In the early 1990's he moved to California with his wife and three children in order to pursue an acting career. However, he found success as a radio disc jockey, hosting an old-school rap show. Later he joined Sirius Satellite Radio, and he created a hip-hop ministry featuring Christian-themed rap.

The Music

When Blow first began performing as a disc jockey and emcee in the 1970's, rap was an underground genre. It was mostly heard at block parties in Harlem and Brooklyn and was traded on cassette tapes or recorded on independent labels for extremely limited release. Major record companies believed rap would be a passing fad and were not interested in adding rappers to their rosters. Surprised by the success of Sugarhill Gang's "Rapper's Delight," which became a crossover hit in 1980, Mercury Records discovered Blow's independently produced "Christmas Rappin'." It signed him, making Blow the first rapper with a major record deal. His first album sold well, but his popularity declined as the artists for whom he paved the way came up with more successful innovations in the genre. Blow's work swiftly lost its fresh sound, as rap became faster, edgier, wittier, and more rhythmically complex.

"Christmas Rappin'." Blow cowrote this song with Robert Ford, a writer from Billboard magazine, and released it independently in 1979. An urban retelling of The Night Before Christmas, the song was an underground success. Mercury Records signed Blow for two singles, agreeing that if these did well, it would release a full-length album. "Christmas Rappin'" tells the story of Santa Claus showing up to deliver gifts at a house where a Christmas Eve party is taking place and pausing there to flirt and dance with the girls before continuing on his way. The bass line mimics the one used in Queen's "Another One Bites the Dust." Slow, innocent, and comical, the single eventually went gold. Blow's career was launched on the basis of this sweet and idiosyncratic modern Christmas carol.

"The Breaks." This 1979 follow-up single clocked in at seven minutes and forty-three seconds, and it was one of the first singles to be released on a twelve-inch record. It reached the Top 5 on the Billboard rhythm-and-blues chart, and it marked a defining moment in rap. Using the kind of wordplay that would become common in 1980's rap, "The Breaks" refers to good and bad luck as well as break-dancing moves.

Kurtis Blow. In 1980 Blow released his first album, Kurtis Blow. It included "The Breaks"; "Rappin' Blow, Part Two," a sequel to "Christmas Rappin'"; and the sociopolitically themed "Hard Times." "Hard Times" presaged the political commentary that became a characteristic of later rap artists, such as Furious Five and Public Enemy. Indicating that rap had not found its foothold and that record labels were struggling to define the genre, the album contained a surprisingly ill-conceived cover of Bachman-Turner Overdrive's arena rock anthem, "Taking Care of Business."

Musical Legacy

Blow crossed paths with a surprising array of musicians during his heyday. In 1980 he opened for Bob Marley and the Wailing Wailers at Madison Square Garden in New York City. At various points he opened for the Commodores and the Clash. Bob Dylan contributed vocals to a cut on 1986's Kingdom Blow. When Blow's musical career went into decline, he supported other rappers' careers, helping the Fat Boys get a record deal and producing most of their albums. He had a role in the rap-themed 1985 film Krush Groove. Blow's hits are classics of the old-school genre, and his song "Basketball" is frequently heard at National Basketball Association games. Blow was ordained a minister, and he claims that he never in his entire career recorded a curse word. In collaboration with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), he crusaded to clean up the language on contemporary hip-hop albums.

Lacy Schutz

Further Reading

Blow, Kurtis. "The Ministry of Hip-Hop: Interview with Kurtis Blow." Interview by Scotty Ballard and Javonne Stewart. Jet, August 28, 2006. In this interview, Blow talks about Hip Hop Church, which he founded and which uses music to attract teens and young adults to Christian services.

Forman, Murray, and Mark Anthony Neal, eds. That's the Joint! The Hip-Hop Studies Reader. Oxford, England: Routledge, 2004. This anthology compiles twenty-five years of scholarship on rap and hip-hop.

Fricke, Jim, and Charlie Ahearn. Yes Yes Y'All: The Experience Music Project Oral History of Hip-Hop's First Decade. New York: Da Capo Press, 2002. Produced by Seattle's Experience Music Project for its Hip-Hop Nation exhibit, this extensively illustrated compilation traces hip-hop's early days.

George, Nelson. Hip-Hop America. New York: Penguin, 2005. A journalist who has been writing about rap since the 1970's looks at the cultural milieu into which hip-hop was born.

Rockwell, John. "The New 'Rapping' Style in Pop." The New York Times, October 12, 1980. An early mainstream assessment of the then-new genre of rap.

See also: Dylan, Bob; LL Cool J; Marley, Bob; Simmons, Joseph "Run."

Bono

Irish rock singer and songwriter

Bono, lead vocalist and principal lyricist of the Irish rock group U2, is noted for his distinct voice and pointed lyrics about religion, politics, and human rights.

Born: May 10, 1960; Dublin, Ireland
Also known as: Paul David Hewson (birth name); Bono Vox
Member of: U2

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): God's Favorite Son, 2004.
ALBUMS (with U2): Boy, 1980; October, 1981; War, 1983; The Unforgettable Fire, 1984; The Joshua Tree, 1987; Rattle and Hum, 1988; Achtung Baby, 1991; Zooropa, 1993; Pop, 1997; All That You Can't Leave Behind, 2000; How to Dismantle an Atomic Bomb, 2004; No Line on the Horizon, 2009.
SINGLES (with U2): "New Year's Day," 1983; "Sunday Bloody Sunday," 1983; "Pride (In the Name of Love)," 1984; "I Still Haven't Found What I'm Looking For," 1987; "Where the Streets Have No Name," 1987; "With or Without You," 1987.
WRITINGS OF INTEREST: On the Move, 2006.

Bono. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The Life

Paul David Hewson was born in Dublin, Ireland, to Robert and Iris Hewson, and, with his older brother Norman, he was raised in the Protestant religion. He attended the Protestant-run Mount Temple Comprehensive School, where he met his future U2 bandmates and his wife, Ali. In his street-gang youth, Hewson had several nicknames, including Bono (BAH-noh), an abbreviation of a loose Latin translation of bonavox (good voice) taken from a Dublin hearing aid store, and he has been known as Bono, publicly and privately, ever since.

In 1976 Bono responded to Larry Mullen's school bulletin board advertisement for musicians to form a band. Almost two years later, U2 won a talent show in Limerick, Ireland, and the prize included funding for a demo release. In May, 1978, Paul McGuinness became U2's manager, and the band—with Bono on guitar, Mullen on drums, David Evans (The Edge) on guitar and keyboards, and Adam Clayton on bass—began its long and extremely successful musical career.

Aside from his work with U2, Bono collaborated with other artists, made several profitable financial investments, wrote poetry, and participated in numerous humanitarian efforts to help those suffering in Africa and from AIDS. To support his charities, he established EDUN, described as a socially conscious clothing line. He met with President George W. Bush at the National Prayer Breakfast in Washington, D.C., in 2006. Among Bono's numerous achievements are British knighthood and nominations for the Nobel Prize and Academy, Golden Globe, and Grammy Awards.

The Music

Bono is best recognized as a rock musician, specifically as lead vocalist and principal lyricist of the Irish rock group U2. U2's consistent popularity can be linked to its willingness to experiment sonically, while maintaining its distinctive sound, and the broad range of subjects in its songs' lyrics.

Early Works. In 1976, after an inauspicious beginning in Mullen's kitchen, U2 garnered some attention when it released a demo that gained the notice of Island Records, which signed the band in 1980. U2's first major release, Boy, received positive reviews, and that was followed by a less-successful second album, October. Both albums' lyrics reveal a strong emphasis on the band's Christian faith, with October earning a spot on Contemporary Christian Music Magazine's list of top Christian albums of all time. U2's third album, War, retained some of the band's earlier Christian themes, but it was more politically charged. The Daniel Lanois-Brian Eno-engineered fourth release, The Unforgettable Fire, was a marked change from previous albums, with its experimental, impressionistic, and improvisatory music.

The Joshua Tree and Rattle and Hum. The band's exploration of indigenous American musical genres helped shape its fifth album, The Joshua Tree, which quickly rose to the top of international charts and which some consider one of the best rock albums of all time. The American-influenced recording also won U2 its first two Grammy Awards and is a consistent best-seller. The next album and its accompanying documentary, Rattle and Hum, contained a mixture of new material and live recordings; however, it received mixed reviews from critics.

Achtung Baby. Taking a break from Rattle and Hum, U2 released its seventh album in 1991 to rave reviews and reception. The band starting arguing while they were recording the album, because Bono and the Edge wanted to incorporate more techno-electronic and dancelike sounds, while Mullen and Clayton wanted to maintain U2's rock-and-roll feel. The conflict threatened to break apart the band, but the members eventually came together to write the mega-hit "One."

Later Works. Following the outstanding success of Achtung Baby, U2's next two albums, Zooropa and Pop, utilized the band's interest in experimental music and techniques and were not as commercially successful as previous albums. After a brief hiatus from recording, U2's 2000 release, All That You Can't Leave Behind, signaled a return to the band's traditional roots in rock. That album and the next, How to Dismantle an Atomic Bomb, were extremely successful, garnering more Grammy Awards for the band. In 2005 U2 was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame.

Musical Legacy

As principal lyricist and lead singer of the rock group U2, Bono became a rock-and-roll legend. U2's distinct sound is largely credited to Bono's unique vocals, which range from impassioned and throaty to falsetto. Lyrically, Bono has been inspired by his Christian faith, his mother's untimely death, political concerns, social justice, and humanitarian work. Despite the public's fickle taste in popular music, U2 has maintained its popularity, with its forays into various musical sounds, from gospel to techno. Bono cites as his influences the Clash, the Beatles, and the Who. U2, in turn, has influenced Coldplay, the Killers, Snow Patrol, and many more.

Anastasia Pike

Further Reading

Bordowitz, Hank. U2 Reader. Milwaukee, Wis.: Hal Leonard, 2003. An excellent resource documents the band from professional and personal perspectives. Includes notable newspaper interviews and objective analysis.

Cashman, Lola. Inside the Zoo with U2: My Life with the World's Biggest Rock Band. London: John Blake, 2003. U2's first stylist gives an interesting, highly subjective, and controversial glimpse into U2's image.

De la Parra, Pimm Jal. U2 Live: A Concert Documentary. London: Omnibus Press, 2003. Extensive documentation of all U2 concerts through part of the PopMart tour. Contains details from set lists to pizza-delivery orders.

Scharen, Christian. One Step Closer: Why U2 Matters to Those Seeking God. Ada, Mich.: Brazos Press, 2006. Written by a Yale Divinity School faculty member and Lutheran minister, the book explores the seeming dichotomy between U2's Christian lyrics and the rock-and-roll lifestyle.

U2, and Neil McCormick. U2 by U2. New York: HarperCollins, 2006. The band's autobiography includes stunning photography and personal insights from each member.

See also: Blige, Mary J.; Jones, Quincy; Lennon, John; McCartney, Sir Paul; Morrison, Van; Orbison, Roy; Pavarotti, Luciano; Prokofiev, Sergei; Strummer, Joe.

Nadia Boulanger

French classical composer, conductor, and teacher

Known as Mademoiselle to her legions of students, Boulanger taught numerous performers and composers, among them Aaron Copland, Darius Milhaud, and Leonard Bernstein, the intricacies of musicianship.

Born: September 16, 1887; Paris, France
Died: October 22, 1979; Paris, France
Also known as: Nadia Juliette Boulanger (full name)

Principal works

CHAMBER WORKS: Trois Pièces, 1911 (for organ); Trois Pièces, 1914 (for voice); Pièce for orgue sur des airs populaires flamands, 1915; Vers la vie nouvelle, 1917.

CHORAL WORKS: Allons voir sur le lac d'argent, 1905; Les Sirènes, 1905; À l'aube, 1906; Selma, 1907; À l'hirondelle, 1908; La Sirène, 1908; Roussalka, 1909; Soir d'été, 1909.

ORCHESTRAL WORKS: Allegro, 1905; Fantaisie variée, 1912.

The Life

Nadia Juliette Boulanger (NAH-dyah zhoo-LYEHT boo-lahn-ZHAY), born in 1887, was the daughter of Raïssa Mychestsky, singer, and Henri Alexandre Ernest Boulanger, composer, vocal professor, conductor, and pianist. An older and younger sister died in infancy, and Boulanger's surviving sister, Marie-Juliette Olga (Lili) Boulanger, became a well-known composer.

Boulanger began to show an interest in music at the age of five. Her father, a man she respected throughout her life, was her first teacher; he taught her aesthetics, art, and music. Her mother instructed her in reading, geography, and French and German. The strong work ethic instilled by her mother remained with Boulanger all her life.

Boulanger entered the Paris Conservatory when she was nine years old, although she had been auditing classes since she was seven. She continued private lessons, studying piano and organ with Louis Vierne. She eventually studied with Paul Vidal, Alexandre Guilmant, and Auguste Chapuis. Boulanger's intense focus on her lessons resulted in numerous first-place awards from the Paris Conservatory, which did not give out diplomas but instead awarded prizes indicating that a student had mastered the information.

Four years after her father's death in 1900, the family moved to an apartment on rue Ballu in Paris, and this was Boulanger's home for the rest of her life. It also functioned as her studio and salon, where she entertained the notable musicians, artists, and writers of the era. At this time, Boulanger, her mother, and her sister purchased a home in Gargenville, France, where they retreated during the hot summer months.

Boulanger met pianist Raoul Pugno in 1904 during her last exam, the accompagnement au piano, at the Paris Conservatory. He acted as her adviser until his death in 1914. Together they collaborated on Les Heures claire, a series of songs, and La Ville morte, an opera that was never performed.

When Boulanger completed her studies, she began her professional career in order to support her family. She played the organ; she worked as an assistant to Henri Dallier at the Church of the Madeleine; she accompanied such performers as Paul Franz, Marthe Chenal, and Suzanne Balguerie; and she performed as a pianist and conductor in concerts with Pugno. One concert featured her Fantaisie variée for piano and orchestra.

Just seventeen when she began teaching, Boulanger wore austere clothing—low-heeled shoes, long black skirts with white shirts, dark bow ties, black jackets, and spectacles—and pulled her hair back into a chignon to project an air of maturity. (Only when visiting Gargenville did she relax her style.) Her first students were her sister Lili and young ladies from wealthy families, including Annette Dieudonné, who became her companion in later life. In the rue Ballu apartment, Boulanger instructed her students using one of the two Pleyel grand pianos or the full-sized Cavaillé-Coll-Mutin organ with fourteen ranks of pipes. Lessons included performance, sight reading, sight singing, harmony, composition, counterpoint, accompaniment, and music history. Later, Wednesday-afternoon salons at Boulanger's apartment were regarded as significant, and only students who showed promise were invited to mingle there with the reigning composers of the day, such as Igor Stravinsky, Maurice Ravel, and Francis Poulenc.

In addition to being active in the musical world, Boulanger participated in such civic activities as writing letters to soldiers and arranging music for them throughout World War I. At the end of the war, Boulanger performed a concert to benefit the orphans. When World War II erupted, she moved to the United States at the request of her students, but she continued to be active in raising money for French musicians and soldiers.

In 1918 Lili died at the age of twenty-four, a death that deeply affected Boulanger, who pledged to devote herself to preserving her sister's memory. She accomplished this by promoting Lili's musical compositions and assisting Walter Damrosch, conductor of the New York Symphony, when he programmed Lili's Faust et Hélène.

In 1920 Boulanger replaced Paul Dukas in teaching music history at the École Normale de Musique in Paris, the first woman to hold this position. In addition, she taught organ, harmony, counterpoint, and composition there until 1939. In 1921 Damrosch persuaded Boulanger to join the faculty at the newly created summer American Conservatory in Fontainebleau, where she taught harmony, composition, and counterpoint, and at one point she was appointed director of the school. Boulanger also took a position in the Conservatoire Femina-Musica, and she received an appointment to teach at the Paris Conservatory. During World War II, while she lived in the United States, she was a visiting professor at the Longy School of Music in Cambridge, Massachusetts, and she taught at Radcliffe College in Boston, Massachusetts; at Wellesley College in Wellesley, Massachusetts; at Juilliard School of Music in New York City; and at the Dominican Convent in Santa Clara, Wisconsin.

After a lifetime of teaching music, Boulanger died in her home in Paris in 1979. She left the majority of her papers, including family documents, musical scores, personal compositions, honorary degrees, correspondence, and more, to the Boulanger archives in the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris.

The Music

Boulanger's strict musical education resulted in first prizes in organ, accompagnement au piano, and fugue from the Paris Conservatory. Following her father's death, her goal was to support her family by writing music, giving lessons, and performing. Her lessons continued outside the Paris Conservatory with Alphonse Duvernoy, Charles Widor, Paul Vidal, and Gabriel Fauré.

La Sirène. In 1908 Boulanger won the second prize in the prestigious Prix de Rome competition for her cantata La Sirène, although there was some controversy. There was an allegation that Boulanger, in the early stage of the competition, had composed the fugue for string quartet instead of for vocalists. This almost caused her to be disqualified from the competition, because the composition was required to be written for at least four voices.

Monteverdi. As an accomplished conductor and music historian, Boulanger organized numerous concerts of music from the medieval, Renaissance, and Baroque style periods featuring her vocal ensemble of talented amateur and professional singers in both live and recorded sessions. In 1937 Boulanger and her vocal ensemble produced five recordings of the madrigals of Claudio Monteverdi, one of the first times Monteverdi's music had been recorded.

Conductor. Although Boulanger was a composer and arranger, she renounced composition two years after her sister Lili's death. She continued to perform as an accomplished organist and conductor, the first woman to lead such renowned orchestras as the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra of London, the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, the Philadelphia Orchestra, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Musical Legacy

Boulanger's musical legacy is her students, with whom she shared her vast knowledge of music, including composition, theory, harmony, and history, and in whom she stimulated interests in various types and styles of music. Boulanger witnessed the changes in music from the teachings of her father, who focused on late 1800's works, through the experimentation of Stravinsky and the serialism of Arnold Schoenberg. In fact, all music was valuable to her. She was fascinated by the polyrhythms found in American jazz.

Boulanger taught her students to recognize the significance of a composition by Johann Sebastian

Bach and by Monteverdi. Her composition and her performing students were encouraged to find "la grande ligne" to accentuate the flow of the music throughout the piece. In addition, she encouraged them to understand all the musical elements and their function in the composition and the place that the composition held in musical history.

History and technique were just two of the gifts Boulanger gave her students: In addition, she championed her students' musical abilities. Former students stayed in touch with Boulanger and sent her their compositions for review, which she promoted to other musicians. For example, she commissioned Aaron Copland to compose Symphony for Organ and Orchestra. She performed the work with Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra and then with Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony.

Roberta L. Lindsey

Further Reading

Campbell, Don G. Master Teacher: Nadia Boulanger. Washington, D.C.: Pastoral Press, 1984. A biography, with writings by Boulanger and quotations from her students. Includes illustrations.

Kendall, Alan. The Tender Tyrant: Nadia Boulanger, a Life Devoted to Music. Wilton, Conn.: Lyceum Books, 1976. A student of Boulanger examines her teaching techniques and incredible knowledge of music. Includes illustrations.

Monsaingeon, Bruno, and Nadia Boulanger. Mademoiselle: Conversations with Nadia Boulanger. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1988. This intriguing book provides mock interviews with Boulanger, the author sculpting Boulanger's words to his imagined questions. Includes illustrations.

Rosenstiel, Léonie. Nadia Boulanger: A Life in Music. New York: W. W. Norton, 1982. Violinist, student, and family friend of Boulanger presents a thorough biography of the composer-teacher. Includes illustrations.

Spycket, Jérôme. Nadia Boulanger. Translated by M. M. Shriver. Stuyvesant, N.Y.: Pendragon Press, 1992. Originally written in French, this book won a prize for literature from the Académie des Beaux-Arts. Spycket, a musician, artist, and writer, portrays Boulanger in a fair and balanced manner. Includes illustrations and bibliography.

See also: Barenboim, Daniel; Carter, Elliott; Copland, Aaron; Glass, Philip; Koussevitzky, Serge; Legrand, Michel; Piazzolla, Astor; Poulenc, Francis; Ravel, Maurice; Schoenberg, Arnold; Stravinsky, Igor; Thomson, Virgil; Xenakis, Iannis.

Pierre Boulez

French classical composer and conductor

A prominent composer, conductor, and director of the avant-garde in the postwar era, Boulez broke with past musical traditions by developing and promoting music characterized by integral serialism, pointillism, and indeterminacy. As the director of the Institut de Recherche et Coordination Acoustique/Musique (IRCAM), he influenced the direction of electroacoustic music.

Born: March 26, 1925; Montbrison, France

Principal works

CHAMBER WORKS: Sonatina for Flute and Piano, 1947; Polyphonie X, 1951 (for eighteen instruments); Le Marteau sans maître, 1955; Livre pour quatour, 1955; Éclat, 1965; Domaines, 1968; Explosante-fixe, 1972; Répons, 1981.

ORCHESTRAL WORKS: Le Soleil des eaux, 1950 (for voice and orchestra); Le Visage nuptial, 1957; Doubles, 1958; Poésie pour pouvoir, 1958; Pli selon pli, 1960; Livre pour cordes, 1968; Rituel, 1975; Notations, 1980.

PIANO WORKS: Notations, 1945; Piano Sonata No. 1, 1946; Piano Sonata No. 2, 1950; Structures, 1952, completed 1953, revised 1961; Piano Sonata No. 3, 1957.

WRITINGS OF INTEREST: Pierre Boulez: Conversations with Celestin Deliege, 1985; Orientations: Collected Writings, 1990.

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (as conductor): Schönberg: Das Chorwek, 1990; Debussy: Pelléas et Mélisande, 1991; Richard Wagner: Overtures and Preludes, 1995; Mahler: Symphony No. 4, 2000; Bartók: Piano Concertos

Nos. 1 and 3, 2003; Stravinsky: The Firebird Suite, 2005; Wagner: Der Ring des Nibelungen, 2006.

The Life

Pierre Boulez (pyehr boo-LEHZ) was born in 1925 during the peace between the two world wars. He showed an aptitude for music and math, both important for his professional development. After a conflict with his father, who wanted him to pursue engineering, Boulez moved to Paris in 1942 to enroll in the Paris Conservatory. For the next three years, in German-occupied Paris, Boulez received his musical training from teachers such as Olivier Messiaen (harmony and analysis), René Leibowitz (serial techniques), and Andrée Vaurabourg (counterpoint). By the end of the war in 1945, Boulez had completed his formal studies.

As a composer, Boulez rose to prominence while still at the Paris Conservatory, having won a first prize in harmony before leaving in 1945. From the beginning of his career, he produced works in an avant-garde style and aesthetic, consciously avoiding formal structures and idioms from the past. From 1945 through 1952, he experimented with integral serialism. Throughout the 1950's, he also experimented with indeterminacy, producing some of his most famous works. Gradually, throughout the 1950's and early 1960's, his compositional output decreased, with Boulez shifting his energies to teaching and to conducting.

As an educator, Boulez taught composition at the Darmstadt International Summer Courses for New Music, at the Basle Musik-Akademie, and at Harvard. Many of his lectures and writings related to his teaching career during the 1950's and 1960's have been published, and they are a valuable source to understanding his music as well as the overall direction of postwar contemporary music.

As a director, Boulez began his successful career with a position as director of the Compagnie Renaud-Barrault, a new company formed in Paris in 1946. Although he was only twenty-one years old at the time, Boulez already showed an aptitude for management in the music industry. In 1954, less than ten years later, he established the Domaine Musical concert series, providing a venue for the performance of new music. He continued to influence the direction of musical life in Paris, becoming the president of the Paris Musicians' Union in 1965. In 1969 he accepted a position as chief conductor of London's BBC Symphony Orchestra. In 1970 he became the director of the New York Philharmonic, serving in that capacity until 1977. In that year, the Institut de Recherche et Coordination Acoustique/Musique (IRCAM) opened in Paris. Boulez became its first director, remaining in that position until 1992.

The Music

Boulez wrote his first works under the influence of Olivier Messiaen. Boulez was attracted to the idea of rhythm as an extension, rather than a division, of time, as well as to his precompositional, objective, logical, and serial determinations of the various elements of music.

Additionally, the composers known as the Second Viennese School—Arnold Schoenberg, Alban Berg, and especially Anton von Webern—influenced Boulez's early experiments with serial techniques. Not satisfied with the classical and Romantic idioms still existing in Arnold Schoenberg's and Alban Berg's music, Boulez moved toward integral serialism. The strictest compositions in this style were analogous to the pointillist technique of painting in art. By 1952, after the composition of Structures for two pianos, his own style emerged.

In addition to serial techniques, Boulez experimented with open forms that allowed for a certain amount of indeterminacy in performance. He allowed performers to choose the order of defined sections within larger works. Although his works were not as freely determined by chance as were the aleatory works of John Cage, with whom he was in frequent communication, Boulez remained an important figure in this area. Throughout his career, Boulez's compositional method has included reworking older pieces. For this reason, his oeuvre is characterized by numerous versions and revisions of the same work, a number of which remain unpublished.

Early Works. From 1945 until about 1950, Boulez produced works that had been heavily influenced by his formal training and his teachers. Although he experimented with unconventional instruments such as the ondes martenot, he wrote largely for works that included the piano. In Sonatina for Flute and Piano, Boulez consciously departed from the prevailing French neoclassic style, choosing rather the style of Schoenberg's tone rows and Messiaen's rhythmic cells. This piece, for which Boulez received a public review, marked his debut as an important composer. Piano Sonata No. 1 and Piano Sonata No. 2 were also composed during this time, a further attempt to integrate serial techniques into all areas of the music and to eliminate large formal structures.

Le Visage nuptial. Originally written in 1946 and based on five poems by René Char, Le Visage nuptial can be seen as an early work, although it is an example of many of Boulez's works that have undergone reworking. The first version was scored for solo soprano along with a small group of instruments that included two ondes martenot. The 1951 revised work is for women's chorus and full orchestra. The music shows further experimentation with precompositional serial processes that give a nonsentimental objectivity, an expressionistic, and a highly charged tension to the music. Instead of the classical structures of song, strophic, refrain, variation, and other text-based forms, Boulez created a structure based on symmetry and retrogradable rhythmic phrases found entirely in the music.

Structures. Written for two pianos, this first of two works with the title Structures is considered to be the textbook example of total serialism. Boulez's inspiration for this work was Messiaen's "Mode de valeurs et d'intensités," the starting point for Structures. This work is governed by a series of twelve factors in each of four elements of music—pitch, duration, attack, and dynamics—although Boulez achieves variety through transposition, inversion, and retrograde applications. Whereas these elements are determined rigidly by the rows and their manipulations, some choice is evident in assignments to register and density. The result is a disjunctive, pointillistic texture of seemingly random and unrelated pitches, sounding in a wide variety of dynamic levels and attacks. The series is the underlying order to the work, although it is not easily apparent to the listener.

Le Marteau sans maître. In 1953 Boulez began work on Le Marteau sans maître (the hammer without a master), a vocal work in nine movements again based on poetry by Char. The composition is based on serialism, but it is one that grows by extending variations and multiplications of the basic series in order to sustain coherence in a large work. It also explores unusual sonorities of various groupings of instruments in each of the movements, reminiscent of Schoenberg's Pierrot lunaire (1912).

Pierre Boulez. (Library of Congress)

Pli selon pli. Inspired by the poetry of Stéphane Mallarmé, Pli selon pli (fold upon fold), composed for soprano and orchestra, is one of Boulez's most famous works. The five movements—"Don," three interior "Improvisations sur Mallarmé," and "Tombeau"—are a tribute to the life and death of the poet. While continuing to employ serial techniques and rhythmic ideas that constantly avoid the establishment of a regular beat, Boulez experiments with a limited degree of indeterminacy, in which some choices in performance are given to either the conductor or the performer.

Piano Sonata No. 3. Reaching the height of Boulez's exploration of indeterminacy, Piano Sonata No. 3 incorporates freedom in choosing the order in performance of given sections of the music. Rather than having movements, the five major parts of the work are called "formants," because they are always in flux within a given set of parameters. In this sense, the music follows combinatorial procedures that allow for a range of performance possibilities. The first formant, "Antiphonie," is composed with two independent structures that have several possible orderings in performance together. Within each of the formants, there is a specified formula for changing the order and sequence of the sections. In the overall work, the formants themselves may be performed in an order allowing for some limited choices. "Antiphonie," for example, may be performed first, second, or last, but "Constellation" and "Constellation-miroir," the middle formant, must remain at the center of the piece.

Musical Legacy

Boulez has been one of the most influential composers and conductors of the latter half of the twentieth century. His work to eradicate every element from past traditions in the Western style and to create compositions that explored new ways of thinking about and composing music became an ideal for other composers. His continual reworking of his own compositions is evidence of a mind that continually seeks to incorporate new ideas. His thinking has advanced with musical innovation, from his early experiments in serialism to his excursions into quarter tones, indeterminacy, and electronic music. Although his compositional output decreased as he devoted more time to conducting and directing, all of his works can be found at the forefront of the avant-garde.

Because Boulez was a prolific writer, his legacy extends to his written work. He continues to influence musicians and composers through his philosophy, his attitude, his technical explanations, his views of other composers, and his analyses of the works of others and of his own.

In terms of his work as a promoter of new music through his positions as directors of large orchestras in Europe as well as in the United States, he has taken an active role in bringing new works to stages that had hitherto resisted modernization. His work as director of IRCAM has furthermore placed him in a prominent position to foster new avenues for creative research in music.

Sandra S. Yang

Further Reading

Born, Georgina. Rationalizing Culture: IRCAM, Boulez, and the Institutionalization of the Musical Avant-Garde. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1995. This is a study of the organization of IRCAM, the sociology of its composers and employees, and its importance in understanding the culture and economy of government-funded avant-garde music production. Born is an anthropologist who spent time participating in the activities at IRCAM.

Boulez, Pierre. Orientations: Collected Writings. Edited by Jean-Jacques Nattiez and translated by Martin Cooper. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1986. This complete collection of writings by the composer is divided into three major sections: one that explains Boulez's own compositional processes and aesthetic, one that comments on other composers, and one of reflections.

Boulez, Pierre, and John Cage. The Boulez-Cage Correspondence. Edited by Jean-Jacques Nattiez and translated and edited by Robert Samuels. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press, 1993. This valuable source contains the letters of the two great composers, often with detailed theoretical and analytical notes regarding new works. A valuable source for understanding parallel developments in avant-garde music in Europe and in the United States.

Gable, David. "Boulez's Two Cultures: The Postwar European Synthesis and Tradition." Journal of the American Musicological Society 43 (1990): 426-456. This article analyzes Boulez's work and the extent to which he was able to cast off the Western traditions he had inherited.

Glock, William, ed. Pierre Boulez: A Symposium. London: Eulenburg Books, 1986. This detailed biography of Boulez is written by a variety of scholars, all knowledgeable in the life and work of the composer. The book systematically discusses Boulez's contributions over the span of his career.

Vermeil, Jean. Conversations with Boulez: Thoughts on Conducting. Translated by Camille Nash. Portland, Oreg.: Amadeus Press, 1989. This valuable work in the format of an interview contains a famous treatise on conducting by Boulez.

See also: Babbitt, Milton; Barenboim, Daniel; Berg, Alban; Berio, Luciano; Cage, John; Carter, Elliott; Honegger, Arthur; Messiaen, Olivier; Nono, Luigi; Rampal, Jean-Pierre; Ravel, Maurice; Schoenberg, Arnold; Stockhausen, Karlheinz; Varèse, Edgard; Webern, Anton von.

David Bowie

English rock-pop singer and songwriter

Throughout his career, Bowie has presented completely new stage personas and fresh compositional styles—encompassing folk, glam rock, psychedelic, soul, disco, heavy metal, hip-hop, avant-garde, electronic, and other subgenres.

Born: January 8, 1947; London, England
Also known as: David Robert Jones (birth name); Ziggy Stardust; Thin White Duke

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: David Bowie, 1967; Space Oddity, 1969; Hunky Dory, 1971; The Man Who Sold the World, 1971; The Rise and Fall of Ziggy Stardust and the Spiders from Mars, 1972; Aladdin Sane, 1973; Pin Ups, 1973; Diamond Dogs, 1974; Young Americans, 1975; Station to Station, 1976; Heroes, 1977; Low, 1977; Lodger, 1979; Scary Monsters (and Super Creeps), 1980; Let's Dance, 1983; Oddity, 1984; Tonight, 1984; Never Let Me Down, 1987; Sound and Vision, 1989; Black Tie, White Noise, 1993; Outside, 1995; Earthling, 1997; Hours, 1999; London Boy, 2001; Heathen, 2002; Reality, 2003.

The Life

Born David Robert Jones on January 8, 1947, in London, England, David Bowie (BOH-ee) was the son of Heywood Stenton Jones and Margret Burns, who married in September, 1947. Bowie grew up with a half sister, Annette, and a stepbrother, Terry. As a youngster, he learned to play saxophone. In Bromley, Kent, he attended a technical boys' high school, where a fistfight with a classmate left him with a permanently dilated left pupil.

Leaving school at age sixteen, Bowie worked briefly as a commercial artist. He meanwhile performed with a succession of bands: the Kon-rads, King-Bees, Manish Boys, Lower Third, and Riot Squad. By 1966, to avoid being mistaken for Davy Jones of the Monkees, he changed his name to David Bowie.

Bowie released his debut self-titled album in 1967, the first of more than twenty recordings, most of which have charted well in England. Bowie added acting to his repertoire with the lead role in the film The Man Who Fell to Earth (1976), and he has appeared in other films, such as The Hunger (1983), Merry Christmas, Mister Lawrence (1983), Labyrinth (1986), The Last Temptation of Christ (1988), and The Prestige (2006), and he has appeared on Broadway in The Elephant Man (1979). Bowie also served as producer on acclaimed albums from Iggy Pop, Lou Reed, and others. Ever the innovator, in the late 1990's, he launched BowieNet, an Internet service provider.

An androgynous, highly visible, controversial figure, Bowie in the early 1970's publicly declared his bisexuality, but he later admitted it was a temporary lifestyle choice. He married his first wife, Angela Barnett, in 1970, and they had a son, Duncan Zowie Heywood Jones, born in 1971, before they divorced in 1980. After extended periods of drug abuse during the 1970's and 1980's, Bowie married for a second time, to Somali supermodel Iman (Abdulmajid) in 1992, and they had a daughter, Alexandria Zahra Jones, in 2000. The family divides time between homes in New York and London. After recuperation from an angioplasty in 2004, Bowie resumed a restrained tour schedule, and he is involved in a variety of other activities, including writing the sound track for a video game and contributing to other musicians' albums.

The Music

The lyrics of an early Bowie single, "Changes," encapsulate his entire musical career. Extreme change—in the form of wildly different onstage personas and musical styles—has characterized Bowie's work since he began writing and performing in the 1960's.

Early Works. Bowie began with little clear musical direction. His self-titled debut album mixed pop songs, psychedelic-influenced tunes, and novelty numbers, and it drew scant attention. He injected theatrical elements into his performances, and he began creating characters to lend visual interest to his music. His first hit, the single "Space Oddity," released in 1969 to coincide with the Apollo moon landing, rocketed to the top of the charts in England.

Glam Rock. After moderately successful heavy rock (The Man Who Sold the World) and acoustic (Hunky Dory) albums, Bowie made a major impact with The Rise and Fall of Ziggy Stardust and the Spiders from Mars, a glam rock concept album that produced hits such as "Moonage Daydream," "Starman," and "Suffragette City." Adopting the title character's persona, Bowie toured in support of the album, sporting a wild mane of red hair and outrageous costumes. At the same time, Bowie established Main Man Productions, which produced breakthrough albums for Lou Reed and the Stooges.

Bowie's follow-up album, Aladdin Sane, added to his star allure, rising to number one on charts in England and yielding such hits as "The Jean Genie" and "Drive-in Saturday." Pin Ups, featuring Bowie's covers of 1960's standards, also hit number one in England. In 1974 Bowie switched to pop-oriented music, releasing the rhythm-and-blues- and disco-heavy Diamond Dogs. The album claimed the top spot on British charts, and it reached number five in the United States, with hit singles such as the title cut and "Rebel Rebel." The funky, soulful Young Americans album solidified Bowie's foothold in the United States with the hit single "Fame."

The Thin White Duke. By the release of the U.S. number-three-ranked Station to Station, in which the soul theme, though choppy and disjointed, was still prominent, Bowie—now in the alter ego of the Thin White Duke—was a star in America. Nevertheless, at the peak of his popularity, Bowie moved to West Berlin to combat his cocaine addiction. During a four-year sojourn, he discovered electronics and minimalism, producing three experimental albums that incorporated world-beat rhythms—Low, Heroes, and Lodger—but yielded no major hits.

In 1980 Bowie released the hard-edged Scary Monsters (and Super Creeps), which generated a top single, "Ashes to Ashes." Let's Dance built upon that momentum with the hits "Modern Love" and "China Girl," as did a second dance album, Never Let Me Down. Following a two-year stint with Tin Machine, a new band that did little to enhance his reputation, Bowie changed direction with Black Tie, White Noise, focusing on soul, jazz, and hip-hop.

Later Work. After veering into alternative and electronic music with Outside, Bowie returned to an emphasis on live instrumentation and on a softer, introspective sound with Hours. Heathen, featuring darker material, charted well with singles such as "Slow Burn" and "I've Been Waiting for You."

Musical Legacy

An original, much-emulated, gender-bending theatrical stage presence, Bowie has demonstrated an uncanny ability to anticipate and capitalize on trends. Performing in an amazing range of genres, he has remained at the cutting edge of music, and he has produced well-received performances on film and stage, and he has demonstrated excellent skills as a sound and video producer.

Bowie has received many honors during his lifetime: Grammy Awards (in 1984 for Best Video Short Form and in 2006 for lifetime achievement), BRIT Awards (in 1984 for best British Male Solo Artist and in 1996 for outstanding contributions to music), and Webby Awards (in 2007 for outstanding contributions to music). Bowie was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 1996. He refused knighthood in 2003.

Jack Ewing

Further Reading

Bowie, Angela. Backstage Passes: Life on the Wild Side with David Bowie. New York: Cooper Square Press, 2000. Written by Bowie's former wife, this behind-the-scenes personal memoir focuses on the singer's bizarre behavior.

Buckley, David. Strange Fascination: David Bowie: The Definitive Story. London: Virgin Books, 2001. An in-depth biography of Bowie, illustrated with photographs, emphasizes the singer as an artist.

Pegg, Nicholas. The Complete David Bowie. Richmond, England: Reynolds & Hearn, 2006. This comprehensive and illustrated look at Bowie features analyses of albums, production histories, and live show documentation.

Waldrep, Shelton. The Aesthetics of Self-Invention: Oscar Wilde to David Bowie. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 2004. This scholarly work examines various personalities, among them Bowie, who created images for public consumption.

Welch, Chris. Davie Bowie: We Could Be Heroes: The Stories Behind Every David Bowie Song. New York: Thunder's Mouth Press, 1999. This is a song-by-song examination of the inspiration for Bowie's lyrics and music.

See also: Brel, Jacques; Eno, Brian; Glass, Philip; Latifah, Queen; Newley, Anthony; Prokofiev, Sergei; Reed, Jimmy; Reich, Steve; Simone, Nina; Vaughan, Stevie Ray.

Jacques Brel

Belgian cabaret and pop vocalist, songwriter, and film-score composer

A major figure in the French chanson tradition of the 1950's and 1960's, Brel wrote and performed songs that were musically rich and varied and were noted for their masterful and expressive lyrics.

Born: April 8, 1929; Brussels, Belgium
Died: October 9, 1978; Bobigny, France
Also known as: Jacques Romain Georges Brel (full name)

Principal works

FILM SCORES: Un Roi sans divertissement, 1963; La Bande à bonnot, 1969; Mon oncle Benjamin, 1969; Le Bar de la Fourche, 1972; L'Emmerdeur, 1973.

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Jacques Brel et ses chansons, 1955; Jacques Brel Vol. 2, 1957; Jacques Brel Vol. 3, 1958; American Début, 1959; Jacques Brel Vol. 4, 1959; Jacques Brel (1962), 1962; Jacques Brel accompagne pas François Rauber et son orchestra, 1963; Jacques Brel Vol. 5, 1964; Jacques Brel Vol. 6, 1964; Jacques Brel, 1965; Encore, 1966; Jacques Brel, 1966; J'arrive, 1968; Jacques Brel, 1968; Brel, 1977; Infiniment, 2004.

The Life

Jacques Romain Georges Brel (jahk brehl) was born to Romain and Élisabeth Brel. Although at first Brel worked in his father's cardboard factory, he displayed little interest in continuing in that line of work, focusing instead on culture. He began acting and singing after joining the Franche Cordée, a Catholic humanist youth organization. It was there that he met his wife, Thérèse Michielsen, whom he married in 1950.

In 1953 Brel quit his job in Belgium and moved to Paris to pursue a singing career. He performed in the city's cabarets and music halls, and he wrote music. By the late 1950's Brel was being recognized in France and beyond, thanks to his albums and to his performance schedule of nearly three hundred shows a year. With the assistance of his friend Georges Pasquier and pianists Gérard Jouannest and François Rauber, Brel found his songs attaining new depth as he explored the grim sides of life, love, death, and society.

Inspired by a visit to Broadway during a trip to the United States in 1967, Brel translated L'Homme de le Mancha (Man of La Mancha) into French, and he directed and starred in the musical in France. In the late 1960's Brel appeared frequently as an actor and director in films such as L'emmerdeur and Mon oncle Benjamin. In 1974 Brel embarked on a cruise around the world, and upon reaching the Canary Islands, he was diagnosed with lung cancer. After spending his final years in Paris and the Marquesas Islands, Brel died in 1978. He is buried in Calvary Cemetery in the Marquesas Islands.

The Music

Along with Georges Brassens, Brel stands as one of the most significant composers of French popular chanson. Brel's chanson is varied and innovative, responding sensitively to the mood and meaning of the text, with recitativelike vocal lines that favor declamation over melody. Brel's initial performances in the 1950's consisted solely of voice and guitar; later, in collaboration with his arranger, pianist Rauber, his songs used extensive orchestral accompaniments, often featuring the skills of pianist Jouannest.

Jacques Brel. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

"Ne me quitte pas." Although Brel composed nearly forty songs before 1959, his Parisian experiences led to more complex and diverse themes. "Ne me quitte pas" (1959) is among the most well-known of Brel's songs. Inspired by an ill-fated affair with fellow singer Suzanne Gabriello, "Ne me quitte pas," typically accompanied by piano, strings, and flute, is characterized by gradually descending vocal lines of minimal breadth in a recitative style.

"Les Bourgeois." Brel's songs were also notable for their social criticisms. The lyrics of "Les Bourgeois" (1962) comment on society, quite a different theme from Brel's somber love ballads. While not as penetrating or caustic as Brel's other songs dealing with society ("Les Singes," 1961, and "Jaures," 1977), "Les Bourgeois" is a gently mocking piece set in a waltzlike triple meter with an abundance of dotted rhythms. Accordion, harpsichord, percussion, and brass instruments showcase Brel's increasing forays into larger and more colorful accompaniments. A substantial number of Brel's songs portray either people ("Mathilde," 1964; "Les Flamandes," 1959) or places ("Le Plat Pays," 1962; "Bruxelles," 1962).

"Amsterdam." One of the most notable aspects of Brel's craftsmanship was his ability to create striking verbal portraits. He did not shy away from depicting the unsavory side of society; alcoholics, drifters, drug addicts, and prostitutes are given insightful and compassionate portraits in "Jef" (1964), "La Chanson de Jacky" (1965), and "Amsterdam" (1964). "Amsterdam," which he recorded multiple times with a full orchestral arrangement, displays Brel at his most caustic, with the harsh criticism of society implicit in the song's text mirrored by an ever-rising and frenzied vocal line and accompaniment.

"Jojo." The late 1960's and 1970's saw a decrease in Brel's chanson output as he focused instead on musical theater and his growing film career. The songs of Brel's final years are intensely personal and reflective ("Avec élégance," 1977, and "L'Amour est mort," 1977), and the primary example of this is "Jojo" (1977). In 1974, shortly after embarking on his trip around the world, Brel received word that his friend Pasquier ("Jojo") had passed away. With only guitar for accompaniment, "Jojo" shows Brel at his most intimate as he reflects on the significance of his friendship with Pasquier and Brel's own impending death.

Musical Legacy

Although Brel's music is not widely known outside of French-speaking countries, it has had a remarkable influence on artists and performers worldwide. In the English-speaking world, despite the difference in genres, he is often seen as a forebear of Bob Dylan and Leonard Cohen, whose lyrics, similarly, delved into personal, sometimes dark, subjects with unflinching seriousness.

English translations of Brel's songs have been recorded by artists worldwide, including David Bowie, Frank Sinatra, and Shirley Bassey. "Ne me quitte pas" has been translated into numerous languages (Marlene Dietrich's "Bitte geh nicht fort" and Rod McKuen's "If You Go Away" are two of the most well known) and recorded in the original French by artists ranging from Nina Simone to Sting.

In 1968 the Off-Broadway musical Jacques Brel Is Alive and Well and Living in Paris was introduced to the American public with great success. Although some criticized the English translations of Brel's lyrics, the musical brought Brel's brand of energetic, introspective, romantic, touching, hopeful, and humorous songs to a wide audience.

Ryan Scott Ebright

Further Reading

Blau, Eric. Jacques Brel Is Alive and Well and Living in Paris. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1971. A narrative of the creation of the Off-Broadway musical, with biographical details about Brel and the French lyrics and corresponding English translations of songs used in the musical.

Clayson, Alan. Jacques Brel: The Biography. London: Sanctuary Publishing, 1996. A brief biography of Brel's career, one of the few resources in English.

Tinker, Chris. Georges Brassens and Jacques Brel: Personal and Social Narratives in Post-war Chanson. London: Liverpool University Press, 2005. An interesting study that examines the mix of personal and social personas developed in the songs of Brassens and Brel.

See also: Cohen, Leonard; Collins, Judy; Dietrich, Marlene; Dylan, Bob; Simone, Nina; Sting.

Benjamin Britten

English classical composer

Britten resurrected the British operatic tradition dormant since the time of Henry Purcell in the seventeenth century.

Born: November 22, 1913; Lowestoft, Suffolk, England

Died: December 4, 1976; Aldeburgh, Suffolk, England

Also known as: Edward Benjamin Britten (full name); Baron Britten of Aldeburgh

Principal works

BALLET (music): The Prince of the Pagodas, 1957 (choreography by John Cranko).

CHAMBER WORKS: Lachrymae, Op. 48, 1950 (for viola and piano); Metamorphoses, Op. 49, 1951 (for solo oboe; based on texts by Ovid); Suite No. 1, Op. 72, 1964 (for cello); Suite No. 2, Op. 80, 1967 (for cello); Suite No. 3, Op. 87, 1971 (for cello).

CHORAL WORK: A Boy Was Born, 1934.

CHORAL WORKS: Ceremony of Carols, Op. 28, 1942; Hymn to St. Cecilia, Op. 27, 1942 (based on texts by W. H. Auden); Rejoice in the Lamb, Op. 30, 1943 (festival cantata for trumpet, soloists, chorus, and organ); Missa Brevis, Op. 63, 1959 (for boys' voices); War Requiem, Op. 66, 1962 (for choirs, orchestra, chamber orchestra, and organ).

OPERAS (music): Paul Bunyan, Op. 17, 1941 (libretto by W. H. Auden); Peter Grimes, Op. 33, 1945 (libretto by Montague Slater; based on George Crabbe's poem "The Borough"); The Rape of Lucretia, Op. 37, 1946 (libretto by Ronald Duncan; based on André Obey's play Le Viol de Lucrèce); Albert Herring, Op. 39, 1947 (libretto by Eric Crozier; based on Guy de Maupassant's story "Le Rosier de Madame Husson"); The Beggar's Opera, Op. 43, 1948 (based on John Gay's opera); The Little Sweep, Op. 45, 1949 (libretto by Crozier); Billy Budd, Op. 50, 1951 (libretto by E. M. Forster and Crozier; based on Herman Melville's novel); Dido and Aeneas, 1951 (libretto by Nahum Tate; based on Henry Purcell's opera); Gloriana, Op. 53, 1953 (libretto by William Plomer); The Turn of the Screw, Op. 54, 1954 (libretto by Myfanwy Piper; based on Henry James's novel); Noye's Fludde, Op. 59, 1958 (based on Alfred W. Pollard's edition of the Chester Mystery Cycle); A Midsummer Night's Dream, Op. 64, 1960 (libretto by Britten and Peter Pears; based on William Shakespeare's play); Curlew River, Op. 71, 1964 (libretto by Plomer); The Burning Fiery Furnace, Op. 77, 1966 (libretto by Plomer); The Golden Vanity, Op. 78, 1967 (libretto by Colin Graham; based on the old English ballad); The Prodigal Son, Op. 81, 1968 (libretto by Plomer); Owen Wingrave, Op. 85, 1971 (libretto by Piper; based on James's novel); Death in Venice, Op. 88, 1973 (libretto by Piper).

ORCHESTRAL WORKS: Simple Symphony, Op. 4, 1934 (for string orchestra); Variations on a Theme by Frank Bridge, Op. 10, 1937 (for strings); Piano Concerto, Op. 13, 1938; Violin Concerto in D Minor, Op. 15, 1939; Sinfonia da Requiem, Op. 20, 1940; Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra, Op. 34, 1946 (based on a theme from Henry Purcell's suite Abdelazar); Cello Symphony, Op. 68, 1963.

VOCAL WORKS: Our Hunting Fathers, Op. 8, 1936 (for soprano or tenor and orchestra); On This Island, Op. 11, 1937 (for high voice and piano); Les Illuminations, Op. 18, 1939 (for high voice and strings); Seven Sonnets of Michelangelo, Op. 22, 1940 (for tenor and piano); Serenade, Op. 31, 1943 (for tenor, horn, and strings).

WRITINGS OF INTEREST: The Story of Music, 1958 (with Imogen Holst; reprinted as The Wonderful World of Music, 1968).

The Life

Born on November 22, the day that honors Saint Cecilia, patron saint of music, Edward Benjamin Britten (BRIH-tuhn) displayed from the earliest age a rare musical fluency. He was encouraged in composition by his dominating, musical mother, Edith, who predicted he would be "the fourth B"—after Johann Sebastian Bach, Ludwig van Beethoven, and Johannes Brahms. At age fourteen, Britten learned rigorous professional technique from composer Frank Bridge, who encouraged musical expression of what Britten found within himself, including the pacificism that remained a lifelong concern. Well ahead of his peers, Britten worked out his frustrations at the Royal College of Music from 1930 to 1933 by composing for the innovative documentaries of the General Post Office Film Unit (working alongside the poet W. H. Auden) and honing his dramatic skills.

In Britten's concert music the 1936 song cycle Our Hunting Fathers marks the formative influence of Auden, who wrote the text during a time when Britten was moving away from his mother's institutional Christian religion. This period of philosophical and sexual change is reflected in a series of diverse works further developing his strong interest in international styles and literature. In 1939, after the death of his father, his mother, and Bridge, Britten followed Auden to America and there cemented his relationship with his lifelong partner, the tenor Peter Pears, for whom he wrote much of his music. Returning to England in 1942 after the critical (but not public) failure of his Auden operetta, Paul Bunyan, Britten achieved international recognition at the end of the war with his opera Peter Grimes (title role created by Pears). Basing himself and Pears in Snape and Aldeburgh, a few miles down the coast from his birthplace, Britten produced a series of operas and concert works that enabled the establishment of the Aldeburgh Festival in 1948. He regularly accompanied Pears in recitals around the world, and their 1956 tour of Asia proved decisive for his compositional language. In 1967 Queen Elizabeth II officially opened the Snape Maltings Concert Hall, built on Britten's vision. Britten suffered ill health throughout his life and in 1973 underwent heart surgery from which he never fully recovered.

The Music

A Boy Was Born. Britten's early period, consisting of much more music than the opus numbers indicate, culminates in his set of choral variations A Boy Was Born, Op. 3. Britten's motivic mastery, developed through his early love of Beethoven, Arnold Schoenberg, and the German school, is matched by a choral mastery, juxtaposing "experienced" adult voices with those of "innocent" children. The work points toward Britten's future preferences both for text setting and for the theme of corrupted innocence, which is a reflection of his own nature.

Our Hunting Fathers. Britten's musical language underwent a decisive evolutionary climax in his symphonic song cycle Our Hunting Fathers, Op. 8, first performed at the Norwich Festival. W. H. Auden selected three central medieval poems—"Rats Away," "Messalina," and "Dance of Death: Hawking the Partridge"—and framed them with his original poems "Prologue" and "Epilogue: Our Hunting Fathers." The cycle charts a spiritual crisis that ends in death—of the individual and of a culture. Britten's letters imply that the work is a commentary on the contemporary Spanish Civil War.

Sinfonia da Requiem. Written and performed in New York in the immediate aftermath of his union with Pears, and dedicated to the memory of his parents, the Sinfonia da Requiem, Op. 20, reinscribes the themes of Our Hunting Fathers in climactically personal and purely orchestral terms. This is a summation of his technical training under Bridge in "music as self-revelation," and his debt to Gustav Mahler and Alban Berg is evident. The technical and spiritual clarifications made in the Sinfonia are so significant for Britten's mature style that his later War Requiem is a texted expansion of them.

Peter Grimes. Peter Grimes, Op. 33, was written to a libretto by Montagu Slater after George Crabbe and first performed at London's Sadler's Wells theater. Its references to private (Pears, who created the title role) and international (World War II) sources give the opera a raw, visceral power that contributes to its continued success in repertory. Peter Grimes deals with issues of alienation caused by the rebellion of the ego—on the personal level, symbolized by Grimes, and at the public level, symbolized by the character of the Borough in which he lives (Aldeburgh). The fusion of music and water (specifically the sea) as narrator of spiritual truth is seminal. Grimes's drowning at sea is as symbolic of the aesthetic purpose of the opera as it is a baptism into hell for both Grimes and the religiously hypocritical Borough.

Benjamin Britten. (Library of Congress)

War Requiem. Britten's War Requiem, Op. 66, can be considered a "second summation" after Peter Grimes, whose public popularity it rivals. Britten's radical, tropelike setting of Wilfred Owen's poetry in the context of the liturgy is spatially illuminated by the separation of adult choir, soprano soloist, and symphony orchestra (liturgy) from tenor and baritone soloists with chamber orchestra (Owen settings) and boy's choir and organ (liturgy). The alienation of these forces culminates in the Pyrrhic final tutti as the two soldiers sleep together, offset by the repetition of the tritone that pervades the work and the distant, haunting sound of innocent boys' voices.

Curlew River. Britten's "First Parable for Church Performance" (libretto by William Plomer), Curlew River, Op. 71, marks his final evolutionary stage. The mixing of medieval Eastern (Japanese No play) and Western (sung liturgical drama) musico-dramatic forms, presented by an all-male cast and a handful of unconducted instrumentalists, radically refocused Britten's compositional language. The heterophonic suspension of pitches derived from and returning to plainsong results in surprisingly new dissonances—blending modality, tonality, and modern atonalism—befitting the intensely ritualized nature of the unfolding dramaturgy concerning a Madwoman seeking her abducted son. The second and third Parables, The Burning Fiery Furnace, Op. 77, and The Prodigal Son, Op. 81, contribute a unique trilogy to the genre of twentieth century music-theater.

Death in Venice. Britten's final opera, Death in Venice, Op. 88—which should ideally be experienced after Owen Wingrave, Op. 85, to which it is related by librettos by Myfanwy Piper after Thomas Mann and Henry James, respectively—is not only a final summation to his operatic oeuvre but also a retroactive philosophical key to Britten's entire output. The composer's psychodramatic attempt to make peace between Western- and Eastern-inspired musical ideas embodied by the antihero writer and Britten surrogate Gustav von Aschenbach (Western) and the object of his erotic desire, the boy Tadzio (Eastern), is a culmination of Britten's entire aesthetic quest. He arrays the full weight of his compositional achievement behind a philosophical position at odds with the Christianity of his idealized youth and the part of the conscience he kept alive and in tension with his adult self. That Britten was able to bring such musical beauty from a fatal dualistic philosophical flaw (that is, Aschenbach's spiritual as well as physical death in Venice) is not only the key to Britten's own output but also a commentary on the Western compositional tradition embodied in the city where Aschenbach expires.

Musical Legacy

Britten's re-creation of a British operatic tradition (resulting in the operas of Sir Michael Tippett, Sir Peter Maxwell Davies, Sir Harrison Birtwistle, Mark-Anthony Turnage, and Thomas Adès) and that on the international landscape (such as the operas of Hans Werner Henze and music of Arvo Pärt) is seminal. The absolute integrity of his music for children is a significant part of his legacy. The international Aldeburgh Festival, for which Britten wrote most of his mature music, has been a model for many new summer festivals in England and around the world. The steady release of archival recordings of Britten's work as a conductor and performer, especially of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, has achieved special acclaim. Recordings by Pears and Britten of his work are considered peerless.

Britten's genius in manipulating his modal and tonal heritage to highly personal, expressive ends during a period of derision of such reactionary practice finds parallel with the work of his friend Dmitri Shostakovich. Their shared ability to transform the language and psycho-dramatic themes of Gustav Mahler and Alban Berg to different ends—Britten's to private and social, Shostakovich's to political—is indicative of their development of musical tradition in a way that increasingly eclipses the avant-garde in the mainstream repertory. In Britten's case this has led to a scholastic industry devoted to issues of gender and sexuality and, more recently, investigation into the religious and spiritual implications of his legacy.

Stephen Arthur Allen

Further Reading

Allen, Stephen Arthur. "Billy Budd: Temporary Salvation and the Faustian Pact." Journal of Musicological Research 26 (January, 2006): 43-73. A close reading and musical analysis of the religious tensions at the core of Britten's seminal opera.

_____. "Christianity and Homosexuality in the Operas of Benjamin Britten." The International Journal of the Humanities 2 (2005): 817-824. An essential, nontechnical overview of Britten's religious tensions.

Brett, Philip. Music and Sexuality in Britten: Selected Essays. Edited by George E. Haggerty. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2006. Groundbreaking investigation into the connection between sexuality and gender and the culture of Britten's music.

Britten, Benjamin. Britten on Music. Edited by Paul Kildea. Oxford, England: Oxford University Press, 2003. An indispensable collection of Britten's writings about his own music and that of others, edited by a major Britten scholar.

_____. Letters from a Life: Selected Letters and Diaries. 2 vols. Edited by Donald Mitchell and Philip Reed. London: Faber & Faber, 1991. A mine of information in Britten's own words, covering 1923 to 1951.

_____. Selected Letters. Edited by Donald Mitchell, Philip Reed, and Mervyn Cooke. London: Faber & Faber, 2004. Letters place Britten in the context of the British and continental musical scene of the period, focusing on the period 1946 to 1951.

Carpenter, Humphrey. Benjamin Britten: A Biography. London: Faber & Faber, 1992. Authorized, no-holds-barred biography, but fair and insightful in spite of superficial musicological analysis.

Cooke, Mervyn. Britten and the Far East Asian Influences in the Music of Benjamin Britten. Aldeburgh Studies in Music 4. Woodbridge, Suffolk, England: Boydell Press, 1998. A comprehensive account and analysis of Britten's relationship to the music and culture of Asia.

_____, ed. The Cambridge Companion to Benjamin Britten. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press, 1999. Provocative essays charting the trends of current musicology.

Evans, Peter. The Music of Benjamin Britten. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1996. The standard positivist analysis of Britten's entire work.

Rupprecht, Philip. Britten's Musical Language. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press, 2001. Invaluable insights into the nature of Britten's music.

See also: Berg, Alban; Elgar, Sir Edward; Fischer-Dieskau, Dietrich; Mahler, Gustav; Menotti, Gian Carlo; Pärt, Arvo; Previn, Sir André; Rostropovich, Mstislav; Rutter, John; Schoenberg, Arnold; Shostakovich, Dmitri; Solti, Sir Georg; Sutherland, Dame Joan; Tippett, Sir Michael; Vaughan Williams, Ralph; Walton, Sir William.

Garth Brooks

American country singer-songwriter and guitarist

Country-music singer-songwriter Brooks promoted his crossover approach by performing his music in 1970's-style rock shows. His enormous popularity resulted largely from his accessibility to his fans and humble, Everyman image. He is renowned as the best-selling solo artist in American history, with several multiplatinum albums and sales of more than 123 million units.

Born: February 7, 1962; Tulsa, Oklahoma
Also known as: Troyal Garth Brooks (full name)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Garth Brooks, 1989; No Fences, 1990; Ropin' the Wind, 1991; Beyond the Season, 1992; The Chase, 1992; In Pieces, 1993; Fresh Horses, 1995; Sevens, 1997; In the Life of Chris Gaines, 1999; Garth Brooks and the Magic of Christmas, 1999; The Magic of Christmas: Songs from Call Me Clause, 2001; Scarecrow, 2001.

The Life

Troyal Garth Brooks was born in Tulsa, Oklahoma, to Troyal Raymond Brooks, an oil company draftsman, and Colleen Carroll Brooks, a country singer who had recorded with Capitol Records during the 1950's. As a student at Oklahoma State University, Brooks performed with lead guitarist Ty England in a club band. Brooks graduated with a degree in marketing and headed to Nashville to begin a career as a performer. Soon, however, he returned to Oklahoma. Brooks married his college girlfriend, Sandy Mahr, in 1987, and they returned to Nashville, where he signed with Capitol Records.

For the next three years, Brooks's career skyrocketed, and he was inducted into the Grand Ole Opry in October, 1990. In 1993, however, his image began to take a downturn when, against the wishes of his management, he positioned himself as an activist for world peace. In August, 1997, Brooks performed an enormously successful concert in Manhattan's Central Park that was attended by hundreds of thousands of fans and broadcast live by Home Box Office. This concert provided a well-timed boost of Brooks's image and career, effectively promoting the release of a new album.

Unfortunately, the glow of this success faded with his brief, unsuccessful foray into the film industry. Brooks and his wife divorced in 2000. He then went into retirement until, in 2005, he released a DVD that included a duet with singer Trisha Yearwood, whom he married in 2006.

The Music

Brooks introduced pop-rock influences to country music by combining the country styles of George Strait and George Jones, the folk-rock approach of James Taylor, and the pop-rock musical styles of Elton John, Dan Fogelberg, and the bands Kiss, Styx, and Boston. In so doing, he brought a whole new audience to country music. His stadium-arena spectaculars were customarily attended by tens of thousands of people, for whom Brooks intentionally kept the ticket prices low. He further engaged his audiences by wearing a headset microphone, facilitating his active and energetic movement around the stage while breaking away from the previous tradition in country music whereby singers had performed in a stationary position behind a microphone.

Garth Brooks. In 1989, Brooks released his self-titled first album to immediate success. Its style combined a nod to traditional country in the single "Much Too Young (to Feel This Damn Old)" with the sensitivity of "If Tomorrow Never Comes." This album catapulted Brooks's crossover reputation from country into pop, particularly with the release of "The Dance," the single that effectively tripled album sales, making Garth Brooks the best-selling country album of the 1980's.

No Fences. Brooks's second album was released to great acclaim in 1990, selling 700,000 copies within its first ten days and staying at the top of the country charts for twenty-three weeks. As a result of Billboard's new method of tallying sales through SoundScan, No Fences moved from number sixteen to number three on the pop charts. The first single, "Friends in Low Places," had been unofficially released to a local radio station, spurring the enormous popularity of the album through its rollicking, honky-tonk, humorous music and lyrics. Another hit, "Unanswered Prayers," again demonstrated Brooks's talent for sensitive reflection.

The album's most controversial song, "The Thunder Rolls," turned out to be the greatest asset to the sales of the album because the accompanying video generated media interest in the depiction of spousal violence and was briefly taken off the air by Country Music Television (CMT) and The Nashville Network (TNN). Since the song's subject matter was familiar to many, the video was returned to the airwaves and gained great popularity. By 1993, No Fences had sold in excess of ten million copies. As of 2006, it was certified as multiplatinum, at 17 million sales, by the Recording Industry Association of America (RIAA).

Ropin' the Wind. Released in 1991, this was the first country album to debut at number one on both the country and pop charts, with an unprecedented four million prerelease orders. Unlike the hit singles "What She's Doing Now" and "Shameless" (originally written and recorded by Billy Joel), which continued Brooks's themes of love and conflict between a man and a woman, the popularity of "The River" stemmed from its positive lyrics, urging people to risk believing in themselves. The combination of Brooks's abilities as a consummate performer and his album sales in the tens of millions garnered superstar status for Brooks with the release of this album. Courted by the mass media, he was featured on the covers of major magazines such as Time, Forbes, and Entertainment Weekly.

The Chase. The Chase debuted in 1992, but it only sold five million copies and did not rise above number twelve on the charts, a level of performance much lower than that of his previous works. Brooks received particularly negative criticism for "We Shall Be Free," as it was perceived to incorporate a moralistic, gospel style through its music and lyrics urging racial tolerance and suggesting homosexual tolerance as well.

Fresh Horses. Although Fresh Horses, released in 1995, topped at quadruple platinum, like The Chase it did not meet with Brooks's previous successes. This slump in his album sales reflected a negative change in Brooks's personality, as he became increasingly arrogant toward the media. The single entitled "The Change" shows this development; its lyrics, unlike his previously inspiring messages, came across instead as cynical and defensive.

Musical Legacy

Brooks drew from his own background as a suburban American who grew up listening to 1970's pop and rock but developed a desire to return to country, a sentiment shared by millions of baby-boomer Americans between the late 1980's and early 1990's. A high-energy performer, he became completely interactive with his audience in concerts, even to the point of crowd-surfing while singing. As a result of Brooks's success in bringing country music to a huge new audience, he lent enormous support to the country-music scene and industry.

Brooks has received numerous awards, including the Country Music Association Horizon Award (1990), two Grammys (1991, 1997), and the following Academy of Country Music awards: Entertainer of the Year (1990, 1991, 1992, 1993, 1997, 1998), Artist of the Decade (1998), and the first Crystal Milestone Award (2008).

Laurie R. Semmes

Further Reading

Appell, Glenn, and David Hemphill. American Popular Music: A Multicultural History. Belmont, Calif.: Thomson Higher Education, 2006. Places the various styles of country music in historical and cultural context.

Feiler, Bruce. Dreaming Out Loud: Garth Brooks, Wynonna Judd, Wade Hayes, and the Changing Face of Nashville. New York: Avon Books, 1998. Based on the author's three-year period of fieldwork with the artists in Nashville, Tennessee.

Kingsbury, Paul, Alan Axelrod, and Susan Costello, eds. Country: The Music and the Musicians—From the Beginnings to the Nineties. New York: Abbeville Press, 1994. A history that is amply illustrated with archive photographs.

Millard, Bob. Country Music: Seventy Years of America's Favorite Music. New York: HarperPerennial, 1993. Combination of year-by-year list of events with prose. Brief foreword by Garth Brooks.

Starr, Larry, and Christopher Waterman. American Popular Music: The Rock Years. New York: Oxford University Press, 2006. Briefly mentions country music's intersection with rock in Brooks's generation.

See also: Campbell, Glen; Jones, George; Strait, George.

Clifford Brown

American jazz trumpeter and composer

Talent, perseverance, and diligence made Brown one of the most creative jazz trumpeters-improvisers of the twentieth century. He combined flawless instrumentalism with the lyricism, rhythm, and harmony of bebop language.

Born: October 30, 1930; Wilmington, Delaware
Died: June 26, 1956; Pennsylvania
Also known as: Clifford Benjamin Brown (full name); Brownie

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: The Beginning and the End, 1952; Alternate Takes, 1953; Clifford Brown and Art Farmer, 1953; The Clifford Brown Sextet in Paris, 1953; Memorial Album, 1953; New Star on the Horizon, 1953; Clifford Brown, 1954; Clifford Brown All Stars, 1954; Clifford Brown and Max Roach, Vol. 1, 1954; Daahoud, 1954; Jazz Immortal, 1954; Clifford Brown with Strings, 1955; More Study in Brown, 1955; Study in Brown, 1955; At Basin Street, 1956.

The Life

Clifford Benjamin Brown, youngest of the eight children of Joe Brown and Estella Hackett, was born on October 30, 1930, in Wilmington, Delaware. Driven with desire to possess a shiny new trumpet, which he saw in his father's collection, Brown enrolled in the school band at the age of nine. By twelve he was provided with private trumpet lessons on a regular basis.

From 1943 to 1946 Brown was exposed to the fundamentals of trumpet performance, music theory, ear-training, arranging, piano, jazz music, and improvisation. His instructors were Robert "Boysie" Lowery and Harry Andrews. Performing with the Little Dukes, a band that played rearranged popular big band repertoire at dance parties, was Brown's first professional job.

From 1946 to 1950 Brown was introduced to progressive music of Charlie "Yardbird" Parker and Dizzy Gillespie. Brown visited Philadelphia and its big jazz scene, participated in jam sessions, met Parker and Gillespie, and impressed them with his exceptional instrumental abilities, creativity, and talent.

With Gillespie's encouragement to pursue a career as a performing musician, Brown transferred to Maryland State College as a music major. At the same time he was mentored by Theodore "Fats" Navarro, whose style became a model for Brown's musical expression.

In 1950 Brown was seriously injured in a car accident, resulting in postponement of his artistic dreams for a year. In 1951 he joined the touring band Chris Powell and the Blue Flames, performing rhythm and blues, soul, calypso, and mambo with slight modern-jazz elements. By 1952 Brown had established himself on the New York and Philadelphia jazz scenes. He appeared alongside such jazz modernists as James Louis "J. J." Johnson, Lou Donaldson, Elmo Hope, Philly Joe Jones, and Percy Heath on the Blue Note label and with Tad Dameron's ensemble on Prestige label's recording sessions. Brown's musicianship, improvisational style, and maturity earned him the admiration of colleagues and critics.

During 1953-1954 Brown cut his first album as a leader for Blue Note label, signed a contract with Lionel Hampton's band, toured Europe, and managed to record with European jazz artists. Upon his return to the United States, he moved to New York City, joining Art Blakey and the Jazz Messengers. With this group he recorded for the Blue Note label.

Clifford Brown. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

In 1954 Brown relocated to Los Angeles, California, to collaborate with drummer Max Roach (Brown and Roach, Inc.). They signed a record contract with the EmArcy label, although Brown recorded for other labels as well. The same year, Brown won Down Beat critics' New Star of the Year poll. On June 26, 1954, Brown married Larue Anderson, and their son, Clifford Brown, Jr., was born the following year. For Brown, 1955 and 1956 were years of recording and extensive touring on the East and West Coasts. He actively composed and tirelessly continued to shape his mastery.

On the night of June 26, 1956, his second wedding anniversary, Brown's life was cut short in a tragic automobile accident.

The Music

Brown's music is characterized by flawless sound and technique and fluid inventiveness. Though his improvisations were a symbiosis of his primary influences—Navarro, mixed with inspirations of Parker, Gillespie, and Earl "Bud" Powell—his accomplished musicianship and constant search for improvement allowed Brown's artistic individuality to blossom. His approach to arranging, composition, and bandleading made him one of the most prominent figures of hard bop in jazz history.

Early Records. Brown's solo debut album as a leader, Brownie's Eyes (later renamed Memorial Album), was recorded on August 28, 1953. This record presented his strong arranging and compositional skills. However, it was on Ray Noble's "Cherokee"—a Parker signature piece—that Brown's full mastery became apparent. Brown was the first trumpeter in jazz history to improvise over the chord progressions of "Cherokee" with a fluidity equal to Parker's technical, emotional, and intellectual levels, implementing a saxophone-piano approach to his trumpet style.

Live at Birdland. A role of featured star in Art Blakey and the Jazz Messengers reinforced Brown's artistic potential. Five volumes of live recording sessions entitled Live at Birdland, made on February 21, 1954, for the Blue Note record label, allowed Brown's creativity to stretch out.

Study in Brown and More Study in Brown. These two prominent records came out as a result of sessions recorded on August 3, 1954, and February 23-25, 1955, for the EmArcy label: a coleadership between Brown and drummer Roach, then an established star in the jazz world. Both records were considered classics among jazz musicians, fans, and critics. Marked by his intricate and smoothly harmonized melodies, Brown's originals "Daahoud," "Joy Spring," "Blues Walk," and "Sandu" became jazz hits and standards often performed by other musicians. Brown's phenomenal progress, achieved in the short period of two years, was confirmed by the new version of Noble's "Cherokee" that put him on the pedestal of renowned sensations of bebop trumpet.

Musical Legacy

Brown's relatively large recording archives, produced in a short span of five years, showcase his consistent high-quality performance and serve as a practice manual for every jazz trumpeter. Stylistic echoes of Brown can be heard in records of such jazz trumpet giants as Booker Little, Louis Smith, Joe Gordon, Donald Byrd, Wilbur Harden, and Johnny Coles. Brown's bright talent made him a jazz icon.

Gregory Rivkin

Further Reading

Ahlfors, Elizabeth. "Sweet Clifford Brown." Delaware Today, May 20, 1996. Short musical biography of Brown spiced with interesting quotations from his peers, colleagues, widow, and former instructor.

Catalano, Nick. Clifford Brown: The Life and Art of the Legendary Jazz Trumpeter. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001. Professor of music and literature presents a biographic sketch of Brown's life.

Hentoff, Nat. "Blindfold Test: Brownie Digs Only Modern Jazz." Down Beat, February 22, 1956. Informative article about Brown's musical taste.

_____. "Brown and Roach Inc., Dealers in Jazz." Down Beat, May, 1955. Brown and Roach talk about their partnership, their band, and their career steps.

_____. "Clifford Brown: The New Dizzy." Down Beat 72 (2005). Reissued interview from April 7, 1954. Brown speaks about his music and what it takes to maintain a career as a jazz musician.

See also: Blakey, Art; Gillespie, Dizzy; Lovett, Lyle; Navarro, Fats; Parker, Charlie; Powell, Bud; Roach, Max; Rollins, Sonny; Vaughan, Sarah.

James Brown

American rhythm-and-blues singer, pianist, and songwriter

Brown validated the cultural significance of African Americans in the arts, placing more than a hundred song hits on the best-selling charts during his five-decade career.

Born: May 3, 1933; Barnwell, South Carolina
Died: December 25, 2006; Atlanta, Georgia

Also known as: James Joseph Brown (full name)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Please Please Please, 1959; Try Me, 1959; Think, 1960; The Amazing James Brown, 1961; James Brown Presents His Band and Five Other Great Artists, 1961; Night Train, 1961; Jump Around, 1962; Shout and Shimmy, 1962; Tour the U.S.A., 1962; Live at the Apollo, 1963; Prisoner of Love, 1963; Grits and Soul, 1964; Out of Sight, 1964; Showtime, 1964; James Brown Plays James Brown: Yesterday and Today, 1965; Papa's Got a Brand New Bag, 1965; Handful of Soul, 1966; I Got You (I Feel Good), 1966; It's a Man's Man's Man's World, 1966; James Brown and His Famous Flames Sing Christmas Songs, 1966; James Brown Plays New Breed, 1966; Mighty Instrumentals, 1966; Cold Sweat, 1967; James Brown Plays the Real Thing, 1967; James Brown Sings Raw Soul, 1967; I Can't Stand Myself When You Touch Me, 1968; I Got the Feelin', 1968; James Brown Plays Nothing but Soul, 1968; James Brown Sings out of Sight, 1968; James Brown Presents His Show of Tomorrow, 1968; A Soulful Christmas, 1968; Soul Party, 1968; A Thinking About Little Willie/A Few Nice Things, 1968; Gettin' Down to It, 1969; It's a Mother, 1969; The Popcorn, 1969; Say It Loud—I'm Black and I'm Proud, 1969; Ain't It Funky, 1970; Hey America, 1970; It's a New Day—So Let a Man Come In, 1970; Sex Machine, 1970; Soul on Top, 1970; Hot Pants, 1971; Sho Is Funky Down Here, 1971; Soul Brother No. 1, 1971; Super Bad, 1971; Get on the Good Foot, 1972; There It Is, 1972; Black Caesar, 1973; The Payback, 1973; Slaughter's Big Rip Off, 1973; Hell, 1974; Reality, 1974; Everybody's Doin' the Hustle and Dead on the Double Bump, 1975; Sex Machine Today, 1975; Bodyheat, 1976; Get Up Offa That Thing, 1976; Hot, 1976; Mutha's Nature, 1977; Strangers, 1977; Jam/1980's, 1978; Take a Look at Those Cakes, 1978; The Original Disco Man, 1979; People, 1980; Soul Syndrome, 1980; Nonstop!, 1981; Special, 1981; The Third Coming, 1981; Bring It On!, 1983; Gravity, 1986; I'm Real, 1988; Love Over-Due, 1991; Universal James, 1992; James Brown, 1994; Bodyheat, 1995; I'm Back, 1998; The Merry Christmas Album, 1999; Funky Christmas, 2001; Feel So Good, 2002; Give It Up or Turn It Loose, 2004.

The Life

James Joseph Brown was born to Joseph Gardner and Susie Brown in the rural South in the extreme poverty of the Great Depression. When his mother abruptly left home, six-year-old "Junior" was sent to live with his aunt in her bordello in Augusta, Georgia. As a child he worked the streets of Augusta as a shoeshine boy and danced for tips. As a teenager, Brown drifted into petty theft, was caught, was convicted, and at sixteen was sent to a juvenile detention center. Singing gospel music in prison, Brown was heard by Bobby Byrd, who persuaded the authorities to release Brown under his cognizance in order to perform under Byrd's tutelage. In time, Brown joined Byrd's group just as Byrd was shifting its musical identity to secular rhythm and blues. With this new orientation, the Avons, as they had been known, became the Flames, and Brown was their front man.

With the release of his first hit single, Brown faced his life as a touring musician and recording artist with a newfound self-possession. Determined to overcome the insults and discrimination he endured as a black American during the civil rights era, he refused the bookers and theater owners who had slighted him earlier. Brown fought with his label, King Records, for control of production and design of his albums and singles. As Brown continued in his efforts to broaden his appeal to wider audiences, he began a new production company, Fair Deal, intending to create instrumental albums and singles for Mercury Records' subsidiary Smash Records. Brown believed that his contract with King Records covered only vocal work, but the record label objected, and during the legal battle between Smash Records and King Records, Brown was unable to record vocals for a year.

James Brown (right). (Library of Congress)

With the wealth delivered by his success, Brown in 1967 purchased a Knoxville, Tennessee, radio station, renaming it WJBE. By the end of the decade he had purchased several radio stations, including Augusta's WRDW, in front of which he once shined shoes.

By 1970 Brown's new backing band was known as the J. B.'s. In 1971 Brown began recording for Polydor Records and later completed the sound track for Black Caesar. During the 1970's, Brown also recorded a number of songs with sociopolitical topics, such as "Don't Be a Drop-Out" and "Papa Don't Take No Mess." The end of the 1970's—with the advent of disco and hip-hop—rendered Brown a figure of the cultural past, even though both popular idioms had first been developed by him. At that time, Brown had largely limited his work to the occasional film or television appearance, along with the reissuing of his older recordings, though his live appearances continued to sell many tickets.

In 1988 Brown was arrested following a high-speed police chase. He was convicted for various drug, driving, and assault offenses, and he was not released until 1991. In the last fifteen years of his life, Brown was repeatedly arrested on charges of domestic violence. He continued to tour until the year of his death, and a number of his late performances were before record-breaking crowds.

The Music

Brown's music derived from several sources. As a teenager Brown heard Louis Jordan and resolved to become a popular singer. While at reform school Brown began a gospel group and perfected his gospel-inflected style and striking vocal delivery. Last, Brown was influenced by Frank Sinatra, whose independent image Brown admired.

Early Works. Brown's recordings for Federal Records are proscribed somewhat by the conventions of the day, the songs being regular rhythm-and-blues fare. While the Flames largely played Southern venues, the group succeeded in signing a contract with Federal Records and in 1956 released their first single, a million-seller entitled "Please, Please, Please." In this work the Brown sound arrived, fully formed. The textual content is severely thin, entire verses given over to permutations of one word. Brown shrieks in his high voice, then instantly drops to a soothing, enveloping baritone. "Please, Please, Please" was the template upon which Brown's future vocal style was based.

Live at the Apollo. In 1963, in opposition to King Records owner Syd Nathan, Brown self-financed the production of a live album entitled Live at the Apollo, which proved to be a tremendous commercial success, enjoying substantial sales to white listeners, as Brown had intended. At the time, the music industry was singles-oriented, so Live at the Apollo, intended to reproduce the concert experience, was pioneering. The concert repertory heard here demonstrates Brown's range of musical ideas, including such up-tempo rockers as "I'll Go Crazy," followed immediately by the slower and more sensitive "Try Me." Fairly simple chord changes are the rule, with creative arrangements of horn and electric guitar, all designed as a backdrop for Brown's impassioned vocals. Live at the Apollo represents a forward-looking attempt to utilize the long-playing (LP) format to offer the excitement of a live concert to the listener.

"Papa's Got a Brand New Bag" and "I Got You (I Feel Good)." In 1965 two important Brown songs appeared to worldwide acclaim. "Papa's Got a Brand New Bag" and "I Got You (I Feel Good)" overwhelmed the sales charts, making Brown arguably the most successful African American in the public eye. The former features a blues-based chord change, with Brown singing more melodically, the band switching from the blues chord to a static pulse, then back again for the next verse. "I Got You" is similar, although its bridge section involves more elaborate horn changes. Lyrics are delivered in a comprehensible manner, with dramatic vocal signatures saved for line endings. Both songs have an ear for dance, and for years the discotheques of the world resounded with these pieces.

"Super Bad." On the original album, this song, approximately fifteen minutes long, has a relentless, propulsive, rhythmic drive. With the inclusion of the J. B.'s, the shift from older soul styles to the newer funk sound that Brown had been developing through the late 1960's was complete. There is only one chord change, for the bridges, which are forcefully presaged by Brown's vocals and which bracket a fierce sax solo by Maceo Parker. The band drops and then rises back in intensity, and the horns function in close order with the rhythm section. In this performance Brown reaches an expressive peak in which the rhythmic force supports his immense vocals.

"Sex Machine." This song was first released as a single, then was made the featured work on an album of the same name. Structured in fashion similar to "Super Bad," it is a prolonged funk exercise in D, with an occasional bridge. One difference in the arrangement is the use of a secondary voice in place of horns to ornament the rhythmic pulse. In this recording Brown leads his band in a recounting of the towns in which they have performed, handled much like a Southern religious service. Again, Brown's vigorous, staunchly male persona infuses the work with meaning, lending drama to the seemingly never-ending rhythmic propulsion.

Musical Legacy

Brown remains at the pinnacle of the African American musical experience. From his beginnings as the lead singer for the Flames, he devised performance techniques far beyond what other rhythm-and-blues singers of the time could offer. The soul sound of black American popular music prevalent in the 1960's was, with its gutsy and forceful yet vulnerable singers, largely created by Brown's example. The funk that supplanted soul to a great degree in the 1970's is principally Brown's invention, showcased in such works as "Super Bad" and "Sex Machine." Even the disco craze of the late 1970's, which supposedly caught Brown by surprise, owes much of its rhythmic component to Brown's dance music first performed in the 1960's.

The musical idiom of hip-hop reflects Brown's influence in its intensely rhythmic vocal delivery. Brown's recordings are one of the most popular sampling sources in the digital age. His influence on five decades of popular music cannot be overestimated, and his stylistic innovations and irresistible recordings remain part of the contemporary musical arena.

Jeffrey Daniel Jones

Further Reading

Brown, James. I Feel Good: A Memoir of a Life of Soul. New York: New American Library, 2005. Brown intersperses biographical information with pronouncements on what ails America. The introduction by Marc Eliot is a helpful biographical summary.

Brown, James, with Bruce Tucker. James Brown: The Godfather of Soul. Glasgow: Fontana/Collins, 1986. Brown's first attempt at a memoir. While the story line is autobiographical, the written dialogues are too precise to be verbatim. Nonetheless, many stories in this memoir are not found in the other.

Guralnick, Peter. Sweet Soul Music: Rhythm and Blues and the Southern Dream of Freedom. New York: Back Bay Books, 1986. Fascinating details on Brown during the 1950's and 1960's, the years of his meteoric rise.

Vincent, Rickey. Funk: The Music, the People, and the Rhythm of the One. New York: St. Martin's Griffin, 1996. Describes funk, the propulsive musical style of the 1970's. Includes an excellent biographical chapter on Brown, concentrating on his development of the funk style in the late 1960's and early 1970's.

See also: Costello, Elvis; Ice Cube; Ice-T; Jackson, Michael; Jordan, Louis; LL Cool J; Pickett, Wilson; Redding, Otis; Seger, Bob; Sinatra, Frank; Wilson, Jackie; Wolfe, Julia.

Roy Brown

American rhythm-and-blues singer-songwriter

Brown, an important figure in the post-World War II rhythm-and-blues scene of the late 1940's, introduced gospel-inspired vocal stylizations.

Born: September 10, 1925; New Orleans, Louisiana
Died: May 25, 1981; San Fernando, California

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Roy Brown and Wynonie Harris, 1959; Hard Times, 1968; The Blues Are Brown, 1968; Cheapest Price in Town, 1979; Courage, 1995; Saturday Nite, 1999.
SINGLES: "Let the Four Winds Blow," 1957; "Party Doll," 1957.

The Life

Born to True Love and Yancy Brown, a conservative, religious couple, Roy Brown was encouraged toward musicality as a child by his mother, the organist and choir director at her church. Upon his mother's death when he was fourteen, Brown followed his father to Houston, Texas, and then Los Angeles.

By 1946 Brown had become a professional singer and relocated to Galveston, Texas, where he composed his first hit, "Good Rockin' Tonight." By the following year Brown was back in New Orleans, where he tried, unsuccessfully, to sell his song to blues shouter Wynonie Harris. However, Brown was able to sell his own performance of "Good Rockin' Tonight" to Jules Braun of DeLuxe Records. Upon noting the good sales of Brown's version, Harris changed his mind and decided to record and release the song, ending up with a greater hit than its composer had.

During the period 1948-1951 Brown recorded a number of hits for the DeLuxe label, but in subsequent years the popularity of his recordings declined. During the rock-and-roll boom of the mid-1950's, Brown was unable to capitalize on the explosion of a sound that he had helped to create, and his recordings for King Records sold inadequately. His record sales did improve when he signed with Imperial Records in 1957, releasing "Let the Four Winds Blow" and a version of "Party Doll" to placement on the national sales charts.

The 1960's were lean years for Brown, whose musical style seemed archaic for that decade. In 1970, remembered by fellow bandleader Johnny Otis, Brown was contracted to close Otis's show at the Monterey Jazz Festival, and he did it to great acclaim. That performance was dramatic enough to gain Brown a contract with Mercury Records, which released "Love for Sale," Brown's first hit record in nearly fifteen years. In the later 1970's the Scandinavians discovered Brown, releasing a compilation album of his older work and welcoming him in a successful tour of the region. By 1980 Brown was enjoying a resurgence in popularity, performing at the Whisky a Go Go in Hollywood and in 1981 headlining the New Orleans Jazz & Heritage Festival. This resurgence of Brown's musical prominence was cut short by his death from a heart attack in May of that year.

The Music

Brown's early years of singing in church provided good training for his vocal technique, honing his ability to sing melismatically, with multiple notes per syllable of text. This gave his voice a flexibility and tunefulness not typical of the blues shouters of the era and made his music distinctive and desirable, thus eminently salable to rhythm-and-blues audiences. Also, unlike many singers who simply bought songs to perform, Brown wrote and recorded his own material, making him one of the earliest in the category singer-songwriter.

"Good Rockin' Tonight." Brown's first big hit record was from his initial recording session upon reaching New Orleans in July, 1947. A classic rhythm-and-blues tune, it describes the pleasures to be had meeting with one's lover in the evening. The remarkable aspect of the performance is Brown's voice, light and elegant (a contrast to Harris's strident, shouting vocal style). The song enjoyed even greater popularity when it was sung by Elvis Presley in 1954 for Sun Records and sold two years later to RCA.

"Hard Luck Blues." This song was produced for King Records around 1953, but it did not achieve the healthy sales of Brown's recordings for DeLuxe. The hot up-tempo rocker shows Brown coming close to the standard rhythm-and-blues shouting style. His confident tenor voice traces melodic lines and high notes that would have defeated many of his contemporaries in rhythm and blues. Also notable is the arrangement, featuring a larger, more elaborate sound of horns and guitar than found in his earlier recordings.

"Let the Four Winds Blow." Recorded on January 22, 1957, this was Brown's big hit for Imperial Records and a second chance to demonstrate the salability of his music. The song reflects the changes in the popular-music scene that had occurred since Brown's previous time on the charts. His higher, tuneful vocals were successful at matching the newer, lighter sound aimed at the teenage buyer. After several years of struggling, Brown had once again written a piece perfect for its day, showing his mastery of rock and roll.

"Love for Sale." After appearing at the Monterey Jazz Festival as part of Johnny Otis's show, Brown was sought out by Mercury Records to record "Love for Sale." Here Brown returns to slow blues, singing with passion and feeling. The melismatic flexibility of his voice is apparent, and the lighter, tuneful sound is undiminished. Brown rerecorded this song for a late 1970's album, and it is heard in a live recording made near the end of his life.

Musical Legacy

Brown's appearance in the late 1940's was timely. His smooth, romantic style proved to be highly desirable to the record-buying public and for a few years made him a top-selling performer. Brown helped steer the rhythm-and-blues style of his era toward the rock-and-roll sound of the mid-1950's, and elements from his performance style were appropriated by many singers of succeeding decades, such as Sam Cooke, Al Green, and Whitney Houston.

Jeffrey Daniel Jones

Further Reading

Broven, John. Rhythm and Blues in New Orleans. Gretna, La.: Pelican Publishing, 1978. Short biography of Brown's life and career and a good description of the New Orleans rhythm-and-blues scene from which he emerged.

_____. "Roy Brown Part 1: Good Rockin' Tonight." Blues Unlimited 123 (January/February, 1977).

_____. "Roy Brown Part 2: Hard Luck Blues." Blues Unlimited 124 (March/June, 1977). Two-part article consists of an interview with Brown in the late 1970's and covers facts about and personal impressions of Brown through the years.

Harris, Sheldon. "Roy Brown, 1925-1981." Living Blues, no. 52 (Spring, 1982). Obituary and sympathetic summation of Brown's career, with interesting details not found in other sources.

Santelli, Robert. The Big Book of Blues: A Biographical Encyclopedia. New York: Penguin Books, 2001. Includes a brief but insightful entry on Brown.

Tosches, Nick. Unsung Heroes of Rock 'n' Roll. New York: Da Capo Press, 1999. A book on the early singers and musicians who invented the rock-and-roll style in the late 1940's and early 1950's. Includes an interesting chapter on Brown, discussing the ups and downs of his career.

See also: Cooke, Sam; Green, Al; Otis, Johnny; Presley, Elvis.

Jackson Browne

American rock singer, songwriter, guitarist, pianist, and keyboard player

A literate, poetic songwriter, Browne has exhibited versatility in writing love ballads, protest songs, cynical self-explorations, and tunes that incorporate a multitude of world-beat styles. An evocative vocalist and a superb musician on guitar and piano, Browne has turned out a string of hits that illustrate his ability to blend significant lyrics with memorable music.

Born: October 9, 1948; Heidelberg, Germany
Also known as: Clyde Jackson Browne (full name)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Jackson Browne, 1972; For Everyman, 1973; Late for the Sky, 1974; The Pretender, 1976; Running on Empty, 1977; Hold Out, 1980; Lawyers in Love, 1983; Lives in the Balance, 1986; World in Motion, 1989; I'm Alive, 1993; Everywhere I Go, 1994; Looking East, 1996; The Naked Ride Home, 2002; Solo, Acoustic, Vol. 1, 2005; Solo Acoustic, Vol. 2, 2008; Time the Conqueror, 2008.

SINGLES: "Running on Empty," 1978; "Doctor My Eyes," 1991; "Sky Blue and Black," 1994; "About My Imagination," 2003.

The Life

The son of an American father stationed in Germany and his American wife, Clyde Jackson Browne was born in Heidelberg, Germany. The family returned to the United States in 1951, settling in Los Angeles, where Browne learned to play keyboards and guitar. After graduating from high school, Jackson joined the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band. Under contract, he also wrote and published songs for Nina Music. Following a short stint with Tim Buckley's band in Greenwich Village, New York, Browne released the first of more than a dozen well-received albums. Initially known for poignant lyrics and sensitive songs of personal angst, Browne later became a social activist. He cofounded the antinuclear organization Musicians United for Safe Energy (MUSE) in 1979. He has performed at benefits supporting Farm Aid, Amnesty International, the Children's Defense Fund, and other causes, especially Democratic political candidates.

In 1975 Browne married actress and model Phyllis Major, two years after the birth of their son Ethan Zane. Phyllis committed suicide in 1976 at the age of thirty. Browne married again in 1981, to Australian model Lynne Sweeney, and their son Ryan Daniel was born in 1982. The couple divorced in 1983, following Browne's highly publicized affair with actress Daryl Hannah. Browne began a relationship with artist Dianna Cohen in the mid-1990's.

The Music

Browne's musical career can generally be divided into three phases. From the beginning to the middle of the 1970's, he was an introspective, truth-seeking confessional artist. His tuneful, folk-rock songs, delivered in a plaintive tenor, focused on romance and the meaning of life, incorporating heartfelt, literary lyrics. From the middle to the late 1970's, Browne produced more up-tempo, mainstream material that brought him a broader audience. From the late 1970's to the early 1990's, he was actively committed to a variety of political and social causes. In the early 1990's—during which time he released only three new albums, plus several compilations—Browne's output began to blend elements from all three phases and new themes, including celebrations of world diversity and homage to Southern California. Regardless of the period, several characteristics are common to Browne's work: clear vocals, accessible melodies, strong production values, and virtuosity on guitar and keyboard.

Jackson Browne. Also known as Saturate Before Using, this album established Browne as a thoughtful, versatile force to be reckoned with. Ably assisted by singer David Crosby, bassist Leland Sklar, drummer Russ Kunkel, and others, the singer-songwriter produced the bouncy "Doctor My Eyes," a Top 10 single, and hard-driving tunes such as "Rock Me on the Water" and "Jamaica Say You Will" that received considerable airplay.

Late for the Sky. This solidified Browne's reputation as a powerful music maker, capable of bending allegory to his will. Here, he focused on the search for love in a troubled world through such classics as the title tune and in the apocalyptic "Before the Deluge." Late for the Sky charted in the Top 20 among pop albums.

The Pretender. Browne's first album after the suicide of his wife, unsurprisingly, deals with the subject of death. One track, "Here Come Those Tears Again," was co-written with Nancy Farnsworth, his late wife's mother. Though dark in tone—especially in "Sleep's Dark and Silent Gate"—the album features a broad mix of styles, from flamenco ("Linda Paloma") to country ("Your Bright Baby Blues"). The cynical title tune helped propel The Pretender to number five on the pop album charts.

Running on Empty. A concept album recorded live, Running on Empty gives behind-the-scenes glimpses of touring and performing. Ten cuts deal with everything from setting up and tearing down gear ("The Load-Out") to the boredom of long bus rides ("Running on Empty") to the drug use endemic to rock and roll ("Cocaine"). The album produced two Top 20 hits and rose to number three on pop album charts.

Jackson Browne. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Lives in the Balance. An overtly political album, Lives in the Balance took direct aim at U.S. foreign policy under president Ronald Reagan. Particular targets were American-sponsored conflicts in Guatemala, El Salvador, and Nicaragua in such songs as "Soldier of Plenty," "For America," and the title track. Though tempered by such diversions as the reggae-flavored "Till I Go Down" and a love ballad, "In the Shape of a Heart," this angry album sets up Browne's even more outspoken polemical follow-up, World in Motion.

Musical Legacy

With unflinching honesty, Browne has examined the complexities of relationships, agonized over self-discovery, and searched for truth and justice, not just in himself but also in the world at large. Originally known as a balladeer, Browne over the course of his career has expanded his repertoire to encompass diverse traditions across the musical spectrum. He has produced a body of work that ranges from soft folk to bitter protest, including more than twenty hit singles that continue to receive frequent radio airplay. For his compositional skills, Browne was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 2004. For his environmental and social contributions, he received the John Steinbeck Award in 2002.

Jack Ewing

Further Reading

Bego, Mark. Jackson Browne: His Life and Music. New York: Citadel, 2005. An illustrated biography with a general overview of the artist's musical output.

Hoskyns, Barney. Hotel California: The True-Life Adventures of Crosby, Stills, Nash, Young, Mitchell, Taylor, Browne, Ronstadt, Geffen, the Eagles, and Their Many Friends. Hoboken, N.J.: Wiley, 2007. An informative look at the 1960's-1970's Los Angeles musical scene, the book explores the complex relationships among the top artists of the place and time.

Marcus, Greil, ed. Stranded: Rock and Roll for a Desert Island. 2d ed. Cambridge, Mass.: Da Capo Press, 2007. Answering a question about what single album one would want to have on a desert island, these essays by leading rock critics include the Jackson Browne-Glenn Frey song "Take It Easy."

Waterman, J. Douglas, ed. Song: The World's Best Songwriters on Creating the Music That Moves Us. Cincinnati, Ohio: Writer's Digest Books, 2007. Interviews compiled from American Songwriter in which artists, including Jackson Browne, discuss why and how they write songs.

Wiseman, Rich. Jackson Browne: The Story of a Hold Out. New York: Doubleday, 1982. Early review of Browne's life that delves deeply into family history and emphasizes the stories behind his music.

See also: Crosby, David; Raitt, Bonnie; Rush, Tom; Staples, Pops; Taylor, James; Vaughan, Stevie Ray; Young, Neil.

Dave Brubeck

American jazz composer and pianist

As a composer, pianist, and leader of an influential quartet, Brubeck introduced unusual time signatures, polyrhythms, and polytonalities to the jazz world.

Born: December 6, 1920; Concord, California
Also known as: David Warren Brubeck (full name)
Member of: The Dave Brubeck Quartet

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Brubeck Trio with Cal Tjader, Vol. 1, 1949; Brubeck Trio with Cal Tjader, Vol. 2, 1949; Brubeck/Desmond, 1951; Dave Brubeck Quartet, 1951; Stardust, 1951; Dave Brubeck/Paul Desmond, 1952; Dave Brubeck and Paul Desmond at Wilshire-Ebell, 1953; Jazz at Oberlin, 1953; Brubeck Time, 1954; Jazz Goes to College, 1954; Paul and Dave's Jazz Interwoven, 1954; Brubeck Plays Brubeck, 1956; Distinctive Rhythm Instrumentals, 1956; Jazz Impressions of the U.S.A., 1956; Dave Digs Disney, 1957; Jazz Goes to Junior College,1957; Plays and Plays and . . ., 1957; Reunion, 1957; Dave Brubeck Plays Solo, 1958; Gone with the Wind, 1959; The Riddle, 1959;

Southern Scene, 1959; Time Out, 1959; Brubeck a La Mode, 1960; Brubeck and Rushing, 1960; Brubeck Plays Bernstein Plays Brubeck, 1960; Tonight Only, 1960; Brandenburg Gate: Revisited, 1961; Near-Myth, 1961; Real Ambassadors, 1961; Time Further Out, 1961; Angel Eyes, 1962; Bossa Nova USA, 1962; Countdown: Time in Outer Space, 1962; Gold and Fizdale Play Dave Brubeck's Jazz Ballet, 1962; Music from West Side Story, 1962; Time Changes, 1963; Jazz Impressions of Japan, 1964; Jazz Impressions of New York, 1964; Anything Goes: The Music of Cole Porter, 1965; Time In, 1965; Jackpot!, 1966; My Favorite Things, 1966; Compadres, 1967; Blues Roots, 1968; The Light in the Wilderness: An Oratorio for Today, 1968; The Gates of Justice, 1969; The Dave Brubeck Trio with Gerry Mulligan and the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, 1970; Elementals for Jazzcombo, Orchestra, and Baritone-Solo, 1970; Adventures in Time, 1972; We're All Together Again (For the First Time), 1972; All the Things We Are, 1973; Truth Is Fallen, 1973; Two Generations of Brubeck, 1973; Brother, the Great Spirit Made Us All, 1974; 1975: The Duets, 1975; La fiesta de la posada (Festival of the Inn), 1976; A Cut Above, 1978; Back Home, 1979; Tritonis, 1980; Paper Moon, 1981; Concord on a Summer Night, 1982; For Iola, 1984; Reflections, 1985; Blue Rondo, 1986; Moscow Night, 1987; New Wine, 1987; Quiet as the Moon, 1988; Sound of Jazz, 1988; Once When I Was Young, 1991; Trio Brubeck, 1993; In Their Own Sweet Way, 1994; Jazz Sonatas, 1994; Just You, Just Me, 1994; Young Lions and Old Tigers, 1994; A Dave Brubeck Christmas, 1996; To Hope! A Celebration, 1996; One Alone, 1997; So What's New, 1998; The Crossing, 2000; On Time, 2001; I Hear a Rhapsody, 2002; V and J, 2002; Brubeck in Chattanooga, 2003; Classical Brubeck, 2003; Private Brubeck Remembers, 2004; London Flat, London Sharp, 2005; Songs, 2005; Brubeck Piano Compositions, 2006; Rondo, 2006; Indian Summer, 2007.

SINGLES: "Old Sound from San Francisco," 1954.

The Life

Born in 1920 in Concord, California, David Warren Brubeck (BREW-behk) was attracted to music at an early age, influenced by his mother, a piano teacher. His childhood ambition was to be a cattle rancher, emulating his father, who owned a forty-five-thousand-acre ranch in the Sierra Nevada foothills. Brubeck combined his daily ranch chores with playing the piano in local dance bands. Persuaded by his parents, Brubeck enrolled as a veterinary student in the College of the Pacific. However, a year later, he was majoring in music. He married Iola Marie Whitlock, the host of a weekly campus radio show.

Dave Brubeck. (Library of Congress)

Following college graduation in 1942, Brubeck was drafted into the Army, and he spent World War II playing piano to entertain the troops. After his discharge, Brubeck enrolled at Mills College to study with Darius Milhaud, the renowned French composer. At Mills College, he studied polytonality, counterpoint, and other classical-music topics. Nevertheless, he retained his fascination with jazz, which was encouraged by Milhaud.

In 1947 Brubeck began his professional jazz career in a San Francisco nightclub, the Geary Cellar, with an octet. At that time a serious swimming accident forced him to interrupt his career for several months. After his recovery, Brubeck formed his first quartet, with saxophonist Paul Desmond, drummer Joe Dodge, and bassist Bob Bates. The quartet played a series of nightclub and college engagements and recorded albums for a few years, gaining great notoriety. In 1954 Brubeck was featured on the cover of Time. Joe Morello, a highly regarded drummer, replaced Dodge in 1956. Eugene Wright replaced Bates on bass soon thereafter. One acclaimed album after another was released from the mid-1950's through the mid-1960's.

Despite the success in recordings and appearances, Brubeck dissolved the quartet in 1967. He began to compose in other idioms, such as ballets, liturgical music, and symphonic works.

Brubeck performed for Presidents John Kennedy, Lyndon Johnson, Ronald Reagan, and Bill Clinton. He received the Lifetime Achievement Award from the National Academy of Recording Arts and Sciences and a National Medal of the Arts. He was inducted into the Down Beat Hall of Fame, and he was granted honorary doctorate degrees from six universities.

The Music

Brubeck's early career coincided with the gradual decline of the big band era and the development of bop. Following a different path, Brubeck used his training in classical music and composition to develop a jazz piano style that was suitable for small combo settings.

Early Years. Advised by his Mills College mentor, Milhaud, to pursue jazz, Brubeck assembled an octet with other Milhaud disciples. Among them were Cal Tjader (vibraphone) and Desmond (alto saxophone), who would later become iconic figures in jazz. The octet gave way to a trio, which won the Down Beat Best Small Combo Award in 1949. The trio expanded to a quartet with the addition of Desmond in 1951. The contrasting improvisations of Brubeck and Desmond proved to be a winning blend.

Jazz at College. The early edition of the Dave Brubeck Quartet employed various bassists and drummers, but Desmond was a fixture. With a steady engagement at the Blackhawk in San Francisco, the quartet was able to expand to other performance venues. Brubeck's wife, Iola, wrote to colleges across the United States, soliciting invitations for the quartet to appear on campus. The effort paid off. It was estimated that during one college tour the quartet performed sixty "one-nighters" in a row. The campus concerts produced steady income and broad exposure, and, importantly, they introduced jazz to a new generation. College students demonstrated their support by faithfully buying the quartet's recordings: Jazz at Oberlin, Jazz Goes to College, and Jazz Goes to Junior College, among others. The college-concert period set the stage for Brubeck's innovative and experimental ideas.

The Classic Quartet. The addition of Morello on drums and Wright on bass solidified the quartet. Instead of a homogeneous group of musicians with similar personalities, tastes, and styles, the Dave Brubeck Quartet comprised four individualistic musicians, unafraid to take risks. Brubeck could easily shift from powerful chords to subtle nuances as the music demanded. Desmond's silky, feathery alto tone provided lyrical melodies, even in improvisational solos. Wright on bass was a steadying influence, playing in a traditional style reminiscent of earlier jazz eras. Morello possessed a keen ability to play in difficult meter signatures and still maintain a strong swing feel. Together, they complemented as well as inspired each other.

"Take Five." Brubeck first encountered odd meters when traveling to Turkey and Africa, and he realized their potential for use in American-style jazz. The landmark album Time Out proved to be a turning point in jazz history: It included the jazz classics "Take Five" in 5/4 time and "Blue Rondo à la Turk" with a mixture of meter signatures, including 9/8 time. The management of Columbia Records and the producer of the album were fearful this innovative music style strayed too far from the standards on the successful college albums. The quartet, however, refused to compromise. Time Out went gold, "Take Five" was a gigantic hit, and Columbia relented. Time Further Out, Countdown: Time in Outer Space, and similar albums followed.

Polyrhythm and Polytonality. Besides experimenting with odd meters, Brubeck infused polyrhythm and polytonality into the quartet's music. Polyrhythm involves multiple rhythms being played simultaneously. The ideal drum-set artist, Morello could play four different rhythms at once, using hands and feet separately, and at the same time he could synchronize the various rhythms throughout the composition.

The use of polytonalities was another step in the quartet's evolution. The standard procedure for a composer is to write a tune in a major or minor key, and musicians perform it in the original key or transpose it to another. However, the melody remains in one key at a time. Brubeck's polytonal approach was to layer his compositions so that two or three different keys were employed together. Traditionalists rejected such unconventional techniques, but Brubeck never wavered in his determination to compose and perform music his way.

West Coast Jazz. Some viewed Brubeck as a member of the West Coast, or cool, jazz style because he was based in California when West Coast jazz flourished. In reality, Brubeck played the piano in a heavy, aggressive style, atypical of ethereal and lyrical cool jazz. With Desmond applying the lighter touch, Brubeck was free to provide the contrast that the quartet utilized so successfully.

Indian Summer. In 2007 Brubeck produced this retrospective solo piano recording. The album featured new Brubeck compositions along with a collection of standards and ballads, performed with sensitivity and restraint. Full of nostalgia, Indian Summer showed Brubeck coming full circle, back to his roots.

Musical Legacy

During his long and successful career, Brubeck created a wide audience for jazz and endeared himself to fans. His body of work is sophisticated and pioneering as well as voluminous, and his signature piece, "Take Five," is familiar to even the most casual jazz, and nonjazz, listeners. Brubeck's alma mater honors his legacy in the Brubeck Institute of the University of the Pacific, established in recognition of Brubeck and his wife, Iola. It preserves Brubeck's educational and creative musical contributions and perpetuates his interests in environmental issues, social issues, and international relations. The institute manages the Brubeck archives and sponsors a jazz festival, an outreach program, a fellowship program, and a summer jazz colony.

Douglas D. Skinner

Further Reading

Hall, Fred. It's About Time. Fayetteville: University of Arkansas Press, 1996. Written by a radio broadcaster, this book traces Brubeck from boyhood to experienced jazzman. Includes interviews and stories of life on the road.

Martin, Henry. Enjoying Jazz. New York: Schirmer Books, 1986. A compendium of jazz styles and jazz artists that contains an in-depth analysis of Brubeck's "Blue Rondo à la Turk."

Megill, David W., and Paul O. W. Tanner. Jazz Issues: A Critical History. Madison, Wis.: Brown and Benchmark, 1995. This text for jazz history places Brubeck at strategic points in jazz history. Provides listening recommendations.

Ostransky, Leroy. Understanding Jazz. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1977. An overview of jazz origins written by a jazz educator. Brubeck's influences and importance to jazz are detailed.

Taylor, Billy. Jazz Piano: History and Development. Dubuque, Iowa: W. C. Brown, 1982. Eminent jazz pianist Billy Taylor describes Brubeck's piano style.

See also: Armstrong, Louis; Desmond, Paul; Hancock, Herbie; Milhaud, Darius; Waller, Fats.

Jimmy Buffett

American rock singer, songwriter, and guitarist

With a musical style best described as an amalgam of country-western, rock, and reggae, Buffett created a roster of appealing, lighthearted story songs that celebrate coastal towns, libations, and carefree lifestyles.

Born: December 25, 1946; Pascagoula, Mississippi
Also known as: James William Buffett (full name)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Down to Earth, 1970; A White Sport Coat and a Pink Carnation, 1973; A-1-A, 1974; Living and Dying in 3/4 Time, 1974; Rancho Deluxe, 1975; Havana Daydreamin', 1976; High Cumberland Jubilee (1972), 1976; Changes in Latitudes, Changes in Attitudes, 1977; Son of a Son of a Sailor, 1978; You Had to Be There, 1978; Volcano, 1979; Coconut Telegraph, 1981;

Somewhere over China, 1982; One Particular Harbour, 1983; Riddles in the Sand, 1984; Last Mango in Paris, 1985; Floridays, 1986; Hot Water, 1988; Off to See the Lizard, 1989; Feeding Frenzy, 1990; Fruitcakes, 1994; Barometer Soup, 1995; Banana Wind, 1996; Christmas Island, 1996; Don't Stop the Carnival, 1998; Beach House on the Moon, 1999; Captain American, 2002; Far Side of the World, 2002; License to Chill, 2004.

The Life

James William Buffett (BUH-fet) was born in Mississippi, but he grew up in Mobile, Alabama. He attended a Catholic elementary school and an all-male high school. He studied at Auburn University in Alabama and at Pearl River Community College in Mississippi before transferring to the University of Southern Mississippi, where he earned a bachelor of science degree in history and journalism in 1969. That year he married Margie Washichek, moved to Nashville, Tennessee, and worked as a freelance journalist for Billboard. He performed locally in Nashville and recorded two albums that met with limited success.

In the early 1970's he divorced and moved to Florida, where his musical career flourished. He worked with country-music singer Jerry Jeff Walker and started a long and fruitful collaboration with the Coral Reefer Band. He met Jane Slagsvol; they married and had three children.

In addition to being a singer and a songwriter, Buffett was an airplane pilot, a record producer, a film producer, a sound-track composer, a conservationist, and an entrepreneur. Notably, he was one of a few authors to have a New York Times best seller in both the fiction and nonfiction categories. Although his most popular songs were written in the 1970's, his concert tours kept his music vital. His devoted fans are called Parrot Heads.

The Music

Buffett composes humorous and sentimental ballads and sings them over a simple accompaniment. His music does not fit one genre; it samples several, such as country-western, rock, and reggae. Supported by a marimba, a ship's bell, an electronic piano, an organ, an acoustic guitar, conga drums, and other percussion instruments, Buffett unspools his first-person tales in lyrics that revolve around themes of sailing, drinking, and living freely.

Backed by the Coral Reefer Band, Buffett released several albums in the 1970's, including the immensely successful Changes in Latitudes, Changes in Attitudes and Son of a Son of a Sailor. His duet with Alan Jackson, "It's Five o'Clock Somewhere," was a country hit in 2003, and in 2004 his album License to Chill was his first to be ranked number one on the Billboard chart.

"Come Monday." Buffett's first nationally successful song, "Come Monday," appeared on the Billboard singles chart under the pop, country, and adult contemporary headings. This slow ballad, which features a steel guitar, a string section, and tender lyrics about being separated from a loved one, has a definite country sound. "Come Monday" was the only hit song from the album Living and Dying in 3/4 Time.

"Margaritaville." "Margaritaville" was a surprise hit when it was released in 1977 on Buffett's album Changes in Latitudes, Changes in Attitudes. The singer's persona relates the story of his return to Margaritaville (evidently a tropical tourist destination) and the inebriation that he initially blames on a woman but admits is "my own damned fault." The combination of guitar, marimba, conga drums, electronic keyboard, and Buffett's tranquil voice became the quintessential elements of his sound. "Margaritaville" ranked in the Top 15 on the Billboard charts in the pop, country, and adult contemporary categories. Even after the album was certified platinum later that year, no one suspected just how big the song would become outside the music arena. In addition to the restaurant chain Jimmy Buffett's Margaritaville and the satellite radio station Radio Margaritaville, a Margaritaville brand of tequila, a margarita mix, footwear, and frozen shrimp products were created. One Buffett biography was titled Jimmy Buffett: The Man from Margaritaville Revealed; a two-disc collection of Buffett's songs was called Meet Me in Margaritaville. When Buffett released an album of his greatest hits in 1985, its title made subtle reference to the enormity of the song's success: Songs You Know by Heart: Jimmy Buffett's Greatest Hit(s).

"Cheeseburger in Paradise." "Cheeseburger in Paradise" was released in 1978 on the album Son of a Son of a Sailor. This song is the story of Buffett's failed attempt to become a vegetarian, and his ultimate desire to consume an elaborate, perfect cheeseburger. In addition to his standard use of guitar, drums, and vocals, this song features an electric organ, hand clapping, harmonica, and a female chorus. In The Parrot Head: Handbook, Buffett wrote that the inspiration for this song was a cheeseburger he imagined while he was lost on the Caribbean Sea. He landed on an island and, to his surprise, found a restaurant that served cheeseburgers. He ordered the cheeseburger he imagined, he was served something rather different, but he was pleased, nonetheless, to be fed and back on dry land. In addition, a restaurant chain was built around this song.

Musical Legacy

Although Buffett's music is distinctive for its leisurely attitude, Buffett himself is tireless. He performed on concert tours for decades, he composed and recorded music for numerous albums, he wrote several books, and he traveled extensively. He is noted for his involvement in multiple business ventures and conservationist organizations. He collaborated with other musicians, such as James Taylor, Merle Haggard, Waylon Jennings, Jim Croce, and Alan Jackson. He and his fans contributed "parrot head," "phlock," and "parrot hedonism" to the lexicon.

Joseph R. Matson

Further Reading

Buffett, Jimmy. The Parrot Head: Handbook. Universal City, Calif.: MCI Records, 1992. A general account of the culture surrounding Buffett's concerts and background stories from the author himself. Photographs, discography, and facsimiles of his notebooks.

_____. A Pirate Looks at Fifty. New York: Random House, 1998. Short stories chronicle Buffett's life and travels.

Corcoran, Tom. Jimmy Buffett: The Key West Years. Marathon, Fla.: Ketch & Yawl Press, 2006. Short chapters explain Buffett's early years in Florida, with photographs.

Eng, Steve. Jimmy Buffett: The Man from Margaritaville Revealed. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1996. Although written without the participation of Buffett, this is a thorough biography. Features an extensive discography, a bibliography, and an index.

Quigley, Jackson, with Jerry Gontang. Jimmy dotcom: The Evolution of a Phan. Lake Forest, Calif.: St. Somewhere Press, 2000. A humorous account of Buffett's impact on his fans, including more than a thousand photographs.

Thomas, Ryan. The Parrot Head Companion: An Insider's Guide to Jimmy Buffett. Secaucus, N.J.: Carol, 1998. A history of Buffett's professional career, including reviews of his albums and books up to 1998.

See also: Haggard, Merle; Jennings, Waylon; Taylor, James.

Johnny Burke

American musical-theater composer and lyricist

One of the most popular lyricists of the 1930's and 1940's, Burke wrote primarily for film musicals, many featuring Bing Crosby. His fanciful lyrics mentioned moonbeams, stars, dreams, and cottages built of lilacs and laughter, balm for Depression-era Americans.

Born: October 3, 1908; Antioch, California
Died: February 25, 1964; New York, New York
Also known as: John Francis Burke (full name)

Principal works

MUSICAL THEATER: Nellie Bly, 1946 (lyrics; music by Jimmy Van Heusen); Carnival in Flanders, 1953 (lyrics; music by Van Heusen); Donnybrook!, 1961.

SONGS (lyrics; music by Rudolf Friml): "Bon Jour," 1956; "Comparisons," 1956; "This Same Heart," 1956; "Vive la You," 1956; "Watch out for the Devil," 1956.

SONG (lyrics; music by Erroll Garner): "Misty," 1955.

SONGS (lyrics; music by Arthur Johnston; from Pennies from Heaven): "Pennies from Heaven," 1936; "All You Want to Do Is Dance," 1937; "Double or Nothing," 1937; "The Moon Got in My Eyes," 1937; "One, Two, Button Your Shoe," 1937.

SONGS (lyrics; music by James Monaco): "I've Got a Pocketful of Dreams," 1938; "Sing a Song of Sunbeams," 1939; "Ain't It a Shame About Mame?," 1940; "Only Forever," 1940; "Sweet Potato Piper," 1940 (from The Road to Singapore); "Too Romantic" 1940 (from The Road to Singapore).

SONGS (lyrics; music by Harold Spina): "Shadows on the Swanee," 1932; "Annie Doesn't Live Here Anymore," 1933; "My Very Good Friend the Milkman," 1934; "You're Not the Only Oyster in the Stew," 1934.

SONGS (lyrics; music by Jimmy Van Heusen): "Imagination," 1942 (from The Road to Morocco); "Moonlight Becomes You," 1942 (from The Road to Morocco); "Polka Dots and Moonbeams," 1942 (from The Road to Morocco); "Sunday, Monday, or Always," 1943 (from Dixie); "Going My Way," 1944 (from Going My Way); "It Could Happen to You," 1944 (from Going My Way); "Swinging on a Star," 1944 (from Going My Way).

The Life

Born in California, John Francis Burke grew up in Chicago, where his father was in the construction business and his mother taught school. Although he had a classical music education—he played piano in the University of Wisconsin orchestra—it was in popular music where Burke made his name. The talented youngster got a job as staff pianist, selling songs, in the Chicago office of the Irving Berlin Music Corporation after he graduated from the University of Wisconsin in 1927. At the same time, he was playing piano in dance bands and for vaudeville.

After a transfer to the New York office of the Irving Berlin Music Corporation, Burke began writing lyrics for composer Harold Spina, and in short order they wrote some minor hits, enough to attract the attention of Hollywood. In 1939, Burke signed a contract with Paramount Pictures, where he stayed for the rest of his career. Personable and gregarious, Burke enjoyed the parties and the golf games that Southern California had to offer. However, his heavy drinking was a detriment to his health, and he died at the age of fifty-five of a heart attack in his sleep in 1964. Married four times, Burke had four children with Bess Patterson, to whom he was married from 1939 to 1955.

The Music

Burke wrote the lyrics to more than 550 published songs, most of which appeared in forty-two motion pictures and three Broadway musicals. When Burke started at Paramount Pictures, he was first paired with composer Arthur Johnston, and he was given an assignment that would change his life: to write a song for Bing Crosby.

Ballads for Bing. "Pennies from Heaven" was a big hit for Crosby, and the crooner and the studio liked the song (which was nominated for an Academy Award) so much that it became the title of the film. The song also began a relationship between Burke and Crosby that produced a string of popular songs. Burke's lyrics reinforced and helped establish Crosby's signature troubadour style. The lyricist downplayed his accomplishment, saying he simply listened to Crosby talk and either took phrases directly from him or patterned some after Crosby's way of putting phrases together. Crosby was more direct: "One of the best things that's happened to me is a 145-pound Irish leprechaun named Johnny Burke." For the next seventeen years, in 120 personally tailored songs in twenty-three films, Burke largely created the Crosby song persona. Burke was one of Crosby's closest friends, and the singer nicknamed Burke "the poet."

Collaborations with Van Heusen. When Johnston left Paramount for Twentieth Century-Fox, Burke teamed with James Monaco, and he continued writing hits for Crosby, including "I've Got a Pocketful of Dreams," "Sing a Song of Sunbeams," "Only Forever" (nominated for an Academy Award), "Ain't It a Shame About Mame?," and "Too Romantic." The team wrote songs for the first of the "road pictures" starring Crosby, Bob Hope, and Dorothy Lamour, The Road to Singapore (1940).

When Burke changed to composer Jimmy Van Heusen, he found his ideal collaborator, and they produced hit after hit for the next fifteen years. Writing songs for sixteen more Crosby films, the team also wrote material for others, including Frank Sinatra ("Polka Dots and Moonbeams") and the Glenn Miller Orchestra ("Imagination").

Written for The Road to Morocco (1942), "Moonlight Becomes You" was another hit from Burke and Van Heusen, which prompted Crosby to dub them his Gold Dust Twins. Crosby insisted that the songwriting team be paid $150,000 a year at Paramount Pictures, the highest salary of any studio songwriting team. Burke and Van Heusen made good on this investment, winning the Academy Award for Best Song for "Swinging on a Star," written for Going My Way (1944). The song was inducted in the Grammy Hall of Fame in 2002. In 1944 the duo created Burke and Van Heusen, Inc., a music publishing firm, with backing from Crosby, Sidney Kornheiser, and Edwin H. Morris.

Johnny Burke. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The box office magic that Burke and Van Heusen inspired in film audiences, however, did not work on Broadway theatergoers. Their first stage musical, Nellie Bly, ran just two weeks, despite the presence of two great stars, Victor Moore and William Gaxton. While Carnival in Flanders ran only six performances, it did yield the team's greatest torch song: Sammy Cahn listed "Here's That Rainy Day" as one of the ten best songs ever written, and Rosemary Clooney called it "the most evocative song I've ever sung."

Solo Work. Burke and Van Heusen's partnership was increasingly strained because of Burke's heavy drinking, so Van Heusen began to look for a new writing partner, eventually finding one in Cahn. Now alone, Burke set lyrics in 1955 to a well-known jazz instrumental, "Misty," by Erroll Garner. "Misty" became Sarah Vaughan's signature song, and it was included in the Grammy Hall of Fame in 2002. He wrote new lyrics to Rudolf Friml melodies for The Vagabond King (1956). Burke's last major work was the Broadway musical Donnybrook!, which was based on the film The Quiet Man (1952), for which he wrote lyrics and music. Burke was heartbroken that it lasted only sixty-eight performances.

Musical Legacy

In addition to providing Crosby with numerous popular hits, Burke produced lyrics that were recorded by other great vocalists, such as Tony Bennett, Rosemary Clooney, Nat King Cole, Perry Como, Harry Connick, Jr., Doris Day, Lena Horne, Betty Hutton, Johnny Mathis, Linda Ronstadt, Frank Sinatra, and Mel Tormé. Burke was among the few lyricists who had seventeen songs selected to appear on Your Hit Parade, and he was one of the first songwriters to be inducted into the Songwriters Hall of Fame. Thirty-one years after his death, the Broadway musical revue Swinging on a Star: The Johnny Burke Musical (1995) introduced his genius to another generation of music lovers.

Bud Coleman

Further Reading

Furia, Philip, and Michael Lasser. America's Songs: The Stories Behind the Songs of Broadway, Hollywood, and Tin Pan Alley. New York: Routledge, 2006. Furia and Lasser comment on the historical importance of Burke's writing.

Giddins, Gary. Bing Crosby—A Pocketful of Dreams: The Early Years, 1903-1940. New York: Little, Brown, 2001. Giddins credits a great deal of Crosby's success to Burke's skill as a lyricist.

Gottlieb, Robert, and Robert Kimball. Reading Lyrics. New York: Pantheon Books, 2000. This source offers a brief appraisal of Burke's career and includes lyrics to nineteen of his songs.

Hischak, Thomas S. The American Musical Film Song Encyclopedia. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1999. Sixty-four of Burke's songs are briefly described, including who originally sang them, in which film they appeared, and who subsequently recorded the song.

Nolan, Frederick. "Johnny Burke." In Dictionary of Literary Biography: American Song Lyricists, 1920-1960. Detroit: Gale, 2002. An extensive source of information about Burke.

See also: Bennett, Tony; Cole, Nat King; Crosby, Bing; Ronstadt, Linda; Sinatra, Frank; Tormé, Mel; Van Heusen, Jimmy; Vaughan, Sarah.

Solomon Burke

American rhythm-and-blues singer and songwriter

With a stylistic depth and considerable vocal range, Burke ranked as one of the most versatile early singers of soul music.

Born: March 21, 1940; Philadelphia, Pennsylvania

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Solomon Burke, 1962; Rock 'n' Soul, 1964; The Rest of Solomon Burke, 1965; I Wish I Knew, 1968; King Solomon, 1968; Proud Mary, 1969; Electronic Magnetism, 1972; King Heavy, 1972; I Have a Dream, 1974; Back to My Roots, 1975; Music to Make Love By, 1975; Lord We Need a Miracle, 1979; Sidewalks, Fences, and Walls, 1979; King of Rock 'n' Soul, 1981; Lord I Need a Miracle Man, 1982; Soul Alive, 1984; A Change Is Gonna Come, 1986; Homeland, 1990; Into My Life You Came, 1990; This Is His, 1990; Soul of the Blues, 1993; The Definition of Soul, 1997; We Need a Miracle, 1998; Not by Water but Fire This Time, 1999; Don't Give Up on Me, 2002; The Incredible Solomon Burke at His Best, 2002; Soulman, 2002; The Apollo Album, 2003; Make Do with What You Got, 2005; Nashville, 2006; Soul Lucky, 2006; Like a Fire, 2008.

SINGLES: "None of Us Are Free," 2003; "Rhino Hi-Fives: Solomon Burke," 2005; "Tomorrow Is Forever," 2007.

The Life

Solomon Burke was born on March 21, 1940, in Philadelphia. The oldest of seven children, he began singing in the church founded by his grandmother, becoming a soloist when he was nine. At twelve he had a radio program, Solomon's Temple, during which he sang and preached. In 1955 Kae Williams, a Philadelphia disc jockey, helped Burke contact record companies, and he signed with Apollo Records, issuing his first single, "Christmas Gifts from Heaven."

When his gospel tunes sold poorly, Burke became disenchanted with the recording industry. He became a funeral director, opening a chain of mortuaries later operated by two of his sons. Eventually, Paul Ackerman of Billboard persuaded him to give music another chance, and in December, 1960, he signed with Atlantic Records, where legendary producer Jerry Wexler helped Burke to develop a soulful, secular singing style that would reach wider audiences. However, when Atlantic Records did not renew Burke's contract in 1968, he blamed Wexler for allowing his career to stall.

In the 1970's Burke frequently changed labels. While at MGM he recorded songs for the sound track of Cool Breeze (1972). When the songs he recorded for Chess Records in 1975 did not meet expectations, Burke, already an ordained minister, began devoting his energies to leading his Philadelphia church and recording gospel music for Savoy Records. In 1984 Rounder Records released Soul Alive, a live album of Burke's 1960's and 1970's hits and some soul classics.

In 1995 Jim Fifield, head of EMI Music, helped Burke sign with Point Blank Records, which resulted in The Definition of Soul. The album reunited Burke with Wexler on "Your Turn to Cry," the only tune not cowritten by Burke, and "Everybody's Got a Game," a duet with Little Richard, which revitalized Burke's career.

The father of fourteen daughters and seven sons, the three-hundred-pound Burke acted occasionally; he had a prominent role as a crime boss opposite Dennis Quaid and Ellen Barkin in The Big Easy (1987). Burke received a Pioneer Award from the Rhythm and Blues Foundation in 1993. Because of Burke's longtime relationship with the Catholic Church, he performed at the Vatican for Pope John Paul II and Pope Benedict XVI.

The Music

Burke's singing was influenced by artists as diverse as Gene Autry, Nat King Cole, Big Joe Turner, and Muddy Waters. Before Ray Charles made it acceptable for black performers to record country-western songs, Burke scored a hit at Atlantic Records with "Just Out of Reach (Of My Two Empty Arms)," originally recorded by Faron Young. A blend of country, gospel, and rhythm and blues, "Down in the Valley," featuring King Curtis on saxophone and Bucky Pizzarelli on guitar, demonstrated Burke's ability as a singer and songwriter to merge genres. As he related in the blues concert documentary Lightning in a Bottle (2004), Burke was invited to perform at a Ku Klux Klan event, whose organizers thought he was a white country singer.

Songwriter. Burke wrote or cowrote most of his hits during his years with Atlantic Records, including the infectious dance tune "Everybody Needs Somebody to Love." A rousing version appeared on 1965's The Rolling Stones Now!, and forty years later, Burke was the Rolling Stones' opening act on some stops of their A Bigger Bang tour. His biggest soul hit, "Cry to Me," was recorded by the Rolling Stones and other artists, such as Tom Petty. It also can be heard on the sound track for Dirty Dancing (1987), one of several films to feature Burke's songs.

Despite Burke's inspirational leanings, his secular songs always had a sensual, though not explicitly erotic, quality, as with "Tonight's the Night." Throughout his career, Burke's music had a raw, spontaneous spirit, never sounding overproduced. He was more melodic and less a shouter than many other soul singers. Music historians considered him a pioneer, along with Charles, for injecting the vocal motifs of African American religious music into pop music.

Although he had six songs on the rhythm-and-blues charts during the period 1961-1965, Burke, unlike his contemporaries Charles, Sam Cooke, Percy Sledge, and Otis Redding, never had a major hit on the pop charts, an odd occurrence given the crossover appeal of his music. "Just Out of Reach (Of My Two Empty Arms)," "Got to Get You off My Mind," "Tonight's the Night," and "If You Need Me" were all Top 40 hits, though none placed higher than number twenty-two.

The Next Phase. A group of Burke's admirers wrote songs for Don't Give Up on Me, which was nominated for a Grammy Award as Best Contemporary Blues album. Burke took music composed by famous singer-songwriters and made it his own, although retaining the style of its creator. Elvis Costello's almost operatic "The Judgement" tested the strength of Burke's powerful voice. Van Morrison's "Fast Train" and "Only a Dream" were tributes to Burke's gospel roots. Bob Dylan's "Stepchild" featured the odd, demanding rhythms of the legend's late composing style. Nick Lowe, Tom Waits, and Brian Wilson also contributed songs to the album, arguably Burke's best.

Following the similar Make Do with What You Got, with songs by Dylan, Morrison, Mick Jagger, Keith Richards, and Dr. John, Burke recorded his first completely country album. Nashville included solo efforts, including Bruce Springsteen's "Ain't Got You," as well as duets with Patty Griffin, Emmylou Harris, Patty Loveless, Dolly Parton, and Gillian Welch. Unlike other such collaborations, the songs in Nashville are heartfelt and never strained, a distinguishing characteristic of Burke's music.

Solomon Burke. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Musical Legacy

Burke was described as one of the founders of soul, building upon the contributions of Charles and Cooke and paving the way for Aretha Franklin, Wilson Pickett, and Redding. Waits praised him as one of the architects of American music, and both Wexler and Ahmet Ertegun, cofounder of Atlantic Records, considered him the greatest soul singer. While Burke never achieved widespread popularity, he was a role model for dozens of singers and songwriters.

Michael Adams

Further Reading

Ertegun, Ahmet, and Perry Richardson. "What'd I Say?" The Atlantic Story: Fifty Years of Music. New York: Welcome Rain, 2001. A look at Burke's years at Atlantic Records.

Guralnick, Peter. Sweet Soul Music: Rhythm and Blues and the Southern Dream of Freedom. New York: Harper & Row, 1986. Burke's achievements examined in the context of the history of African American music.

Light, Alan. "Song of Solomon." Gentlemen's Quarterly 72 (August, 2002): 86-90. Analysis of Burke's impact on popular music and his legacy. In an interview, the singer explains the nature of soul.

Newman, Melinda. "Point Blank Goes Regional with Soul Legend Burke." Billboard 109 (January 25, 1997): 13. Burke discusses the making of Definition of Soul and his relationship with Wexler.

See also: Blackwell, Otis; Charles, Ray; Franklin, Aretha; Jagger, Sir Mick; Redding, Otis; Turner, Big Joe; Waters, Muddy.

Gary Burton

American jazz songwriter, vibraphone player, and marimba player

A major figure in jazz, Burton revolutionized vibraphone performance by playing with four mallets instead of two.

Born: January 23, 1943; Anderson, Indiana

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: New Vibe Man in Town, 1961; Who Is Gary Burton?, 1962; Three in Jazz, 1963; Artist's Choice, 1963; Something's Coming, 1963; The Groovy Sound of Music, 1964; Tennessee Firebird, 1966; The Time Machine, 1966; Duster, 1967; A Genuine Tong Funeral (with Carla Bley), 1967; Lofty Fake Anagram, 1967; Country Roads and Other Places, 1968; Good Vibes, 1969; Paris Encounter, 1969; Throb, 1969; Alone at Last, 1971; Gary Burton and Keith Jarrett (with Keith Jarrett), 1971; Crystal Silence (with Chick Corea), 1972; Works, 1972; The New Quartet, 1973; Seven Songs for Quartet and Chamber Orchestra, 1973; Hotel Hello (with Steve Swallow), 1974; Matchbook (with Ralph Towner), 1974; Ring (with Eberhard Weber), 1974; Dreams So Real, 1975; Passengers, 1976; Times Square, 1978; Duet (with Corea), 1979; Easy as Pie, 1980; In Concert, Zurich (with Corea), 1980; Picture This, 1982; Real Life Hits, 1984; Gary Burton and the Berklee All Stars, 1985; Slide Show (with Towner), 1986; Whiz Kids, 1986; Times Like These, 1988; Reunion (with other performers), 1989; Right Time, Right Place, 1990; Cool Nights, 1991; Six Pack, 1992; It's Another Day, 1993; Face to Face, 1994; Astor Piazzolla Reunion: A Tango Excursion, 1996; Departure, 1997; Like Minds (with other performers), 1998; Libertango: The Music of Astor Piazzolla, 2000; For Hamp, Red, Bags, and Cal, 2001; Virtuosi, 2002; Music of Duke Ellington, 2003; Generations, 2004; Next Generation, 2005.

The Life

Gary Burton was born January 23, 1943, in Anderson, Indiana. He taught himself to play the marimba at the age of six and the vibraphone at the age of eight. He was joined by his sister on the piano and his brother on clarinet and bass. The family group's repertoire included classical pieces, Dixieland tunes, and novelty numbers. At their peak, the siblings played about a hundred performances a year. At age thirteen Burton discovered jazz and lost interest in the family group.

When he was seventeen, Burton made his first recordings for RCA Records with country guitarist Hank Garland. After Burton graduated from high school, he spent the summer in Nashville, playing with Garland. Burton then moved to Boston to study at the Berklee School of Music for two years, during which time he recorded as a bandleader for RCA Records. In 1962 Burton moved to New York, and in 1963 he joined George Shearing's quintet. He then rose to prominence as a member of Stan Getz's quartet (1964-1966), winning the Down Beat Talent Deserving of Wider Recognition Award in 1965. In 1967 he formed his own quartet with Larry Coryell, Steve Swallow, and Bob Moses, a group whose style was influenced by rock music. Down Beat awarded Burton its Jazzman of the Year award in 1968, and his 1971 album Alone at Last (a solo vibraphone concert recorded at the 1971 Montreux Jazz Festival) was honored with a Grammy Award.

Gary Burton. (Reuters/Landov)

Burton moved back to Boston to teach percussion and improvisation in the fall of 1971, and in 1985 he was named dean of curriculum and later executive vice president of the Berklee College of Music. In 2003 he retired and moved to Fort Lauderdale, Florida.

The Music

A virtuoso vibraphonist, Burton developed an original style of improvisation distinct from his famous predecessors, Lionel Hampton and Milt Jackson. In the early 1960's Burton departed from the two-mallet playing style and always held four mallets. At the time, Burton was one of the few modern jazz improvisers not to have drawn substantially on the melodic conceptions of the bebop pioneers Charlie Parker and Dizzy Gillespie. Instead, Burton's musical vocabulary emphasized classical, country, and rock styles. He frequently employed accompanying vamps and pedal points made possible by his consistent use of four mallets.

Duster. In the late 1960's Burton's recordings featuring a mixture of jazz, country, and rock styles were among the earliest of the fusion sound that would later become mainstream with Miles Davis's Bitches Brew (1969). With Burton's quartet recording of Duster, the electric guitar became a leading instrument in jazz, and rock elements were first introduced into virtuosic jazz. This and other RCA Records recordings Burton did in the late 1960's with guitarist Coryell created a new jazz-rock sound, and the Gary Burton Quartet was invited to play at concert performances with such well-known rock groups as the Electric Flag and Cream at the Fillmore West in San Francisco in 1967.

A Genuine Tong Funeral. Burton's recording of Carla Bley's wordless opera A Genuine Tong Funeral is a musical portrait of the emotions surrounding death. Bley originally intended this work for staging with costumes. In A Genuine Tong Funeral Burton's quartet is augmented by five horn players, with Bley on piano and organ. The themes are derived from American jazz, European cabaret styles, and Chinese processional music. A Genuine Tong Funeral is unique in Burton's oeuvre, since he rarely recorded large-scale works.

Crystal Silence. Crystal Silence marks the beginning of Burton's recordings for the ECM label and the start of his collaboration with pianist Chick Corea. Burton's late 1960's fusion style was replaced in the early 1970's by virtuosic acoustic jazz. The performances on Crystal Silence demonstrate the precision and accuracy of Burton's and Corea's tight improvisatory imitations. Avoiding blues and bebop clichés, Burton and Corea focused on modern melodies. Their duets resulted in several noteworthy ECM recordings, including the Grammy Award-winning Duet and In Concert, Zurich.

Libertango. Burton's recordings of Astor Piazzolla's tangos transformed Burton's work. Unlike the expanded solos in his traditional jazz playing, Burton shifts smoothly back and forth between written parts and short improvisations.

Virtuosi. Burton's Virtuosi includes performances of classical repertoire and improvisations with pianist Makoto Ozone. Virtuosi includes works by Maurice Ravel, Sergei Rachmaninoff, George Gershwin, Alessandro Scarlatti, Johannes Brahms, Léo Delibes, and Ozone. Some pieces, such as Samuel Barber's Excursions (1945), flow seamlessly from composed to improvised and back; other pieces show clear distinctions between the composed and improvised sections.

Musical Legacy

Among Burton's many recorded performances, those with a lasting historical significance are the fusion recordings from the late 1960's. Burton produced several of the earliest jazz-rock fusion and country-jazz fusion recordings with guitarist Coryell. The influence of the Burton Quartet's interactions with rock groups such as Cream is evident in the adoption of extended improvisations in rock music of the late 1960's. Burton transformed the jazz vibraphone technique with an innovative four-mallet grip that was adopted by jazz vibraphonists worldwide. His technique became widely used on orchestral keyboard percussion instruments, such as the marimba, the xylophone, and orchestra bells.

David Steffens

Further Reading

Kart, Larry. "Gary Burton." In Jazz in Search of Itself. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 2004. Burton discusses his career and his development as a vibraphonist and a bandleader.

Mattingly, Rick. "Gary Burton: The Innovator of the Vibraphone." Percussive Notes 37, no. 5 (October, 1999): 8-14. Mattingly interviews Burton about his early career, the history of the vibraphone, and the influences of Red Norvo, Jackson, and Hampton.

Petercsak, Jim. "A Profile of Gary Burton: The Man and His Music, Part One." Percussive Notes 12, no. 2 (Winter, 1974). Petercsak interviews Burton about his youth, his musical training, his approach to improvisation, and his recordings.

Scott, Craig. "Gary Burton's Solo on 'Bud Powell.'" Percussive Notes 33, no. 6 (December, 1995): 52-56. A complete transcription of Burton's solo on "Bud Powell" from a live performance with Chick Corea in Munich, 1979.

Wanamaker, Jay. "A Profile of Gary Burton: The Man and His Music, Part Two." Percussive Notes 18, no. 1 (Fall, 1979). Wanamaker interviews Burton about his ECM recordings, his improvisations, and his use of electronics with the vibraphone.

See also: Corea, Chick; Getz, Stan; Hampton, Lionel; Jarrett, Keith; Metheny, Pat; Piazzolla, Astor.

Adolf Busch

German violinist

Busch was hailed as a great violinist in the German tradition, and his interpretations in performances and recordings (especially of Beethoven's late string quartets) were described as masterpieces that elucidated the complex architecture of violin works.

Born: August 8, 1891; Siegen, Westphalia, Prussia (now in Germany)
Died: June 9, 1952; Guilford, Vermont
Also known as: Adolf Georg Wilhelm Busch (full name)
Member of: The Busch Quartet; the Busch Chamber Players

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Schubert: String Quartets 14 and 15, 1932 (with the Busch Quartet); Brandenburg Concertos, 1936 (with the Busch Chamber Players); Beethoven's String Quartet No. 13 in B-Flat, Op. 130, 1941 (with the Busch Quartet).

The Life

Adolf Georg Wilhelm Busch (boosh) was born into a musical family that included his father, his older brother Fritz (who became a well-respected conductor), and his younger brother Hermann (who became the cellist for the Busch Quartet). He began violin lessons at the age of three with his father, who had reputedly been a pupil of the great German virtuoso violinist, opera composer, and violin pedagogue Louis Spohr. Busch entered the Cologne Conservatory at the age of eleven, where he continued his studies with violinists Willy Hess and Bram Eldering, both of whom had been pupils of the nineteenth century virtuoso Joseph Joachim. When he was fifteen, Busch turned pages at a performance in Bonn by Joachim's string quartet, with Ernst von Dohnanyi at the piano, an influential experience for the youthful musician.

Busch's education was rooted in an exclusively Germanic line of musicians, so his mature style stood in contrast to such soloists as Jascha Heifetz, Mischa Elman, and Nathan Milstein, who had been trained by Leopold Auer in the Russian school. In 1907 Busch met composer Max Reger, and they maintained a strong friendship until Reger's death in 1916. Busch frequently performed Reger's violin concerto and solo works, and he adopted Reger's style in his own compositions, which number more than two hundred and include symphonies, concerti, choral works, chamber music, and solo pieces. Busch's original compositions, however, have faded in the light of his greater accomplishments as a performer.

In 1913 Busch married Frieda Grüters, the daughter of Hugo Grüters, his composition professor, and they had a daughter. Busch left Germany as the Nazi regime expanded its power and influence, and he settled first in Basel, Switzerland, in 1927, adopting Swiss citizenship. In 1939 he emigrated to the United States. His professional life centered around his performances as a concerto soloist, as the first violinist of his string quartet, and as the founding member of the Busch Chamber Players.

Shortly after Frieda died in 1946, Busch married Hedwig Vischer, and they had two sons. In 1950 and 1951 he founded, along with Rudolf Serkin and Marcel Moyse, the Marlboro Music Festival in Vermont, which is among the greatest chamber music festivals in the United States, and is a proving ground for aspiring chamber musicians. Busch performed for most of his life on a Stradivarius violin known as the Wiener Strad. He died in 1952 at the age of sixty.

The Music

Busch's professional career began in 1910, when he performed Reger's violin concerto in Berlin, with the composer conducting the orchestra. In 1912 he assumed the position of concertmaster of the Konzertverein Orchestra in Vienna. It was in this position that Busch founded his first quartet, the Vienna Konzertverein Quartet, composed of principals from the orchestra. The quartet disbanded during World War I. He also taught for a time at the Musikhochschule in Berlin beginning in 1916.

The Busch Quartet. Following World War I, Busch regrouped with three colleagues to form the Busch Quartet. Its original membership consisted of Busch as first violin, Karl Reitz as second violin, Emil Bohnke on viola, and Paul Grümmer on cello. Later, Gösta Andreasson became the second violinist and Karl Doktor became the violist. With these musicians (and again later in 1930, when the younger Hermann Busch replaced Grümmer on cello), the Busch Quartet garnered international acclaim, especially for its interpretations of the music of the works of Ludwig van Beethoven, Franz Schubert, and Johannes Brahms, much of which they also recorded. The quartet's style was reminiscent of the Joachim Quartet's interpretations a generation earlier, emphasizing clarity of musical architecture through honest adherence to the printed score.

The Busch Chamber Players. The Busch Chamber Players came into being, according to one source, as a result of a request from the city of Florence to perform as a part of its May Festival in 1935. In order to bring the Florentine audience a performance of Johann Sebastian Bach's Brandenburg concerti at an artistic level Busch felt acceptable, nearly seventy hours of rehearsal were required. The Busch Chamber Players continued giving concerts for many years, ultimately including Serkin, who became Busch's son-in-law.

A review of many of Busch's concert programs shows how often he was featured performing either Beethoven's Violin Concerto in D Major (which he performed in 1927—the Beethoven Centenary—more than one hundred times), Brahms's or Reger's concerti, or Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's Violin Concerto in D Major. These were among his favorites and formed his basic repertoire. Similarly, his recital programs frequently presented Bach's solo sonatas and partitas, along with sonatas by Beethoven, Brahms, and Reger. Busch was close friends with many of the greatest musicians of his day, including Arturo Toscanini, Yehudi Menuhin, Efrem Zimbalist, Vladimir Horowitz, George Szell, and Bruno Walter.

Musical Legacy

Busch was hailed in his lifetime as the greatest violinist of the German school, continuing the tradition established by Spohr and Joachim. He was influential on the musical world of the mid-twentieth century for his performances (as a soloist and as the first violinist of the Busch Quartet), for his teaching (among his students was Menuhin), and for his founding in 1950 of the Marlboro Music Festival in Vermont.

Busch concertized extensively, principally in Europe and America, and he recorded the major concerti, from those of Bach to Brahms, and a considerable number of string quartets and chamber music with the Busch Quartet and the Busch Chamber Players (which included his brother and son-in-law Serkin, among others).

During the height of his career, Busch was avidly sought as a soloist and chamber musician. His concert schedule was full, and his letters from the time reveal what he termed a "hectic lifestyle." His emphasis on clarity of form and structure, and his faithful adherence to the composer's intent were perhaps more in line with the styles of a generation later.

Jonathan A. Sturm

Further Reading

Busch, Adolf. Adolf Busch: Letters, Pictures, Memories. Edited by Irene Busch Serkin, translated into English by Russell Stockman. Walpole, N.H.: Arts and Letters Press, 1991. This two-volume set collects primary source material on Busch, including letters, pictures, drawings, and more, presenting a comprehensive portrait.

Potter, Tully. Adolf Busch: The Life of an Honest Man. Lancaster, England: Toccata Press, 1986. Subjective and narrative in tone, this brief book nevertheless contains valuable information, including repertoire lists, composition lists, and recording data.

See also: Horowitz, Vladimir; Menuhin, Sir Yehudi; Serkin, Rudolf; Toscanini, Arturo; Walter, Bruno.

Ferruccio Busoni

Italian classical composer and conductor

A virtuoso concert pianist who championed Johann Sebastian Bach, Busoni urged other composers to take up bold, new musical experiments. His own compositions owe much to his personal study of Bach's music and demand great technical prowess from performers.

Born: April 1, 1866; Empoli, Italy
Died: July 27, 1924; Berlin, Germany
Also known as: Dante Michelangelo Benvenuto Ferruccio Busoni (full name)

Principal works

ORCHESTRAL WORKS: Piano Concerto, Op. 39, 1904; Turandot Suite, Op. 41, 1905; Die Brautwahl, 1911; Sonatina seconda, 1912 (for piano); Turandot, 1917 (based on Carlo Gozzi's play); Arlecchino, 1917; Piano Sonatina No. 6, 1920 (Fantasia da camera super Carmen); Fantasia contrappuntistica, 1921 (for two pianos); Doktor Faust, 1923.

PIANO WORKS: An die Jugend, 1909; Fantasia nach J. S. Bach, 1909.

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Chorale Prelude "Nun freut euch liebe Christen," 1922 (by Johann Sebastian Bach); Ecossaisen, 1922 (by Ludwig van Beethoven); Étude, Op. 10, No. 5, 1922 (by Frédéric Chopin); Étude, Op. 25, No. 5, 1922 (by Chopin); Hungarian Rhapsody No. 13, 1922 (by Franz Liszt); Nocturne, Op. 15, No. 2, 1922 (by Chopin); Prelude and Fugue No. 1, 1922 (by Bach); Prelude, Op. 28, No. 7 and Étude, Op. 10, No. 5, 1922 (by Chopin).

The Life

Dante Michelangelo Benvenuto Ferruccio Busoni (fehr-REW-chyoh boo-SOH-nee) was born to musical parents: His father, Ferdinando, was a virtuoso clarinetist, and his mother, Anna Weiss, was a concert pianist. Busoni received his early musical education from his parents and was introduced to the music of Johann Sebastian Bach by his father. With the help of money from a wealthy patron, Busoni began studies at the Vienna Conservatory when he was nine years old. Unsatisfied with the curriculum, the family moved to Graz, Austria, where Busoni studied composition with Wilhelm Mayer. In 1886 Busoni moved to Leipzig, Germany, where he made a living through performing, teaching, and publishing transcriptions and original compositions. There he developed friendships with composers Edvard Grieg and Frederick Delius as well as the young Egon Petri, who would become one of Busoni's most famous piano students. Busoni also contributed to Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, an important musical journal.

In 1888, at the age of twenty-two, Busoni accepted a post as professor of piano at the conservatory in Helsinki, Finland. While in Finland, he cultivated a friendship with composer Jean Sibelius (only a few years his elder). Busoni entered the Anton Rubinstein Competition in St. Petersburg, Russia, taking first place for his Concert Piece for piano and orchestra. His success opened new professional opportunities, and in 1890 Busoni left Helsinki to accept a teaching post at the Moscow Imperial Conservatory. While in Moscow, he married Gerda Sjöstrand, the daughter of Swedish sculptor Carl Aeneas Sjöstrand. After only one year, Busoni left for the United States to teach piano and composition in the graduate department of the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston. While in Boston, their first son, Benvenuto ("Benni"), was born. Disappointed with the limitations and restrictions of his academic appointments, Busoni began to support his family primarily through his performing and compositional activity.

The family returned to Europe in 1894, taking up permanent residence in Berlin, Germany. A second son, Rafaello ("Lello"), was born in 1900. Busoni focused his beliefs on the future of music and artistic expression in the essay "Entwurf einer neuen Ästhetik der Tonkunst" (1907, revised in 1916; "Outline of a New Aesthetic of Music," 1911). The events of World War I drove the family to leave Berlin. They resided in the United States for a short time and eventually moved to Zurich, Switzerland. While in Zurich from 1915 to 1920, Busoni turned increasingly to operatic composition. His operas Arlecchino and Turandot both premiered to great critical success in 1917.

Busoni returned to Berlin in 1920. Increasingly ill, he gave his final public piano performance on May 29, 1922. He continued to teach a small number of composition students, including Kurt Weill. He spent his last years working on his opera Doktor Faust, leaving two scenes unfinished at the time of his death in 1924 from heart failure and kidney disease.

The Music

Busoni the Pianist. Technique came easily to Busoni, even in his youth; however, he despised the notion of technique as an end in itself. While he was a clear descendant of the Romantic piano tradition, Busoni's approach to playing was cerebral and analytical. He experimented boldly with the instrument, especially with the pedals, to achieve new effects in tone production.

Ferruccio Busoni. (Library of Congress)

Busoni had a prodigious memory and his repertoire was vast, but the music of Bach and Franz Liszt remained the cornerstone of his programming. The piano concerti of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart were also greatly admired by Busoni. He performed them frequently, with original cadenzas that reflected modern compositional trends rather than Mozartian conventions. Busoni also programmed the works of Frédéric Chopin, though his performances were criticized for being perfunctory and abstract. Busoni would often take liberties with the music of other composers, adding notes and recomposing in a manner unheard of today. While he performed his own compositions, he rarely performed modern works.

During his lifetime, Busoni made only a few recordings. He disliked the process greatly, given that the works often had to be distorted to fit time constraints. Of the recordings that were eventually released, only about a half hour's worth of music exists. These include performances of Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 13; a Bach prelude; an ecossaise by Beethoven; a handful of pieces by Chopin; and Busoni's own arrangement of a Bach chorale prelude.

Busoni the Philosopher. Busoni's musical and compositional contributions are augmented by his writings. He was a prolific letter writer and essayist, and his "Outline of a New Aesthetic of Music" reached a wide readership at its revised publication in 1916. In the essay Busoni advocated the attributes of absolute music over program music, arguing that the latter is often trivial and of little depth. He outlined his beliefs for music theater, condemning the trend of realism in favor of more psychological or spiritual representations. For Busoni, the artist should not be bound by laws and prescribed forms but rather should seek to cultivate new modes of expression. Near the end of the essay, he proposed exploring further subdivisions of the octave beyond its traditional twelve tones, a technique known as microtonalism. His criticisms of the German musical traditions created a backlash, most notably in the writings of Hans Pfitzner; at the same time, Busoni stirred up support, especially among the younger set of artists in Berlin.

Bach and Busoni. Busoni was introduced to the music of Bach at a young age; as an adult, he paved the way for the development of a pianistic approach to Bach's music, which was originally conceived for the harpsichord, clavichord, and organ.

Busoni's earliest transcription of Bach's works dates from the Leipzig years. After hearing a performance of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in D Major played at St. Thomas Church in Leipzig, Busoni quickly produced a piano transcription. Other transcriptions followed, including his now-famous piano transcriptions of the Chaconne for Violin in D Minor and ten of Bach's organ chorale preludes. He prepared a complete edition of Bach's two volumes of The Well-Tempered Clavier (vol. 1, 1894; vol. 2, 1916). These editions are heavily edited and annotated but reveal an insight into Busoni's understanding of this music as both a pianist and a composer. Busoni's editions are still in print and consulted frequently by students, teachers, and performers.

The study of Bach left an indelible imprint on Busoni's original compositions. His An die Jungend for piano features a movement in which Busoni combines themes from Bach's Prelude and Fugue in D Major in a contrapuntal tour de force. In the same year, Busoni wrote the haunting Fantasia nach J. S. Bach, dedicated to the memory of his deceased father. His most monumental work in the tradition of Bach is the Fantasia contrappuntistica, which takes its inspiration and material from Bach's The Art of Fugue, the German chorale All Glory Be to God on High, and Bach's own musical signature: the pitches B-flat, A, C, and B-natural (H, in German).

Late Operas. Busoni spent the last decade of his life composing opera. His one-act opera Arlecchino (with a libretto by the composer) is based on characters and situations from Italian commedia dell'arte. Busoni's work is dark and satirical, exploring themes of fidelity and human cruelty. Busoni's Turandot premiered in the same year as Arlecchino and in fact was considered a possible companion piece. For Turandot, Busoni constructed a libretto based on the play by Carlo Gozzi. (Giacomo Puccini used the same source material for his opera of the same name.) However, these music-theater pieces were only preludes to the major project of his last years, Doktor Faust. In fact most of Busoni's compositions written after 1918 were studies for a grand musical-theater piece that he had been planning since his teenage years. Conductor Antony Beaumont refers to twenty-three "satellite pieces" that provided Busoni with the musical material for Doktor Faust. The opera, which remained unfinished at the time of Busoni's death, has been completed in at least two versions: one by composer Philipp Jarnach (performed in Dresden, Germany, in 1925) and another by Beaumont (performed in Bologna, Italy, in 1985).

Musical Legacy

Busoni left little in terms of recorded performance. His pianistic legacy lives on largely through the playing and teaching of his students (Egon Petri the most influential among them) and his writings on the subject. Busoni invigorated a tradition of playing the keyboard music of Bach on the piano in public. He developed a technical and stylistic approach to the Bach repertoire (albeit one that runs counter to current trends of historically informed performance) and disseminated his interpretations through his editions and transcriptions. His formidable piano technique is legendary; he inspired generations of pianists to experiment boldly with sound (especially through the use of the instrument's pedals). Despite his vibrant presence in recital, Busoni promoted the music over the performer, abhorring the cult of the superstar virtuoso.

Busoni advanced some daring musical ideas in his writings, including the use of electronics and microtonalism. His ideas had direct influence on such composers as Edgard Varèse and members of the Italian Futurist movement, including Luigi Russolo.

Although Busoni's editions and transcriptions of Bach's works have been widely available since his death, his own works are complex and often difficult to perform. His piano concerto takes more than an hour and requires a men's chorus in addition to the orchestra and soloist. Nevertheless, his music, noted for its depth and richness, is drawing an ever-growing audience.

Joseph A. Bognar

Further Reading

Beaumont, Antony. Busoni the Composer. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1985. A chronological study of the life of the composer as seen through his musical works. Includes photographs, facsimiles, and a catalog of works.

Brendel, Alfred. "Busoni." In Musical Thoughts and Afterthoughts. Suffolk, England: Robson Books, 1998. Brendel reflects on the legacy and pianism of Busoni.

Busoni, Ferruccio. The Essence of Music and Other Papers. Translated by Rosamond Ley. New York: Dover, 1957. A collection of Busoni's short essays, letters, notes, and aphorisms.

_____. Letters to His Wife. Translated by Rosamond Ley. London: E. Arnold, 1938. A look at the personal life of Busoni, told through correspondence with his wife.

_____. Selected Letters. Translated and edited by Antony Beaumont. Boston: Faber & Faber, 1987. Letters give insight into Busoni and his music.

_____. "Sketch of a New Esthetic of Music." In Source Readings in Music History, edited by Oliver Strunk and Leo Treitler, translated by Robert P. Morgan. New York: W. W. Norton, 1998. Excerpts from Busoni's treatise in English translation, including Busoni's outline for the use of microtonal divisions of the octave.

Couling, Della. Ferruccio Busoni: "A Musical Ishmael." Lanham, Md.: Scarecrow Press, 2005. A detailed yet readable biographical account of Busoni's life, using letters and other source material.

Schonberg, Harold C. "Dr. Faust at the Keyboard." The Great Pianists: From Mozart to the Present. Rev. ed. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1987. The longtime music critic of The New York Times discusses Busoni's pianism and his small recorded output.

Sitsky, Larry. Busoni and the Piano. New York: Greenwood, 1986. Second-generation Busoni student gives comprehensive analysis of the piano works. Includes a discography and bibliography.

See also: Argerich, Martha; Feldman, Morton; Grainger, Percy Aldridge; Schnabel, Artur; Segovia, Andrés; Sibelius, Jean; Tiomkin, Dimitri; Watts, André; Weill, Kurt.

Paul Butterfield

American blues singer and harmonica player

Butterfield was a major figure in the emergence of white blues bands in the 1960's, bringing an overlooked, indigenous American music to a new audience.

Born: December 17, 1942; Chicago, Illinois
Died: May 4, 1987; Los Angeles, California
Member of: The Paul Butterfield Blues Band

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): Put It in Your Ear, 1976; North-South, 1981; The Legendary Paul Butterfield Rides Again, 1986.

ALBUMS (with Better Days): Better Days, 1973; It All Comes Back, 1973; Live at Winterland '73, 1999.

ALBUMS (with the Paul Butterfield Blues Band): The Paul Butterfield Blues Band, 1965; East-West, 1966; The Resurrection of Pigboy Crabshaw, 1967; In My Own Dream, 1968; Keep on Moving, 1969; Sometimes I Just Feel Like Smilin', 1971; The Original Lost Elektra Sessions, 1995; East-West Live, 1996; Strawberry Jam, 1996.

The Life

Paul Butterfield was born in Chicago, and he grew up in the affluent area of Hyde Park. His father was a successful lawyer, and his mother was a painter, and they encouraged their son's musical studies on the flute, which continued into high school. As a teenager, Butterfield starred on the high school track team, and it was also during this time that his older brother and a friend, Nick Gravenites (later a successful musician), pushed Butterfield to investigate the urban blues they heard on the radio. Chicago's South Side hosted such African American blues greats as Muddy Waters, Howlin' Wolf, and Marion "Little" Walter Jacobs.

Butterfield and Gravenites began frequenting the black-only blues clubs, and before long Butterfield assembled the Paul Butterfield Blues Band, which played for about five years. Butterfield continued to form other bands with different players until 1976, when he embarked on a solo career, releasing a few poorly received albums and working as a session player for other musicians. Butterfield developed peritonitis from heavy drinking, and he died in 1987 of a heroin overdose.

The Music

Once he saw Little Walter play an amplified harmonica, Butterfield became an avid fan of the instrument, and he quickly formed a band with Elvin Bishop, a guitarist from Oklahoma studying at the University of Chicago. They recruited two players from Muddy Waters's band—drummer Sam Lay and bassist Jerome Arnold—and by 1963 they had become the house band at Big John's, a folk music club. The group became so popular that it was the first electric band signed to the folk label Elektra Records.

The Paul Butterfield Blues Band. The group's eponymously titled first record, released in 1965, was a hard-edged sampler of urban blues that challenged the dominance of the British and American pop songs that saturated radio airwaves. The album opens with the band's signature song, "Born in Chicago," which Butterfield sings with his trademark raw intensity, while belting out powerful harp licks. The band featured two guitarists, Bishop and Michael Bernard Bloomfield, as well as keyboardist Mark Naftalin, a player recruited for these sessions who remained with the band for several years. The album is a heady mix of traditional blues songs—"Shake Your Money Maker," "Blues With a Feeling," "I Got My Mojo Working," "Mellow Down Easy," among others—and original compositions, such as the loose jam "Thank You Mr. Poobah," Bloomfield's guitar workout, "Screamin'," and "Our Love Is Drifting." The album immediately became popular with a predominantly rock audience, and the band was launched.

East-West. The following year, East-West, the band's second release, continued with traditional blues numbers, such as "Walkin' Blues" and "Never Say No," as well contemporary offerings, such as Allen Toussaint's "Get Out of My Life, Woman" and a reinterpreted Monkees' song, "Mary, Mary." The album also featured two lengthy instrumentals, "Work Song" and "East-West," a rock raga homage to Ravi Shankar.

Un-Banded. By the next year, half of the members of the band had left, including Bloomfield, and Butterfield reconfigured the band to include a horn section. In 1967 he released The Resurrection of Pigboy Crabshaw, an album featuring fewer traditional blues numbers and less of Butterfield's signature harp work. In My Own Dream, the band's fourth album, released in 1968, continued in a similar, though far less satisfying, vein. The last original members had left the band, and each successive release was inconsistent in quality. Keep on Moving and Sometimes I Just Feel Like Smilin' were disappointing, and in their wake Butterfield broke up the band.

In 1972 Butterfield had modest success with a new band, Better Days, releasing two records, Better Days and It All Comes Back, and he then pursued a solo career. Releases such as Put It in Your Ear, North-South, and The Legendary Paul Butterfield Rides Again were uneven or simply embarrassing. The harmonica was now largely absent as Butterfield ranged through rhythm and blues, jazzy arrangements, or synthesized music.

Rereleases. A decade later, The Original Lost Elektra Sessions, the first recordings of the original band, appeared from tapes once considered lost and inferior. The performances are not as polished as later studio offerings, but the power of the first band is clearly evident. Strawberry Jam, a collection of live performances, was released, along with East-West Live, a disk that provides a fascinating view of the evolution of that seminal song. Tapes of a stellar performance of the Better Days band, Live at Winterland '73, was issued in 1999, and they reveal how accomplished that collection of musicians was. An Anthology: The Elektra Years (1998) collects some of the best early material by Butterfield.

Paul Butterfield. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Musical Legacy

Though some rock journalists and historians dismiss Butterfield's contributions as merely derivative, that assessment is contradicted by his contemporaries, among them Bloomfield, Corky Siegel, Levon Helm, and Muddy Waters. Butterfield revered the blues, and he never corrupted the genre for commercial purposes.

His principal contribution was bringing the blues to a white rock-and-roll audience, paving the way for other white musicians to play and build upon the traditions of the blues masters. He was so successful that in 1965 his band was invited to play at the historic Newport Folk Festival, which had never before featured electric music. At that same festival, members of Butterfield's band backed up Bob Dylan when he switched from acoustic to electric music.

Butterfield's best albums reveal a musicologist's broad knowledge of sources and an impassioned playing. East-West is a tour-de-force, with its mixtures of styles and astounding virtuosity, and "East-West" is an audacious musical experiment, with its emulation of Eastern modalities and its pure inventiveness.

David W. Madden

Further Reading

Butterfield, Paul, and Happy Traum. Paul Butterfield Teaches Blues Harmonica Master Class: Sessions with a Legendary Player. Woodstock, N.Y.: Homespun Tapes, 1997. This book and accompanying compact disc offer detailed instructions on the playing of blues harmonica.

Ellis, Tom, III. "The Real World of Paul Butterfield." Blues Access 23 (Fall, 1995): 11-19; "The Glory Years: The Maturation of an Idea." Blues Access 25 (Spring, 1996): 22-35; "Building a New Tradition: Butterfield Gets the Blues Back in Touch with Jazz." Blues Access 27 (Fall, 1996): 28-40; "The Woodstock Years." Blues Access 29 (Spring, 1997): 20-36; "Paul Butterfield: The Final Years." Blues Access 31 (Fall, 1997): 13-25. A detailed and comprehensive assessment of Butterfield is contained in this series of articles from Blues Access magazine. Ellis traces Butterfield's career, with its high and low points.

Sebastian, John, and Paul Butterfield. Blues Harmonica. Woodstock, N.Y.: Homespun Tapes, 2005. Originally released as a collection of tapes, the book offers advice from two musicians on playing the harmonica, and it includes observations on the blues and the great musicians who have mastered this instrument.

Wolkin, Jan Mark, Bill Keenom, Michael Bloomfield. Michael Bloomfield—If You Love These Blues: An Oral History. San Francisco: Miller Freeman Books, 2000. In this memoir, Bloomfield reflects on his bandmates and his career. Butterfield figures prominently in reminiscences.

See also: Cotton, James; Dylan, Bob; Howlin' Wolf; Shankar, Ravi; Van Ronk, Dave; Waters, Muddy.

David Byrne

American rock guitarist, singer, and songwriter

As singer and principal songwriter for the Talking Heads, Byrne was an influential figure in the post-punk new wave movement of the late 1970's and early 1980's. His prodigious talent as a musical and visual artist made him an exciting and memorable front man.

Born: May 14, 1952; Dumbarton, Scotland
Member of: The Talking Heads

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): The Catherine Wheel, 1981; The Knee Plays, 1985; Rei Momo, 1989; The Forest, 1991; Uh-Oh, 1992; David Byrne, 1994; Feelings, 1997; In Spite of Wishing and Wanting, 1999; Look into the Eyeballs, 2001; Lead Us Not into Temptation, 2003; Grown Backwards, 2004.

ALBUMS (with Brian Eno): My Life in the Bush of Ghosts, 1981; Everything That Happens Will Happen Today, 2008.

ALBUMS (with the Talking Heads): Talking Heads: 77, 1977; More Songs About Buildings and Food, 1978; Fear of Music, 1979; Remain in Light, 1980; Speaking in Tongues, 1983; Little Creatures, 1985; Sounds from True Stories, 1986; True Stories, 1986; Naked, 1988.

SINGLES (with the Talking Heads): "Houses in Motion," 1981; "Re-Mixes," 1983; "Take Me to the River," 1983; "Once in a Lifetime," 1984; "And She Was," 1985; "Lady Don't Mind," 1985; "Road to Nowhere," 1985; "Blind," 1988; "Burning Down the House," 1989; "Lifetime Piling Up," 1992; "Love for Sale," 2006; "(Nothing but) Flowers," 2006.

The Life

Although born in Scotland, David Byrne (burn) grew up in North America. He spent most of his childhood in the suburbs of Hamilton, Ontario, and Baltimore, Maryland, and their innocuous middle-class landscapes later played a role in many of his songs. He was the son of a respected scientist, whose work brought the family across the Atlantic while Byrne was a toddler. However, Byrne's keen aesthetic sensibilities took him in a career direction quite different from his father's. After high school, Byrne was accepted at the prestigious Rhode Island School of Design (RISD) in 1970. He stayed at RISD for only a year, dismissing art schools as overpriced and unnecessary. While in art school, he met drummer Chris Franz and bassist Tina Weymouth, and their musical collaboration resulted in the formation of the Talking Heads, one of new wave's most vital and influential bands. After playing sporadically in Boston and New York, in 1975 the Talking Heads added guitarist-keyboardist Jerry Harrison (formerly of Jonathan Richman's band the Modern Lovers) and landed regular gigs at Hilly Kristal's music club CBGB. Because it was one of the few clubs at the time to feature such cutting-edge bands as the Ramones, Television, Blondie, and the Talking Heads, this small but important Manhattan venue came to be recognized as the birthplace of the fledgling punk, new wave scene of the mid- to late 1970's.

By 1979 Byrne and the Talking Heads were the undisputed darlings of the new wave scene, having chalked up two popular albums and an appearance as musical guests on NBC television's Saturday Night Live. As lead singer and principal lyricist, Byrne garnered considerable attention. His intense, frenetic stage persona made him a charismatic, exciting performer, and his astute but accessible lyrics delighted both mainstream fans and avant-garde purists. The Talking Heads' Remain in Light made several critics' Top 10 lists for 1980, and the album was widely heralded as a groundbreaking fusion of pop, disco, funk, and experimental music. Having penned most of the album's tracks, Byrne rapidly earned the attention of the worldwide rock press. Offers for Byrne to participate in a number of projects poured in.

By the early 1990's Byrne had toured the world as a rock performer, scored films and ballets, appeared in hit music videos and a full-length concert film, shown his paintings and mixed-media installations in gallery exhibitions, and published books. In 1991 the Talking Heads officially broke up. Even though the band's working relationship had been dysfunctional since the release of Naked in 1988, greater interest in side and solo projects on the part of Byrne and the other band members compelled them to go their separate ways.

Byrne was an ambitious and prolific artist, working in a staggering variety of genres. Beginning in 1981 he released several solo albums and collaborated on recordings with other musicians. He established a record label, Luaka Bop, in the early 1990's, focusing primarily on African and other world-music performers. He displayed numerous works, from drawings and paintings to photographs and furnishings, in prestigious art galleries. In the late 1990's he hosted the public television show Sessions at West 54th and later appeared in other television series, including The Simpsons and Inside the Actors Studio.

The Music

Byrne worked in several musical styles, running the gamut from the Talking Heads' jaunty early minimalism to the group's later lush, radio-friendly productions. As a solo artist, Byrne released projects that include experimental, African-influenced, and acoustic works. An open mind and a penchant for eclecticism typified his music, and his lyrics were characterized by plain phrasing and wide-eyed optimism.

Talking Heads: 77. Falling somewhere between punk and new wave, the Talking Heads' debut album features a fresh combination of stark instrumentation and quirky lyrics. The popular single "Psycho Killer" combines a brooding, infectious bass line with ponderous lyrics written from a serial murderer's point of view. Byrne delivers the song's vocal in a terse, nervy staccato that punctuates the song's message. In thematic terms, however, "Psycho Killer" is atypical of the album, which features several songs—particularly "Love Comes to Town" and "Don't Worry About the Government"—with brazenly enthusiastic, sometimes even kitschy lyrics. Byrne's distinctive vocal style, simultaneously shrill and sincere, gives these tracks the irony-laden, painfully self-conscious flavor that defines new wave.

Remain in Light. By 1980 the Talking Heads had abandoned the minimalism of its early albums for a more complex sound. Remain in Light is generally regarded as their artistic breakthrough, a work that masterfully combines African rhythms and dense, emotive musical landscapes with some of Byrne's most perceptive lyrics. The album features "Once in a Lifetime," which spawned a video that made the Talking Heads one of MTV's earliest stars. "Life During Wartime" and "This Must Be the Place," also thematic centerpieces of the album, show Byrne's depth as a lyricist and remain among the band's most respected recordings.

My Life in the Bush of Ghosts. In 1980 avant-garde musician Brian Eno produced Remain in Light, and that collaboration between Eno and Byrne spawned 1981's My Life in the Bush of Ghosts. Acclaimed for its distinctive sound, at turns dreamy and ominous and always unpredictable, the work is perhaps best known for its use of samples—digitally manipulated and reinterpreted fragments of other recordings—as a central part of its sound.

The Catherine Wheel. In the early 1980's Byrne expanded his musical scope to include scores, his first being for modernist choreographer Twyla Tharp's ballet The Catherine Wheel. Byrne wrote, produced, and performed the music for the ballet, which is considered one of the most important works of contemporary American dance.

Little Creatures. Little Creatures was markedly devoid of the dense, sample-laden funk soundscapes that had characterized the Talking Heads' previous albums. The clean, stripped-down songs—especially the Talking Heads' classics "Road to Nowhere" and "Stay Up Late"—brought Byrne's refreshingly innocent, joyous lyrics to the forefront in a way that had not been heard since the band's debut.

Naked. Although a critical and commercial success, Naked was the Talking Heads' last album. During the album's production, the band was rife with internal struggles, but the result was a remarkably cohesive album, in both sound and theme. Several songs, particularly Byrne's, lament the alienation caused by modern mechanization. Tracks such as "Blind" and "(Nothing but) Flowers" point out the intellectual and spiritual sterility to which unbridled technological development has given birth. Author Bret Easton Ellis used lyrics from "(Nothing but) Flowers" as the epigraph for his nihilistic novel American Psycho (1990).

Grown Backwards. Byrne's 2004 solo effort, released by the folk-jazz label Nonesuch Records, signaled another musical departure. Grown Backwards includes the heavy use of orchestral string arrangements as well as two operatic arias. Following the release of the album, Byrne toured North America and Australia with the renowned Tosca Strings, performing selections from the release.

Musical Legacy

One of the most recognizable faces from MTV, Byrne was also familiar to those who attend art galleries and theaters. For his contributions to the development of punk and new wave music, Byrne's status in musical history was secure. However, his contributions to the visual and theatrical arts distinguished Byrne as one of the most dynamic figures in contemporary popular culture. His many prestigious accolades included Grammy Awards for his recordings with the Talking Heads and a score of gold and platinum albums commemorating his commercial triumphs. Talking Heads was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 2002.

Gregory D. Horn

Further Reading

Bowman, David. This Must Be the Place: The Adventures of Talking Heads in the Twentieth Century. New York: HarperCollins, 2001. A biography of the band focuses on the internal conflicts that led to the group's breakup and highlights the aesthetic differences between Byrne and Weymouth. Includes black and white photographs, a bibliography, a discography, and a filmography.

Gans, David. Talking Heads: The Band and Their Music. London: Omnibus Press, 1986. Overview of the Talking Heads that explores their work at its artistic and commercial apex.

Howell, John. American Originals: David Byrne. Berkeley, Calif.: Publishers Group West, 1992. A biography of Byrne that covers his work with the Talking Heads and his significant endeavors outside the band. Includes an insightful discussion of Byrne's creative process in music and art. Also provides extensive insights into Byrne's artistic collaborations, particularly with choreographer Tharp and musicians Laurie Anderson, Robert Wilson, and Eno.

Olinsky, Frank, and Talking Heads. What the Songs Look Like. New York: Perennial Library, 1987. Through a pastiche of paintings, sculptures, photographs, and drawings, artists capture the visual essence of the Talking Heads' songs. Included are lyrics and biographies of the artists.

Reese, Krista. The Name of This Book Is Talking Heads. Saline, Mich.: Proteus Publishing, 1982. Unique insights into the band's formative years, with noteworthy comments from CBGB's owner Kristal, guitarist Adrian Belew, and singer Nona Hendryx.

See also: Eno, Brian; Glass, Philip; Puente, Tito; Smith, Mamie.

C

John Cage

American classical composer

Cage is a significant contributor to the avant-garde music of increasing openness and vitality in which chance and improvisation play a central role.

Born: September 5, 1912; Los Angeles, California
Died: August 12, 1992; New York, New York

Principal works

CHAMBER WORKS: First Construction (In Metal), 1939 (for six percussionists); Second Construction, 1940 (for four percussionists); Third Construction, 1941 (for four percussionists); Two, 1987 (for flute and piano).

EXPERIMENTAL WORKS: Imaginary Landscape No. 1, 1939 (for two variable-speed turntables, frequency records, muted piano, and cymbal); 4'33", 1952 (for any ensemble or number of players); Fontana Mix, 1958 (for four-channel tape); Variations I, 1958; Music for . . ., 1984 (any combination of one to seventeen instrumental parts).

KEYBOARD WORKS: Bacchanale, 1940 (for prepared piano); The Perilous Night, 1944 (for prepared piano); A Valentine out of Season, 1944 (for prepared piano); Music for Marcel Duchamp, 1947 (for prepared piano); Dream, 1948 (for piano); Experiences No. 1, 1948 (for two pianos); In a Landscape, 1948 (for piano or harp); Sonatas and Interludes, 1948 (for prepared piano); Suite for Toy Piano, 1948; Music of Changes, 1951 (for piano); Cheap Imitation, 1969.

ORCHESTRAL WORKS: Concerto, 1951 (for piano and chamber orchestra); Atlas Eclipticalis, 1961 (for orchestra; parts for eighty-six musicians).

VOCAL WORKS: The Wonderful Widow of Eighteen Springs, 1942 (for voice and closed piano); Aria, 1958 (for solo voice); Roaratorio: An Irish Circus on Finnegan's Wake, 1979 (for voice, tape, and combination of instrumental parts); Ryoanji, 1983-1985 (for voice, flute, oboe, trombone, contrabass, percussion, and chamber orchestra).

The Life

In 1930 John Cage left college to roam in Europe and to decide what course to take for his professional life. Settling on music, he returned to America and began serious study in composition. His studies led him to the experimental composer Henry Cowell and later to Arnold Schoenberg.

Cage prided himself on his wise choice of teachers. From Cowell, Cage learned to value unexpected sound sources and radical methods. From Schoenberg, Cage learned a systematic approach to composition. In 1937 Cage began working as an accompanist for dancers, and this led him to an appointment to the Cornish School of the Arts in Seattle, Washington, where he met choreographer Merce Cunningham. Working with Cunningham and other dancers, Cage produced a body of innovative work that used recurring patterns of durations as a central organizing principle. For one of his collaborations with Cunningham, he found the theater too small for his percussion ensemble to play his music. He solved his problem in a creative manner emblematic of his early career: He inserted foreign objects, such as nuts and bolts, into the strings of the piano, effectively transforming their pitch and timbre to simulate the instruments of his percussion ensemble. He returned often to this instrument, which he called the prepared piano.

Eventually, his work brought him to New York City, where he taught at the New School for Social Research. Cage's interest in Eastern philosophy (especially Zen Buddhism) and his contact with the Abstract Expressionist movement in the visual arts combined to lead him in a more radical direction, creating a series of works configured in part to erase the individual desires of the composer from the composition while functioning to "sober and quiet the mind, thus making it susceptible to divine influences." His music from this point forward embraced elements of chance in the creation and execution of the work.

John Cage. (AP/Wide World Photos)

During the 1950's he allied himself with piano virtuoso David Tudor; likeminded composers Morton Feldman, Christian Wolff, and Earle Brown; and minimalist La Monte Young to promote avant-garde music. In 1961 Cage's compositions started to be published by C. F. Peters Editions, granting his ideas worldwide reach. His book, Silence: Lectures and Writings, published that same year by Wesleyan University Press, became required reading for artists and intellectuals drawn to his ideas of open music based on principles of chance and improvisation. From 1961 onward, Cage was in such high demand for new compositions and speaking and teaching engagements that he was forced to turn down many offers.

His winsome public persona and unusual lecture practices made him a celebrity at universities. As a guest lecturer, he prepared in advance answers to questions often posed by audience members, and then, while on stage, he would roll dice to randomly select an answer, trusting that chance would lead to answers of greater use to the questioner. He also on occasion recorded himself giving lectures, and then he would play the recordings while he lectured. He added lengthy pauses so that there would be many moments when there was only one Cage speaking. The resulting theater of a man competing with his mechanically recorded self made a wonderful impact on audiences. Of course, some were offended by his unwillingness to conform to the conventions of public speaking. However, their displeasure added to the amusement of his delighted fans and made him popular on the lecture circuit.

In the last five years of his life, his productivity as a composer soared, and he produced forty-three works. When he died of a stroke in 1992, Cage was an internationally celebrated artist and thinker.

The Music

First Construction (In Metal). Using the idea of structuring a work around recurring patterns of durations, this piece for six percussionists typifies the composer's early output. In it, Cage enriches the timbral options available by introducing diverse objects not usually considered musical instruments (such as brake drums), utilizing instruments previously unused in classical composition (such as a Yavapai rattle), and addressing traditional percussion in new ways (such as a submerged gong drawn from water during the performance). This piece, like many he composed in the 1930's and 1940's, was meant for use in conjunction with dance.

Bacchanale. This was Cage's first work for his invention, the prepared piano. He later created more celebrated compositions for this instrument.

Sonatas and Interludes. This large-scale work constitutes his most ambitious solo work for prepared piano. In this musical meditation on seven permanent emotions described in Hindi aesthetics (erotic, heroic, odious, angry, mirthful, sorrowful, and wondrous), each emotion is treated in a distinct sonata. In keeping with the Hindi origins, these emotions tend toward stasis, which Cage presents in the diffuse interludes. The piece prompted Time magazine to declare Cage "America's most promising composer," and the success of the piece earned him the Guggenheim Prize. Nevertheless, this work marks the end of a phase—using a durational system, as he did in First Construction (In Metal)—in his compositional output. After this, Cage favored chance operations to determine the content of his compositions.

Music of Changes. Taking its name from the Chinese I Ching (or Book of Changes), an ancient book used for divining wisdom, this work for solo piano in four sections presents an early attempt to efface the composer's desires from the composition. Creating a matrix of possible events that constantly changes and consulting a Chinese system of random number generation rooted in the use of the I Ching, Cage used chance to determine the specific events of this work. The result is not a true effacement, since the matrixes exemplify a musical style drawn from Cage's desires. Nevertheless, the work did initiate his lengthy search for methods that might detach his compositions from his musical desires, with the purpose of creating pieces of "sound come into its own."

4′33″. This work calls for the performer or performers to make no sounds for the titular duration of the piece. First presented at a concert featuring David Tudor in Woodstock, New York, it became one of Cage's most celebrated pieces. This so-called silent piece is not completely silent; it comprises all the accidental and ambient sounds in the performance room, including the respiration of the audience members. Cage's ambitious effort to rethink the act of composition is often misunderstood, and the piece sparked challenges to his credentials as a composer.

Variations I. Cage composed several works over several decades titled Variations, and these pieces constitute some of his most radical compositions. These scores contain no specific instructions to performers on what pitches or rhythms to execute. Instead, Cage regulates the duration of the work, and he guides performers in choosing how dense the materials might be. These materials can be made up of anything the performers may select. The only limitation Cage composed into his score is the density of material, not the material itself.

Cheap Imitation. This work comprises fragments of Erik Satie's work Socrate. For it, Cage uses chance to reorganize Satie's ambling harmonic and melodic work into a less goal-oriented composition. Despite its self-deprecating title, it was an act of sincere homage for a composer who inspired Cage for his quiet and simple audacity.

Two. Like many works from Cage's later life, this finds small amounts of material isolated in pools of silence. This work calls for flute and piano, and it allows for careful, studious listening to modest quantities of sound.

Musical Legacy

Cage's influence continues in the innumerable performances his compositions receive worldwide each year. Diverse composers have creatively explored the ideas presented by the avant-garde composer, and the members of the alternative rock bands Sonic Youth and Radiohead acknowledge Cage's influence. Performance artists, such as Brenda Hutchinson and Scot Jenerik, draw from Cage's innovations. While his impact outside of music history may be little felt in the music academies, Cage and his techniques are studied for their practical applications to aesthetic theories in dance and fine art.

Michael Lee

Further Reading

Cage, John. Empty Words. Middletown, Conn.: Wesleyan University Press, 1979. In this volume of lectures and essays covering the bulk of the 1970's, Cage reveals his evolving musical sensibility, and he shares insights into his methods and aims.

_____. Silence: Lectures and Writings. Middletown, Conn.: Wesleyan University Press, 1961. Cage's collection of essays and anecdotes is full of humor and insight into the avant-garde art and music of the 1960's.

Duckworth, William. Talking Music. New York: Da Capo Press, 1999. Among the excellent interviews with experimental composers is one with Cage, which forms a thorough introduction to his art and ideas. Cage comments on the seeming contradiction of continuing to compose in the wake of 4′33″.

Kostelanetz, Richard. Conversing with Cage. New York: Kindle Editions, 2007. Kostelanetz takes snippets from dozens of Cage's interviews to construct a book-length insight into the composer.

Nyman, Michael. Experimental Music: Cage and Beyond. New York: Da Capo Press, 1999. This important volume identifies Cage as the catalyst for an international movement in music toward greater experimentation. The author, an important composer, provides a penetrating first attempt at writing the history of a movement as it is unfolding. The book is especially remarkable in linking Cage with the minimalist movement.

Pritchett, James. The Music of John Cage. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press, 1993. This exemplary scholarly work is a comprehensive effort to take stock of Cage's career. Cage's important works are discussed in vivid terms that will enlighten both professional musicologists and the curious.

See also: Adams, John; Berio, Luciano; Boulez, Pierre; Cowell, Henry; Crumb, George; Eno, Brian; Feldman, Morton; Janáček, Leoš; Lucier, Alvin; Lutosławski, Witold; Satie, Erik; Schaeffer, Pierre; Schoenberg, Arnold; Seeger, Ruth Crawford; Stockhausen, Karlheinz; Takemitsu, Tōru; Tan Dun; Varèse, Edgard; Zappa, Frank.

Sammy Cahn

American musical-theater lyricist

Cahn had a considerable impact on films, since many of his songs, by becoming popular hits, helped increase the box office.

Born: June 18, 1913; New York, New York
Died: January 15, 1993; Los Angeles, California
Also known as: Samuel Cohen (birth name)

Principal works

MUSICAL THEATER: High Button Shoes, 1947 (music and lyrics with Jule Styne); Skyscraper, 1965 (lyrics; music by Jimmy Van Heusen); Walking Happy, 1966 (lyrics; music by Van Heusen; Thoroughly Modern Millie, 1967 (lyrics; music by Van Heusen); Look to the Lilies, 1970 (lyrics; music by Styne).

SONGS (lyrics; music by Nicholas Brodszky): "Be My Love," 1950; "Wonder Why," 1951; "Because You're Mine," 1952.

SONGS (lyrics; music by Saul Chaplin): "Shake Your Head from Side to Side," 1933; "Rhythm Is Our Business," 1935; "Shoe Shine Boy," 1936; "Until the Real Thing Comes Along," 1936; "Bei mir bist du schoen," 1937; "If You Ever Should Leave," 1937; "Please Be Kind," 1938.

SONG (lyrics; music by Gene de Paul): "Teach Me Tonight," 1953.

SONGS (lyrics; music by Axel Stordahl and Paul Weston): "I Should Care," 1945; "Day by Day," 1946.

SONGS (lyrics; music by Jule Styne): "I've Heard That Song Before," 1942; "Victory Polka," 1943; "I'll Walk Alone," 1944; "Let It Snow, Let It Snow, Let It Snow," 1945; "Five Minutes More," 1946; "The Things We Did Last Summer," 1946; "Time After Time," 1947; "It's Magic," 1948; "Saturday Night Is the Loneliest Night of the Week," 1952; "Three Coins in the Fountain," 1954.

SONGS (lyrics; music by Jimmy Van Heusen): "Love and Marriage," 1955; "The Tender Trap," 1955; "All the Way," 1957; "Come Fly with Me," 1957; "High Hopes," 1959; "The Second Time Around," 1960; "Call Me Irresponsible," 1963; "My Kind of Town," 1964.

WRITINGS OF INTEREST: I Should Care: The Sammy Cahn Story, 1974 (autobiography).

The Life

Sammy Cahn, born Samuel Cohen, the only son of Abraham and Elka Riss Cohen, had four sisters. His parents were Jews from Galicia, Poland, who had emigrated about 1905. Cahn was not a good student, and he claimed to hold the truancy record at P.S. 147. He frequented pool rooms, attended the Windsor motion picture theater, and saw many vaudeville performers, including future pal Milton Berle, at Loew's Delancey. When he was eighteen, he got his first job at the United Dressed Beef Corporation, although he was also a violinist with the Pals of Harmony, a Dixieland group. After writing songs for two-reel shorts for Warner Bros.' Vitaphone Corporation, they were sent to Hollywood in 1940, eventually getting jobs with Republic Pictures.

Sammy Cahn. (AP/Wide World Photos)

In California, Cahn became close friends with Frank Sinatra, at whose house he met his future wife, Gloria Delson. They married September 5, 1945, and they had two children: Steven, born in 1947, and Laurie, born two years later. After eighteen years of marriage, the couple, who had been drifting apart and who had separated for a time, divorced in 1964.

Shortly before the divorce, Cahn was operated on for his ulcers, which had troubled him since he was thirteen. Although he barely survived the operation, he continued to write songs for the Broadway stage and for films. On August 2, 1970, he married Tita Basile Curtis, to whom he had proposed after a visit with Nancy Sinatra, who had served as matchmaker for his first marriage.

In 1974 Cahn appeared in Words and Music, a show featuring his songs, and he toured with the show for many years. That year his autobiography was published. In his later years he served as a goodwill ambassador for the perfume house Fabergé. Cahn died of congestive heart failure in 1993.

The Music

Cahn's musical career began in 1927, when he played the violin for the Pals of Harmony. He wrote his first song, "Shake Your Head from Side to Side," and with pianist Saul Chaplin he began writing specialty songs for vaudeville acts. The pair changed the name Pals of Harmony to Cahn and Chaplin, and they played the summer season in the Catskills, a Jewish resort area in New York. Cahn progressed to writing songs for such big band singers as Ella Fitzgerald in the 1930's, including her big hit "If You Should Ever Leave." When in 1937 he translated the Yiddish lyrics of the song "Bei mir bist du schoen" into English, he had a small success.

Music for Film. While working for Vitaphone Studios in the late 1930's, Cahn and Chaplin wrote "Please Be Kind" for one of the studio's short subjects; the song was the first of its kind to make the hit parade. After a futile trip to Warner Bros. studios in Hollywood, they returned to New York. Nevertheless, they went back to California and got jobs with Republic Pictures, writing the story, the screenplay, and the score for Rookies on Parade (1941). After Cahn and Chaplin split up in 1941, he joined Jule Styne, in what turned out to be a successful and longtime collaboration. Their song "Three Coins in the Fountain" won an Academy Award in 1954. "I'll Walk Alone," another of their hits, sold one million copies as sheet music. He and Styne went on to write many songs for Columbia Pictures, headed by Harry Cohn. Some of the more memorable Cahn-Styne songs were "I've Heard That Song Before" and "I'll Walk Alone," both of which were nominated for Academy Awards, and "Five Minutes More," "Saturday Night Is the Loneliest Night of the Week," and "Time After Time."

Meeting Sinatra. Cahn's meeting with Sinatra resulted in another fruitful collaboration, this one with Jimmy Van Heusen in the 1940's. The pair won three Academy Awards: for "All the Way" in The Joker Is Wild (1957) and "High Hopes" in A Hole in the Head (1959), both of which were sung by Sinatra, and for "Call Me Irresponsible" in Papa's Delicate Condition (1963). They also wrote "Love and Marriage" and "Come Fly with Me." Cahn's collaboration with Nicholas Brodszky also produced memorable tunes, including "Be My Love" and "Because You're Mine." In addition to his film work, he wrote the popular "Love and Marriage" for the television production of Our Town (1938); "Love and Marriage" became the theme song for the television series Married with Children, a satiric look at marriage and family life.

Music for the Stage. Cahn also wrote for the stage, beginning with High Button Shoes (with Styne), and, twenty years later, Skyscraper and Walking Happy (both with Van Heusen). Look to the Lilies was a collaboration with Styne in 1970. Those experiences may have encouraged Cahn to produce and act in his Words and Music, in which he sang his own songs. He toured with that show until a few years before his death.

Musical Legacy

During his career, Cahn was nominated for thirty-one Academy Awards and five Golden Globe awards. His songs, regardless of his collaborator, were upbeat and romantic, featuring optimism and high hopes. (In fact, he established the High Hopes Fund at the Joslin Diabetes Center in Boston.)

Thomas L. Erskine

Further Reading

Cahn, Sammy. I Should Care: The Sammy Cahn Story. New York: Arbor House, 1974. Breezy account of Cahn's relationships with collaborators, film stars, and friends. Includes the stories behind the writing of the songs, the lyrics of the most popular songs, a "songography," and recipes for matzot brei and Hawaiian chicken barbecue.

_____. The New Sammy Cahn Songbook. New York: Cherry Lane Music, 2003. Music for ninety-nine of Cahn's compositions. Includes an introduction that quotes Sinatra as saying, "Sammy's words fit my mouth the best of all the writers."

_____. Sammy Cahn's Rhyming Dictionary. New York: Cherry Lane Music, 2002. Cahn arranged fifty thousand words phonetically, not alphabetically, because he was interested in the sound of the words, not their spellings. Includes thirty-two-page introduction by Cahn, who relates stories about his songs and their contexts.

Ewen, David. American Songwriters: An H. G. Wilson Biographical Dictionary. New York: H. G. Wilson, 1987. Entry for Cahn focuses on his songs written for film.

Taylor, Theodore. Jule: The Story of Composer Jule Styne. New York: Random House, 1979. Recounts stories about the Styne-Cahn collaboration, from the beginning to their eventual breakup.

See also: Burke, Johnny; Ronstadt, Linda; Sinatra, Frank; Styne, Jule; Van Heusen, Jimmy; Webb, Jimmy.

Maria Callas

American opera singer

Opera diva Callas revived the classical bel canto repertoire with her dramatic, versatile, and lyrical singing. Her powerful performances and recordings of the whole range of repertoire captivated audiences and transformed opera.

Born: December 2, 1923; New York, New York
Died: September 16, 1977; Paris, France
Also known as: Maria Cecilia Sophia Anna Kalogeropoulos (birth name)

Principal works

OPERATIC ROLES: Santuzza in Pietro Mascagni's Cavalleria rusticana, 1939; Beatrice in Franz von Suppé's Boccaccio, 1940; Tosca in Giacomo Puccini's Tosca, 1942; La Gioconda in Amilcare Ponchielli's La Gioconda, 1947; Norma in Bellini's Norma, 1948; Brünnhilde in Richard Wagner's Die Walküre, 1949; Elvira in Vincenzo Bellini's I puritani, 1949; Turandot in Puccini's Turandot, 1949; Eurydice/Genio in Joseph Haydn's L'anima del filosofo, 1951; Lucia in Gaetano Donizetti's Lucia di Lammermoor, 1952; Anna in Donizetti's Anna Bolena, 1957; Aida in Giuseppe Verdi's Aida, 1959.

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Verdi: Nabucco, 1949; Verdi: Il Trovatore, 1950; Verdi: Aida, 1951; Bellini: Norma, 1952; Verdi: Macbeth, 1952; Bellini: I Puritani, 1953; Cherubini: Medea, 1953; Mascagni: Cavalleria

Rusticana, 1953; Puccini: Tosca, 1953; Leoncavallo: Pagliacci, 1954; Spontini: La Vestale, 1954; Bellini: Norma, 1955; Donizetti: Lucia di Lammermoor, 1955; Verdi: La Traviata, 1955; Verdi: Rigoletto, 1955; Puccini: La Bohème, 1956; Verdi: Un Ballo in Maschera, 1956; Verdi: Il Trovatore, 1956; Bellini: La Sonnambula, 1957; Donizetti: Anna Bolena, 1957; Rossini: Barber of Seville, 1957; Verdi: Un Ballo in Maschera, 1957; Mad Scenes and Bel Canto Arias, 1958; Verdi: La Traviata, 1958; Ponchielli: La Gioconda, 1959; Bizet: Carmen, 1964; Puccini: Tosca, 1964.

The Life

Maria Cecilia Sophia Anna Kalogeropoulos (kah-lah-geh-ROH-pew-lohs) was born to George and Evangelia Kalogeropoulos, who had emigrated from Greece to New York in 1923. She had an older sister Jackie and a brother Vassilis, who died in 1922. Her father was a pharmacist, and he changed the family name to Callas (KA-las) for easier pronunciation. Callas's mother recognized her daughter as a child prodigy and encouraged her talent. By the age of five Callas was singing arias along with recordings of famous operas. In 1932 Callas began piano lessons, and by the age of eleven she was entering children's talent contests and singing on radio programs.

Faced with financial difficulties and a deteriorating marriage, Callas's parents separated in 1937, and Callas moved back to Greece with her mother and sister. In 1938 Callas entered the National Conservatory in Athens, where she studied with Maria Trivella. On April 11, 1938, she performed with fellow students in her first public recital, a duet from Giacomo Puccini's Tosca. On April 2, 1939, Callas made her stage debut as Santuzza in a student production of Pietro Mascagni's Cavalleria rusticana at the Olympia Theatre.

The following fall Callas enrolled at the Athens Conservatory, where she studied with Elvira de Hidalgo, the famous Spanish coloratura soprano. Later, Callas would acknowledge de Hidalgo's great influence on her artistic development. In 1940 Callas made her professional operatic debut, appearing as Beatrice in Franz von Suppé's Boccaccio at the National Lyric Theater. During World War II, she continued to perform in small opera productions.

After the war, she returned to New York but found no desirable major roles. Finally, in 1947, she made her Italian debut singing Amilcare Ponchielli's La Gioconda at the Arena in Verona. She met Giovanni Battista Meneghini, a wealthy businessman thirty years her senior. He became her agent and patron. They married in 1949 and separated in 1959.

A celebrated diva during the 1950's, she performed in the world's major opera houses. Callas revived the nineteenth century bel canto repertoire, including works by Gioacchino Rossini, Vincenzo Bellini, and Gaetano Donizetti. She often gave fifty performances a year, but by 1959 she was experiencing vocal problems, and she retired from singing after 1965. She acted in an unsuccessful film adaptation of Medea in 1969.

In 1957 Callas met Greek shipping magnate Aristotle Onassis, and their love affair received much publicity. In 1968 Onassis abruptly ended their relationship to marry president John F. Kennedy's widow Jacqueline Kennedy. Callas died at the age of fifty-three in Paris in 1977.

The Music

Callas was perceived to have three voices, with her exceptionally broad range just short of three octaves, from F-sharp below middle C to E-natural above high C. Although she could perform trills in every register, the high register was sometimes undependable and shrilly. The middle voice could be velvety and beautifully haunting. The lower voice could sound either rich or edgy.

Her teacher de Hidalgo had encouraged her to concentrate on light bel canto roles to strengthen the three registers and to take advantage of her voice's flexibility. Unlike most other sopranos, Callas maximized every gesture, facial expression, and movement onstage. She overcame vocal limitations by using subtle tonal accents, shadings, and inflections to make every word and phrase meaningful and dramatic.

Stardom. During her Italian debut in Verona in 1947, conductor Tullio Serafin was impressed with Callas's talent. He became her mentor and arranged for her to sing Isolde in Richard Wagner's Tristan und Isolde and Turandot in Puccini's Turandot.

The turning point in Callas's career occurred in 1949 in Venice. She had just sung Brünnhilde in Wagner's Die Walküre, and Serafin insisted she replace the ailing Margherita Carosio in the florid bel canto role of Elvira in Bellini's I puritani. Such versatility in one person was unheard of, and Callas's reputation soared. In 1950 Callas sang Giuseppe Verdi's Aida in her debut at La Scala in Milan, which during the next decade became the scene of some of her greatest performances in a wide range of roles. She also would restore bel canto operas to the standard opera repertoire.

Bel Canto. Bel canto (beautiful singing) originated in Italy in the late seventeenth century and reached its peak during the first half of the nineteenth century with the operas of Donizetti, Bellini, and Rossini. Characteristics of these operas included rich melodies and florid ornamentation or embellishment, with fast cadenzas and scales. They also featured legato or smoothly connected notes in sustained passages, a continuity of tone and lyric timbre, and a light upper register. Emphasis was on technique rather than volume.

Maria Callas. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Lucia di Lammermoor. Donizetti's masterpiece, this opera premiered in 1835 and is full of beautiful melodies for solo and ensemble. In the plot Lucia secretly loves Edgardo, whose Ravenswood family is feuding with Lucia's Lammermoor family, but Lucia's brother tricks her into marrying Arturo. The third act contains the famous "mad scene," in which a crazed Lucia, who has just murdered her new husband, appears with a bloody knife. Lucia's long and demanding coloratura aria "Il dolce suono" (the sweet sound), with its high notes and unique interplay of flute and voice, perfectly showcased Callas's technical and dramatic abilities. She first appeared in Lucia di Lammermoor in 1952 in Italy, and this would become one of her most frequently performed roles. Lucia di Lammermoor was also her first commercial recording for EMI in 1953. Callas sang Lucia di Lammermoor in her Berlin debut in 1955 and her Vienna debut in 1956.

Anna Bolena. Callas also revived another Donizetti opera, Anna Bolena, which was the composer's first success when it premiered in Milan in 1830. It is based on the story of King Henry VIII and his second wife, Anne Boleyn, and the final scene with Boleyn in the Tower of London awaiting execution features a beautiful soprano aria, "Al dolce guidami castel natio," a plea to be led to the dear castle where she was born. Callas's successful productions of Anna Bolena in 1957 and 1958 made this opera popular again.

Norma. Vincenzo Bellini's Norma was Callas's signature role, one she sang more often than any other. She first performed it in Florence in 1948, at her London debut in 1952, her American debut in Chicago in 1954, and her New York Metropolitan Opera debut in 1956. Her final performance in Norma was in 1965.

First produced in 1831, Norma takes place in Gaul in 50 B.C.E. during the Roman occupation. The heroine is a Druid priestess who has broken her vow of chastity for the Roman pro-consul Pollione. The role of Norma is extremely challenging, requiring a coloratura soprano with a dramatic, flexible, and intense voice. "Casta diva" was one of Callas's best arias.

Tosca. As the complex beauty Floria Tosca in Tosca, Callas was ideal—powerful and impassioned but also tender and vulnerable. She performed this role more than fifty times between 1942 and 1965, often to standing ovations. In one of opera's great dramatic scenes, Tosca stabs the sinister Scarpia, chief of police, who had imprisoned Tosca's lover and wanted to seduce her in exchange for her lover's life. Callas's renditions of the aria "Vissi d'arte" (music and love) delighted audiences.

Medea. Callas's intense performances in Luigi Cherubini's Medea were considered haunting and thrilling. In Greek mythology, Medea was the enraged wife who killed her own children when her husband Jason abandoned her for another woman.

Later Years. In the 1960's, as Callas experienced increasing vocal problems, she gradually withdrew from the stage. Her final operatic performance was as Tosca at Covent Garden on July 5, 1965. In 1971-1972 Callas gave twenty-three master classes at the Juilliard School of Music in New York. She then reunited with the famous tenor Giuseppe di Stefano, with whom she had performed and recorded frequently. In 1973 they began an international recital tour to raise money for his daughter's medical treatments. Panned by the critics, they ended their tour with a final concert in Sapporo, Japan, on November 11, 1974. This was Callas's last public performance. During her career, Callas recorded more than twenty complete operas and performed more than forty different roles.

Musical Legacy

Callas had a profound influence on opera and subsequent generations of singers. She revitalized opera by making it exciting theater as well as music. She was a passionate actress and vocal artist who mesmerized audiences with her intense dramatic character portrayals.

She also revived the bel canto operas through her musicianship and compelling performances of this neglected repertoire, creating a new generation of bel canto opera stars, including Joan Sutherland, June Anderson, Beverly Sills, and Marilyn Horne.

Callas's master classes at Juilliard provided future generations of vocalists and teachers with her personal insights and lessons on technique and expression. John Ardoin transcribed tapes of the classses and published them as a book to help pass along this valuable musical tradition. These classes also inspired Terrence McNally's historical drama, Master Class, in 1995. Off the stage, the Callas persona and her newsworthy personal life also changed the world of opera. She was a classical music superstar, much like popular rock or film stars whose lives are always in the limelight.

Fascination with Callas persisted after her death. Biographies, journal articles, international fan clubs, Web sites, and other tributes continued the Callas legend. In 2007 pop singer Celine Dion dedicated to Callas the song "La Diva" on Dion's French album D'elle.

Alice Myers

Further Reading

Ardoin, John. Callas at Juilliard: The Master Classes. Portland, Oreg.: Amadeus Press, 2003. From 1971 to 1972, Callas taught twenty-three two-hour opera master classes at Juilliard. The author, a preeminent Callas scholar, has transcribed and arranged the tapes of the classes into a valuable volume, including Callas's suggestions for the expressive use of cadenzas, word accents, consonants, and ornaments. Illustrated.

_____. The Callas Legacy: The Complete Guide to Her Recordings on Compact Disc. Milwaukee, Wis.: Hal Leonard Corporation, 2003. Thorough guide to all Callas compact disc recordings, with detailed commentary on each recording. Illustrated, with bibliography and index.

Edwards, Anne. Maria Callas: An Intimate Portrait. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2001. Well-researched and revealing portrait that provides insight into Callas's personal and professional life, including her relationships, her "mystery child" with Aristotle Onassis, her rise to fame, and the circumstances surrounding her death. Illustrated, with bibliography and index.

Huffington, Arianna Stassinopoulos. Maria Callas: The Woman Behind the Legend. New York: Cooper Square Press, 2002. Comprehensive biography, based on extensive interviews and research. Illustrated, with bibliography and index.

Levine, Robert. Maria Callas: A Musical Biography. New York: Black Dog & Leventhal, 2003. Artistic biography focusing on Callas's voice, musical development, and performances. The accompanying compact discs and expert commentary feature Callas's major performances. Illustrated, with rare photographs. Includes discography, videography, index, and two sound discs.

Petsalis-Diomidis, Nicholas. The Unknown Callas: The Greek Years. Portland, Oreg.: Amadeus Press, 2001. An intimate portrait covering the crucial formative years from 1937 to 1945. Based on Athenian archives and more than two hundred interviews, this book won Greece's National Biography Award in 1999. Extensive bibliography, notes, and index.

Stancioff, Nadia. Maria Callas Remembered: An Intimate Portrait of the Private Callas. Boulder, Colo.: De Capo Press, 2000. Intimate account of the private Callas by a close friend, who knew Callas from 1969 until her death. Based on the author's own memories and interviews with Callas's sister Jackie, friends, and colleagues. Illustrated.

See also: Barber, Samuel; Sills, Beverly; Sutherland, Dame Joan; Tebaldi, Renata.

Glen Campbell

American country singer and guitarist

A respected session player for artists from Elvis Presley to the Beach Boys, Campbell became a country singer that crossed over successfully to a pop career.

Born: April 22, 1936; Billstown, Arkansas
Also known as: Glen Travis Campbell (full name)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: The Astounding Twelve-String Guitar of Glen Campbell, 1964; By the Time I Get to Phoenix, 1967; Gentle on My Mind, 1967; Oh Happy Day, 1968; Wichita Lineman, 1968; Galveston, 1969; Bobbie Gentry and Glen Campbell, 1970; Try a Little Kindness, 1970; The Last Time I Saw Her, 1971; Glen Campbell, 1973; I Knew Jesus (Before He Was a Star), 1973; Houston (I'm Comin' to See You), 1974; Reunion: The Songs of Jimmy Webb, 1974; Arkansas, 1975; Rhinestone Cowboy, 1975; Bloodline, 1976; Southern Nights, 1977; It's Just a Matter of Time, 1986; Still Within the Sound of My Voice, 1988; Meet Glen Campbell, 2008.

The Life

Glen Travis Campbell was born to Wes and Carrie Campbell, one of twelve children in a family of poor farmers. Taught to play a five-dollar Sears and Roebuck guitar by his uncle Boo, Campbell quickly became well known among local musicians by the time he was eight years old. Remarkably proficient with the twelve- and six-string guitar, Campbell became adept at playing everything from jazz standards to country and pop tunes. Never a dedicated student, Campbell dropped out of school at the age of fourteen to tour with two of his uncles and their band of musicians. In 1955, at the age of nineteen, he married Diane Kirk. The marriage, which lasted four years, produced a daughter, Debra Kay, from whom Campbell remained estranged until the 1980's.

Campbell eventually outgrew playing with his uncles on the circuit of proms, weddings, dance halls, and local radio shows, and he moved to California in the late 1950's. He met and married Billie Jean Nunley, with whom he had another daughter, Kelli Glen, and a son, William Travis. Campbell's solo recording career took off in the late 1960's, but it was his 1968-1972 television variety show, The Glen Campbell Goodtime Hour, that made him an international star. Campbell's television success led to a brief stint in Hollywood, where he costarred with John Wayne in the Western True Grit (1970). Success had a downside, however, as drugs and alcohol contributed to the end of Campbell's marriage to Nunley as well as to a much-publicized affair with and a brief marriage to Sarah Davis, wife of country-pop star Mac Davis, in 1975. In the late 1970's, Campbell and rising teen country singer Tanya Tucker began a tumultuous affair. In 1982 Campbell married Kim Woolen, who helped lead him to sobriety and stability, though he suffered a relapse in 2004 when he was arrested for drunk driving and sentenced to ten days in jail. Nonetheless, the marriage to Woolen survived this episode. Campbell performs regularly at the Glen Campbell Goodtime Theatre in Branson, Missouri.

The Music

In 1960 Campbell joined Dash Croft and Jimmy Seals in the revamped pop band the Champs, which had already hit a peak with the Top 40 instrumental single "Tequila." A year later, Campbell became a staff writer for American Music, and he cowrote, with Jerry Capehart, "Turn Around, Look at Me." Campbell recorded and released this song as his first solo effort on Capehart's Crest label, but it would be a new vocal group, the Vogues, fashioned after the Lettermen, who turned the song into a smash hit seven years later.

Session Work. While he continued to write songs and to play in a variety of bands, Campbell supplemented his income by becoming an in-demand session guitarist and vocalist. He played guitar and occasionally bass, and he supplied background vocals on hundreds of studio recording sessions for some of the most important pop stars of the 1950's and 1960's, including Jan and Dean, the Crystals, Ricky Nelson, Bobby Darin, Wayne Newton, the Kingston Trio, Elvis Presley, Dean Martin, Nat King Cole, Jack Jones, and Frank Sinatra.

Campbell's most famous early association, however, was with the Beach Boys. Having already played and sung on several Beach Boys recordings, Campbell was asked to fill in for Brian Wilson in 1964 when the increasingly reclusive pop songwriter refused to tour with the group. In 1965 the group asked Campbell to become a permanent member but he declined. He was ready to devote all his energy to his fledgling solo career.

Glen Campbell. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Songs by Webb. After releasing several unsuccessful singles in the mid-1960's Campbell was immensely successful with a release of John Hartford's folk song "Gentle on My Mind," though his most successful partnership would be with pop songwriter Jimmy Webb. His recordings of two classics by Webb—"By the Time I Get to Phoenix" (1967) and "Wichita Lineman" (1968)—sealed the connection between the two in the public mind. Both songs dominated the pop, country, and easy-listening charts. Webb's unique blend of down-home lyricism, urbane melodies, and slightly psychedelic arrangements (such as the organ flourishes at the end of "Wichita Lineman") satisfied the upscale ambitions of Campbell's traditional country audience while attracting new recruits from both the pop and rock audiences.

In 1969 Campbell hit it big again with two more Webb songs, "Galveston" and "Where's the Playground, Susie?" In 1970 he recorded Webb's "Honey Come Back," a song that had only moderate success on the country charts. Campbell, who once called Webb the "best songwriter ever born in America," would eventually record more than thirty Webb songs. Although Campbell's recording career faded as he entered the 1980's, he still achieved Top 10 country radio hits as late as 1987 with "The Hand That Rocks the Cradle" and Webb's "Still Within the Sound of My Voice."

Rhinestone Cowboy. Campbell's biggest-selling single (and only number-one hit) is 1976's "Rhinestone Cowboy." This song, and the follow-up hit, "Country Boy (You've Got Your Feet in L.A.)," seemed to be based on Campbell's image as a pop singer who had abandoned his country roots. "Rhinestone Cowboy" tells the tale of a country singer resigned to acting out a role to make a living, while "Country Boy (You've Got Your Feet in L.A.)" is critical of that compromise. Both songs were smash hits, selling millions of copies, making them Campbell's biggest-selling records.

Musical Legacy

Despite his significant performances as a session guitarist in the late 1950's and early 1960's, Campbell will likely be remembered as the singer of the Webb classics "By the Time I Get to Phoenix," "Wichita Lineman," and "Galveston." His contributions to country music are unparalleled. He was one of the first major country artists to successfully cross over and dominate the country and pop charts. Significantly, he introduced many country artists of the late 1960's to a larger audience by insisting that they be regular guests on his successful CBS television variety show, The Glen Campbell Goodtime Hour. His promotion of country-music performers paved the way for the "new country" explosion of the 1980's and 1990's. Through his efforts, the careers of Vince Gill, Garth Brooks, and Alan Jackson (whom Campbell discovered) were made possible.

Tyrone Williams

Further Reading

Campbell, Glen, with Tom Carter. Rhinestone Cowboy. New York: Villard, 1994. In this frank autobiography, Campbell gives the details of his life. He recounts the poverty of his youth, his life as an adolescent on the road with his uncles in the Southwest, his recording sessions as a guitarist with some of the best singers and bands of the early 1960's, his affairs with Davis and Tucker, and his redemption as a Christian.

Eng, Monica. "Glen Campbell's Redemption: Star Talks of Life, New Beginnings." Chicago Tribune, July 26, 2005. Eng interviews Campbell shortly after he moved from Phoenix, where he was arrested and jailed for drunk driving, to Malibu, California. Campbell reports that he is sober and enjoying clean living.

Flippo, Chet. "Glen Campbell Sounds Off on Country Music, Bryan White, Down Under." Billboard 18, no. 32 (August 10, 1996): 29. Campbell criticizes the glitzy new Nashville sound and performers, though he singles out some, such as White, for praise.

See also: Cole, Nat King; Hopkins, Lightnin'; Nelson, Ricky; Sinatra, Frank; Webb, Jimmy; Wilson, Brian.

Mariah Carey

American pop singer and songwriter

With her spectacular five-octave range, Carey has inspired a generation of female pop and soul singers.

Born: March 27, 1970; Huntington, Long Island, New York

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Mariah Carey, 1990; Emotions, 1991; Music Box, 1993; Merry Christmas, 1994; Daydream, 1995; Butterfly, 1997; Rainbow, 1999; Glitter, 2001; Charmbracelet, 2002; The Emancipation of Mimi, 2005; Maximum Mariah Carey, 2005; E = MC², 2008.

The Life

Mariah Carey (mah-RI-ah KEH-ree) was born to an opera-singer mother (whose heritage was Irish and American) and an aeronautical-engineer father (whose heritage was Venezuelan and African American). Her first name came from the song "They Call the Wind Mariah" from the Tony Award-winning musical Paint Your Wagon (1951).

The youngest of three siblings, Carey did not have a happy home. Her sister Alison turned to drugs and prostitution at fifteen, got pregnant, and contracted HIV. Her brother Morgan was diagnosed as a child with cerebral palsy. Her parents went through a bitter divorce when Carey was three, leaving her mother to raise the three children single-handedly. She supported the household with a work schedule that meant Carey was alone at home for extended periods.

Carey turned to music as an escape, listening to New York's rhythm-and-blues station WBLS-FM and to her mother's Minnie Riperton records. Carey started singing almost as soon as she began talking, and she used music as a way to deal with her insecurity about being biracial. At seventeen, right out of high school, Carey moved to New York City to pursue music, and she supported herself with backup singing jobs and with being a waitress.

She befriended singer Brenda K. Starr, who reportedly gave Carey's demo tape to business mogul and Columbia Records head Tommy Mottola. Mottola was smitten with the voice and the person behind it, signing Carey to a record deal that resulted in her 1990 debut release. A Columbia Records artist at the time relates a memo Mottola sent to the promotional staff at Columbia: "Make Mariah Carey a star, or it's your job."

Mottola left his wife of twenty years and married Carey, almost twenty years his junior. Together they bought a ten-million-dollar home, but quickly the marriage began to deteriorate. Carey believed Mottola was manipulative and controlling, and she called her home with Mottola "Sing Sing" (referring to the prison and to what was expected of her). The couple divorced in 1997, and in 2001 Carey left Mottola's label to sign a contract with Virgin Records.

That same year, a live studio audience of MTV's Total Request Live witnessed Carey's erratic behavior on stage, and shortly thereafter the singer checked in to a Connecticut clinic, taking a break from public performances. Her film Glitter (2001) was a box-office failure, and in 2002 Virgin Records ended her eighty-million-dollar contract (the largest ever at the time) with a twenty-eight-million-dollar buyout.

Nevertheless, Carey overcame her personal struggles, rising again to prominence. She signed a contract with Island Records in 2002, and she established a record label, MonarC Music. With the success of later albums, Carey ranks among the largest-selling female artists of all time and the first to hit number one consecutively for every year in the 1990's. In May, 2008, Carey married Nick Cannon, an actor and a rap artist.

The Music

"Visions of Love." Carey quickly achieved fame with four number-one singles from her debut album, Mariah Carey, including "Visions of Love." In 1991 she won two Grammy Awards, for Best New Artist and Best Female Vocalist. In a performance on the television show MTV Unplugged, Carey proved that her vocal talents were real, not created in a studio.

Music Box. Despite the fact that critics panned her second album, Emotions, Carey's third album, Music Box, sold twenty-five million copies, launching her to worldwide popularity. Billboard hailed the album as "heart-piercing." She continued to top the charts, releasing several solo albums: Merry Christmas, Daydream, Butterfly, Rainbow, Glitter, and Charmbracelet. Her two compilations, MTV Unplugged EP and #1's, went platinum or better.

The Emancipation of Mimi. In 2005 the thirty-five-year-old singer released an album that delivered her back to her rhythm-and-blues roots and to the top of the charts. The Emancipation of Mimi hit number one on the Billboard Top 100, along with its tracks "It's Like That" and "We Belong Together." The album garnered commercial and industry acclaim, and Carey earned another Grammy Award. The video for its track "We Belong Together" shows Carey jilting an older fiancé at the wedding, in order to pursue a younger lover. Carey wore her own twenty-five-thousand-dollar Vera Wang wedding dress for the shoot.

$E = MC^2$. In this release from 2008, Carey plays on Einstein's famous formula, declaring that "Emancipation equals Mariah Carey to the second power." Debuting at number one, the album garnered Carey the largest opening-week sales of her career and featured the hit single "Touch My Body."

Musical Legacy

Carey has won five Grammy Awards, and several of her albums have achieved platinum sales. As a singer, she has utilized her voice, with its substantial vocal range and power, to great effect on hit singles. Carey evolved in her musical career to include songwriting and record-producing, and she has overcome personal and professional hardships with a remarkable resilience. In April, 2008, Carey appeared as a mentor on the television show American Idol, coaching the contestants in her singing style.

Louis R. Carlozo, Madeleine Kuhns, and LeeAnn Maton

Further Reading

Nickson, Chris. Mariah Carey Revisited: Her Story. New York: St. Martin's Griffin, 1998. This exploration of Carey's life and music as of 1998 provides a snapshot of the singer at the height of her 1990's popularity.

Parker, Judy. Mariah Carey. New York: Children's Press, 2001. Appealing to her younger fans, this biography for juvenile readers chronicles the singer's rise to fame.

Shapiro, Marc. Mariah Carey: The Unauthorized Biography. Toronto, Ont.: ECW Press, 2001. Using behind-the-scenes information, Shapiro describes the personal struggles and triumphs behind Carey's musical career.

See also: Babyface; Combs, Sean; Elliott, Missy; Franklin, Aretha; Seeger, Peggy; Snoop Dogg; Summer, Donna.

Wendy Carlos

American composer, arranger, keyboardist, and synthesizer player

A pioneering electronic music artist, Carlos popularized the Moog synthesizer and legitimized its use as a medium for classical-music composition and performance. Her techniques of electronic orchestration—which depend on a thorough knowledge of classical models, the synthesizer, and the possibilities and limitations of stereo sound recording—surpassed those of her contemporaries and remain vital today.

Born: November 14, 1939; Pawtucket, Rhode Island

Also known as: Walter Carlos (birth name)

Principal works

FILM SCORES: Timesteps, 1970; A Clockwork Orange, 1972; Tron, 1982.

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Switched-On Bach, 1968; Switched-On Brandenburgs, Vol. 1, 1969; The Well-Tempered Synthesizer, 1969; Sonic Seasonings, 1972; Digital Moonscapes, 1984; Beauty in the Beast, 1986; Secrets of Synthesis, 1990; Switched-On Bach 2000, 1995; Tales of Heaven and Hell, 1998; Switched-On Bach II, 2001; Switched-On Brandenburgs, 2001; By Request, 2003.

The Life

Born Walter Carlos, the composer felt she was female from the time she was five years old. She began the process resulting in her sex reassignment in 1967, after her career had already been established. Carlos began studying the piano at the age of six but was also attracted to science and visual art. She pursued undergraduate studies in physics and music at Brown University and in 1965 earned a master's degree in composition from Columbia University, where her teachers included Jack Beeson, Otto Luening, and Vladimir Ussachevsky. In 1964 she collaborated with Robert Moog on the development of his Moog synthesizer; after graduation, she continued consulting with him and worked as a recording engineer. Around the same time she met Rachel Elkind, who became an important companion and artistic collaborator. Elkind convinced her to work on an album of Bach compositions realized for the synthesizer; the album, Switched-On Bach, was produced by Elkind and released on Columbia Records in 1968. It became the first platinum-selling classical album. Elkind and Carlos's important collaboration continued until 1980, resulting in a series of crossover albums containing both original work and additional realizations of others' music. Carlos, who received the Society for Electro-Acoustic Music in the United States' SEAMUS Lifetime Achievement Award in 2005, continues to compose. In addition to electronic music, she has written a concerto for string quartet and orchestra, commissioned by the Kronos Quartet, and excerpts from her Digital Moonscapes have been performed by orchestras in Berkeley, California, and Boston under the direction of Kent Nagano.

The Music

Carlos's early works include Dialogues for Piano and Two Loudspeakers and Episodes for Piano and Electronic Sound. The two works are episodic and largely atonal but depend on a remarkable and carefully crafted relationship between the solo instrument and the electronic sounds. In particular, both tape and piano parts contain presentations of similar recognizable melodic, rhythmic material.

The Well-Tempered Synthesizer. The follow-up to Switched-On Bach was released in 1969 and contained realizations of Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 and four sonatas of Domenico Scarlatti, as well as realized excerpts from George Frideric Handel's Water Music and Claudio Monteverdi's L'Orfeo. In this album Carlos refined basic elements of her electronic orchestrations, including the selective doubling of certain parts and the rapid shifting of parts from one side of the stereo image to the other. Her realizations of Scarlatti's Sonatas in G Major and D Major and the final movement of the Brandenburg Concerto are stunning in this regard.

Sonic Seasonings. This work, first released in 1972, is a large-scale suite of four movements depicting the four seasons. The music explores a wide expressive range and includes recordings of natural sounds as well as a haunting vocalise—a vocal exercise without words—by Elkind in the final movement. As Carlos later observed, Sonic Seasonings anticipated the development of what came to be called ambient music.

Timesteps. Timesteps was originally designed to ease listeners into an electronic realization of excerpts from Ludwig van Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. However, her reading of Anthony Burgess's novel A Clockwork Orange around the same time helped Timesteps evolve into what Carlos called "an autonomous work with an uncanny affinity for Clockwork." Timesteps was her first original work to use the same techniques of orchestration she had developed in The Well-Tempered Synthesizer and also included her pioneering use of the vocoder, a speech analyzer and synthesizer, to produce electronically altered vocal sounds. As in many of her works, the musical material includes textures and gestures that could be produced only by electronic instruments as well as many ideas that suggest music for conventional instruments. Examples include a lyrical episode with electronic birdsong, church bells, and the crashing of waves. The penultimate section initially combines a minimalist ostinato with ominous vocoder textures and ultimately superimposes musical ideas from the work's beginning in a manner best accomplished through the technology of the studio.

Beauty in the Beast. In this suite of evocative character pieces, Carlos experimented with a number of alternative tuning systems, although there is no loss of melodic grace or accessibility. The title track is a particularly fine example. A gentle theme is harmonized by triads, but the tuning system prevents the triads from agreeing with each other. A central section includes a menacing, stepwise theme and a sudden explosion of maniacal circus music, after which the theme returns and brings the piece to a mysterious, tentative close.

Musical Legacy

By emphasizing recognizable melody, harmony, and rhythm in her electronic music, Carlos influenced both her contemporaries and younger composers to use synthesizers for the creation and performance of new but more accessible music. Mother Mallard's Portable Masterpiece Co., founded by David Borden in 1969, was the first performing group to use Moog synthesizers in its performances; the better known Philip Glass Ensemble began to replace electric organs with synthesizers in the 1980's. Unlike Borden or Glass, however, Carlos rarely sought to have her work performed in concert settings. Her concentration on studio electronic music and the emotional difficulties she experienced before and after her sex reassignment—as well as her tendency toward reclusiveness—also made it difficult for her to cultivate a more extensive career as a composer for the concert hall. Nevertheless, her best music has wit, charm, and considerable sophistication and is deserving of more widespread acclaim.

Rob Haskins

Further Reading

Bakan, Michael B., Wanda Bryant, and Guangming Li. "Demystifying and Classifying Electronic Music Instruments." Selected Reports in Ethnomusicology 8 (1990): 37-64. Modifies and extends the Hornbostel/Sachs instrument classification system to include electronic instruments. Includes a description of Switched-On Bach.

Carlos, Wendy. "Tuning: At the Crossroads." Computer Music Journal 11, no. 1 (Spring, 1987): 29-43. A comprehensive discussion of various tuning systems available via digitally controlled music synthesis.

Darter, Tom, comp. The Art of Electronic Music: The Instruments, Designers, and Musicians Behind the Artistic and Popular Explosion of Electronic Music. New York: William Morrow, 1984. A compendium of articles originally published in Keyboard from 1975 to 1983, this book includes an interview with Carlos.

Doerschuk, Robert L. "Wendy Carlos: The Magic in the Machine—Reflections from the First Great Modern Synthesist." Keyboard 21, no. 8 (August, 1995): 50-63. Short but informative introduction to Carlos's work and aesthetics.

Pinch, Trevor, and Frank Trocco. Analog Days: The Invention and Impact of the Moog Synthesizer. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 2002. Critical history that includes a chapter on Switched-On Bach.

See also: Babbitt, Milton; Glass, Philip.

Karen Carpenter

American singer

As female vocalist and drummer in the brother-sister act the Carpenters, Carpenter scored a series of hit singles and albums throughout the 1970's, demonstrating that "easy-listening" and "middle-of-the-road" music could still break into the Billboard Hot 100. Her close harmonies with brother Richard and their knack for choosing great material made them one of the most influential recording groups of the decade.

Born: March 2, 1950; New Haven, Connecticut
Died: February 4, 1983; Downey, California
Also known as: Karen Anne Carpenter (full name)
Member of: The Carpenters

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (with the Carpenters): Offering, 1969; Close to You, 1970; The Carpenters, 1971; A Song for You, 1972; Now and Then, 1973; Horizon, 1975; A Kind of Hush, 1976; Passage, 1977; Christmas Portrait, 1978; Made in America, 1981; Voice of the Heart, 1983; An Old-Fashioned Christmas, 1984.

The Life

Karen Anne Carpenter was the second child of Harold and Agnes Carpenter. Their first child, Richard, four years older, was a prodigy on the piano, and in 1963 the family moved to Downey, California, to aid Richard's career by being close to the recording industry. At Downey High School, Karen played drums in the marching band and for the first time discovered her own musical talent. At fifteen she joined her brother's jazz group, the Richard Carpenter Trio, on the drums. In 1969 she and her brother signed with A&M Records as The Carpenters, releasing Ticket to Ride, which barely scratched the Billboard Hot 100 (the title song peaked at number fifty-four). The next album began a decade of Top 40 hits. She and her brother were, as their hit single put it, "On Top of the World." By the middle of the decade, however, it became evident that Karen was battling anorexia nervosa, a then little-known eating disorder. She married real-estate developer Tom Burris in August, 1980; the couple separated the following November. In 1982 she received treatment for anorexia, but the strain on her heart from the disorder led to her death a few months later in 1983.

The Music

Karen spent her teen years in the shadow of her brother Richard, though she did not seem to resent it: Even as a part of his musical groups, she remained one of her brother's staunchest fans. In the Richard Carpenter Trio and the more pop-oriented Spectrum, Karen played drums so well that Herb Alpert of A&M Records noticed her and signed the duo to his label. (Jazz drumming legend Buddy Rich, Modern Drummer magazine, and the Playboy jazz poll would later join Alpert in praising Karen's work.) Their first album, Ticket to Ride, did not have a song in the Top 40, but their second album had two.

Close to You. The second Carpenters album collected twelve songs that sounded great alone and worked well together, including three original songs by Richard and one of his guitarists from Spectrum, John Bettis. Karen began a career-long association with Burt Bacharach by including two of his songs: the title track and "I'll Never Fall in Love Again" from the Broadway show Promises, Promises. The latter was overshadowed by Dionne Warwick's version, which hit number six, but "Close to You" hit number one, stayed at the top for four weeks, and remained on the charts for fifteen. Their second gold single from the album, "We've Only Just Begun," demonstrated the Carpenters' ear for good material. Composed by Paul Williams for a local bank commercial in California, it struck the Carpenters as a potential hit, and it became one:

Karen Carpenter. (CBS/Landov)

number two on the Billboard Hot 100 and for six weeks number one in the Billboard adult contemporary category. Karen's contralto vocals on both hits became key to the duo's success. In 2003 Rolling Stone listed this album in the Top 500 of all time at number 175.

The Carpenters. Richard and Karen followed their success with "We've Only Just Begun" by cutting another Paul Williams composition, "Rainy Days and Mondays," again with Karen singing lead. It, too, soared on the charts. It was their third gold record. The B side of the album was unified by a six-song Burt Bacharach-Hal David medley. "Superstar," which had been successful for both Joe Cocker and Bette Midler, again capitalized on Karen's solo voice against a contrasting bass line. The song did not quite fit the group's wholesome image, but Richard changed the line "I can hardly wait to sleep with you again" to "I can hardly wait to see you again." Once again, the Carpenters went to number-two pop, number-one adult contemporary, and a gold single.

A Song for You. With the highest concentration of hit singles—six—ever for the Carpenters, their fourth album saw four songs reach the Top 12. "Top of the World" became their second number one. The album made Cash Box's Top 100 for 1972 at number twenty-six.

Now and Then. When Ricky Nelson's song "Garden Party" prompted an interest in "oldies" music, the Carpenters responded with their first concept album (though Richard had originally conceived their previous album that way). The B side was a medley of hit songs from the early 1960's, with Karen and Richard duplicating the arrangements and vocal styles of the originals. Their guitarist, Tony Peluso, played a DJ weaving the songs together, and the whole side was introduced with the Richard Carpenter-Bettis nostalgic original "Yesterday Once More" (which became another number-two pop, number-one adult contemporary hit). From the A side, "Sing," which advisers warned would not overcome its association with the children's television show Sesame Street, became a gold single and peaked at number-one adult contemporary.

Musical Legacy

Though Karen died before the compact-disc medium became standard, her hits continue to be packaged on compilation compact discs—including her 1979 solo album, which was not released in its entirety until 1996. Karen's success on drums has proven an inspiration for female aspirants to one of the last male-dominated instruments in pop music. Her clear and strong contralto became a trademark. Her homey image helps to make the Carpenters' two Christmas albums, Christmas Portrait and An Old-Fashioned Christmas, continue to sell, and her vocal leads on "The Christmas Song" and "Merry Christmas, Darling" remain radio and Muzak perennials during the holiday season. Although Karen attempted to shed her clean-cut image in her solo album, there is no doubt she primarily will be remembered as the smiling girl next door on the Carpenters' album covers. Seven months after Karen's death, the Carpenters received a star on the Hollywood Walk of Fame.

John R. Holmes

Further Reading

Coleman, Ray. The Carpenters: The Untold Story. An Authorized Biography. Boston: HarperCollins, 1994. The author had access to Carpenter family records and memories.

Garcia, Ronald. Close to You: The Story of Richard and Karen Carpenter. Chicago: The Good Reading Company, 1995. Well-written basic coverage, mostly of the years of the Carpenters' success, 1970-1982.

Schmidt, Randy. Yesterday Once More: Memories of The Carpenters and Their Music. New York: Tiny Ripple Books, 2000. Music-oriented biography, a good source for commentary on individual songs and albums.

Stockdale, Tom. Karen Carpenter. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2000. Brief biography, with a good selection of photographs from all stages of Karen's short life.

See also: Alpert, Herb; Anderson, Leroy; Aznavour, Charles; Warwick, Dionne.

Benny Carter

American jazz saxophonist

Carter mastered all phases of jazz music from the 1920's until the end of the twentieth century. To study his career is to review major jazz developments over a span of seventy years.

Born: August 8, 1907; New York, New York
Died: July 12, 2003; Los Angeles, California
Also known as: Bennett Lester Carter (full name)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Symphony in Riffs, 1930; Alto Saxes, 1954; Benny Carter Plays Pretty, 1954; Jazz Giant, 1957; Aspects, 1958; Further Definitions, 1961; The King, 1977; A Gentleman and His Music, 1985; Benny Carter Meets Oscar Peterson, 1986; Central City Sketches, 1987; In the Mood for Swing, 1987; My Man Benny, My Man Phil, 1989; Harlem Renaissance, 1992; Elegy in Blue, 1994; Another Time, Another Place, 1996; Songbook, 1996.

The Life

Bennett Lester Carter was born in New York City on August 8, 1907, the son of Norrell and Sadie Carter. He was called Bennett, his mother's maiden name, in the family but soon became Benny to others. He was the youngest of three children and the only boy.

Music was important in the Carter household. His father was a self-taught guitarist, and his mother played the organ and piano. Although Carter did not complete the seventh grade and his musical training consisted only of early instruction on the piano, he learned a great deal from reading about music and the world in general, becoming highly articulate. Music was always his passion, but he did pay marked attention to the origin and usage of the English language and sought to express his thoughts as clearly and effectively as he did his music.

Carter had an active social life and made many friends around the world, but interviewers had considerable difficulty eliciting personal information from him. He was more interested in discussing the present than the past. Well informed about politics and international affairs, he generally restricted his activities to matters pertaining to music; for instance, as a man who had known and performed with white musicians most of his life, he worked at integrating local musicians' unions. He taught part time at a number of schools and colleges, and students found him helpful and always interested in their work if they displayed devotion to music, even if their talents were decidedly limited.

Carter married five times. His first marriage ended with his wife's early death; three others were terminated by divorce. He had one daughter, Joyce. Carter met Hilma Arons in 1940, when she visited the Savoy Ballroom in New York to hear his orchestra play. In 1979, when he was in his seventies and she in her late fifties, they married. A graduate of Barnard College, she managed many of his business details and also advised him when he was writing lyrics for the songs he composed. She and his daughter survived him when he died a few weeks short of his ninety-sixth birthday.

The Music

Carter's contributions to jazz were so many that it is difficult to specify the greatest. Probably most admired as an instrumentalist, he ranks among the most talented of reed players and also received much acclaim as a trumpeter. In addition, he played the piano and trombone professionally. Carter disagreed strongly with critics who thought that the differences in the mouthpieces and embouchure (use of facial muscles and shaping of the lips around the mouthpiece) of reed instruments and trumpets prevented a musician from excelling at both. All that was needed, he insisted, was sufficient practice. He also was convinced that his various musical activities, such as being able to compose a work and play or direct it, enhanced one another.

Benny Carter. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Early Jazz Achievements. In the late 1920's and early 1930's Carter played in several jazz organizations populated by important young musicians. He performed in the orchestras of Charlie Johnson, Fletcher Henderson, Chick Webb, and the group known as McKinney's Cotton Pickers, and he arranged for most of them. In 1931 he composed one of his best-known songs, "Blues in My Heart." From 1932 to 1934 he recorded with his own orchestra. By this time he was incorporating trumpet solos as well as those for clarinet and saxophone. Maintaining a fourteen-piece orchestra in the Depression was difficult, and although several of the performers later ranked Carter's first orchestra as one of the best they had ever been in, he had to disband in 1934.

Carter in Europe. Like many other American jazz musicians, Carter spent several years in Europe, from 1935 to 1938, recording with various orchestras and chamber groups in such places as London, Copenhagen, Stockholm, The Hague, and Paris. A highlight occurred on April 18, 1937, when Carter was set to record with an orchestra led by the great tenor saxophonist Coleman Hawkins. Carter arrived in Paris without having prepared arrangements that he had agreed to prepare for the date, but he then quickly arranged Fats Waller's "Honeysuckle Rose" and Roger Wolfe Kahn and Joseph Meyer's "Crazy Rhythm." The former featured Hawkins, but Carter's solo on the latter is still regarded as one of his finest. He also contributed a notable thirty-two-bar solo on the trumpet in "Out of Nowhere." For many of these foreign performances, the orchestra was an international one, in this instance including two of France's best reed players.

"When Lights Are Low." Carter introduced his best-known song, "When Lights Are Low," in Europe, but the most important of several of his recordings of it came on September 11, 1939, in New York with Lionel Hampton's orchestra. No fewer than three top tenor saxophonists—Hawkins, Ben Webster, and Leon "Chu" Berry—can be heard on this recording. The session was also important because twenty-one-year-old Dizzy Gillespie was asked to replace the unavailable lead trumpeter. Hampton later described Gillespie's performance during another number at this session as the first time he had ever heard bebop played on a trumpet. Both Carter's arrangement and his solo on "When Lights Are Low" stand high among his achievements, and Hampton's vibraharp solo on the second take, which was not released for many years (perhaps because of some mistakes by the then-inexperienced Gillespie), is another high point.

During this period Carter was busy arranging for Benny Goodman, Glenn Miller, Teddy Wilson, Artie Shaw, and Count Basie. However, World War II and a 1942 ban on recording imposed by the American Federation of Musicians brought an end to the period called the Swing Era.

Motion-Picture Work. From 1942 to 1946 Carter headed another orchestra, which arrived in California for engagements near the end of 1942. A few weeks later he was invited to work on the film Stormy Weather, which had a talented all-black cast. Carter's arrangements impressed the music supervisor, Alfred Newman, who allowed him many more contributions to the film, including one of Carter's own compositions, "Moppin' and Boppin'." He played trumpet on two songs in a septet led by Fats Waller, arranged for and played in the large studio orchestra, soloed on the saxophone, and arranged the title song for Lena Horne. However, even in this film populated by black performers, he neither appeared on screen nor was given any screen credits.

Carter's later Hollywood experiences were also mixed. He resigned from one all-black film because the musical director claimed that his arrangements were "too good," beyond the capacity of early black bands, despite Carter's insistence that he had been in such bands and that they were better than the current ones. Later, he not only wrote and arranged music for films but also appeared in some of them, including An American in Paris (1951), for which he arranged several George Gershwin tunes.

Two Later Performances. Two of Carter's finest performances are Further Definitions, an album recorded in New York on November 15, 1961, and his July 13, 1977, concert at the Montreux Jazz Festival in Switzerland. In the former he was reunited with Hawkins, along with two younger reed players and a rhythm group. Further Definitions includes two of his best (but not especially well-known) songs, "Doozy" and "Blue Star." In his Montreux performance, he worked as part of a quartet that included pianist Ray Bryant, one of many much younger musicians with whom Carter played in his later years. There were seven songs; on five Carter played alto saxophone and on two both saxophone and trumpet, once muted and once open bell.

Critics raved about Carter's appearance at Montreux in his seventies and later performances, but he wished to be judged by his playing, not his age. Carter did not give up his instruments until he was in his nineties, when he decided that his playing was no longer up to his own standards.

Songbook. In 1996 MusicMasters Records issued Songbook. Carter wrote hundreds of songs but did not often have his own orchestras play them and generally seemed to disdain promoting them. Although he worked on this project, he did not, at the age of eighty-eight, take part in its promotion. The performers included such well-known singers as Joe Williams, Peggy Lee, Bobby Short, and cornetist Warren Vaché. The project brought a selection of his songs together for the first time. Although praised by reviewers, it was not a commercial success, but it brought together for the first time fifteen of Carter's best songs, including his only hit song, "Cow-Cow Boogie."

Musical Legacy

Carter played with a pure tone, dexterity, dynamic shading, and an ease in all registers. His early work was in chamber and orchestral jazz, but he contributed to the swing music of the late 1930's as performer and arranger. In the early 1940's he employed many of the young men who would establish a new era in jazz a few years later: Gillespie, J. J. Johnson, Max Roach, Art Pepper, and Miles Davis. Although Carter's roots were in more traditional jazz, he learned from these men and incorporated later jazz developments in his own playing and composing. Carter's capacity for adapting musical ideas from later musicians is one of his most striking achievements.

In his later years he was involved in educational work. A self-educated man, he began teaching during the 1970's at Princeton University and other institutions of higher learning and supported the development of an important jazz research and education center at Rutgers University.

Carter made many trips to Europe and also performed in South America, Africa, the Middle East, and Japan, even when he was well up in his eighties. He won numerous awards, including the National Medal of Arts, conferred by President Bill Clinton on December 20, 2000.

Robert P. Ellis

Further Reading

Berger, Monroe, Edward Berger, and James Patrick. Benny Carter: A Life in American Music. 2d ed. 2 vols. Rutgers, N.J.: Institute of Jazz Studies, 2002. Definitive work on Carter's musical legacy, including biography, discography, filmography, and bibliography.

Gioia, Ted. The History of Jazz. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997. Jazz historian stresses Carter's songwriting, particularly his expertise as a composer of ballads.

Schuller, Gunther. Early Jazz: Its Roots and Development. New York: Oxford University Press, 1968. Schuller includes musical excerpts from Carter's arrangements for Fletcher Henderson's orchestra beginning in the late 1920's.

_____. The Swing Era: The Development of Jazz, 1930-1945. New York: Oxford University Press, 1989. A discussion of Carter's strengths and weaknesses, with an emphasis on Carter's versatility and his unusual success as a performer in his later years.

Stewart, Rex. Jazz Masters of the Thirties. New York: Macmillan, 1972. One of the musicians who played with Carter offers an extensive account of his influence.

See also: Basie, Count; Gershwin, George; Gillespie, Dizzy; Hampton, Lionel; Hawkins, Coleman; Henderson, Fletcher; Lee, Peggy; McPartland, Marian; Peterson, Oscar; Tatum, Art; Waller, Fats; Webster, Ben.

Elliott Carter

American classical composer

Carter's influence extended beyond the sphere typically occupied by modernist composers. His innovations in expressive character and rhythm inspired not only those who shared his stylistic bent but also those striking out in different musical directions. Prolific for more than five decades, he inspired postwar composers around the world.

Born: December 11, 1908; New York, New York
Also known as: Elliott Cook Carter, Jr. (full name)

Principal works

BALLETS (music): Pocahontas, 1936; The Minotaur, 1947.

CHAMBER WORKS: Eight Études and a Fantasy for Wind Quartet, 1949; String Quartet No. 1, 1951; String Quartet No. 2, 1959; String Quartet No. 3, 1971; Triple Duo, 1983 (for wind, string, and percussion instruments); Penthode, 1985 (for five groups of four instruments); String Quartet No. 4, 1986; String Quartet No. 5, 1995; Mosaic for Harp and Ensemble, 2004; Réflexions for Ensemble, 2004.

INSTRUMENTAL WORKS: Eight Pieces for Four Timpani, 1949; Night Fantasies, 1980 (for piano); Changes, 1983 (for guitar); Intermittences, 2005 (for piano); Catenaires, 2006 (for piano).

OPERA (music): What Next?, 1998 (libretto by Paul Griffiths).

ORCHESTRAL WORKS: Symphony No. 1, 1942; Holiday Overture, 1944; Piano Sonata, 1946; Cello Sonata, 1948; Variations for Orchestra, 1955; Double Concerto, 1961 (for piano, harpsichord, and two chamber orchestras); Piano Concerto, 1964; Concerto for Orchestra, 1969; A Symphony of Three Orchestras, 1976; Oboe Concerto, 1987; Three Occasions, 1989; Violin Concerto, 1990; Clarinet Concerto, 1996; Symphonia: Sum Fluxae Pretium Spei, 1996 (I Am the Prize of Flowing Hope); ASKO Concerto, 2000; Cello Concerto, 2001; Boston Concerto, 2002; Dialogues, 2003 (for piano and orchestra); Three Illusions, 2004 (in three parts: "Micomicón," "Fons Juventatis," and "More's Utopia"); Soundings, 2005 (for piano and orchestra); Horn Concerto, 2007; Interventions, 2007 (for piano and orchestra).

VOCAL WORKS: Three Poems of Robert Frost, 1942 (for baritone and ensemble); A Mirror on Which to Dwell, 1975 (for soprano and ensemble); Syringa, 1978 (for mezzo-soprano, bass-baritone, guitar, and ensemble); In Sleep, in Thunder, 1981 (for tenor and ensemble); Of Challenge and of Love, 1994 (for soprano and piano); In the Distances of Sleep, 2006 (for voice and ensemble).

WRITINGS OF INTEREST: The Writings of Elliott Carter: An American Composer Looks at Modern Music, 1977; The New Worlds of Edgard Varèse: A Symposium, 1979 (papers by Carter, Chou Wen-Chung, Robert P. Morgan, and Sherman van Solkema).

The Life

Elliott Cook Carter, Jr. was born in New York but spent a lot of time in Europe; his father was a wealthy importer and his family traveled frequently. In particular, he spent a great deal of time in France, learning French at a young age. He started piano lessons early, but his musical development was impacted less by his family than by the encouragement he received from Charles Ives, whom he met in 1924 and with whom he attended many concerts. Carter had a broad range of musical interests, stylistically speaking. He was interested in many of the modernists of the early twentieth century, such as Henry Cowell, Edgard Varèse, and Roger Sessions, even though Carter's early works seem to belie this influence.

In 1926 Carter began to study at Harvard but felt that the music department was too conservative. Instead, he turned to studying Greek and English literature. He maintained some musical studies, in solfeggio and piano, and ultimately earned a master's degree in music in 1932. Among his primary teachers were Gustav Holst and Walter Piston. Like many American composers of his generation, he studied in Paris with Nadia Boulanger, first privately and then at the École Normale de Musique. His move to Europe was at least in part because of the enjoyable experiences he had during his travels in his youth. Upon completion of his studies in 1935, he returned to New York to devote his time to composing. He assumed the directorship of Ballet Caravan. The music he composed for this group was typical of neoclassicism of the time—most clearly displaying the influence of his studies with Boulanger.

Carter's later works (after 1948) established him as one of the foremost innovators in the twentieth century. He held a number of teaching posts on the East Coast, primarily in the New York area, where he taught at Columbia University, Queens College, with his longest stint at the Juilliard School from 1964 to 1984. Carter received the Pulitzer Prize twice, once in 1960 and then again in 1973. In 1987 the Paul Sacher Foundation arranged to acquire all of Carter's manuscripts, assuring their place alongside the papers of such other twentieth century masters as Igor Stravinsky, Pierre Boulez, Béla Bartók, Paul Hindemith, and Richard Strauss.

Elliott Carter. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The Music

Early Works. Carter's early works bear a strong resemblance to his neoclassical contemporaries, many of whom also studied with Boulanger in Paris. Two compositions in particular, Pocahontas and The Minotaur, suggest that Carter's compositional output was following a path similar to that of his friend Aaron Copland. The former was written for the Ballet Caravan and the latter for the Ballet Society (the precursor of the New York City Ballet). Style and timing help explain why Carter's career did not flourish in quite the same manner as that of his contemporaries at the time. Pocahontas is rather similar to Copland's style and had its premiere on the same night as Copland's Billy the Kid. It is also interesting to note that the works deal with American and Native American subjects, respectively. The Minotaur combines Copland-like strains with a healthy dose of Stravinsky. It shared a number of other similarities with Orpheus, a work by Stravinsky to which it is often compared. Orpheus was produced by George Balanchine, and Carter collaborated with the legendary choreographer on The Minotaur. Both are based on Greek myths, and both were premiered by the Ballet Society. While these early works did take strides away from neoclassicism, particularly in their dramatic expression, they did not compare favorably to the works of Carter's more established colleagues. Radical stylistic change was, however, on the horizon.

Sonata for Cello. In 1948, the year after The Minotaur was completed, Carter composed a work that pinpoints when he left the path of the mainstream, populist composers he seemed to be emulating. Carter was looking for new rhythmic structures not found in traditional Western art music. He found his inspiration in the music of Africa, Arabia, and Southeast Asia. Initially, Carter composed the second movement, the only one that utilizes key signatures. The tonality and jazzy sounds in this movement were identified by Carter as a parody of the work of his American colleagues at the time. It is interesting to note that after attending concerts together, Carter and Ives would often rush to a piano to play parodies of the various composers they had heard; perhaps that game was the genesis of this movement. The other movements, however, foreshadow Carter's later works in their simple form and modernist language.

This work displays some of the devices that would pervade Carter's later compositions. It shows his penchant for assigning different characteristics to different instruments. In this case, the cello begins with a free, legato melody, while the piano's clocklike percussion contrasts sharply. The characteristics of each instrument shift dramatically and between movements seem to trade such elements as melody and tempo. In this work Carter also establishes his method of "metric modulation," a technique that owes a debt to the composer's exploration of the rhythms of other cultures. The music shifts through proportionally related tempi rather quickly, the rhythmic analogue of modulation between keys in a tonal system. It was not originally well received—in Carter's own words, "Everybody hated it."

String Quartet No. 2. The change in compositional philosophy in the Sonata for Cello led to a period of exploration and discovery, involving increasingly complex polyrhythms and bearing the influence of his friend Ives, along with that of Conlon Nancarrow and Béla Bartók. His String Quartet No. 1 and the Variations for Orchestra combined these influences and expanded his ideas while achieving the critical success that the Cello Sonata did not. The String Quartet No. 2 represents the next step in the evolution of Carter's compositional language. Much more dissonant and angular than his earlier pieces, this work divides the ensemble into four characters, each identified by varying intervals, rhythms, tempi, and dynamics. Also, the members of the quartet are instructed how to sit: in pairs, with violin and viola seated across from violin and cello and as far apart as possible, so that it seems as if they are playing two distinct pieces. Carter won his first Pulitzer Prize in 1960 for this work.

Later Works. Carter remained prolific throughout his long career, and the concepts and devices created in the Cello Sonata and String Quartet No. 2 were expanded upon in the works that followed, establishing him as one of the true innovators of the twentieth century. Among these devices are chords whose notes exhibit all possible intervals (all-interval chords), increasingly complex polyrhythms, a circular time plan, and opposing forces and characters in his chamber and orchestral works. These, along with an increasing expressiveness, are shown in the String Quartet No. 3 (for which he won his second Pulitzer Prize), A Mirror on Which to Dwell for soprano and chamber ensemble, Triple Duo, and the Oboe Concerto. While the evolution of his musical language was rapid and sharp in the late 1940's, Carter never disavowed his earlier works and seemed quite comfortable with their place in his oeuvre.

Musical Legacy

Carter never belonged to one group or symbolized one movement. He is usually described as a modernist, but this label does not tell the whole story. While his works show tremendous compositional control and a highly chromatic character, he never explicitly utilizes the serial system, as did most of the composers who are often mentioned in the same breath, such as Milton Babbitt, Pierre Boulez, or Karlheinz Stockhausen. Carter's influence has been felt on both sides of the Atlantic, and his innovations, particularly in rhythm, have impressed composers whose styles and philosophies range far beyond the circle of modernism. Carter described his compositional goal as follows: "I want to invent something I haven't heard before."

David J. Weisberg

Further Reading

Carter, Elliott. Elliott Carter: Collected Essays and Lectures, 1937-1995. Edited by Jonathan W. Bernard. Rochester, N.Y.: University of Rochester Press, 1998. Includes writings and talks by Carter. Many are nontechnical, dealing with his influences, experiences, and compositional goals.

_____. Harmony Book. Edited by Nicholas Hopkins and John F. Link. New York: Carl Fischer Music, 2002. A comprehensive catalog Carter kept during his compositional processes of the harmonies he derived. Includes an interview with the composer and examples from the works with detailed explanations.

Link, John F. Elliott Carter: A Guide to Research. New York: Routledge, 2000. Comprehensive guide to sources. Includes list of compositions (published and unpublished), interviews with the composer, and articles about the composer.

Rosen, Charles. "Elliott Carter." In Dictionary of Contemporary Music, edited by John Vinton. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1974. Reference article about Carter, including biography and insightful descriptions of works.

Schiff, David. The Music of Elliott Carter. 2d ed. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1998. Complete examination of the composer and his body of work by a former compositional student. Includes essays by the composer, full-length interviews, and anecdotes. Combines historical background of the various works with discussions of the composer's techniques.

See also: Barenboim, Daniel; Boulanger, Nadia; Copland, Aaron; Cowell, Henry; Dodge, Charles; Holst, Gustav; Ives, Charles; Levine, James; Ma, Yo-Yo; Nancarrow, Conlon; Seeger, Ruth Crawford; Solti, Sir Georg; Stravinsky, Igor.

Maybelle Carter

American country guitarist

As part of the musical Carter family, Carter helped create modern commercial country music, familial ties giving early country music its musical flavor as well as its stage presence.

Born: May 10, 1909; Nickelsville, Virginia
Died: October 23, 1978; Nashville, Tennessee
Also known as: Maybelle Addington (birth name); Mother Maybelle
Member of: The Carter Family; the Carter Sisters and Mother Maybelle

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Mother Maybelle Carter, 1951; Queen of the Autoharp, 1964; Living Legend, 1965; An Historic Reunion: Sara and Maybelle, the Original Carters, 1967 (with Sara Carter and Joe Carter); Will the Circle Be Unbroken, 1972 (with the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band); Wildwood Pickin', 1997.

The Life

Maybelle Addington was born on May 10, 1909, in Nickelsville, Virginia, in the small Appalachian community of Rich Valley in Scott County. Of the many valleys created by the five mountain ridges that ran through the county, the neighboring one, Poor Valley, more accurately described conditions there. Isolated and sparsely populated, with no more than twenty thousand residents, the county was home to farmers and coal miners. For these people, life was mostly a struggle. However, they took consolation in their faith, and the church was the most important community institution in both Poor Valley and Rich Valley. In church, people found another comfort, music. Gospel singing with the congregation on Sundays and fiddle music and square dances on Saturday were the main diversions from hard lives. What we know today as country music was born in this environment.

Although Maybelle and her cousin, Sara Dougherty, grew up within a quarter mile of each other in Rich Valley, they were not especially close as children. Their lives became entwined later, when they married brothers from Poor Valley, Ezra and Alvin Pleasant (A. P.) Carter.

The Music

A. P. Carter held a variety of jobs before he met and married Dougherty in 1915. It was a love of music and Sara's beautiful alto voice that brought them together. In 1926 they were joined by Maybelle (around the time she married Ezra, or "Eck"), and they unsuccessfully played before a Brunswick Records talent scout. The following year, however, they recorded six sides for three hundred dollars—a significant sum when the average American wage was seven hundred dollars a year—for Victor executive Ralph Peer at an audition twenty-six miles away in Bristol, Tennessee (a day's drive from Poor Valley, an especially trying summer journey for Maybelle, who was eight months pregnant).

The Bristol Sessions. The so-called Bristol sessions have often been called the starting point of country music, and Peer discovered a wealth of talent—including Jimmie Rodgers—during his ten-day stay. Peer was one of the first New York record executives to realize the commercial potential in Southern rural music. Besides finding good acts, he also was looking for material that could be copyrighted, and song collector A. P. Carter was happy to help.

A. P. Carter's special genius was taking lyrics and melodies from old traditional mountain songs and "working them up" (as he called it) with Maybelle and Sara into something marketable. Several further recording sessions with Peer followed, with significant sales—more than seven hundred thousand records—until the stock market crash in 1929 threw the country into the Great Depression. This hurt sales and prevented the Carters from doing radio tours and from touring the vaudeville circuit. As Maybelle and Sara began to devote more attention to their children and families, the Carter Family got together mainly for recording records.

The Carter Style. The music the Carters were making—focusing on hard times, personal tragedies, and the rewards offered in heaven—was just the mix American listeners wanted to hear, especially as the Dust Bowl winds and drought punished the South and Midwest. In the early 1930's, Sara lost patience with A. P. Carter's temper and his sullen ways, and she fell in love with another man. She divorced A. P. Carter in 1936. Though estranged, the trio still performed professionally. Oddly, the divorce bound the group together more tightly (more work meant more royalties, which allowed A. P. Carter to pay off his settlement to Sara more quickly).

By 1938 the Carter Family was broadcasting on XERA, a five hundred-kilowatt radio station in Mexico across the border at Del Rio, Texas. These transmissions were so powerful, they could be heard all over North America. The two years the Carter Family performed on XERA increased their record sales and their audience significantly. The station closed when the United States and Mexico signed a broadcast agreement in 1941. Though they performed off and on as a group on a North Carolina radio show, the original Carter Family effectively was finished by 1943. A. P. Carter retired to a country store in Poor Valley, and Sara and her second husband moved to California.

After the Breakup. Maybelle and her daughters Helen, June, and Anita then went on to form the group the Carter Sisters and Mother Maybelle, and they played for three years, from 1943 to 1946, at radio station WRNL in Richmond, Virginia. For the rest of the 1940's, they played on various barn dance radio shows throughout the South. June was a natural salesperson, and she was committed to becoming a professional musician as well as a comedian. In 1950 Maybelle and the Carter Sisters, along with fledging guitar giant Chet Atkins, went to the Grand Ole Opry, the mecca of country-music venues. Television appearances throughout the early 1950's followed, including a tour with Elvis Presley in 1955 (during which Anita and Presley had a brief flirtation). Meanwhile, from 1952 to 1956, A. P. Carter and his ex-wife Sara and their children performed and recorded locally with little fanfare. When A. P. Carter died in 1960, the Carter Sisters and Mother Maybelle took back the Carter Family name.

With the rise of rock and roll and sanitized Nashville-produced popular country music, interest by the public in older traditional and hillbilly sounds waned. However, with the folk music revival in the 1960's, Maybelle was in great demand once again as a solo performer on the college and festival circuit. There was a renewed interest in Carter Family materials, and artists as diverse as Presley and the Kingston Trio covered their songs. Maybelle reunited with Sara to perform at the famous Newport Folk Festival in 1967 (and a few more times before Sara died in 1979). In 1968 June married Johnny Cash, and they became stars of their television show in the 1970's. Mother Maybelle and daughters Helen and Anita appeared on many of these weekly shows. Before her death in 1978, Maybelle went on to do some important recordings, especially on the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band's seminal album, Will the Circle Be Unbroken (a title based on a Carter song).

Musical Legacy

The Carter Family is the "first family" of country music, and Mother Maybelle is the matriarch. While the original trio broke up in the early days of World War II, Maybelle kept alive the traditions and songs for nearly another four decades. The original Carter Family recorded 287 sides (all are still available), and half of them are part of the modern country-music canon. In 2004 a tribute compact disc titled The Unbroken Circle: The Musical Heritage of the Carter Family was released. The contributors included the most noted country and crossover artists, including Willie Nelson, Johnny Cash, Sheryl Crow, Shawn Colvin, and John Prine.

Maybelle never learned to read music, but her way of playing the guitar—often called a Carter run or a Carter scratch—changed the way country musicians approached the instrument. A largely self-taught guitar virtuoso, Maybelle picked parts of the melody line while strumming chords. This distinctive way of blending melody on the bass strings with harmony on the treble strings while forming a partial chord has affected three generations of players, from country to rock. The Grateful Dead's Jerry Garcia, the Rolling Stones' Keith Richards, Atkins, and Doc Watson are just a few of the many guitarists who have publicly acknowledged their musical debt to Mother Maybelle.

The Carter Family was inducted into the Country Music Hall of Fame in 1970, the first group so honored. However, the Carter Family's influence was not bound by country music. Many songs, such as "Will the Circle Be Unbroken," painted a portrait of a United States mired in an economic depression and poised at the bring of war. Most of the music from the film O Brother, Where Art Thou? (2001) were songs that A. P. Carter gathered, arranged, and played with Maybelle and Sara. The dozens of family acts and groups of relatives that perform at country and bluegrass venues can trace that heritage to the Carter Family. In the last years of her life, Maybelle was recognized as the mother of country music.

James Stanlaw

Further Reading

Bufwack, Mary. "Carter Sisters." In The Encyclopedia of Country Music: The Ultimate Guide to the Music. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998. A general article on the group Maybelle formed with her daughters in 1943.

Carr, Patrick. The Illustrated History of Country Music. New York: Random House, 1995. An accessible thematic overview of the development of the country-music genre, with hundreds of photographs from the magazine's archives. Provides a good description of the growth and development of country music during the Great Depression, when the Carter Family was just beginning.

Dorman, Katie. "Something Old, Something New: The Carter Family's Bristol Sessions Recordings." In The Bristol Sessions: Writings About the Big Bang of Country Music, edited by Charles Wolfe and Ted Olson. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2005. A definitive account of what went right and wrong for the Carter Family at the birth of country music in 1927.

McCloud, Barry. "Carter Family (a.k.a. the Carter Sisters)" and "Mother Maybelle Carter." In Definitive Country: The Ultimate Encyclopedia of Country Music and Its Performers, edited by Barry McCloud. New York: Perigee, 1995. Succinct but informative articles on Maybelle's life and on her career after the original Carter Family trio broke up.

Malone, Bill. Country Music USA. Rev. 2d ed. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1985. An excellent single-volume history of the genre through the 1970's. Good material on the commercialization of hillbilly music.

Stambler, Irwin, and Grelun Landon. "Carter, Mother Maybelle." In The Encyclopedia of Folk, Country, and Western Music. 2d ed. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1984. An article devoted only to Maybelle, a rarity among the standard country-music encyclopedias.

Zwonitzer, Mark, and Charles Hirshberg. Will You Miss Me When I Am Gone? The Carter Family and Their Legacy in American Music. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2004. The first biography of the Carter Family and their musical influence. Largely based on oral histories and on recollections of relatives and friends, the book has no bibliography or source notes.

See also: Atkins, Chet; Cash, Johnny; Cobain, Kurt; Nelson, Willie; Presley, Elvis; Richards, Keith; Scruggs, Earl; Seeger, Mike; Watson, Doc.

Enrico Caruso

Italian opera singer

Caruso, possessed of a magnificent, expressive, tenor voice, combined with classic technique, was a leading operatic star, and he was the first singer to be heard by millions of people through the newly invented gramophone.

Born: February 25, 1873; Naples, Italy
Died: August 2, 1921; Naples, Italy

Principal works

OPERATIC ROLES: Enzo Grimaldo in Amilcare Ponchielli's La gioconda, 1895; Edgardo Ravenswood in Gaetano Donizetti's Lucia di Lammermoor, 1895; Duke in Giuseppe Verdi's Rigoletto, 1895; Don José in Georges Bizet's Carmen, 1896; Rodolfo in Giacomo Puccini's La Bohème, 1896; Canio in Ruggero Leoncavallo's Pagliacci, 1897; Loris in Umberto Giordano's Fedora, 1898; Radamès in Verdi's Aida, 1900; Mario Cavaradossi in Puccini's Tosca, 1900; Nemorino in Donizetti's L'elisir d'amore, 1901; B. F. Pinkerton in Puccini's Madama Butterfly, 1906; Lyonel in Friedrich von Flotow's Martha, 1906; Prince of Urgel in Verdi's Il Trovatore, 1908; Dick Johnson in Puccini's La fanciulla del west, 1910; Don Alvaro in Verdi's La forza del destino, 1918; Eléazar in Fromental Halévy's La Juive, 1919.

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Cielo e mar aria from Ponchielli's Gioconda, 1902; E lucevan le stelle Puccini's Tosca, 1902; Non t'amo pui aria, 1902; Pagliacci vesti la giubba, 1902; Il songo manon, 1904; Rigoletto la donna è mobile, 1904; Tiempo antico, 1916; Vesti la giubba, 1920.

The Life

Enrico Caruso (kah-ROO-soh), born in 1873 in Naples, Italy, to Marcellino and Anna Baldini Caruso, was the third of seven children; his two older brothers died in infancy. A mechanic, Caruso's father earned barely enough money to supply his family with the necessities. Although an unruly student, Caruso developed a great love of singing. At eleven, he became the lead soloist of his school's choir, earning enough money to pay for private voice lessons. At thirteen, he left school to work at a factory, although he continued to train with Naples's talented musical teachers. Caruso was drafted into the Italian army, but he was a lackluster soldier. Discharged at the age of twenty, he supported himself by singing at various Neapolitan events and eventually at the opera.

Caruso's star rose quickly, and he soon developed an international reputation. On July 2, 1898, Caruso and his longtime mistress, opera singer Ada Giachetti, had a son, Rodolpho. On September 7, 1904, Caruso and Giachetti had a second son, Enrico. Meanwhile, Caruso was starring at the New York Metropolitan Opera and recording operatic and popular songs, which made him world famous and brought him great wealth and a lavish lifestyle.

In 1907 relations between Caruso and Ada became strained after he had an affair with Ada's sister, Rina. Caruso purchased the opulent Villa Bellosguardo estate outside Florence, where he relaxed by drawing outstanding caricatures. In 1908 Ada scandalously left Caruso for their chauffeur, and Caruso acquired a new mistress, Mildred Meffert. On August 20, 1918, Caruso married a young American aristocrat, Dorothy Park Benjamin. Their daughter, Gloria, was born on December 18, 1919. In December, 1920, Caruso, taxed by overwork, contracted pleurisy, a disease of the lungs. The illness fatal, he returned to Naples in 1921, where he died.

The Music

When he perfected his singing technique, Caruso rose meteorically in the world of opera. A tenor, Caruso debuted at Naples's Teatro Nuovo in 1894. He was approved by the composer Giacomo Puccini to sing the role of Rodolfo in La Bohème in the 1897 summer opera season at Livorno. The next year Caruso performed for Czar Nicholas II in St. Petersburg and at the Teatro La Opera in Buenos Aires. In 1900 Caruso began performing regularly at La Scala opera house in Milan. Caruso debuted in Covent Garden in London in 1902 and at the Metropolitan Opera in New York in 1903, where for the next seventeen seasons, until his death, he would star as the lead tenor. Caruso received $960 for each performance at the Metropolitan Opera, which in a few years reached three thousand dollars. For singing engagements, Caruso received as much as fifteen thousand dollars. He was paid a hundred thousand dollars for each of his two motion-picture appearances in 1919, in My Cousin and The Splendid Romance.

Enrico Caruso. (Library of Congress)

Gramophone Recordings. On April 11, 1902, Caruso made his first recording for the newly invented gramophone. In 1904 Caruso entered a long-term contract with Victor Talking Machine Company. The strength of his voice and his technical control were perfectly suited to phonographic technology, and his records were an incredible success. During his career he would make more than two hundred 78-rpm records, which sold millions of copies, earning Caruso as much as five million dollars, prompting some to ask, "Did Caruso make the gramophone or did the gramophone make Caruso?"

As can be heard on these recordings, despite their primitive technology, Caruso had a beautiful voice, often described as lyrical, velvety, and lustrous. Although a tenor, Caruso retained some of the rich timbre and lower register of a baritone. His voice was noble and bold, and yet it contained a disarming warmth and sweetness at its core. A practiced professional, Caruso had near-perfect control of his pitch, tone, and range. His intonation was flawless, his high notes clarion, his lower register dark and vibrant. He was capable of precise phrasing, with a mastery of portamento and legato. Caruso had tremendous lung and chest capacity, with disciplined breath and diaphragm control. His voice was flexible, and he adapted it with precision to every role. Excelling in the older bel canto style, Caruso had a lively, masculine voice that was also well suited to the newer realistic verismo style. He was unabashed in exhibiting passionate, emotional singing. In addition to opera, Caruso's concert and recording repertoire included famous Neapolitan love songs, such as "Santa Lucia" and "O sole mio."

Vesti la Giubba. Caruso first sung the role of Canio in Ruggero Leoncavallo's Pagliacci in 1897. It would become Caruso's most famous role, and he sang it in seventy-eight major productions. His versatility and passion were put to great effect as Canio, the head of a troupe of traveling comic players, who sings with ironic laughter, pathos, and rage. Caruso's rendition of Canio's final aria, "Vesti la giubba" (put on the costume), with its heart-rending plea of "Ridi Pagliacco" (laugh, clown) and sobbing conclusion, overpowered listeners. In 1907

Caruso's recording of "Vesti la giubba" was the first record to sell more than a million copies.

"Over There." With his colorful personality, generosity, and Italian mannerisms, Caruso was an appealing celebrity to millions of Americans. He returned America's affection, despite a 1906 conviction for pinching a woman at the Central Park Zoo. Caruso raised money for the Allied effort in World War I, adopting George M. Cohan's patriotic war song, "Over There," which he sang at Liberty Bond rallies throughout the country. On September 19, 1918, he sang "Over There" before a huge audience in New York's Central Park, and his heroic recording of the song in 1918 in English and French is thrilling, expressing the martial spirit of the song with great energy.

Musical Legacy

Caruso is one of the great opera tenors of all time, in a celebrated tradition dating from eighteenth century star Luigi Bassi to twentieth century star Luciano Pavarotti. Caruso's fame coincided with the rise of the phonograph, and as such Caruso became the first international celebrity of singing, whose mellifluous voice was heard by vast audiences. His recordings had the widest influence, loved by millions of people who knew little about opera. Caruso changed the world of opera, reestablishing the celebrated role of male tenor, perfecting verismo style, and bringing operatic sensibilities to a wide populace.

Howard Bromberg

Further Reading

Caruso, Dorothy. Enrico Caruso: His Life and Death. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1945. These memoirs by Caruso's last wife served as the basis for the 1956 film The Great Caruso, starring Mario Lanza.

Caruso, Enrico, Jr., and Andrew Farkas. Enrico Caruso: My Father and My Family. Portland, Oreg.: Amadeus Press, 1990. Caruso's youngest son relates firsthand information about his father, and he focuses on his and his siblings' chaotic lives as the children of Caruso.

Marafioti, P. M. Caruso's Method of Voice Production. Mineola, N.Y.: Dover Publications, 1981. This describes Caruso's scientific and methodical approach to voice control.

Scott, Michael. The Great Caruso. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1989. This comprehensive biography offers a critical assessment of Caruso's phonographic career. Includes detailed discography.

See also: Björling, Jussi; Cohan, George M.; Dodge, Charles; Melba, Dame Nellie; Pavarotti, Luciano; Puccini, Giacomo; Puente, Tito.

Henri Casadesus

French classical composer and arranger

A member of an illustrious French family of musicians, Casadesus founded the Société des Instruments Anciens, dedicated to the performance and dissemination of early music. He was a notable advocate of the viola d'amore, reviving the instrument's popularity.

Born: September 30, 1879; Paris, France
Died: May 31, 1947; Paris, France

Principal works

OPERETTA (music): Le Rosier, 1923 (libretto by Maurice Devilliers).

ORCHESTRAL WORKS: Concerto for Viola and Orchestra in B Minor, 1924; Twenty-four Preludes for Viola d'Amore and Harp, 1931; Concerto for Viola in C Minor, 1947.

VOCAL WORKS: La Sommeilleuse, 1949; Sur les jolis ponts de Paris, 1949.

Principal recordings

ALBUM (as arranger): Maurice Maréchal Book 3, 1998.

The Life

Henri Casadesus (kas-ah-DEE-sus) was the son of Louis Casadesus, an amateur violinist and guitarist. Seven of Louis's children became professional musicians, including Francis, founder and director of the American Conservatory at Fontainebleau, and Robert, a pianist and composer. Casadesus was educated at the Paris Conservatory, where he studied music history with Albert Lavignac and viola with Théophile Laforge.

Between 1910 and 1917, Casadesus was violist for the Capet Quartet. He also served as director of the Théâtre de la Gaîté-Lyrique in Paris and the opera theater of Liège, Belgium. With bassist Edouard Nanny, Casadesus performed concerts of early music, leading to the formation of the Société des Instruments Anciens Casadesus in 1901. Camille Saint-Saëns was named honorary president.

The group's membership included, at various times, Casadesus's brothers Marcel and Marius on viola da gamba and pardessus de viole and his sister, Regina Patorni-Casadesus, on harpsichord. Another brother, Francis, occasionally conducted the group. Their repertoire included "rediscovered" works of old masters and lesser known composers such as François Francœeur and Jean-Joseph Mouret. Many of these works were likely composed by Casadesus and other members of the group. Casadesus amassed a large collection of musical instruments, some of which he sold to the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1926.

The Music

Casadesus's notable works are those that he wrote and attributed to early composers, such as George Frideric Handel and Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach. In this sense, he was much like his contemporary Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, who also composed works in the style of other composers and did not acknowledge who had created them. Casadesus also wrote operettas, ballet music, film scores, songs, and a method for viola d'amore. In general he was a master of late-Baroque styles, but his music, forged and otherwise, recounts these historical genres from a nineteenth century perspective. His operettas are derivative of the works of Jacques Offenbach but possess a classical bent with clear textures and lyric content.

Le Rosier. Set to a libretto by Maurice Devilliers, a member of the Société des Instruments Anciens, the work premiered in 1923 at the Liège Opera and later, in Paris, at the Théâtre des Folies-Dramatiques in 1925. The operetta was one of several similar works composed by Casadesus after World War I, likely to raise money for the financially strapped musician. Set in three acts with an obligatory ballet, the work is well crafted if not derivative. Stylistically, Le Rosier recalls nineteenth century opéra bouffe, including a cancan and alternating vocal combinations with ensembles. Casadesus employs chromaticism and nonharmonic tones strategically throughout but never at the expense of tonal clarity and lyrical melodies.

Concerto for Viola and Orchestra in B Minor. Originally published in 1924 as a work by Handel, subsequent analysis has determined that it is a work by Casadesus in the style of Handel. Written for viola and orchestra, the work has been transcribed for a number of other instruments, and its popularity is evidenced by performances by the famous violist William Primrose and by its appearance in the Suzuki-method canon. The work enjoyed significant fame as a Handel concerto until its true origins were discovered in the 1950's, and it demonstrates that Casadesus had a masterly command of the Handel compositional style.

Set in three movements, the concerto possesses the virtuosic, the expressive, and the rhythmic vitality inherent in many works of its kind. In typical Baroque concerto fashion, the first movement is built on rapid sixteenth-note figures weaving in and out of closely related tonalities. The second movement is slow and expressively lyrical, with a simple but emotionally rich melody. The last movement is lively and playful, with continuous motion throughout.

Twenty-four Preludes for Viola d'Amore and Harp. Published in 1931 as part of the Technique de la viole d'amour, an instructional method for the instrument, the preludes span the gamut of Baroque compositional styles. Though the music is historically derived, the works are well crafted and musically charming, highlighting Casadesus's unique compositional abilities.

Concerto for Viola in C Minor. This concerto was performed by the Société des Instruments Anciens and eventually published in 1947. It was attributed to Johann Christian Bach until further stylistic research led to the conclusion that it was written by Casadesus. The work is characterized less by the gallant style that one might expect from Bach and more by rich Romantic textures.

The first and last movements are characterized by rapid rhythmic figurations, and the middle movement is slower and more lyrical. The opening allegro has a vibrant and dramatic theme shared by orchestra and solo, accompanied by richly textured harmonies. The slow adagio is expressive, with a highly ornamented melody. The last movement is in the style of a gigue, with a solo voice performing energetic arpeggiations capped with a climactic cadenza.

Musical Legacy

Although his performance style was embedded in a Romantic conception of early music, Casadesus was an important figure in the historic performance movement of the first half of the twentieth century. As leader of the Société des Instruments Anciens, he brought the music of early composers to audiences around the world. He played a significant role in the rebirth of the viola d'amore by promoting it as an expressive musical instrument and not merely a museum piece. His compositions for the instrument reflected an impressive creative gift and musicality. Casadesus's uncanny talent for mimicry assured his legacy as a first-rate musical forger. He mastered the style of the late Baroque and presented his own work as that of older masters. His contributions to operetta demonstrated a high level of craftsmanship and command of this entertaining genre.

Brian Doherty

Further Reading

Haskell, Harry. The Early Music Revival: A History. London: Thames & Hudson, 1988. Examines Casadesus's role in the evolution of the early music movement.

IBM Gallery of Science and Art. The Casadesus Collection of Old Musical Instruments. New York: IBM Gallery of Science and Art, 1964. A detailed description of the portion of Casadesus's instrument collection sold to the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1926. Includes background information on how Casadesus assembled the collection.

See also: Kreisler, Fritz; Suzuki, Shin'ichi.

Pablo Casals

Spanish classical cellist, composer, and conductor

Casals transformed cello technique and brought recognition to the cello as a solo instrument, contributing greatly to a reinvigoration of the music of Johann Sebastian Bach.

Born: December 29, 1876; El Vendrell, Catalonia, Spain
Died: October 22, 1973; San Juan, Puerto Rico
Also known as: Pau Carlos Salvador Casals y Defilló (full name)

Principal works

CHORAL WORKS: El pessebre, 1960; Hymn for the United Nations, 1971.
ORCHESTRAL WORKS: Revérie, 1896 (for cello and piano); La Sardana, 1926; Sonata, 1972 (for violin and piano).

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: A Concert at the White House, November 13, 1961, 1961; The Art of Pablo Casals, 1964; Pablo Casals at Montserrat, 1968; Casals Conducts Mozart, 1970; Pablo Casals in Concert, 1972; Pablo Casals Conducts Beethoven, 1975; Bach: Suites for Cello, 1988; Pablo Casals Plays Works for Cello and Orchestra, 1989; Beethoven: Cello Sonatas, 1990; Casals Festivals at Prades, Vols. 1 and 2, 1991; Early Recordings, 1925-1928, 1994.

The Life

Pau Carlos Salvador Casals y Defilló, who would come to be known as Pablo Casals (kah-SAHLZ), was the third of eleven children born to Pilar Defilló i Amiguet and Carlos Casals i Riba. The couple resided in El Vendrell, Spain, a small Catalonian town to the southwest of Barcelona, where Carlos, a talented pianist and vocalist, served as organist at the local church, led a men's chorus, and gave private instruction in piano and voice. Thus the young Casals was immediately immersed in music. Soon after Pablo, or Pau, as he was known in Catalan, began piano studies at age four, his father permitted him to join the church choir, and by six or seven the child was composing short pieces for the piano. Pablo first heard a violoncello at the concert of a professional chamber trio in 1888, and at once he became enamored of the instrument. His father managed to obtain a small cello for his son, and Pablo, at twelve, began preliminary instruction. Within the same year, Pablo and his mother traveled to Barcelona, so that he could begin serious musical study at the Municipal School of Music.

As a student in Barcelona, Casals performed regularly with a trio at a local café and with several local orchestras. Wherever the young cellist went, his playing was well received and his talent widely recognized, perhaps most importantly by Isaac Albéniz, Spain's foremost pianist at the time. With Albéniz's recommendation, Casals came under the patronage of Count Guillermo Morphy y Férriz de Guzmán, private secretary to María Cristina, the queen regent of Spain. The count tutored Casals in a broad range of subjects, both academic and musical, and María Cristina, a pianist and enthusiastic patron of the arts, awarded Casals a stipend, enabling him to study at the Madrid Conservatory. After an unsuccessful attempt to transfer to the Brussels Conservatory and a short and disastrous stint as a professional musician in Paris, Casals returned to Barcelona in 1896. His reputation now well established within Spain, he performed in chamber concerts, in recitals, and as a soloist with the Madrid Symphony Orchestra.

Three years later Casals made his first major European solo debuts, most notably in London and Paris. He toured extensively from 1899 through 1906, quickly achieving an international fame unrivaled by any cellist up until that time. He made his North American debut in 1901, he toured South America in 1903, and he performed in Russia for the first time in 1905. Success as a soloist created opportunities to perform chamber music with outstanding musicians of the day. In late 1905 or early 1906 Casals formed a chamber trio with the pianist Alfred Cortot and the violinist Jacques Thibaud, two talented French musicians who were accomplished soloists. The superstar trio performed together for almost thirty years and left several recordings as testament to their brilliant musicianship.

By the age of thirty, Casals had achieved international stardom, which in turn brought considerable wealth. For a time, he found romance with a Portuguese cellist, Guilhermina Suggia, who lived with him in Paris for several years. Later, after an extremely brief courtship, he married an American soprano, Susan Scott Metcalfe, in April of 1914. However, the couple separated in 1927, eventually divorcing in 1957 so that Casals could marry his dying companion, Franchisca Vidal de Capdevila, a former student who had accompanied him into exile at the end of the Spanish Civil War.

By 1920, realizing the cello did not completely satisfy his musical creativity, Casals mounted the conductor's podium. That year he formed the Orquestra Pau Casals, which he conducted from its base in Barcelona until 1936, the year that marked the beginning of the conflict in Spain between the elected republican government and the Fascist opposition led by General Francisco Franco. When Franco assumed power in 1939, Casals, an ardent republican, was forced into exile. He relocated to Prades, France, and resided there during World War II, performing only sporadically and always to benefit victims of the European conflict and Franco's tyranny.

Casals's opposition to Franco was so vehement that Casals publicly declared his intent never to perform in countries that recognized the Fascist state of Spain. His music making continued, a tool he utilized to promote global peace and democracy. Casals spoke and performed several times at the United Nations, and he was a candidate for the Nobel Peace Prize in 1958. A year earlier he had set up residence in Puerto Rico, the birthplace of his mother and the home of his soon-to-be-bride, Marta Montañez, a cello student sixty years his junior.

In the last twenty years of his long life, Casals appeared as a cellist, a conductor, and a pedagogue at festivals in Prades and Puerto Rico. At the age of ninety-four, Casals performed for the last time at the United Nations, once again calling attention to the plight of his homeland, Catalonia, a region whose existence was being threatened by Franco's nationalist policies. Casals died in 1973, at the age of ninety-six, in San Juan, Puerto Rico, surrounded by friends, family, and the music of Bach.

The Music

New Cello Technique. Casals began to revolutionize the technique of playing cello before he was fifteen. Nineteenth century conventions dictated that the cellist hold the bow arm close to the body, thus forcing the right wrist to be crooked and, in Casals's view, creating unnecessary tension. José García, Casals's cello teacher, instructed his students to practice with a book held under the right arm in order to ensure proximity between the arm and the body. However, Casals chose to practice without the book, which enabled greater freedom of movement and permitted a more expressive variety of sounds to be produced. García also taught that the fingers of the left hand should be kept close to one another, requiring the cellist to shift the hand position in order to traverse the lengthy cello fingerboard and creating unwanted interruptions in the musical line. Casals instead played with his left hand in an open position, permitting him to extend his fingers to reach notes, decreasing the number of hand shifts, and preserving musical continuity. His technical innovations arose from his need for a particular musical result from the cello.

Pablo Casals. (Library of Congress)

Musical Interpretation. Under the influence of French philosopher Henri-Louis Bergson, Casals believed that music was a creative life force common to all humanity. Because he considered human life to be dynamic, he aspired to create a similar dynamism in his music. Casals described music as a "succession of rainbows"; in other words, music is constantly in oscillation, and each note or phrase comes in the context of a musical ebb and flow. For example, the pitches of a melody go higher or lower, and the tempo of the music slows or accelerates. The task of the interpreter is to bring these changes to the fore. When Casals played, long notes or repeated notes never slumped into monotony. Such notes were growing or subsiding, creating direction and sustaining vitality.

Casals often dropped the fingers of his left hand onto the fingerboard in a percussive manner, sometimes even plucking the string with his left hand, to set the string in vibration prior to the playing of a note, which created a robust, clean sound. He colored the tone by portamento (sliding the left hand's fingers on the strings), by varying the speed of his vibrato, and by experimenting with the strings' sonorities. Intonation was an expressive tool for Casals. Unlike the pianist, the string player can raise or lower the pitch by small increments, and Casals applied this technique in order to emphasize harmonic relationships between a succession of notes or those within a chord.

Casals and Bach. Casals's technical ingenuity was astounding, but his ultimate aim was to reveal the beauty of the composer's score. For Casals, the greatest composer was Johann Sebastian Bach. Casals discovered Bach's Six Suites for Unaccompanied Cello when he was thirteen, at a time when the German Baroque composer was largely neglected. Though it was relatively unheard of to perform more than a movement or two of a suite, twelve years later Casals would often include an entire suite in his recital programs. He revered Bach, and the Six Suites for Unaccompanied Cello were an integral part of his daily life. Casals actively promoted the composer throughout his lifetime, bringing new recognition to the forgotten genius. Bach was born again in Casals's lively and deep interpretations.

In Bach's brilliant polyphonic writing, Casals perceived a vast emotional spectrum, ranging from playfulness to pathos. He conveyed the various moods embedded in the music through a calculated use of rubato (the stretching or compression of the rhythmic pulse), applied in a manner that did not upset the dancelike quality of the movements. For this and other reasons—one being Casals's occasional use of portamento—his interpretations have been criticized by some musical purists who insist upon a strict adherence to the stylistic conventions of the composer's time. Casals contended, however, that the studied application of technical and stylistic innovations would facilitate musical expression and elucidate timeless and profound meaning. Believing in the inevitability of new musical insights and the potential for multitudes of valid interpretations, he chose never to edit a published manuscript of the Six Suites for Unaccompanied Cello.

Musical Legacy

Largely ignored by eighteenth century and Romantic composers, the cello rarely rated a concerto setting. However, with a virtuosic technique, an impeccable intonation, a powerfully beautiful sound, and an assured and profound musicality, Casals convinced the world of the cello's worth as a solo instrument. Memorable cello concerti by composers Edward Elgar and Dmitri Shostakovich perhaps attest to Casals's elevation of the instrument. As a cellist, Casals achieved international renown and paved the way for such great twentieth century cellists as Gregor Piatigorsky, Jacqueline du Pré, and Mstislav Rostropovich and such twenty-first century cellists as Yo-Yo Ma and Mischa Maisky.

Joshua Addison

Further Reading

Baldock, Robert. Pablo Casals. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1992. Compact yet comprehensive biography with photographs and a discography.

Blum, David. Casals and the Art of Interpretation. Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1977. Details Casals's philosophy of musical interpretation, with a chapter on the music of Johann Sebastian Bach, for whom the cellist exhibited a lifelong affinity.

Corredor, Josep M. Conversations with Casals. Translated by André Mangeot. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1956. A series of interviews with Casals provides valuable insights into the mind and the convictions of the maestro.

Henle, Fritz. Casals. Garden City, N.Y.: American Photographic, 1975. Casals's words of wisdom juxtaposed with a series of photographs taken in 1972, when Casals was ninety-five.

Kahn, Albert E. Joys and Sorrows: Reflections by Pablo Casals. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1970. Casals's autobiography, as told to Kahn, which reveals the cellist's musical philosophy and political convictions.

See also: du Pré, Jacqueline; Hawkins, Coleman; Rostropovich, Mstislav; Rubinstein, Artur; Segovia, Andrés; Shostakovich, Dmitri.

Johnny Cash

American country singer, guitarist, and songwriter

Singing of the trials and tribulations of the common man, Cash sold more than fifty million albums during his lifetime.

Born: February 26, 1932; Kingsland, Arkansas
Died: September 12, 2003; Nashville, Tennessee
Also known as: J. R. Cash (full name); the Man in Black Member of: Johnny Cash and the Tennessee Two; Johnny Cash and the Tennessee Three; the Highwaymen

Principal works

MUSICAL THEATER: Return to the Promised Land, 1992 (music and lyrics with June Cash).

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Johnny Cash with His Hot and Blue Guitar, 1957; The Fabulous Johnny Cash, 1958; Hymns, 1959; Songs of Our Soil, 1959; Ride This Train, 1960; Blood, Sweat, and Tears, 1963; Ring of Fire, 1963; Bitter Tears: Ballads of the American Indian, 1964; I Walk the Line, 1964; Keep on the Sunny Side, 1964 (with June Carter); Johnny Cash Sings the Ballads of the True West, 1965; Orange Blossom Special, 1965; Mean as Hell, 1966; Carryin' on with Johnny Cash and June Carter, 1967; Johnny Cash at Folsom Prison, 1968; The Holy Land, 1969; Johnny Cash at San Quentin, 1969; Story Songs of the Trains and Rivers, 1969 (with the Tennessee Two); Hello, I'm Johnny Cash, 1970; Little Fauss and Big Halsy, 1970 (with Carl Perkins and Bob Dylan); Singing Storyteller, 1970 (with the Tennessee Two); The World of Johnny Cash, 1970; Johnny Cash and Jerry Lee Lewis Sing Hank Williams, 1971; The Man in Black, 1971; America, 1972; Folsom Prison Blues, 1972; Give My Love to Rose, 1972 (with June Carter Cash); A Thing Called Love, 1972; Any Old Wind That Blows, 1973; Johnny Cash and His Woman, 1973 (with June Carter Cash); Five Feet High and Rising, 1974; The Junkie and the Juicehead Minus Me, 1974; Ragged Old Flag, 1974; Johnny Cash Sings Precious Memories, 1975; Destination Victoria Station, 1976; One Piece at a Time, 1976; Strawberry Cake, 1976; Last Gunfighter Ballad, 1977; The Rambler, 1977; Gone Girl, 1978; Silver, 1979; A Believer Sings the Truth, 1980; Rockabilly Blues, 1980; The Baron, 1981; The Adventures of Johnny Cash, 1982; Highwayman, 1985 (with the Highwaymen); Rainbow, 1985; Believe in Him, 1986; Class of '55 (Memphis Rock and Roll Homecoming), 1986 (with Roy Orbison, Jerry Lee Lewis, and Carl Perkins); Heroes, 1986 (with Waylon Jennings); Johnny Cash Is Coming to Town, 1987; Water from the Wells of Home, 1988; Highwayman 2, 1990 (with the Highwaymen); The Mystery of Life, 1991; American Recordings, 1994; The Road Goes on Forever, 1995 (with the Highwaymen); Unchained, 1996; American III: Solitary Man, 2000; American IV: The Man Comes Around, 2002.

WRITINGS OF INTEREST: Man in Black: His Own Story in His Own Words, 1975 (autobiography); Cash: The Autobiography, 1997 (with Patrick Carr).

The Life

Johnny Cash, born J. R. Cash, was the son of Ray and Carrie Cash, both of Scottish descent. His parents were involved in the New Deal farm program and settled on land in Dyess Colony in northeast Arkansas. When he was young, he joined his family in picking cotton on the farm and sang with them while they worked. A flood that devastated the family farm inspired a song he wrote many years later called "Five Feet High and Rising." When Cash was twelve years old, his older brother, Jack, died in an accident involving a table saw, an incident that Cash suggested may have provided the dark edge to his music.

Gospel and radio music permeated his childhood, and he started to write songs as a boy. He sang on a radio station in high school and later enlisted in the U.S. Air Force as a radio operator. He was assigned to a U.S. Air Force Security Service unit in Landsberg, Germany, where he bought his first guitar and started a band. After his service in the Air Force ended in 1954, he married Vivian Liberto, whom he had met during technical training at Brooks Air Force Base in San Antonio, Texas. Their first child, Rosanne Cash, was born in 1955. That year the family moved to Nashville, where Cash sold appliances while he studied to be a radio announcer.

His musical career took off in the 1960's, but Cash started to drink heavily and became addicted to amphetamines, using "uppers" to stay awake during tours. Despite the fact that he and Vivian had four daughters, their marriage did not survive Cash's constant touring and drug abuse. Vivian and Cash divorced in 1966.

By the mid-1960's, Cash's singing partner, June Carter, had helped him overcome his addiction. Carter was a member of one of the most influential singing groups in country music, the Carter Family. Although Carter and Cash were married to other people when they met, they fell in love and were married in 1968.

By the end of the 1960's, many people considered Cash the hottest recording artist, outselling The Beatles. From 1969 to 1971 The Johnny Cash Show ran on ABC, featuring such diverse guests as Louis Armstrong, Neil Young, Merle Haggard, and Bob Dylan. The Statler Brothers opened every show for him.

In the mid-1970's, Cash's singing career started to decline, but at the same time his Christian faith grew. With his friend, the Reverend Billy Graham, he cowrote and narrated a film about the life of Jesus titled The Gospel Road. He also continued to appear in televised Christmas specials and with June Carter on the television series Little House on the Prairie.

Johnny Cash. (AP/Wide World Photos)

During the 1980's, Cash appeared as an actor in several television films. He also suffered a severe abdominal injury and underwent heart bypass surgery in 1988. After Columbia Records dropped Cash's recording contract, he had an unsuccessful partnership with Mercury Records and in the early 1990's signed with the American Recordings label. In 1997 Cash was diagnosed with autonomic neuropathy associated with diabetes. A year later he was hospitalized with severe pneumonia, which damaged his lungs.

Carter died during heart-valve surgery on May 15, 2003. While hospitalized at Baptist Hospital in Nashville, Tennessee, Cash followed her in death on September 12, 2003.

The Music

Known for his distinctive baritone, the sound of his backup band, and his black clothes, Cash had perhaps the most recognized voice in country music. With his sold-out tours and more than fifteen hundred recordings, he left an impressive body of work. Although it is not easy for country artists to cross over to a different genre, during his long career Cash successfully recorded folk, rockabilly, blues, rock and roll, gospel, and popular music. He was inducted into the Nashville Songwriters Hall of Fame as well as the Country Music Hall of Fame, at forty-eight the youngest living inductee. He received the Kennedy Center Honors in 1996. His songs were about love, humor, those down and out, and prisoners; later in his life, his themes were moral tribulation and redemption.

Early Works. Cash signed with the Sun Records label in the mid-1950's, and in 1956 he became a full-time musician after his two-sided hit, "So Doggone Lonesome" and "Folsom Prison Blues," jumped to number five on the Billboard country chart. A draft of "Folsom Prison Blues" had been written earlier, when Cash was in the service in West Germany and saw the movie Inside the Walls of Folsom Prison. He had great sympathy for prisoners and began performing prison concerts starting in the late 1950's. These concerts produced two successful albums issued in the late 1960's: Johnny Cash at Folsom Prison, introduced by his moving rendition of "Folsom Prison Blues," and Johnny Cash at San Quentin. "Folsom Prison Blues" became one of his signature songs and was followed by "I Walk the Line," Cash's first number-one country hit and entry on the popular Top 20 chart. "I Walk the Line" is a love song attesting to his fidelity by keeping "a close watch on this heart of mine." By 1958, with more than six million records sold, Cash felt constrained by Sun's small label and signed with Columbia Records.

"Ring of Fire." This song was written by Carter and Merle Kilgore, who eventually became a manager for other recording artists. Although Carter was married to another man when she wrote the lyrics, the words came to her while she was driving down a highway early one morning, thinking about the dangers of falling in love with Cash. She was frightened by his drug abuse, and it came to her that loving him was like a ring of fire. When the song was completed, Carter's sister Anita recorded it to little notice for her 1962 album of the same name. However, a year later, using mariachi-style horns, Cash recorded "Ring of Fire," and it became the biggest hit of his career, remaining number one on the charts for seven weeks. Since then, numerous versions of the song have been produced. In 1990, twenty-seven years after Cash released it, Social Distortion recorded it to great commercial success.

"A Boy Named Sue." Written by Shel Silverstein, a songwriter and author best known for his whimsical children's books, the song was inspired by humorist Jean Shepherd, a friend of Silverstein who was teased as a child for his first name. Cash first heard "A Boy Named Sue" at an informal gathering of musicians in Nashville where Silverstein sang his song. Carter thought it would be a great song for Cash, and later, when they left to record Live at San Quentin, they took it along. Cash sang the song unrehearsed for the first time in front of the prison audience. The recording became a hit, rising to number one on the country charts and to number two on the pop charts. It also became Cash's first hit in England and Ireland. "A Boy Named Sue" tells the unlikely story of a boy who grows up resentful of his father, both for leaving him and for giving him a girl's name. Later the boy, now grown, meets his father in a bar and finally understands that the father gave him the name "Sue" to make him tough.

Musical Legacy

Cash was legendary for the longevity of his career. His signature tune, "Folsom Prison Blues," was recorded and became a hit in 1956, and his video Hurt won an MTV Video Music Award forty-seven years later. Although his career experienced slumps, especially in the mid-1960's when he became addicted to drugs, by the end of that decade he was the voice of country music. Again, in the 1980's, his recording career and connections with the Nashville establishment sank to an all-time low. In the 1990's his career was rejuvenated, and he became popular all over again with a new generation of young people who were admirers of rock and hip-hop. He continued to earn industry awards and enjoyed remarkable commercial success.

Cash influenced numerous artists and was the first to record the songs of Kris Kristofferson and Bob Dylan, who later became popular artists in their own right. He had a long friendship with Dylan, who cited Cash as a major influence on his own work. Cash welcomed Ray Charles to Nashville when Charles came to record his first country song there and became his lifelong friend. Cash was a pioneer in the rockabilly sound and early rock and roll, and for his contributions he was recognized by the Rockabilly Hall of Fame and the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame. An Academy Award-winning film biography of Cash, Walk the Line, was released in 2005 to both commercial and critical success.

Sheila Golburgh Johnson

Further Reading

Cash, Johnny, with Patrick Carr. Cash: The Autobiography. New York: HarperCollins, 1997. Cash attributes his life, health, and success to Carter.

Streissguth, Michael. Johnny Cash at Folsom Prison: The Making of a Masterpiece. Cambridge, Mass.: Da Capo Press, 2004. Examines in depth the legendary concert at Folsom Prison and the live album, placing the concert in the greater context of Cash's career and the music of the times.

_____. Johnny Cash: The Biography. Cambridge, Mass.: Da Capo Press, 2006. Relying on interviews with family members such as Cash's daughter, Rosanne, this book paints a fairly objective picture of Cash and illustrates the influence of his family members while he was growing up.

Turner, Steve. The Man Called Cash: The Life, Love, and Faith of an American Legend. Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 2004. This authorized biography, which deals fairly and honestly with Cash's personal issues, was published in time for the first anniversary of the singer's death and relies heavily on interviews with such Cash fans as Larry Gatlin and Kris Kristofferson.

Urbanski, Dave. The Man Comes Around: The Spiritual Journey of Johnny Cash. New York: Relevant Books, 2003. A spiritual chronicle of Cash's life explores in detail the highs and lows and the failures and successes. His faith became more important to him as he grew older.

See also: Axton, Hoyt; Carter, Maybelle; Charles, Ray; Diamond, Neil; Dorsey, Thomas A.;

Dylan, Bob; Harris, Emmylou; Howlin' Wolf; Jennings, Waylon; Kristofferson, Kris; Leadbelly; Lewis, Jerry Lee; Monroe, Bill; Nelson, Ricky; Nelson, Willie; Orbison, Roy; Perkins, Carl; Ritchie, Jean; Strummer, Joe; Tubb, Ernest.

Ray Charles

American rhythm-and-blues pianist, singer, and songwriter

Charles helped shape the sound of rhythm and blues and soul, and he was one of the first musicians to own his master recordings.

Born: September 23, 1930; Albany, Georgia
Died: June 10, 2004; Beverly Hills, California
Also known as: Ray Charles Robinson (birth name)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Confession Blues, 1954; The Great Ray Charles, 1957; Ray Charles, 1957; Soul Brothers, 1958 (with Milt Jackson); Yes, Indeed!!, 1958; The Genius of Ray Charles, 1959; Genius + Soul = Jazz, 1960; The Genius Hits the Road, 1960; Ray Charles in Person, 1960; Ray Charles Sextet, 1960; Dedicated to You, 1961; Do the Twist with Ray Charles!, 1961; The Genius After Hours, 1961; The Genius Sings the Blues, 1961; Ray Charles and Betty Carter, 1961 (with Betty Carter); Soul Meeting, 1961 (with Jackson); Hallelujah I Love Her So!, 1962; Modern Sounds in Country and Western Music, 1962; Modern Sounds in Country and Western Music, Vol. 2, 1962; Spotlight on Ray Charles, 1962; Ingredients in a Recipe for Soul, 1963; Have a Smile with Me, 1964; Sweet and Sour Tears, 1964; Country and Western Meets Rhythm and Blues, 1965; Crying Time, 1966; Ray's Moods, 1966; A Man and His Soul, 1967; Ray Charles Invites You to Listen, 1967; Doing His Best, 1969; I'm All Yours, Baby!, 1969; Love Country Style, 1970; My Kind of Jazz, 1970; Volcanic Action of My Soul, 1971; A Message from the People, 1972; Presents the Raelettes, 1972; Through the Eyes of Love, 1972; My Kind of Jazz, Number 2, 1973; My Kind of Jazz, Pt. 3, 1975; Renaissance, 1975; World of Ray Charles, Vol. 2, 1975; True to Life, 1977; Love and Peace, 1978; Ain't It So, 1979; Brother Ray Is at It Again, 1980; Wish You Were Here Tonight, 1983; Do I Ever Cross Your Mind, 1984; Friendship, 1984; The Spirit of Christmas, 1985; From the Pages of My Heart, 1986; Just Between Us, 1988; What Would You Believe, 1990; My World, 1993; Strong Love Affair, 1996; I Wonder Who's Kissing Her Now, 1997; Blues, 1999; Thanks for Bringing Love Around Again, 2002; Portrait, 2003; Ray Charles Portrait, 2003; Genius Loves Company, 2004; At Newport, 2005; Genius and Friends, 2005; With the Voice of Jubilation Choir, 2006.

SINGLES: "Basin Street Blues," 1960; "Baby It's Cold Outside," 1961 (with Betty Carter); "Hit the Road Jack," 1962; "I Can't Stop Loving You," 1963; "Ballad of Ray Charles," 1964; "Ballad Style of Ray Charles," 1965; "Ray Charles Sings," 1965; "Swinging Style," 1965; "Take These Chains," 1965; "Busted," 1966; "What'd I Say," 1975; "Seven Spanish Angels," 1988; "I'll Take Care of You," 1990; "Fresh Out of Tears," 1991; "Living Without You," 1991; "Song for You," 1993; "Ellie My Love," 2004; "Here We Go Again," 2005.

The Life

Ray Charles was born to impoverished parents Aretha Williams, who stacked boards in a sawmill, and Bailey Robinson, a railroad repairman, mechanic, and handyman. His parents were not married, and when Charles was an infant, the family moved to Greenville, Florida. Bailey, who had three other families, later abandoned Aretha with her two sons, and she raised her children on her own.

When Charles was five, he witnessed his younger brother George drown in his mother's portable laundry tub. At the age of six, Charles suffered from glaucoma, and he began to lose his sight. By age seven, he was totally blind. His mother sent him to the St. Augustine School for the Deaf and the Blind in St. Augustine, Florida, and she died two years later. At the school, Charles received a formal musical education, learning to read, to write, to arrange music in Braille, and to score for big bands. In addition, he learned how to play piano, organ, saxophone, clarinet, and trumpet.

Charles moved to Seattle in 1947 and formed a trio, which emulated the style of Nat King Cole and Charles Brown. At this time, to avoid being confused with boxer Sugar Ray Robinson, Charles dropped the Robinson from his name. In 1952 Atlantic Records signed him to a contract, and during the next year he enjoyed his first commercial success. Charles began using heroin during this time, and in 1965 he was arrested for possession of heroin and marijuana. At the time, he revealed that he had been addicted for nearly two decades. Although this was his third arrest, he was allowed to check in to a clinic in Los Angeles to recover and to avoid jail time. By 1966 he had completely recovered from his long-standing heroin addiction.

During the 1960's and 1970's, Charles released several hits, but as his music became increasingly sentimental, it fell from popularity. During the 1980's and 1990's, he became recognizable among younger audiences with his appearances in films, such as Blues Brothers (1980), and television shows, such as The Cosby Show and The Super Dave Osbourne Show.

Although he was exceptionally successful as a musician, Charles had a complicated private life. He was divorced twice, and he had twelve children, both in and outside his marriages. He was married to Eileen Williams for one year, between 1951 and 1952. Later, in 1955, he married Della Beatrice Howard, and they divorced in 1977.

In 2004, even though he was suffering from liver disease, Charles worked on a recording project of duets (Genius Loves Company) with musicians Willie Nelson, Bonnie Raitt, B. B. King, Elton John, and Norah Jones. He died from acute liver disease in 2004 at the age of seventy-three.

The Music

Charles's works reflect a broad array of music genres, including country, jazz, blues, funk, and pop. As an artist, he was as comfortable working in rock and roll as in the songs of George Gershwin. His career spanned fifty-eight years, and his music appeared on more than 250 albums, most of which have been top sellers in different musical genres.

Gospel. Charles brought a new perspective to gospel music, bringing it from the African American church tradition and making it popular among white audiences. Although he was highly criticized for this, he never stepped back. Charles was a pioneer in mixing gospel, jazz, blues, and rock and roll, opening new doors for musical artists. His highly developed and controlled technique as a performer made him greatly admired by audiences and other artists; singer Frank Sinatra called Charles "the only genius in the business."

"I Got a Woman." Charles's first rhythm-and-blues album was Confession Blues with Atlantic Records. A career-defining song from this album was "I Got a Woman," which was released as a single in December, 1954. Some believe that this song, a combination of gospel and rhythm, led to soul music. "I Got a Woman" was Charles's first number-one rhythm-and-blues hit, and it was later ranked number 235 in the list of the 500 Greatest Songs of All Time in Rolling Stone. The song utilized vocal techniques (moans and grunts) common in African American church music and applied them to explicitly sexual material. Charles withstood criticism for this, continuing to make this part of his performing style.

Ray Charles. (AP/Wide World Photos)

"I Can't Stop Loving You." This song was composed by country singer and songwriter Don Gibson and recorded in 1957. Charles recorded it in 1962, for his Modern Sounds in Country and Western Music album. His cover version features a string arrangement and a gospel choir. This love song about heartbreak peaked on the Billboard Hot 100 and the rhythm-and-blues and adult contemporary charts. It ranked number forty-nine on Country Music Television's 100 Greatest Songs in Country Music and number 161 on Rolling Stone's list of the 500 Greatest Songs of All Time.

"Hit the Road Jack." Charles's good friend Percy Mayfield wrote this song as a tribute to Jack Kerouac's novel On the Road (1957). "Hit the Road Jack" was on the Billboard Hot 100 chart at number one for two weeks in 1961, and it won the Grammy Award for Best Male Rhythm and Blues Recording in 1961. The jazzy song—about a woman asking her lover to leave—launched Charles to international stardom. It is played at sports events, for example, when a hockey player is sent to the penalty box or a basketball player is taken out of the game.

"Busted." Written by Nashville songwriter Harlan Howard and originally recorded by Johnny Cash in 1962, this song won for Charles the 1963 Grammy Award for Best Rhythm and Blues Recording. "Busted" is a country-style song about a farmer who is broke and has no hope in life. The single features brass arrangements and Charles's vocals.

"Georgia on My Mind." This song, with lyrics by Stuart Gorrell and music by Hoagy Carmichael, became the official state song of Georgia. However, it is not clear whether Gorrell's lyrics refer to Carmichael's sister, Georgia, or to the state of Georgia. Carmichael's autobiography, Sometimes I Wonder (1965), indicates that a friend suggested to Gorrell that he write a song about Georgia because you cannot go wrong writing about the South. Charles recorded the song for his album The Genius Hits the Road. On March 7, 1979, he performed the song before the Georgia General Assembly, and later, on April 24, 1979, the Assembly adopted it as the state song. The song is played on Georgia public television late Sunday nights when it goes off the air. It was also used as the theme song for the television situation comedy Designing Women. "Georgia on My Mind" has a string arrangement, female back vocals, and Charles's vocals and piano.

"Unchain My Heart." This song was written by Bobby Sharp, who sold it to Teddy Powell for fifty dollars in order to buy drugs. Charles's rendition became extremely popular, and later Powell demanded half the songwriting credit. Sharp fought for the rights to his song successfully, renewing the copyright for his publishing company (B. Sharp Music) in 1987.

When Charles released the single in 1961, it reached number one on the rhythm-and-blues chart and reached the Top 10 on the pop singles chart. "Unchain My Heart" was also the working title of the biographical film Ray (2004).

The song—about a man who wants to be free from a woman—features Charles accompanied by his female vocal group, the Raelettes, his longtime saxophonist David "Fathead" Newman, and other members of Charles's band, with brass and percussion. In 1987 Joe Cocker covered the song, popularizing it even further.

Musical Legacy

Charles inspired many blind musicians, such as Ronnie Milsap and Terri Gibbs, to be successful in the business. He brought a new singing style to country music with his landmark album Modern Sounds in Country and Western Music, and Genius Loves Company, a duet album, won eight Grammy Awards, including Album of the Year and Record of the Year. Charles was inducted into the Blues Foundation's Hall of Fame in 1982 and the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in its first year, 1986. He received the prestigious President's Merit Award from the Grammy organization. In his long career, Charles won twelve Grammy Awards and three Emmy nominations. He also received the Kennedy Center Honors, the Grammy Lifetime Achievement Award, and the National Medal of Arts. Rolling Stone ranked Charles at number ten on its list of the 100 Greatest Artists of All Time in 2004. He also received eight honorary doctorates, including one in 2003 from Dillard University in New Orleans. In October, 2004, a feature film based on his life story, Ray, opened to great success. The Ray Charles Robinson Foundation was established in 1987 to assist the hearing impaired. It has been rated one of the top five most competent nonprofit organizations, serving nearly 150 charities.

Dilek Göktürk

Further Reading

Charles, Ray, and David Ritz. Brother Ray: Ray Charles' Own Story. New York: Da Capo Press, 2004. Charles tells the story of his life (until 1978) in his own words. Written in a conversational style, this book is especially helpful in understanding the singer's early life.

Duggleby, John. Uh Huh! The Story of Ray Charles. New York: Morgan Reynolds, 2005. This excellent biography builds a convincing case for the significant contributions Charles made to twentieth century music, influencing the Beatles, Presley, and other musical icons. Includes color photographs.

Evans, Mike. Ray Charles and the Birth of Soul. London: Omnibus Press, 2007. Evans, who has written books on the Beatles and Presley, uses interviews with Charles to tell his life story. Since it was published after his death, the book covers Charles's entire life. Includes discography.

Lydon, Michael. Ray Charles: Man and Music. New York: Routledge, 2004. A veteran music journalist adds fresh details to Charles's life story, covering the performer as well as the offstage man. Includes photographs and bibliography.

See also: Blakey, Art; Burke, Solomon; Cash, Johnny; Cole, Nat King; Costello, Elvis; James, Etta; John, Sir Elton; Jones, Quincy; Jordan, Louis; King, B. B.; Morrison, Van; Nelson, Willie; Pickett, Wilson; Presley, Elvis; Rush, Otis; Sinatra, Frank.

Carlos Chávez

Mexican classical composer

Chávez's music balances traditional forms with intense chromaticism, nonrepetitive development, polyrhythms, contrapuntal textures, and a characteristic Mexican sound. He held significant government positions in the arts.

Born: June 13, 1899; Mexico City, Mexico
Died: August 2, 1978; Mexico City, Mexico
Also known as: Carlos Antonio de Padua Chávez y Ramírez (full name)

Principal works

BALLETS (music and libretto): El fuego nuevo, unstaged; written 1921 (The New Fire); Caballos de vapor, 1932 (Horsepower); La hija de Cólquide, 1946 (Dark Meadow; libretto by Martha Graham); Los cuatro soles, 1951.

CHAMBER WORKS: Sonatina, 1924 (for cello and piano); Energía, 1925; Sonata No. 3, 1930 (for four horns); Soli I, 1933; Toccata, 1941 (for six percussionists); Xochipilli: An Imagined Aztec Music, 1941 (for wind and percussion instruments); Violin Concerto, 1950; Invention, 1960 (for strings); Soli II, 1961 (for wind quintet); Soli IV, 1966.

CHORAL WORKS: Imágen Mexicana, 1923; El Sol, 1934 (The Sun); Ah! Freedome, 1942; Prometheus Bound, 1956.

OPERA (music): Panfilo and Lauretta, 1957 (libretto by Chester Kallman; based on Giovanni Boccaccio's Fiammetta; revised as The Visitors, 1973).

ORCHESTRAL WORKS: Symphony No. 1, 1933 (Sinfonía de Antígona); Chapultepec, 1935 (for a band); Symphony No. 2, 1935 (Sinfonía India); Concerto for Piano with Orchestra, 1938; Toccata para orquesta, 1947; Symphony No. 4, 1953 (Sinfonía romántica); Symphony No. 3, 1954; Symphony No. 5, 1953 (for string orchestra); Symphony No. 6, 1961; Resonancias, 1964; Soli III, 1965; Pirámide, 1968; Mañanas mexicanas, 1974 (for a band); Tzintzuntzan, 1974 (for a band); Zandunga Serenade, 1976 (for a band).

PIANO WORKS: Sonata No. 1, 1917 (Fantasia); Sonata No. 2, 1919; Ten Preludes, 1937; Sonata No. 4, 1941; Miniatura: Homenaje a Carl Deis, 1942; Danza de la pluma, 1943; Sonata No. 5, 1960; Sonata No. 6, 1961.

WRITINGS OF INTEREST: Toward a New Music: Music and Electricity, 1937; Musical Thought, 1961.

The Life

Carlos Antonio de Padua Chávez y Ramírez (CHAH-vehz ee rah-MIH-rehz) was born to Juvencia Ramírez, the principal of a school for young women, and Agustín Chávez, an inventor who died in 1904. His youth was framed by the Mexican Revolution (1910-1920), a period of intense political and social turmoil. When Chávez was around nine years old, he started studying piano with his brother Manuel and later with Asunción Parra. Between 1910 and 1914, he received piano lessons from the famous composer Manuel María Ponce, and between 1915 and 1920, he received piano lessons from Pedro Luis Ogazón. Chávez started composing for the piano by the age of ten, and he took lessons in harmony from Juan B. Fuentes. A determined autodidact, Chávez decided not to seek the instruction of a composition teacher; instead, he studied on his own the works of Ludwig van Beethoven, Richard Wagner, and Claude Debussy. Significant during his formative years were his family's frequent trips to Tlaxcala, where he came in contact with indigenous Native American music.

Chávez married the pianist Otilia Ortiz on September 1, 1922, and soon after they left to tour Europe for seven months. In Germany, the firm Bote und Bock accepted two of his piano pieces for publication, and in France the composer Paul Dukas encouraged him to continue incorporating popular music in his compositions. Back in North America, he traveled to New York, where he met Edgard Varèse, at the time one of the most visible proponents of musical modernism. Varèse commissioned him to write a chamber work, Energía, which he finished in 1925.

Back in Mexico, Chávez organized a series of concerts of new music between 1924 and 1926, featuring compositions by Béla Bartók, Arnold Schoenberg, Igor Stravinsky, and Edgard Varèse. Around this time, he finished the ballet Los cuatro soles, which dealt with Aztec mythology. Avoiding dependence on indigenous themes, the piece presented Native American sonorities, and it included indigenous percussion instruments in the orchestra. In 1926 Chávez traveled again to New York, where he worked in collaboration with muralist Diego Rivera on another ballet, Horsepower.

When Chávez returned to Mexico in 1928, the Musicians' Union asked him to direct the new Orquesta Sinfónica de México. Chávez was able to establish the first long-standing orchestra in the country, remaining its musical director for twenty-one seasons. In addition, in 1928 Chávez was appointed director of the National Conservatory of Music, where he reformed what he saw as an old-fashioned education. He developed courses in free composition, and among his students were Candelario Huizar and Silvestre Revueltas, as well as the Grupo de los Cuatro: Daniel Ayala, Blas Galindo, Salvador Contreras, and José Pablo Moncayo. Chávez also created in the conservatory the Academy of Investigation to collect and catalog indigenous music from Mexico, and he started the music journal Música, revista mexicana. In 1932 Chávez visited the RCA Victor studios in New Jersey and the Bell Telephone Laboratories in New York, and this gave birth to his book Toward a New Music: Music and Electricity.

In 1933 Chávez accepted the position of chief of the department of fine arts at the Secretariat of Public Education, where he oversaw programs in music, dance, and the arts, and he promoted interest in popular and indigenous Mexican culture. By 1940 Chávez's visibility in the United States led Nelson Rockefeller, at the time coordinator of the Office of Inter-American Affairs for the U.S. State Department, to invite Chávez to organize a series of concerts for an exhibit at the Museum of Modern Art in New York. At his request for a piece incorporating indigenous instruments Chávez composed Xochipilli: An Imagined Aztec Music for six percussion instruments and four wind instruments.

Carlos Chávez. (Library of Congress)

Chávez was inducted in the prestigious Colegio Nacional in 1943, and this provided him unprecedented governmental support. Together with other Mexican and expatriate Spanish composers, Chávez created the journal Nuestra Música and the publishing house Ediciones Mexicanas de Música. In 1947 the newly elected president of Mexico, Miguel Alemán, appointed Chávez to direct a new administrative body for the arts, the Instituto Nacional de Bellas Artes (INBA). Within the INBA, Chávez created a new orchestra, the Orquesta Sinfónica Nacional, which he guest conducted until 1971. His administrative duties slowed down Chávez's compositional production, although he finished his Violin Concerto before his retirement in 1952.

The years between 1953 and 1961 were quite prolific for Chávez, both as a composer and as a teacher. During this period he finished the last four of his six symphonies and several other pieces. During this time, he gave summer courses at Tanglewood in 1953, he had a lectureship at the University of Buffalo, and he held the Charles Eliot Norton Poetic Chair at Harvard University between 1958 and 1959. The lectures given at Harvard were eventually published in 1961 as Musical Thought.

In 1959 Chávez started a series of composition workshops in the National Conservatory. Among his most prominent students were Eduardo Mata, Hector Quintanar, and Mario Lavista. As the 1960's advanced, Chávez's compositions moved toward the progressive and even experimental. Works such as Resonancias for orchestra and Soli III, for bassoon, trumpet, viola, timpani and orchestra, present high chromaticism, atonality, and they exemplify what he called nonrepetitive procedures.

Always a critic of tradition-bound education, Chávez lectured in 1969 regarding the substandard teaching of the National Conservatory and the poor direction of the Orquesta Sinfónica Nacional. Following this criticism, President Luis Echeverría appointed Chávez in 1971 to develop a national plan for music. Chávez assumed the position of head of the music department at INBA and the direction of the Orquesta Sinfónica Nacional. A strike by orchestra members who did not agree with Chávez's policies and the lack of support from the government that had appointed him caused his resignation from both positions. During the 1970's, Chávez continued composing and revising earlier works, and his indefatigable interest in teaching continued with lectureships in several universities and colleges in the United States and England. Weakened during the last couple of years of his life, Chávez died of cancer on August 2, 1978.

The Music

Chávez's music helped define Mexican nationalist art music in the mid-twentieth century, although his compositions were strongly embedded in the classical and Romantic traditions of Western Europe. His traditional forms and intense polyphonic textures that privilege counterpoint over harmonic constructions show a highly intellectual compositional process. At the same time, although his music adopts elements from Mexican indigenous and popular music sources, he avoids the common cliché of quoting folkloric melodies. The nationalistic tendency in Chávez's compositional output peaks in the early 1930's. Compositions such as El Sol, Chapultepec, and the successful Sinfonía India show nationalist topics, musical materials, and texts deriving from both Native American and revolutionary Mexican sources. Nevertheless, Chávez's creative output was not only confined to nationalistic pieces. Works such as his Sinfonía de Antígona, Soli I, the Concerto for Piano with Orchestra, and even the Sinfonía India show a particular alignment to the neoclassicism of Paul Hindemith, Stravinsky and Aaron Copland.

El fuego nuevo. Chávez's earliest compositions were for piano and piano and voice, and by 1920 several of them had been published by A. Wagner and Levien in Mexico City. These pieces combined European models from the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries and settings of revolutionary and traditional Mexican songs. In 1921 Chávez received a commission for a ballet with an indigenous theme from the Minister of Public Education José Vasconcelos, a key figure in the post-revolutionary revitalization of Mexico's arts. Chávez's ballet El fuego nuevo, based on an Aztec legend, was scored for orchestra, women's chorus, and large percussion section, and it included flutes from Mexican Native Americans. Chávez evoked a particular indigenous character without directly quoting from indigenous tunes through his invention of neoprimitive pentatonic melodies and harmonies built on fourths and fifths.

Horsepower. During Chávez's stay in New York in 1926, he collaborated with muralist Rivera in the creation of a ballet symphony titled Horsepower, a hard-edged composition depicting the age of the machine and its implications in the contemporary Mexican social context. In this sense, the piece has been compared to compositions such as Arthur Honnegger's Pacific 231 (1924). The piece superimposes harsh sounds representing machines, Mexican dances, and rhythms such as the huapango and the zandunga.

Sinfonía India. Of Chávez's six symphonies, Sinfonía India is the most popular. Premiered by the CBS Symphony Orchestra under the composer's baton, the piece consists of only one movement for orchestra, and it features several indigenous percussion instruments. Characteristic of Sinfonía India and present in most of Chávez's music with nationalistic tendencies are the motor rhythms and the use of the sesquialtera, a superimposition of 3/4 and 6/8, common in popular musics of Latin America. The Sinfonía India is one of the few cases in which Mexican indigenous melodies are present, taken from music of the Cora, Yaqui, Sonora, and Seri Indians.

Soli* chamber works. Between 1933 and 1966 Chávez wrote four pieces: Soli I, Soli II, and Soli IV are for small wind groups, and Soli III is for orchestra with four soloists. In them, a soloist is given prominence in each movement of the works. They reveal a progressive and experimental facet of Chávez, with strong dissonances, high chromaticism, angular melodies, polyrhythmic figures, and, most important, the nonrepetition of materials. As shown by scholar Robert Parker, Chávez's music after the 1950's moved toward a continuous flow void of repetition, in which each new material was generated by the previous one, in a self-perpetuating cycle.

Musical Legacy

Latin American composers during the twentieth century fluctuated between nationalistic and universalistic approaches to music composition. These tendencies were commonly seen as opposed, but they frequently were interpreted lightly, resulting in mannerism and false objectivity. Chávez, together with Heitor Villa-Lobos and Alberto Ginastera, is a part of a generation of Latin American composers whose work attempts to synthesize nationalistic and universalistic trends. Chávez integrates through his music characteristics from the Western European musical tradition and his own personal perception of what constitutes an authentic Mexican music derived from indigenous and popular cultures.

Chávez became a key figure in the post-revolutionary formation of governmental institutions involving the arts, creating a structure of support unequaled in other Latin American countries. This structure, however, was highly hierarchical, and it paralleled the one-party rule that the Mexican revolution left as a legacy for more than seventy years. In 1969, when Chávez had withdrawn somewhat from official positions of power, he gave a lecture titled "The Lyre of Orpheus." In it, he posed the question: "What are the guardians of culture going to do?" He pointed out that nobody was yet carrying the leadership of Mexico's musical life, as he had done in the previous decades.

Eduardo Herrera

Further Reading

Carmona, Gloria. Epistolario selecto de Carlos Chávez. México: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1989. An extensive collection of letters exchanged between Chávez and important artistic and political figures.

Chávez, Carlos. Musical Thought. Cambridge, England: Harvard University Press, 1961. A compilation of the lectures given by Chávez at Harvard in 1958 and 1959. It includes essays on being a Latin American composer, art as communication, form in music, enjoyment of music, and repetition in music.

_____. Toward a New Music: Music and Electricity. New York: W. W. Norton, 1937. This report following Chávez's visit to the RCA Victor Studios and the Bell Telephone Laboratories discusses possibilities provided by electricity, especially radio, recording, film, and electric instruments.

Parker, Robert. Carlos Chávez: A Guide to Research. New York: Garland, 1998. A bibliographical annotated guide to the literature on Chávez. Includes a biography and a list of works.

_____. Carlos Chávez: Mexico's Modern-Day Orpheus. Boston: Twayne, 1983. In this resource, a leading Chávez scholar discusses a large number of representative compositions. It includes a list of works, discography, a list of orchestras Chávez conducted, and a selected bibliography.

See also: Bartók, Béla; Copland, Aaron; Hindemith, Paul; Honegger, Arthur; Revueltas, Silvestre; Schoenberg, Arnold; Stravinsky, Igor; Varèse, Edgard.

Maurice Chevalier

French pop and show tune singer

A cultural ambassador for France, Chevalier brought to Hollywood in the 1930's the image of the cavalier French playboy. In the late 1940's Chevalier's sunny French-jazz style influenced many singers until rock and roll took hold in the late 1950's.

Born: September 12, 1888; Ménilmontant, France
Died: January 1, 1972; Paris, France
Also known as: Maurice Auguste Chevalier (full name)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Encore Maurice!, 1982; No Business Like Show Business, 1994; Fourteen Songs, 1995; Ma pomme y d' la joie, 1996; Moi avec une chanson, 1998; The Romance of Paris, 2000; Valentine, 2002; Inoubliable, 2002.

WRITINGS OF INTEREST: With Love, 1960; I Remember It Well, 1970.

The Life

Born in 1888, Maurice Auguste Chevalier (mah-REES sheh-VAHL-yay) established his reputation as a singer and dancer when his career as an acrobat came to an abrupt end after an accident. While in the military, he was wounded and captured by the Germans in World War I. After a two-year incarceration, during which he learned English from a fellow prisoner, Chevalier returned to Paris, where he discovered jazz and became a huge star.

Chevalier began making short French films in 1908. He was called to Hollywood in 1928; two years later he was nominated for two Academy Awards as Best Actor. Two films with Jeanette MacDonald, One Hour with You and Love Me Tonight, were smash hits in 1932 and helped create the craze for Hollywood musicals. Audiences loved Chevalier's naughty double entendres and insouciant characters.

Chevalier spent World War II in France and protected his Jewish wife, Nita Ray. He performed at the German prisoner of war camp where he had been interned in World War I, but he refused to sing on German radio. After the war, Chevalier was accused of collaborating with France's enemies, and he was marked for death by the French Resistance. Later, he was cleared of the charges.

Chevalier reestablished his American film career in the 1950's with Cole Porter's Can-Can (1960), Billy Wilder's Love in the Afternoon (1957), and most notably Alan Jay Lerner and Frederick Loewe's Gigi (1958). He received a special Academy Award for his lifetime of work in 1958. Chevalier continued to tour and made a few minor films in the 1960's and early 1970's. He died in Paris after a brief illness at age eighty-three.

The Music

A charming, smiling fellow in his trademark tuxedo and straw hat, Chevalier was the embodiment of Gallic charm. Chevalier knew the limitations of his voice, which was a natural rather than a well-trained one. His sunny performances helped audiences momentarily forget the difficult times they were enduring. He was everyone's favorite bachelor uncle or perhaps secret French lover.

Early Works. In many of his songs (such as "Mimi" and "Louise"), Chevalier spoke the middle section, which allowed him to act out instead of merely singing the song. In his work as a music-hall entertainer, Chevalier had to project a song to the last row of seats, so he developed impeccable diction. His recorded voice was so precise that listeners with little knowledge of French could understand some of the words. "Paris sera toujours Paris" (Paris, stay the same) was one of Chevalier's most popular songs during World War II, tolerated by the occupying Germans.

Love Me Tonight. Marcel Orphül's documentary on the French Occupation, when Germany occupied France during World War II, Le Chagrin et le pitié (1971; the sorrow and the pity) famously ends with Chevalier singing "Sweepin' the Clouds Away" from his Hollywood debut Paramount on Parade (1930). However, it was 1932's Love Me Tonight, with songs by Richard Rodgers and Lorenz Hart, that elevated Chevalier to stardom in a long string of motion-picture musicals in the 1930's and 1940's.

Maurice Chevalier. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Love Me Tonight introduced two Chevalier standards, "Isn't It Romantic?" and "Mimi." Chevalier displays his suave, man-about-town side in "Isn't It Romantic?" as the verses of the song pass from person to person, locale to locale, until they reach MacDonald in her chateau. In "Mimi," which does not advance the plot, Chevalier flirts suggestively with MacDonald, in his trademark singsong and talky delivery. This song later bounces from character to character in the chateau.

Gigi. This 1958 film adaptation of Collette's story—about a young girl who, despite being groomed to be a rich man's plaything, finds true love—introduced Chevalier to a younger generation. Chevalier plays to type as actor Louis Jourdan's bachelor uncle who gives his nephew romantic advice gleaned from his years of romancing beautiful women. This is one of Chevalier's best dramatic performances. His semispoken rendition of "I Remember It Well" blends beautifully with the character of his former lover, Hermione Gingold, who was not a singer and primarily spoke her lyrics. His jaunty "I'm Glad I'm Not Young Anymore" charms audiences once again with his smiling, boulevardier manner.

Musical Legacy

Chevalier was one of the best-loved performers in France and America for more than half a century. His early work in Hollywood helped establish the musical motion picture as a popular genre. Singers of a later generation, such as Frank Sinatra and Dean Martin, modeled their stage personas as happy-go-lucky ladies' men on Chevalier, and their light, jazzy singing styles paid homage to his. Even three decades after Chevalier's death, Harry Connick, Jr., demonstrated his debt to Chevalier in sunny but sophisticated performances.

David E. Anderson

Further Reading

Behr, Edward. The Good Frenchman: The True Story of the Life and Times of Maurice Chevalier. New York: Villard, 1993. Behr captures the shadow beneath Chevalier's sunny smile: problems maintaining romantic relationships, fears of returning to the poverty of his youth, and feelings of inadequacy.

Bret, David. Maurice Chevalier: On Top of a Rainbow. London: Robson Books, 1993. Fully authorized biography of Chevalier details the accusations against Chevalier for collaborating with the Germans and the French Resistance marking him for death.

Chevalier, Maurice. I Remember It Well. New York: Macmillan, 1970. Chevalier's recollection of his life's events should be balanced with other biographies.

Chevalier, Maurice, Eileen Pollock, and Robert Mason Pollock. With Love. Boston: Little, Brown, 1960. Lively, personal account of Chevalier's life.

Vals, François. Maurice Chevalier. Paris: Didier Carpentier, 2002. Chevalier's right-hand man for the last twenty years of his career shares his insights. Vals had access to Chevalier's personal material.

See also: Bennett, Tony; Connick, Harry, Jr.; Fain, Sammy; Hart, Lorenz; Legrand, Michel; Lerner, Alan Jay; Loewe, Frederick; Piaf, Édith; Porter, Cole; Rodgers, Richard; Sinatra, Frank.

Charlie Christian

American jazz guitarist and songwriter

With his virtuosic, swinging solos featuring sustained notes and volume levels comparable to wind instruments, Christian expanded the guitar's role beyond mere accompaniment and popularized the electric guitar.

Born: July 29, 1916; Bonham, Texas
Died: March 2, 1942; New York, New York
Also known as: Charles Henry Christian (full name)
Member of: The Benny Goodman Sextet

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): Live Sessions at Minton's Playhouse, 1941; Jazz Gallery/C. Christian, 1999.
ALBUM (with Benny Goodman Sextet): Slipped Disc, 1945-1946, 1946.

The Life

Charles Henry Christian grew up in a supportive African American family, surrounded by music. Both of his parents were involved with music; although his blind father passed away before Christian started playing the guitar seriously, it had been one of his father's favorite instruments. The family moved to Oklahoma City when Christian was young, and there he was exposed to musical acts that traveled through the important trade hub. Because of segregation, many opportunities were closed to Christian and his friends, but they enthusiastically participated in baseball as well as music. He was encouraged in music by his older brother and other musicians, such as guitarist Ralph Hamilton, who invited Christian to participate in a jam session with touring musicians. That public performance, in which Christian improvised long melodic variations on acoustic guitar, was well received. As his reputation grew into the late 1930's, he began playing an amplified guitar. When John Hammond of Columbia Records heard Christian play in 1939, Hammond arranged for the guitarist to meet Benny Goodman. During the next two years, Christian became internationally famous, playing and recording with Goodman's sextet as well as with other musicians, such as Lionel Hampton, and with some of the creators of the bebop style. Christian played incessantly, often going from one engagement to the next in the same evening. Often he would work with Goodman and then travel to a marathon jam session at a small club in Harlem. In the summer of 1941, he was diagnosed with tuberculosis and was hospitalized. Tragically, Christian died just a few months later.

The Music

From the beginning, Christian preferred playing melodic lines rather than focusing on the strummed chord melodies that were popular at the time. Long before adopting the electric guitar, he developed a strong, energetic technique. Christian created a musical style cultivated by midwestern jazz musicians in the 1930's, including a driving rhythm with a light chordal texture; an emphasis on extended, competitive solo improvisation over strict rhythmic cycles; and the use of repeated melodic figures (riffs) to build arrangements. Although Christian was aware of the work of his predecessors on acoustic guitar (including Django Reinhardt), his melodic style was more deeply influenced by wind-instrument players, such as tenor saxophonist Lester Young, whom Christian first met when Young was touring in the Midwest with the Blue Devils.

Benny Goodman. Most of Christian's recorded solos are associated with Goodman's groups from 1939 to 1941. Although he occasionally played with Goodman's orchestra, Christian's most influential solos were recorded with the smaller ensembles: the sextet and septet. In these recordings, the clarity of the thinner textures allowed the tone of the electric guitar to contrast more clearly with the sounds of the vibraphone, the piano, and the other instruments. Along with adding to the midwestern stylistic features of the ensemble as a whole (which are more prominent in the later recordings), Christian introduced dissonant melodic patterns that would become characteristic of modern jazz. He took advantage of the guitar's natural qualities in adopting leaps of perfect fourths, made easier on the guitar by the instrument's standard tuning, and also chromatic double neighbor tones, which are facilitated by the guitar's chromatic fingerboard. In terms of accompaniment, he also changed the rhythmic role of the guitar, which was no longer bound to reinforce the double bass's steady stream of quarter notes.

Live Sessions at Minton's Playhouse. While in New York with Goodman, Christian worked frequently with the musicians who created the bebop style, including trumpeter Dizzy Gillespie and pianist Thelonious Monk. Most of the musicians played into the morning hours at Minton's Playhouse and other places in Harlem. Recordings of these early noncommercial experiments are rare, but it is clear that Christian contributed to the development of the genre, especially considering the melodic characteristics of his recorded solos. Fortunately, Jerry Newman, a jazz fan, brought portable recording equipment to Minton's and captured a few of Christian's jam sessions with drummer Kenny Clarke, tenor saxophonist Don Byas, and others. Associates remember that Christian was constantly refining and perfecting his style.

Musical Legacy

In the decades following Christian's recordings, the electric guitar evolved from an obscure oddity to become the dominant sound of popular music. The first major player of the instrument, Christian extended his influence far beyond his own brilliance as a jazz musician. Ironically, the newer, louder genres eclipsed the music that Christian loved, at least in terms of popularity. Within the jazz world, several generations of the best guitarists point to him as a source of style and inspiration. Wes Montgomery, hailed by many as his successor, began by learning Christian's solos note for note. In addition, Christian played an important role in the development of bebop, the first aggressively modern genre to appear in jazz.

John Myers

Further Reading

Alexander, Charles. Masters of Jazz Guitar: The Story of the Players and Their Music. San Francisco: Backbeat, 2002. Includes a chapter on Christian.

Broadbent, Peter. Charlie Christian: Solo Flight, the Seminal Electric Guitarist. Blaydon on Tyne: Ashley Mark, 2003. Coverage of Christian's career, including interviews with musicians and personal accounts of the guitarist, discography, photographs, and appendixes.

Christian, Charlie. Charlie Christian, the Definitive Collection. Milwaukee, Wis.: Hal Leonard, 2003. By Pete Billmann, Jeff Jacobson, and Wolf Marshall, transcriptions, chord symbols, and staff notation and tablature of Christian's most famous recorded solos.

Ellison, Ralph, and Robert G. O'Meally. Living with Music: Ralph Ellison's Jazz Writings. New York: Modern Library, 2001. Includes a chapter on Christian, setting him in cultural context.

Goins, Wayne E., and Craig R. McKinney. A Biography of Charlie Christian, Jazz Guitar's King of Swing. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 2005. Detailed account of Christian's life, including commentary on music. With illustrations, bibliography, and index.

See also: Gillespie, Dizzy; Goodman, Benny; Hampton, Lionel; Johnson, Lonnie; Monk, Thelonious; Montgomery, Wes; Parker, Charlie; Powell, Bud; Reinhardt, Django; Walker, T-Bone; Williams, Mary Lou; Young, Lester.

Chuck D

American rap vocalist and songwriter

As a member of Public Enemy, Chuck D crafted direct, sometimes confrontational rap. His lyrics incorporated Black Power ideology and highlighted the social and political double standard that marginalizes African Americans.

Born: August 1, 1960; Long Island, New York
Also known as: Carlton Douglas Ridenhour (birth name); Chuckie D; Mista Chuck

Member of: Public Enemy; Spectrum City; Confrontation Camp; Fine Arts Militia

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): Autobiography of Mistachuck, 1996; Tribb to JB, 2007.

ALBUMS (with Confrontation Camp): Objects in the Mirror Are Closer than They Appear, 2000.

ALBUMS (with Fine Arts Militia): We Are Gathered Here, 2003.

ALBUMS (with Public Enemy): Yo! Bum Rush the Show, 1987; It Takes a Nation of Millions to Hold Us Back, 1988; Fear of a Black Planet, 1990; Apocalypse 91 . . . The Enemy Strikes Black, 1991; Muse Sick-N-Hour Mess Age, 1994; He Got Game, 1998; There's a Poison Goin' On, 1999; Revolverlution, 2002; New Whirl Odor, 2005; Beats and Places, 2005; Rebirth of a Nation, 2006; How You Sell Soul to a Soulless People Who Sold Their Soul?, 2007.

ALBUMS (with Spectrum City): Check out the Radio, 1984; Lies, 1984.

The Life

Chuck D was born Carlton Douglas Ridenhour in Roosevelt, New York, a suburb in Long Island's Black Belt. This was a string of communities across the island that became primarily black after white flight short-circuited school integration efforts. Chuck's experience with the racial double standard of the suburbs, combined with his parents' political activism, left an indelible impression that was reflected in his lyrics.

Chuck attended Adelphi University to study graphic design, and there he met most of the future members of Public Enemy, including William Drayton (Flavor Flav), Hank "Shocklee" Boxley, Norman Rogers (Terminator X), and Richard Griffin (Professor Griff). Though he had built a considerable reputation as a capable emcee while at Adelphi, Chuck did not immediately consider hip-hop a viable career. Def Jam Recordings hired Bill Stephney, who had given Chuck and Boxley a radio show on Adelphi's WBAU when the three were in college, to persuade Chuck to sign a contract. Public Enemy's first album, Yo! Bum Rush the Show, was a moderate success. However, it was the next three—It Takes a Nation of Millions to Hold Us Back, Fear of a Black Planet, and Apocalypse 91 . . . The Enemy Strikes Black—that certified Public Enemy as an important rap group.

Chuck D served as rapper, producer, and media liaison for Public Enemy. He also appeared as a commentator on news and political programs and hosted two political and cultural talk shows on Air America Radio: Unfiltered and On the Real.

The Music

For Public Enemy, Chuck D was involved in rapping, production, media, and security. Though he was not directly responsible for the group's sound, he served as its touchstone.

"Don't Believe the Hype." From It Takes a Nation of Millions to Hold Us Back, "Don't Believe the Hype" is a straightforward combination of a funk guitar sample and looping drums. The soundscape features a sampled instrument screech reminiscent of a scream that invades the last beat and a half of each measure. The scream is appropriate, as Chuck addresses the critics who have marked him as a social threat, a reverse racist who espouses Black Power and Nation of Islam antiwhite rhetoric. Here, Chuck walks a thin line: bluntly stating his position while discrediting the worried wails of those who fear him.

"Rebel Without a Pause." From It Takes a Nation of Millions to Hold Us Back, this was recorded just after the release of Rakim's "I Know You Got Soul." "Rebel Without a Pause" features Chuck asserting himself as both a conscientious voice and a stylistic force to rival Rakim. Chuck's lyrics are rapped over a beat that is a sample of Robert McCollough's saxophone squeal, tweaked until it sounds like a tea kettle. Hip-hop, Chuck tells us, has reached a boiling point, and he is determined to move it into a new, more visible position.

"Fear of a Black Planet." From the album of the same name, this song shows Chuck toying with the notion of the black man as sexual predator, out to seduce or steal women of all colors from their mates. His critique of the racial-purity ideal sounds among a chorus of samples of the word "fear" that jump from left to right speaker and complete the musical track.

"Fight the Power." From Fear, "Fight the Power" is Public Enemy's signature song and was featured in the opening credits of Spike Lee's Do the Right Thing (1989), a coupling that launched the director and Chuck into the mainstream. The instrumental track is a typical blending of funk guitar samples and drum sounds, and its militant hook solidified Chuck and Public Enemy as the antiestablishment vanguard.

"By the Time I Get to Arizona." From Apocalypse 91 . . . The Enemy Strikes Black, this piece is a response to Evan Mecham's first act as governor of Arizona: overturning the Martin Luther King, Jr., holiday. Chuck raps atop a slow, funky track that includes gospel choir swells and a guitar sample that features a ripping chainsaw in each measure. The song's title was meant to be threatening, and the accompanying video depicted the poisoning of a senator, the assassination of Mecham, and other gunplay.

Musical Legacy

Public Enemy's early sound featured an endless stream of samples that had been cut, processed, and pasted together by the Bomb Squad, the group's production team that included Boxley, to form a backdrop for Chuck and Drayton's flow. The hyper-sampled sound complemented the group's lyrical message, as both words and music commented upon the culture. The act of signifying through sampling marked much message rap until stricter copyright guidelines forced producers to pay expensive royalties for samples or abandon the practice altogether.

Chuck D's uncompromising lyrics and persona made him a role model for message rap artists. Along with William Michael Griffin, Jr. (Rakim), Chuck reclaimed the substantive messages that marked hip-hop of the early 1980's and cleared a space for explicitly socially conscious rappers to exist alongside the gangsta scene in the 1990's.

Justin D. Burton

Further Reading

Chang, Jeff. "What We Got to Say" and "Follow for Now." In Can't Stop, Won't Stop: A History of the Hip-Hop Generation. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2005. A hip-hop journalist weaves Public Enemy's story into the larger tapestry of hip-hop history.

Chuck D, and Yusuf Jah. Lyrics of a Rap Revolutionary. New York: Offda Books, 2007. Chuck explores the political ramifications and possibilities of hip-hop beyond the social scene.

Chuck D, Yusuf Jah, and Spike Lee. Fight the Power: Rap, Race, and Reality. New York: Delta, 1997. Chuck's book addresses many of the same issues that his music does, especially racial inequality in America.

Friskics-Warren, Bill. "Fight the Power: Spearheads, the Mekons, and Public Enemy." In I'll Take You There: Pop Music and the Urge for Transcendence. New York: Continuum, 2005. An overview of Public Enemy's heyday, exploring the ways in which Chuck's lyrics aimed at transcendence.

Walser, Robert. "Rhythm, Rhyme, and Rhetoric in the Music of Public Enemy." Ethnomusicology 39, no. 2 (1995): 193-217. Walser explores the rhetoric of Public Enemy's music with an analysis of "Fight the Power."

Watkins, S. Craig. "The Digital Underground." In Hip-Hop Matters: Politics, Pop Culture, and the Struggle for the Soul of a Movement. Boston: Beacon Press, 2005. Overview of a legal struggle concerning digital music files, with Chuck D as a central character.

See also: Badu, Erykah; Simmons, Joseph "Run"; Snoop Dogg.

Kyung-Wha Chung

Korean classical violinist

Chung's success as violinist ushered in a new era for accomplished Asian musicians playing classical Western music. Her style combines elegance, perfection, and passion.

Born: March 26, 1948; Seoul, South Korea

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Tchaikovsky, Sibelius: Violin Concertos, 1970; Beethoven: Violin Concertos, 1982; Berg and Bartók: Violin Concertos, 1984; Béla Bartók: Violin Concerto No. 2 and Rhapsodies 1 and 2, 1988; Mendelssohn: Concerto for Violin in E Minor, 1990; Bach: Concerto in E/Trio Sonata Nos. 2 and 4/ Suite No. 2, 1991; Tchaikovsky: Piano Concertos Nos. 1-3; Violin Concerto, 1996; Brahms: Violin Sonatas Nos. 1-3, 1998; Celibidache Conducts Strauss and Resphigi Violin Sonatas, 2000; Vivaldi: The Four Seasons, 2001; Wagner's Ring, 2001; Beethoven Piano Trios Nos. 1, 4, 5, and 7, 2007.

The Life

Kyung-Wha Chung (kyuhng wah chuhng) was born on March 26, 1948, in Seoul, South Korea, daughter of businessman Won Sook Lee Chung and his wife Chun Chai Chung. Kyung's parents loved music, and they educated their nine children in a variety of Western instruments. Kyung settled on playing the violin at six. By nine, she performed with the Seoul Philharmonic Orchestra.

In 1961, at thirteen, Chung moved to New York City to study at the Juilliard School under Ivan Galamian. Her first triumph occurred in 1967, when she was cowinner of the Edgar Leventritt Competition, and her breakthrough came in 1970, when she impressed a London audience with her performance. In 1972 she was awarded the Republic of Korea's Medal of Merit.

Throughout the 1970's and early 1980's, Chung recorded successful albums, and she performed with most of the major orchestras of Western Europe, the United States, South Korea, and Japan. At her peak, she gave 120 performances each season.

In 1984 Chung married British businessman Geoffrey Leggett, with whom she had two sons, Frederick and Eugene. To balance her personal and professional life, she cut her performance schedule in half. In 1988 she won her first Gramophone Award, and in 2000 she won her second Gramophone Award.

The Music

Chung developed a musical style as a concert violinist that combined fireworks with elegance and intelligence with exuberance. Performing with the leading conductors of her era, Chung established herself as a world-class violinist with successful recordings, and she paved the way for other Asian classical music performers, especially Asian women. Her ability to bring genteel refinement to passionate playing and to work with a variety of international symphony orchestras solidified her reputation as one of the Western world's outstanding violinists.

Kyung-Wha Chung. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

The Leventritt Competition. At nineteen, Chung entered the prestigious Edgar Leventritt Competition, despite the fact that her teacher, Galamian, tried to dissuade her from competing with another of his protégés, Pinchas Zukerman. Chung's impressive performance of works by Max Bruch, Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, Ludwig van Beethoven, and Camille Saint-Saëns created a problem for the judges, who could not decide between her and Zukerman as first-place winner. When a second competitive round failed to settle the issue, for the first time in twenty-seven years the Leventritt jury split the first prize between Chung and Zukerman. Chung's performance, characterized by sensitivity, grit, and passion, became her trademark style. That win set Chung on a successful trajectory. She performed at the inauguration of President Richard Nixon in 1969, and she was invited to play with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra and the New York Philharmonic.

Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto. Chung replaced an ailing Itzhak Perlman at the 1970 Royal Festival Hall performance of Peter Ilich Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto with conductor André Previn and the London Symphony Orchestra. Her surprise performance brought out the fire in Tchaikovsky's composition and exposed the cool mastery of his score. A rave review in London's Financial Times opened the doors to solo engagements with major symphonies in Japan, in West Germany, and in the United States.

Tchaikovsky, Sibelius: Violin Concertos. In 1970 Decca Records in London asked Chung to record violin concerti by Tchaikovsky and Jean Sibelius, with the orchestra conducted by Previn. Her album met an appreciative audience who took to her vigorous, yet elegant interpretation of the works. In 2007 Decca released a remastered compact disc of the recording, with the fervor of her performance engrossing both new and old listeners.

Bartók's Violin Concerto No. 2. The Free World was Chung's stage for much of the 1970's, the 1980's, and the 1990's. While communists shunned her for her South Korean heritage, audiences elsewhere took enthusiastically to her mix of fire and restraint. Her performance of Béla Bartók's Violin Concerto No. 2 became the hallmark of her talent and style. Its 1988 recording with Sir Simon Rattle and the City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra became an instant classic. In the same year, she formed the Chung Trio with her cellist sister Myung Wha and her pianist brother Myung Whun, both accomplished musicians.

Violin Sonatas. In 2000 Chung's passionate, sensitive, and refined rendition of select violin sonatas by Richard Strauss and Ottorino Respighi, as conducted by Krystian Zimmerman, earned her another Gramophone Award. Her shining evocation of these works brought to the fore a master violinist at the height of her craft.

The Four Seasons. In February, 2001, Chung released a recording of Antonio Vivaldi's The Four Seasons, which confirmed the belief of critics and audiences that Chung was a rare talent who could render old favorites with new charm. Performing with St. Luke's Chamber Ensemble, Chung gave a majestic and passionate performance.

Beethoven and Brahms. Chung's November, 2001, release of her solo performance in Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 and Johannes Brahms's Violin Concerto in D Major, Op. 77 with Sir Simon Rattle and the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra gave a fresh accent to popular works. Critics lauded her mix of fire and elegance, acuity and tenderness. Her May, 2003, performance in New York City of the Brahms Violin Concerto with André Previn, conductor at her breakthrough in 1970, closed a personal circle.

Musical Legacy

Through her passionate mastery of Tchaikovsky and Bartók, Chung demonstrated that performers from all over the world could give new meaning and musical freshness to classical European music. As a woman Asian violinist, Chung paved the way for later stars, such as Midori, and she matched talents with other great violinists of her time. Chung's combination of fire and elegance, passion and restraint, exuberance and technical artistry, gave her performances a special poignancy and appeal. Proving her teacher Galamian wrong, Chung succeeded both in the musical profession and in having a fulfilling family life.

R. C. Lutz

Further Reading

Althouse, Paul. "Guide to Records: Beethoven." American Record Guide 65, no. 2 (March/April, 2002): 70. Glowing review of Chung's album of Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 and Brahms's Violin Concerto, with praise for an excellent performance of uncommon breadth and beauty.

Homfray, Tim, and Joanne Talbot. "A Balance of Friendship." Strad 113, no. 1348 (August, 2002): 828. The article discusses Chung's love for her favorite violin bow, a Grand Adam, she has used since the late 1960's.

Kurzbauer, Heather. "The Art of Balance." Strad 110, no. 1314 (October, 1999): 1030. Thorough portrait of Chung at fifty, with a focus on her balance of art and family. Includes photographs.

Sand, Barbara. "The Prodigy Returns." American Record Guide 62, no. 1 (January/February, 1999): 5. Sympathetic profile of Chung, with details on her relationship with her teacher Galamian, her work-life balance, and her linkage of concert and recording engagements. Includes photograph.

Time. "Cookie and Pinky Come Through." May 26, 1967. Contemporary account of Chung's co-winning first prize in the Leventritt competition with Zukerman.

See also: Perlman, Itzhak; Previn, Sir André; Szigeti, Joseph.

Eric Clapton

English blues/rock singer, guitarist, and songwriter

As lead guitarist for the Yardbirds and Cream, and as a solo artist, Clapton pioneered virtuosic technique and controlled distortion in rock music.

Born: March 30, 1945; Ripley, England
Also known as: Eric Patrick Clapp (birth name); Slowhand
Member of: Yardbirds; John Mayall and the Bluesbreakers; the Glands; Blind Faith; Cream; Derek and the Dominos

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): Eric Clapton, 1970; Eric Clapton's Rainbow Concert, 1973; 461 Ocean Boulevard, 1974; E.C. Was Here, 1975; There's One in Every Crowd, 1975; No Reason to Cry, 1976; Slowhand, 1977; Backless, 1978; Another Ticket, 1981; Money and Cigarettes, 1983; Behind the Sun, 1985; August, 1986; Crossroads, 1988; Journeyman, 1989; Twenty-four Nights, 1991; The Magic of Eric Clapton, 1993; From the Cradle, 1994; Pilgrim, 1998; Riding with the King, 2000; Reptile, 2001; Me and Mr. Johnson, 2004; Back Home, 2005.
ALBUMS (with Blind Faith): Blind Faith, 1969.
ALBUMS (with Cream): Fresh Cream, 1966; Disraeli Gears, 1967; Wheels of Fire, 1968; Goodbye, 1969.
ALBUMS (with Delaney and Bonnie): Delaney and Bonnie and Friends, 1970.
ALBUMS (with Derek and the Dominos): Layla and Other Assorted Love Songs, 1970.
ALBUMS (with John Mayall and the Bluesbreakers): John Mayall and the Bluesbreakers, 1966.
ALBUMS (with the Yardbirds): Five Live, 1964; Sonny Boy Williamson and the Yardbirds, 1964; For Your Love, 1965.
WRITINGS OF INTEREST: Clapton: The Autobiography, 2007.

The Life

Born at the home of his maternal grandparents, Eric Clapton was the son of Patricia Clapton and Edward Fryer, a Canadian airman stationed in England. He was raised by his grandparents, and they gave him his first guitar when he turned fifteen. Immediately drawn to American blues, Clapton was strongly influenced by the recordings of Big Bill Broonzy, Ramblin' Jack Elliott, and Blind Boy Fuller. He was later attracted to the sound of Chicago blues and the recordings of Muddy Waters and Howlin' Wolf. He was also inspired by the recordings of Mississippi blues legend Robert Johnson, who would be an influence throughout Clapton's career.

He joined his first band as lead guitarist; it was a London-based rhythm-and-blues group known as the Roosters, whose membership also included future Rolling Stones guitarist Brian Jones and future Manfred Mann singer Paul Pond (Paul Jones). Clapton left the Roosters to play lead guitar for the group Casey Jones and the Engineers; he remained with this group for two weeks before replacing Anthony "Top" Topham as lead guitarist for the Yardbirds. Other group members were Keith Relf (vocals, harmonica), Chris Dreja (rhythm guitar), Paul Samwell-Smith (bass), and Jim McCarty (drums).

The Yardbirds played mostly rhythm-and-blues and blues covers, along with a few original songs. While performing with the Yardbirds, Clapton helped develop the rave-up, an extended improvisation based on the twelve-bar blues progression. The rave-up was an integral part of the Yardbirds' live performances and became an important aspect of Clapton's later group Cream. Clapton remained with the Yardbirds until March, 1965, when he left because of artistic differences.

After a brief retirement to the country, Clapton was hired by British blues performer John Mayall to play in the Bluesbreakers. The Bluesbreakers with Clapton, consisting of Clapton (guitar, vocals), Mayall (keyboards, vocals), John McVie (bass), and Hughie Flint (drums), recorded only one album, but John Mayall and the Bluesbreakers is considered to be one of the top British blues albums. Upon leaving the Bluesbreakers, Clapton played in a small blues group called the Glands in 1966; later that year he formed the Powerhouse with Steve Winwood (formerly with the Spencer Davis Group), with whom he would later form the group Blind Faith. In late 1966 Clapton began rehearsing with fellow Bluesbreakers alumni Peter "Ginger" Baker and Jack Bruce, forming the first power trio and supergroup Cream.

Cream was an international success, one of Clapton's most successful groups. However, artistic differences among the members led to their breakup in 1968. At this point Clapton formed another supergroup with Baker and Winwood, Blind Faith. After one album and an unsuccessful U.S. tour, Clapton found himself looking for a new band. He found this in 1969 with a U.S. group, Delaney and Bonnie and Friends. Clapton became a touring member of the group and simultaneously embarked on a solo career, releasing his first solo album, Eric Clapton, with the hit "After Midnight." Drawing on Delaney and Bonnie's rhythm section—Carl Radle (bass), Bobby Whitlock (keyboards, vocals), and Jim Gordon (drums)—Clapton next formed Derek and the Dominos. The Dominos is best described as a talented but drug-troubled blues-based rock group. After recording sessions began, the group was augmented by the slide-guitar sounds of Southern rocker Duane Allman. After releasing two albums, Layla and Other Assorted Love Songs and a live album, the Dominos disbanded in 1971. During 1972 Clapton retired, dealing with his major heroin problem. Eventually, several friends, led by the Who's Pete Townshend, coaxed Clapton into cleaning himself up so he could return to playing. The result was an all-star Rainbow Concert, featuring Clapton, Townshend, Winwood, Ron Wood, and other Clapton friends and bandmates.

At that point Clapton resumed a successful career, releasing several albums. Besides albums with a pop-rock sound such as 461 Ocean Boulevard, Slowhand, and Reptile, Clapton remained true to his blues roots with releases such as From the Cradle, Riding with the King (a collaboration with venerated bluesman B. B. King), and Me and Mr. Johnson (a tribute to Mississippi bluesman Robert Johnson).

The Music

Although Clapton found a strong voice as a singer and songwriter, he was revered for his guitar technique. His earliest recordings with the Yardbirds were originally released as singles and demonstrated the beginnings of his blues technique. Songs such as "Baby What's Wrong" and "Good Morning Little School Girl" featured Clapton as a lead soloist, imitating his Chicago blues influences. His playing featured frequent slides and discrete bent strings as well as a prevalent use of descending minor pentatonic scales. The smoothness of his finger slides led his fans to call him Slowhand.

As he moved on to the Bluesbreakers, his melodic approach became smoother and cleaner, as demonstrated on his solo on "All Your Love." Here, Clapton retained his fluid technique, adding an even, slow vibrato on long-held notes. This vibrato and his ability to bend strings almost to the point of feedback are trademarks of Clapton's guitar style.

Cream. In his performances with Cream, Clapton was influenced by the psychedelic guitar sounds of acid rock and especially the grand technique of Jimi Hendrix. With Cream, Clapton explored the possibilities of sound distortion, with effects such as wah-wah, fuzz tone, and natural feedback. Though Clapton usually preferred the sound of the solid-body Fender Stratocaster, with Cream he often soloed on his Gibson Les Paul guitar for a more biting sound. Exemplary solos during this period included the minor blues performance on "Sunshine of Your Love" from Disraeli Gears, the live "Crossroads" on Wheels of Fire, and his uncredited guest spot on "While My Guitar Gently Weeps" on the Beatles' White Album. One of the most notable aspects of Cream's sound was the juxtaposition of Bruce's jazz-influenced bass lines, Baker's busy but clear jazz-based drumming, and Clapton's raw-edged, psychedelic-distorted blues-based guitar sound.

Blind Faith. Beginning with his days with Blind Faith, Clapton more frequently employed an acoustic guitar on his recordings, played with a folklike fingerpicking style as on "Can't Find My Way Back Home." While he recorded primarily on electric instruments, Clapton also used his acoustic guitar to change mood. Other notable acoustic guitar performances included "Tears in Heaven," a tribute written after the tragic death of his four-year-old son in 1991; his performance on MTV's Unplugged series, which featured an excellent acoustic reconstruction of "Layla"; and a rare acoustic guitar duet with B. B. King on Broonzy's "Key to the Highway" on the album Riding with the King.

Derek and the Dominos. For the heavily blues-influenced Layla and Other Assorted Love Songs with Derek and the Dominos, Clapton returned to his favorite Stratocaster sound. Sharing solos with slide guitarist Allman, Clapton reverted to a clean sound with less distortion and more blues techniques, such as finger slides and string bends. Particularly effective were the solos traded between Clapton and Allman on "Key to the Highway." Although primarily a blues album, there were some raw, rough-edged rock solos heard on their cover of Hendrix's "Little Wing," the title cut "Layla," and the song "Why Does Love Got to Be So Sad?"

Later Works. After his drug rehabilitation, Clapton's playing became as smooth and tasteful as a fine cognac. He had successful radio singles along the way, such as "I Shot the Sheriff" from 461 Ocean Boulevard and "Lay Down Sally" and "Wonderful Tonight" from Slowhand. In the mid-1970's, Clapton shifted to a low profile, releasing an occasional Top 20 single and recording relaxed albums of pop-rock material. He composed and performed on a number of film sound tracks, including Lethal Weapon (1987), Lethal Weapon 2 (1989), Lethal Weapon 3 (1992), Edge of Darkness (1985), and Rush (1991). He was a guest artist on several albums, ranging from classical guitarist Leona Boyd's Persona (1986), to spots on rock albums by George Harrison, Sting, Leon Russell, and the Rolling Stones, to blues collaborations with blues guitarists Buddy Guy, Howlin' Wolf, and B. B. King.

Through it all, Clapton's guitar style was based in the Chicago blues with a smooth melodic sensibility, expressive string bends, and evenly paced vibrato. He no longer depended on sound distortion, either with natural feedback or with distortion devices. Instead, Clapton's playing featured clear and precise note placement seasoned with his blues techniques.

Musical Legacy

Clapton was one of the first musicians in the rock era to gain a strong following based on his instrumental technique rather than his singing or his looks. His fans during the Yardbirds era were so enthralled with his technique they began to spray-paint graffiti around London that read "Clapton is God." While many of his original songs became rock classics, particularly his output with Cream, Blind Faith, Derek and the Dominos, and some of his solo material, Clapton remained faithful to his blues roots. He was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame on three separate occasions for his work with the Yardbirds (1992) and Cream (1993) as well as for his solo endeavors (2000). He was awarded six Grammy Awards for his Unplugged album in 1993, including Album of the Year and Best Song (for "Tears in Heaven"). In 1998 Clapton founded the Crossroads Centre in Antigua, West Indies, a clinic for rehabilitation of drug and alcohol abusers.

Stephen Valdez

Further Reading

Clapton, Eric. Clapton: The Autobiography. New York: Broadway Books, 2007. The complete and authoritative story of his life from Clapton.

Clifford, Mike, ed. The Harmony Illustrated Encyclopedia of Rock. 7th ed. New York: Harmony Books, 1992. Brief articles on Clapton and the groups of which he was a member. Includes a selective discography of Clapton's career to the early 1990's.

Roberty, Marc. Eric Clapton: The Complete Recording Sessions, 1963-1992. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1993. Exhaustively researched, this book lists all of the recording sessions in which Clapton took part, from the Yardbirds to his solo releases and guest sessions, to 1992. Includes a complete discography and videography and lists the instruments Clapton used in each session.

Schumacher, Michael. Crossroads: The Life and Music of Eric Clapton. New York: Hyperion, 1995. Well-written biography of the musician through 1994, including a selective discography of Clapton's career from the Yardbirds to his solo works, including bootlegs, and a discography of other artists for whom Clapton played guitar in the studio and in concert. Includes complete listing of groups and personnel with whom Clapton played from his first group (the Roosters) to his solo albums and concerts.

Shapiro, Harry. Eric Clapton: Lost in the Blues. New York: Da Capo Press, 1993. Good biography of Clapton, though not as complete as Schumacher's Crossroads or Clapton's autobiography. Contains a thorough discography and an appendix on the technical aspects of Clapton's guitars and equipment.

See also: Babyface; Beck, Jeff; Berry, Chuck; Blige, Mary J.; Eddy, Duane; Fogerty, John; Fuller, Blind Boy; Guy, Buddy; Hendrix, Jimi; Howlin' Wolf; James, Elmore; Johnson, Robert; King, Albert; King, B. B.; Marley, Bob; Page, Jimmy; Paul, Les; Reed, Jimmy; Robertson, Robbie; Rush, Otis; Santana, Carlos; Stills, Stephen; Sting; Tosh, Peter; Townshend, Pete; Van Halen, Eddie; Vaughan, Stevie Ray; Waters, Muddy; Waters, Roger; Williamson, Sonny Boy, I.

James Cleveland

American gospel pianist, trombonist, and choral director

A leading star in gospel music for four decades, Cleveland was known for his gruff voice, dynamic showmanship, and innovative work directing gospel choirs. The Gospel Music Workshop of America, founded by Cleveland, became the most significant force in shaping choral music in modern gospel.

Born: December 5, 1932; Chicago, Illinois
Died: February 9, 1991; Culver City, California
Also known as: Reverend Dr. James Cleveland; Crown Prince of Gospel
Member of: Angelic Choir; the Charles Fold Singers; the Southern California Community Choir; the Cleveland Singers; Voices of the Tabernacle

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): This Sunday in Person, 1962 (with the Angelic Choir); James Cleveland and the Angelic Choir, 1962 (with the Angelic Choir); Peace Be Still, 1963 (with the Angelic Choir); I Stood on the Banks of the Jordan, 1964 (with the Angelic Choir); Lord, Let Me Be an Instrument, 1966 (with the Charles Fold Singers); I Told Jesus to Change My Name, 1974 (with the Southern California Community Choir); In the Ghetto, 1974 (with the Southern California Community Choir); Trust in God, 1975 (with the Gospel Girls); James Cleveland and the Charles Fold Singers, Vol. II, 1977; James Cleveland and Ruth Schofield Edition, 1978; James Cleveland and the Charles Fold Singers, Vol. III: Is There Any Hope for Tomorrow, 1978; James Cleveland and the Southern California Community Choir, 1978; Reunion, 1979 (with Alberta Walker); The Promise, 1980 (with the Philadelphia Mass Choir); A Praying Spirit, 1982 (with the Cornerstone Choir); Twentieth Anniversary Album, 1982 (with the World's Greatest Choirs); Amazing Grace, 1990 (with the Southern California Community Choir); For the Prize, 1990 (with the Houston Mass Choir); Give Me My Flowers, 1990 (with the Angelic Choir); Hallelujah 'Tis Done, 1990 (with Cassietta George); Having Church, 1990 (with the Southern California Community Choir); His Name Is Wonderful, 1990 (with the Angelic Choir); I Don't Feel Noways Tired, 1990 (with the Salem Inspirational Choir); I Know He Can, 1990 (with Alberta Walker); James Cleveland Sings with the Great Gospel Star Parade, 1990; This Too Will Pass, 1990 (with the Charles Fold Singers); James Cleveland and the Angelic Choir, 1991; Merry Christmas, 1991 (with the Angelic Choir).

ALBUMS (with the Cleveland Singers): In the Beginning, 1978; At the Cross, 1990; Especially for You, 1990; God's Promises, 1990; His Eye Is Sparrow, 1990; I Love to Tell, 1990; I'm Giving My Love, 1990; Inspired, 1990; Lord Help Me to Hold Out, 1990; Love of God, 1990; The One and Only, 1990; Pilgrim of Sorrow, 1990; Praise 88, 1990; Rev. James Cleveland and the Cleveland Singers, 1990; Sun Will Shine Afterwards, 1990; To the Glory of God, 1990; Tomorrow, 1990; Touch Me, 1990; Where Is Your Faith, 1990; Down Memory Lane, 1991; Out on a Hill, 1991; Songs My Mother Taught Me, 1991; Victory Shall Be Mine, 1991.

The Life

James Cleveland was born to Benjamin and Rosie Lee Cleveland. Benjamin worked for the Works Progress Administration. Young James attended Pilgrim Baptist Church with his family, and his exceptional singing talent was quickly noticed. Thomas A. Dorsey, who is considered the father of gospel music, was the choir director at Pilgrim Baptist Church and mentored James as well as writing a composition for him. The famous gospel music pianist and composer Roberta Martin played keyboards for the choir and helped develop James's skills on the piano. She also published Cleveland's first composition, "I Want to See Jesus."

As a young man, Cleveland moved to Philadelphia, where he helped form the gospel group the Gospelaires. During the 1950's he lived in Philadelphia, New York, Detroit, and Chicago; served as music minister and assistant pastor in several churches; sang in various gospel groups; and established his reputation as a singer, pianist, and arranger.

In the 1960's, Cleveland was ordained and moved to Los Angeles to pastor the New Greater Harvest Baptist Church. In 1968, he organized the Gospel Workshop of America to teach, improve, and spread gospel music. In 1970, he founded the Cornerstone Baptist Church, featuring an internationally known choir. He had a daughter, LaShone.

Cleveland was awarded an honorary doctorate from Trinity Bible College. After his death in 1991, allegations of financial and other improprieties were leveled against him, some by his foster son, Christopher Harris. However, his legacy as the father of modern gospel choir music has continued to grow.

The Music

For the Reverend Cleveland, his life as a church minister and his work as a gospel singer were entwined. He developed his singing talent as a boy under the tutelage of the famous gospel musicians Thomas A. Dorsey and Roberta Martin. As a young adult, he served as music minister and choir leader in various churches, founding his first group in 1959. Much of his early prominence as a singer came from his performances with the legendary gospel group the Caravans. In 1963, he formed the James Cleveland Singers. During his adult career, he took as his mission the forging of gospel choirs into a modern musical force, capable of assimilating the more sophisticated influences and harmonies of jazz, blues, soul, and even classical music.

"The Love of God." While at the Prayer Tabernacle in Detroit, Michigan, Cleveland helped form the Voices of the Tabernacle choir. In 1959, he recorded his first solo hit, "The Love of God" with this group. After a light piano introduction, Cleveland's entry is dramatic. He croons variations of the refrain "Love of God" with his trademark bullfrog timbre. The choir sighs, moans, and swells in the background. Cleveland's singing combines preaching, pop balladry, and soulful glissandi.

"Peace Be Still." In the early 1960's, Cleveland recorded three long-playing (LP) albums for the

James Cleveland. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

Savoy label with the Angelic Choir, featuring Billy Preston at the organ. Volume I, recorded in 1962 and titled This Sunday in Person, was apparently the first live gospel session to be recorded. The second volume, 1962's James Cleveland and the Angelic Choir, featured Cleveland's hit recording of the gospel standard "How Great Thou Art."

The third volume, Peace Be Still, recorded live and released in 1963, was the first gospel LP to sell move than fifty thousand albums; by 2008, it had more than one million. It featured Cleveland's greatest hit, "Peace Be Still," derived from a little-known eighteenth century madrigal. The recording features Cleveland's trademark arrangement: a large choir, rhythms heavily influenced by blues and jazz, and swaying organ and percussion accompaniment. Cleveland's rough-hewn vocals alternate theatrically with the smooth-sounding, swelling choir. Perhaps most notable about the recording is the rousing chorus that assumes prominence in the second half of the performance, as the choir rhythmically and intricately chants "Peace Be Still."

Cleveland performed with the Southern California Community Choir, which he formed when he founded the Cornerstone Baptist Church. The Southern California Community Choir sang behind him on his two Grammy Award LP albums Live at Carnegie Hall and In the Ghetto.

"I Don't Feel No Ways Tired." Cleveland's version of the gospel standard "I Don't Feel No Ways Tired," available on the album of the same name, illustrates his complex interplay of lead voice and choir. Cleveland's gruff lead contrasts starkly with the harmonic chants of the choir. Cleveland pauses to exhort, to preach, and to allow the choral rhythms to emerge. He delivers ecstatic variations on the sung word "believe." Likewise, the choir's varied arrangements of the refrain "I believe he brought me this far" exemplify the sophistication and elegance of Cleveland's choral compositions.

Musical Legacy

Cleveland became the leading modern exponent of the gospel choir. As a choral director, he was innovative as well as instructive, influencing many generations of singers. He performed with most of the leading gospel choirs, including the Voices of the Tabernacle, the Angelic Gospel Choir, and the Southern California Community Choir. The concerts of the Gospel Music Workshop of America, which he founded, featured choirs of as many as three thousand singers. He brought influences from contemporary secular and popular music into the traditional gospel choir. Whereas previous arrangements in gospel were often spontaneous, basic, and emotional, Cleveland arranged choral music with complex rhythms, varied tempi, and sophisticated harmonies. His annual Gospel Singers Workshop Convention spread gospel to thousands of singers and other musicians. Cleveland himself wrote more than four hundred songs and released more than one hundred albums of gospel music, winning four Grammy Awards.

For his contributions to gospel music, vocals, composition, and performance, Cleveland has been called the Crown Prince of Gospel. He was an exciting vocalist—with a hoarse, gritty quality to his voice, in striking contrast to the sweet-toned, imploring choir that accompanied him. The "foghorn" quality of his vocals has been likened to that of Louis Armstrong, and his preaching lyrics were heartfelt and gripping. Cleveland also sang with or accompanied such gospel stars as Clara Ward and had a strong influence on Aretha Franklin.

Howard Bromberg

Further Reading

Boyer, Horace Clarence. How Sweet the Sound: The Golden Age of Gospel. Washington, D.C.: Elliott and Clark, 1995. A conversational history of gospel music told biographically and geographically by a gospel musician and scholar.

Broughton, Viv. Too Close to Heaven: The Illustrated History of Gospel Music. London: Midnight Books, 1996. An updated history of gospel music that served as the basis for a British television documentary.

Carpenter, Bil. Uncloudy Days: The Gospel Music Encyclopedia. New York: Hal Leonard Books, 2007. Based on more than one hundred interviews, this comprehensive reference work reveals both the highlights and the low points in gospel music history.

Cusic, Don. The Sound of Light: A History of Gospel Music. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green State University Popular Press, 1990. Relates the story of gospel music in the broader context of religious musical history and contemporary musical forms.

Darden, Robert. People Get Ready: A New History of Black Gospel Music. New York: Continuum International, 2005. Roots gospel in spirituals, holiness churches, and blues evangelists such as the remarkable Blind Willie Johnson ("Dark was the Night . . . Cold Was the Ground").

See also: Crouch, Andraé; Dorsey, Thomas A.; Franklin, Aretha; Grant, Amy; Jackson, Mahalia; Smith, Michael W.; Staples, Pops; Ward, Clara.

Van Cliburn

American classical pianist

An important figure in the cultural landscape of the Cold War, Cliburn won the 1958 International Tchaikovsky Competition in Moscow two months after the Soviet Union launched the satellite Sputnik, reviving American pride and launching his performing career. His performances of Romantic piano works were notable for their warm, spontaneous sound, and his ability to connect with an audience brought new fans to classical music.

Born: July 12, 1934; Shreveport, Louisiana
Also known as: Harvey Lavan Cliburn, Jr. (full name)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Tchaikovsky: Concerto No. 1/Rachmaninoff: Concerto No. 2, 1958; Brahms: Concerto No. 2/ MacDowell: Concerto No. 2, 1961; My Favorite Chopin, 1962; Beethoven: Concerto Nos. 4 and 5, 1988; Beethoven Sonatas, 1989; Beethoven: Piano Concerto No. 3; Brahms: Rhapsodies; Intermezzo, 1992; Chopin: Sonatas for Piano No. 2; Liszt: Années de Pèlerinage, 2nd Year, 1992; Beethoven: Concerto No. 5/Rachmaninoff: Concerto No. 2, 1994; Schumann: Piano Concerto; Prokofiev: Piano Concerto No. 3, 1995; Tchaikovsky: Piano Concerto No. 1, 2003; Piano Concertos by Beethoven and Schumann, 2007.

The Life

The mother of Harvey Lavan Cliburn, Jr., Rildia Bee, was an aspiring concert pianist who studied with Arthur Friedheim. She immediately recognized her three-year-old son's musical talent when she discovered him playing by ear a waltz that one of her students had just practiced. She began teaching Cliburn piano immediately, and she remained his principal teacher until he went to college.

The results of his mother's tutelage were quickly apparent. Cliburn debuted when he was four years old, playing the Prelude in C Major from the first book of Johann Sebastian Bach's Well-Tempered Clavier. Through the Texas Federation of Music Clubs, the twelve-year-old Cliburn won an appearance with the Houston Symphony Orchestra, performing Peter Ilich Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1, a work that became identified with him. On March 12, 1948, he debuted at Carnegie Hall in New York for a National Music Festival Award. He began spending summers in New York City with his mother, and in 1951 he gained admittance to Juilliard and the piano class of Rosina Lhévinne, the Russian-born teacher of John Browning, Garrick Ohlsson, Misha Dichter, and James Levine.

Lhévinne put finishing touches on her student's formidable technique, and, from 1952 to 1958, Cliburn enjoyed an unprecedented winning streak, taking top honors in every piano competition he entered. In 1952 he won the Dealey Memorial Award and the Kosciuszko Foundation's Chopin prize. In 1953 he won the Juilliard concerto competition. Significantly, in 1954 Cliburn won the Leventritt Award, the first time that honor had been bestowed since 1951. In the intervening years, no entrant was deemed worthy.

Upon graduation, Cliburn was poised for a performing career, debuting with the New York Philharmonic on November 14, 1954, and even appearing on the Tonight Show with television host Steve Allen. However, in 1957, his draft number was called, and he had to report for military service, canceling his performing dates. Cliburn was not accepted into the Army, so he returned home to Kilgore, Texas, to take care of his parents and run his mother's piano studio. In 1958, encouraged by his teacher, Cliburn entered the first Tchaikovsky International Piano Competition in Moscow, winning first prize.

For the next sixteen years, Cliburn enjoyed a career both as a performing musician and as a cultural embassador. He signed with RCA Victor and made more than fifteen records. In 1961 he embarked on a U.S. State Department-sponsored tour of Mexico, the first of many such tours. In 1962 the first Van Cliburn International Piano Competition was held in Fort Worth, Texas, offering the largest amount of prize money of any competition.

Then, in 1974, his father and his manager died within two months of each other. Realizing he wanted to spend more time with friends and family, he stopped securing concert dates, and on September 29, 1978, he gave his final performance. Cliburn's retirement lasted until 1987 when the White House invited him to perform at a state dinner in honor of Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev. Offers poured in after that concert, and Cliburn has performed a few times a year, usually at important events.

Van Cliburn. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

The Music

The American Sputnik. On October 4, 1957, a spherical satellite named Sputnik was launched into space by the Soviet Union, a feat at the time that the United States could not match. Two months later, the Soviet Union announced the first Tchaikovsky International Piano Competition. Upon hearing of the competition, Lhévinne urged Cliburn to enter. Cliburn eagerly complied, and on April 2, 1958, the six-foot-four Texan took the stage in Moscow and caused a sensation. By the final round, in which he played Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1, Dmitri Kabalevsky's Rondo (written for the competition), and Sergei Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 2, even the judges gave Cliburn a standing ovation. After securing Soviet Premier Nikita Khrushchev's permission, the jury awarded him first prize, and Cliburn returned to the United States a hero, greeted with a ticker-tape parade in New York (the first one ever given for a classical musician). A performance at the White House for President Dwight Eisenhower and numerous television appearances followed. He was hailed as the American Sputnik.

Cliburn is associated with the concerti he played in the Tchaikovsky competition: Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1 and Rachmininoff's Piano Concerto No. 2. His recordings of those works on the RCA label made in the years following his win stand as two of the best of their kind, and the Tchaikovsky recording was the first classical record certified platinum.

The Repertoire. Other notable concerti Cliburn frequently performed were Edward MacDowell's Concerto No. 2, Ludwig van Beethoven's Concerto No. 5 ("Emperor"), and Sergei Prokofiev's Concerto No. 3. In the solo repertoire, Cliburn's rendition of Franz Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody No. 12 was noted as moving beyond technical virtuosity to plumb the work's pathos, and his performances of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's Piano Sonata in C Major stand out for their original approach to Mozart's style. Finally, when Cliburn returned to the stage at the White House, he did so with Johannes Brahms's Intermezzo, Rachmaninoff's Étude Tableau, Liszt's transcription of Robert Schumann's lied "Widmung," and Claude Debussy's "L'isle joyeuse," displaying the melodic focus and the singing tone he always cultivated in his playing.

Musical Legacy

By the time of his retirement in 1978, Cliburn was receiving harsh critical evaluations. Some critics maintained that Cliburn had a limited repertoire and that he lacked musical curiosity, causing his career to stall. Nevertheless, Cliburn never apologized for his focus on the Romantic repertoire, and he enjoyed an active performance career that continually sold out houses as long as he desired it.

His greatest legacy to American musical culture rests in two areas. First, he brought the rich, full, and idiosyncratic Russian style of playing (which originated with Anton Rubinstein) to American pianism and the wider public. Second, as a wholesome American pianist, Cliburn, in winning a Soviet competition in Moscow, reassured a country nervous about Sputnik's implications. Although the pianist had an enviable warmth of tone and expressive power, making him a classical-music celebrity, it was his role as cultural hero that brought him fame and honor. It was this role that brought him in 2001 the Kennedy Center Honors and in 2003 the Presidential Medal of Freedom and the Grammy Lifetime Achievement Award. His warm personality and genuine love of his audience made him popular throughout the world, particularly in Russia, where in 2004 he was awarded the Order of Friendship, the country's highest civilian award. Cliburn was committed to his belief in music's power to bridge divides and to speak universally.

S. Andrew Granade

Further Reading

Horowitz, Joseph. The Ivory Trade: Music and the Business of Music at the Van Cliburn International Piano Competition. New York: Summit Books, 1990. An unbiased look at the competition's history and Cliburn's role in American culture.

Kenneson, Claude. Musical Prodigies: Perilous Journeys, Remarkable Lives. Portland, Oreg.: Amadeus, 1998. A fascinating look at the childhood lives of numerous musical prodigies, among them Cliburn.

Reich, Howard. Van Cliburn. Nashville, Tenn.: Thomas Nelson, 1993. A full-length biography of Cliburn, this book is musically knowledgeable and features a useful annotated discography.

See also: Debussy, Claude; Prokofiev, Sergei; Rachmaninoff, Sergei; Rubinstein, Artur.

Jimmy Cliff

Jamaican reggae singer and songwriter

A major figure in the ska music of the 1960's and in the reggae of the 1970's, Cliff has been influenced by a variety of styles, including pop, African, and South American.

Born: April 1, 1948; St. Catherine, Jamaica
Also known as: James Chambers (birth name)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Hard Road, 1967; Give Thanx, 1969; Jimmy Cliff, 1969; Wonderful World, Beautiful People, 1970; Another Cycle, 1971; The Harder They Come, 1972; Struggling Man, 1973; Music Maker, 1974; Brave Warrior, 1975; Follow My Mind, 1976; Unlimited, 1977; Oh Jamaica, 1979; I Am the Living, 1980; Give the People What They Want, 1981; House of Exile, 1981; Special, 1982; Power and the Glory, 1983; Can't Get Enough of It, 1984; Cliff Hanger, 1985; Sense of Direction, 1985; Fundamental Reggae, 1987; Hanging Fire, 1987; Shout for Freedom, 1987; Images, 1990; Breakout, 1992; Jimmy Cliff, Vol. 2, 1995; Many Rivers to Cross, 1995; Higher and Higher, 1998; Humanitarian, 1999; Journey of a Lifetime, 2001; Fantastic Plastic People, 2002; Sunshine in the Music, 2003; Black Magic, 2004.

SINGLES: "Hurricane Hattie," 1962; "King of Kings," 1962; "Pride and Passion," 1962; "I Can See Clearly Now," 1993.

The Life

Jimmy Cliff was born James Chambers in a small village in Jamaica to working-class parents of Pentecostal origins. By age thirteen, the ambitious Cliff had changed his name and moved to Kingston. In 1962 he recorded his first ska-influenced hit, "Hurricane Hattie," with producer Leslie Kong.

Beginning in 1964, Cliff spent four years in England, working for Chris Blackwell of Island Records. This was a difficult and confusing time for Cliff, who had to alter his Jamaican patois toward the cosmopolitan ambitions of the label.

After a six-month stay in South America, Cliff released his first international hit, "Wonderful World, Beautiful People." In 1972 director Perry Henzel approached Cliff to play the title role in Jamaica's first feature film, The Harder They Come. The sound track, coproduced by Cliff, was one of the most successful reggae albums ever.

To capitalize on the success of this sound track, Cliff toured and recorded constantly, although the U.S. market was especially elusive, and his career has remained more popular outside the United States. During the 1970's, Cliff traveled to Africa to seek a deeper understanding of his Muslim faith, and he continued to pursue his interests in film, in both music and acting. This led to roles in Bongo Man (1980) and Club Paradise (1986) and to a hit single with "I Can See Clearly Now" for the film Cool Runnings (1993). Cliff moved to Paris, and from this base he has continued to tour worldwide.

The Music

Cliff began his recording career in the early 1960's, during the high point of Jamaica's ska period, a precursor to reggae. His time in England and South America was fertile, because he was introduced to samba and rock, and he honed his songwriting abilities to adapt to the more universal style of soul. With the release of The Harder They Come, Cliff's early reggae style, for which he would become recognized, was celebrated.

Toward the end of the 1970's, despite commercial pressure to remain with his roots, Cliff embraced the influences of artists outside Jamaica, redefining his style. In fact, his three Grammy Award nominations came for work that was collaborative with artists outside the field of reggae: two lush, party pop albums with Kool and the Gang in the mid-1980's, Power and the Glory and Cliff Hanger (which won a Grammy Award for best reggae album), and Black Magic, a compilation record produced by Dave Stewart, with guest artists Annie Lennox, Sting, Wyclef Jean, Kool and the Gang, Yannick Noah, and Joe Strummer (in one of his last recordings).

Wonderful World, Beautiful People. This album from 1970 is among Cliff's finest, showing great musical diversity and emotional depth. Well known is the deeply moving "Many Rivers to Cross," which was written during Cliff's troubled period in England and which is sung in a simple, spiritual gospel style. It tells of being lost and "washed up for years," with only pride to hold on to. A devastating protest song, "Vietnam" has a deceptively easy arrangement that serves to underline the terror of the theme: a letter telling a mother about the death of her son. Both Paul Simon and Bob Dylan hold this work in great esteem. There is, however, light among the grim themes, particularly in the title track, which manages to have an island quality with lush symphonic additions. The buoyant opening track, "Time Will Tell," with its prominent and active bass guitar, preaches timeless Cliff themes of patience, strong will, and hope for the future.

The Harder They Come. This compilation album put reggae and Cliff on the international stage. Among the eighteen tracks by artists such as Toots and the Maytals and Desmond Dekker, Cliff contributes five, including "The Harder They Come," "You Can Get It If You Really Want It," and "Sitting in Limbo." The title song is one of Cliff's best. Its energy lies between Cliff's soaring vocals and the nononsense arrangement of crisp double-time riffs between bass and organ. This film, about an impoverished young man who travels to the ghettos of Trenchtown to try to make it in the exploitive Jamaican music industry, was quoted in the Clash song "Guns of Brixton," and it remains a popular underground film in the United States.

Jimmy Cliff: Anthology. There are quite a few Cliff anthology records, but many are incomplete because Cliff recorded with so many different labels. This double album includes works from the 1960's, with three early ska works from Cliff's days with Kong, through 1993. This compilation features the major hits as well as the Brazilian hit from 1969, "Waterfall," the title song from the film Club Paradise (1986), the Johnny Nash cover "I Can See Clearly Now." The cover of Cat Stevens's "Wild World," however, is not the wonderful live version from the brilliant 1976 album In Concert. The infectious "Reggae Nights," which was a huge hit in Europe, is also missing.

Musical Legacy

With the release of The Harder They Come in 1972, Cliff was responsible for introducing reggae to an international audience and for paving the way for Bob Marley and others. Cliff, however, would never achieve the prominence of Marley. This is perhaps because he transitioned through many record labels, or because he decided not to adopt Rastafarianism, or because he made music with a crossover nature. Nevertheless, Cliff has continued to tour throughout his career, and he has found much popularity beyond the United States, especially in Africa, South America, and Europe (France and Scandinavia). He and his music are held in high esteem by other artists, as evidenced by the collaborators on his album Black Magic, and he helped make reggae appealing to pop and rock audiences.

Sonya Mason

Further Reading

Brown-Martin, Graham. "Black Magic Man." Air Jamaica: SkyWritings 153 (July/August, 2004): 38. An interview with Cliff about his album Black Magic, with his thoughts on faith and his connection to reggae roots.

Chang, Kevin O'Brien, and Wayne Chen. Reggae Routes. Jamaica: Ian Randle, 1998. The source presents the history of reggae from a Jamaican point of view. Includes song lists, artists, and rankings.

Davis, Stephen. Reggae Bloodlines: In Search of the Music and Culture of Jamaica. New York: Da Capo Press, 1992. This resource focuses on reggae during its developmental period in the 1970's. Includes an insightful interview with Cliff and photographs by Peter Simon.

Larkin, Colin, ed. The Virgin Encyclopedia of 70's Music. London: Virgin Books, 2002. The entry on Cliff gives detailed information on his time in England and a list of album ratings.

Thompson, Dave. Reggae and Caribbean Music. San Francisco: Backbeat Books, 2002. In this comprehensive history of reggae and Caribbean music, the profile of Cliff looks at his life before and after the 1970's. Includes artist profiles and lists of leading Jamaican producers, singles, and albums.

See also: Dylan, Bob; Gil, Gilberto; Marley, Bob; Simon, Paul; Stevens, Cat; Sting; Strummer, Joe; Tosh, Peter.

Patsy Cline

American country singer

One of the first artists to achieve success in country and in popular music, Cline combined her country sensibility with her sophisticated, throaty voice and pop arrangements to make her music accessible to and loved by both audiences.

Born: September 8, 1932; Winchester, Virginia
Died: March 5, 1963; Camden, Tennessee
Also known as: Virginia Patterson Hensley (birth name)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Patsy Cline, 1957; Showcase, 1961 (with the Jordanaires); Sentimentally Yours, 1962.

SINGLES: "A Church, a Courtroom, and Then Goodbye," 1955; "I Loved and Lost Again," 1956; "Pick Me Up on Your Way Down," 1956; "Stop, Look, and Listen," 1956; "Fingerprints," 1957; "A Stranger in My Arms," 1957; "Walkin' After Midnight," 1957; "Crazy," 1961; "I Fall to Pieces," 1961; "Imagine That," 1962; "She's Got You," 1962; "So Wrong," 1962; "When I Get Thru With You," 1962; "Sweet Dreams," 1963.

The Life

Patsy Cline was born Virginia Patterson Hensley, one of three children of Samuel Lawrence Hensley, a blacksmith, and Hilda Patterson Hensley, a seamstress. The Clines moved nearly twenty times before finally settling in Winchester, Virginia, when Cline was in the eighth grade. When Cline was fifteen, her parents divorced, reportedly because of her father's heavy drinking. This forced Cline to quit high school to help her mother support the family, and she worked as a waitress and as a soda jerk.

Cline had been interested in music since the age of eight, when her mother gave her a piano for her birthday, which she learned to play by ear. At thirteen, she had a serious bout with rheumatic fever, which she later credited as giving her the deep, throaty quality of her voice. Cline began singing in the Baptist church choir and then on local radio shows and at dances. In 1952 she met and married

Gerald Cline, but in 1956 the couple separated. A year later, she married Charles Dick. She gave birth to a daughter, Julie, in 1958, and a son, Randy, in 1961. Cline received her first national recognition on Arthur Godfrey's Talent Scouts in 1957, and she achieved the peak of her career in 1961. Cline was involved in a near-fatal automobile accident in 1961, and in 1963 she died in a plane crash, along with Cowboy Copas and Hawkshaw Hawkins, on a flight from a benefit concert in Kansas City to Nashville.

The Music

Early Works. Cline achieved a measure of local fame as a country singer in the Virginia-Maryland area through appearances on radio and especially as a regular on Connie B. Gay's Town and Country television show, which also featured country singer Jimmy Dean, broadcast out of Washington, D.C. In 1955 she signed with Four Star Records, with the stipulation that she record only songs by Four Star writers. Between 1955 and 1957, she recorded fifty-one songs with Four Star; none of them achieved any notable success. All of the Four Star material was country, honky-tonk, and rockabilly style, including "Fingerprints," "Pick Me Up on Your Way Down," and "A Stranger in My Arms." During this period, Cline made several appearances at the Grand Ole Opry.

Patsy Cline. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Country-Pop Crossover. At the insistence of her record label, Cline recorded "Walkin' After Midnight," by Don Hecht and Alan Block, for her first album. The song proved so popular with the audience of the Godfrey show that it was released as the first single on her first album, Patsy Cline. The song was a hit on both the country and pop charts, reaching number two on the country charts and number twelve on the pop charts. Cline became one of the first country artists to achieve crossover success.

In 1959 Cline began to work with a new manager, Randy Hughes, and in 1960 she signed a contract with Decca Records, working under the direction of producer Owen Bradley. With his use of arrangements and instruments more sophisticated than those previously found on country records, Bradley helped create, together with RCA's Chet Atkins, what became known as the Nashville Sound. This sound replaced the prevailing honky-tonk style of country music with a smoother sound. Although Cline never liked the fact that she was singing pop rather than country material, she achieved her greatest success in these crossover recordings.

Cline's first recording for Decca, "I Fall to Pieces," released in 1961 and written by Hank Cochran and Harlan Howard, was her first number-one hit on the country charts, and it reached number twelve on the pop charts. The tremendous success of "I Fall to Pieces" and the national fame that it brought were followed by a serious car accident. However, after a month in the hospital, Cline came back stronger than ever, recording Willie Nelson's "Crazy." Although she initially balked at recording it, "Crazy" became her signature song and a huge hit, landing in the Top 10 of the pop charts. Cline's unprecedented success as a crossover artist continued with "She's Got You," written by Cochran, released in 1962, which became her second number-one hit on the country charts. This was followed by the minor hits "When I Get Thru with You," "Imagine That," and "So Wrong."

Musical Legacy

Cline was one of the most popular female country singers in recording history and one of the first performers to find success in both the country and pop music worlds. She was a pioneer of the Nashville Sound, and she paved the way for such crossover artists as Loretta Lynn and Dolly Parton. Cline was also the first female country artist to headline her own show and to be inducted into the Country Music Hall of Fame. She opened doors for female country artists, who previously had been sidelined in the music business. Cline enjoyed more popularity after her death than she did during her life.

Mary Virginia Davis

Further Reading

Brown, Stuart E., Jr., and Lorraine F. Meyers. Patsy Cline: Singing Girl of the Shenandoah Valley. Berryville, Va.: Virginia, 1996. This source offers rare photographs, stories from Cline's early years, and information on her family history.

Hazen, Cindy, and Mike Freeman. Love Always, Patsy: Patsy Cline's Letters to a Friend. New York: Berkley Books, 1999. A collection of letters written between 1955 and 1959 by Cline to the president of her fan club.

Jones, Margaret. Patsy: The Life and Times of Patsy Cline. New York: HarperCollins, 1994. A sympathetic and detailed biography, based on extensive interviews with several country artists. Includes photographs, discography, and index.

Mansfield, Brian. Remembering Patsy. Nashville, Tenn.: Thomas Nelson, 2003. An extensive collection of photographs of Cline features recollections of those who knew her. A companion to an MCA compact-disc tribute to Cline.

Nassour, Ellis. Honky Tonk Angel: The Intimate Story of Patsy Cline. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1993. This much revised version of Nassour's 1981 Patsy Cline biography includes several new interviews and insights. Includes discography and index.

See also: Everly, Don and Phil; Haggard, Merle; Lang, K. D.; Lynn, Loretta; Presley, Elvis; Williams, Hank.

Kurt Cobain

American rock guitarist, singer, and songwriter

A major figure in the alternative rock movement, Cobain was lead singer, songwriter, and guitarist for the Seattle-based grunge-rock band Nirvana. With his angst-filled lyrics, his guttural singing voice, his distorted guitar technique, and his high-energy live music performances, he became the voice for Generation X.

Born: February 20, 1967; Hoquiam, Washington
Died: April 5, 1994; Seattle, Washington
Also known as: Kurt Donald Cobain (full name)
Member of: Nirvana

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): Collector's Box, 2006.
ALBUMS (with Nirvana): Bleach, 1989; Nevermind, 1991; In Utero, 1993; MTV Unplugged in New York, 1994; The Classic Interviews, 2005; A Golden Legacy, 2006.
SINGLES (with Nirvana): "Smells Like Teen Spirit," 1991; "Come as You Are," 1992; "In Bloom," 1992; "Lithium," 1992; "All Apologies," 1993; "Heart Shaped Box," 1993.
WRITINGS OF INTEREST: Journals, 2003.

The Life

Kurt Donald Cobain (koh-BAYN) was born to Donald and Wendy Cobain on February 20, 1967. Cobain's parents divorced when he was seven years old, and as a result he was shuffled among family and friends' homes. Growing up, Cobain showed a keen interest in art and music, and he was given a guitar for his fourteenth birthday.

In high school, Cobain immersed himself in art classes and, realizing that he was short on class credits, decided to drop out of high school two weeks before graduation. In the following years Cobain held a number of part-time jobs and experienced brief periods of homelessness. Nonetheless, during this time he spent a great deal of energy writing songs and developing his guitar playing.

In 1985 Cobain formed his first band, Fecal Matter, with other local Seattle musicians. The band was short lived and self-recorded only one sixteen-song demo tape, Illiteracy Will Prevail. Upon hearing Illiteracy Will Prevail, Cobain's friend Krist Novoselic saw promise in the budding songwriter and agreed to form a band with him. With the addition of drummer Chad Channing, the highly influential rock band Nirvana was formed.

Nirvana's first album, Bleach, was released in 1989 on a Seattle independent record label, Sub Pop Records, and met with moderate success. The band toured on several occasions and generated a significant amount of attention among the major record labels. In 1990 drummer Channing was replaced by Dave Grohl, and the band signed with David Geffen of Geffen Records.

Kurt Cobain. (AP/Wide World Photos)

While recording Nirvana's 1991 major label debut Nevermind, Cobain was introduced to singer Courtney Love, and the two developed a romantic relationship. On February 20, 1992, they were married in Hawaii; in August, Love gave birth to their daughter, Frances Bean.

Throughout much of his life, Cobain was plagued with chronic stomach ailments. Despite many attempts to solve the medical problem, he was unable to remedy the persistent pain. Because of this, Cobain turned to self-medication in the form of heroin, claiming it was the only drug that could alleviate his stomach pains. Accordingly, he developed a severe heroin addiction.

Nirvana returned to the studio in 1993 to record its third full-length album, In Utero. It was a huge success, and the band went back on tour with a significant amount of media attention, specifically focused on Cobain and Love's personal life. Cobain became increasingly uncomfortable with the media spotlight and increased his drug abuse.

During a European tour in 1994, Cobain was hospitalized for a drug overdose, involving alcohol and insomnia medication. The tour was canceled, and Cobain returned to Seattle. Back in the United States, Love and other friends staged an intervention, and with some persuasion Cobain entered a drug-rehabilitation center in Los Angeles. After a few days, Cobain fled the rehabilitation center and, unbeknown to friends and family, returned to the Seattle area. Love and others mounted a search for the missing singer.

On April 8, 1994, Cobain's body and suicide note were found by a local electric company field technician in Cobain's Lake Washington home. The coroner's report indicated that Cobain died from a self-inflicted shotgun wound to the head on April 5, 1994.

The Music

Cobain's musical interests were diverse. Early influences were such bands as the Beatles and the Monkees. Later his interests progressed to such rock bands as Kiss, Black Sabbath, the Meat Puppets, the Sex

Pistols, and the Clash. Cobain's guitar solos at live performances consisted of extended periods of ad lib, guitar-amp feedback, and noise.

"Smells Like Teen Spirit." When one of Cobain's friends spray-painted "Kurt Smells Like Teen Spirit" on a wall, Cobain was inspired to compose the successful song "Smells Like Teen Spirit." With only a few weeks before recording Nevermind, the band's major-record-label debut, Cobain played the song. It was not an immediate band favorite. Cobain played the guitar part for nearly an hour and a half before someone suggested that the song be slowed down in tempo. At a slower pace, the song fell into place, and it became a hugely popular anthem for Generation X. The song sold more than a million copies, and it was nominated for two Grammy Awards. Despite the song's success, Nirvana attempted to distance itself from"Smells Like Teen Spirit," claiming it had become a parody.

"Come as You Are." "Come as You Are" was the second most popular song on Nirvana's Nevermind album, and it helped catapult the band to the top of rock charts again. After Cobain died in 1994, "Come as You Are" was the subject of speculation and controversy. Eerily, the original music video for the song depicted a gun being fired at Cobain, followed by him dying in slow motion. In 1994 Nirvana released an acoustic version of the song on the album MTV Unplugged in New York. Cobain's hometown of Aberdeen, Washington, elected to use the title as the town's motto: Aberdeen, Washington: Come as You Are.

"Heart Shaped Box." "Heart Shaped Box" was the first single from Nirvana's third album, In Utero, written between 1992 and 1993. The song was inspired by American writer and feminist social critic Camille Paglia, who explored the role of female sex organs and their depiction in society. In addition, Love had sent Cobain a heart-shaped box during the early stages of their courtship, and Cobain and Love collected numerous heart-shaped boxes, displaying them prominently in their Seattle home. "Heart Shaped Box" spent three weeks at number one on the Billboard modern rock charts. Its music video garnered Nirvana two MTV Music Video Awards for Best Art Direction and Best Alternative Video. The awards ceremony was conducted after Cobain's death, and the awards were accepted by the remaining members of Nirvana.

Musical Legacy

Cobain's music, with its simplified melodic and harmonic compositional styling, was noted for its raw, unpolished sound. His unique styling marked a dramatic shift in mainstream musical taste away from the highly complex, aurally perfect sound of glam rock and dance music of the late 1980's to the simplicity of alternative rock. Despite having a short life, Cobain influenced mainstream rock music and various subgenres, such as punk, grunge, and independent rock. Cobain's music was labeled the music of Generation X, his contemporaries born in the 1960's and 1970's, and they helped make him one of the highest-grossing musicians of all time.

Delbert S. Bowers

Further Reading

Azerrad, Michael. Come as You Are: The Story of Nirvana. New York: Main Street Books, 1993. Written before Cobain's death in 1994, a snapshot-in-time look at Nirvana's place in rock history, including the band's beginnings and its significance in rock.

Cobain, Kurt. Journals. New York: Riverhead Books, 2003. Contains entries from more than twenty journals Cobain wrote from the late 1980's until his death, providing a strikingly personal look into Cobain's deepest thoughts.

Crisafulli, Chuck. Nirvana: The Stories Behind Every Song. New York: Thunder's Mouth Press, 2006. Lists every Nirvana song written, recorded, and performed, tracing its origins, story, and meaning.

Cross, Charles C. Heavier than Heaven: A Biography of Kurt Cobain. New York: Hyperion, 2002. An in-depth look at Cobain's personal and public life, using details from hundreds of interviews and articles.

Peterson, Charles. Screaming Life: A Chronicle of the Seattle Music Scene. New York: HarperCollins, 1995. A book of photographs from Seattle's grunge-music scene during the early and post-Nirvana years, illustrating the energy that produced some of the most popular bands of the 1990's.

See also: Lennon, John; McCartney, Sir Paul; Strummer, Joe.

George M. Cohan

American musical-theater composer

Cohan was lauded during his lifetime as a song-and-dance man, but it is as a lyricist and librettist that he made a lasting impact. He "Americanized" the Broadway musical by writing about American characters using American popular music.

Born: July 3, 1878; Providence, Rhode Island
Died: November 5, 1942; New York, New York
Also known as: George Michael Cohan (full name)

Principal works

MUSICAL THEATER (music, lyrics, and libretto unless otherwise stated): The Governor's Son, 1901; Running for Office, 1903; Little Johnny Jones, 1904; Forty-five Minutes from Broadway, 1906; George Washington, Jr., 1906; The Honeymooners, 1907; The Talk of New York, 1907; The American Idea, 1908; The Cohan and Harris Minstrels, 1908; Fifty Miles from Boston, 1908; The Yankee Prince, 1908; The Man Who Owns Broadway, 1909; The Little Millionaire, 1911; Hello, Broadway, 1914; Cohan and Harris, 1916; The Cohan Revue of 1916, 1916; The Cohan Revue of 1918, 1918; The Voice of McConnell, 1918 (music with Ernest R. Ball, Chauncey Alcott, Monte Carlo, and Alma M. Sanders; lyrics with Rida Johnson Young and Richard W. Pascoe); Little Nellie Kelly, 1922; The Rise of Rosie O'Reilly, 1923; The Song and Dance Man, 1923; The Merry Malones, 1927; Billie, 1928.
SONG: "Over There," 1917.

The Life

George Michael Cohan (KOH-han) was born in the proverbial trunk to traveling vaudevillians, who took their infant son on stage as a prop. Soon, the Four Cohans—Jeremiah (Jerry) and Helen (Nellie), and children Josephine (Josie) and George—were touring the circuit, winning enough acclaim to be booked into New York City in 1893. With almost no formal education, Cohan found his schoolroom to be the theater, and he was a good student in this nontraditional venue. By the age of nine, he had his first speaking role, and by the age of eleven he was writing sketches for his family to perform. Publishing songs by sixteen, he wrote his first hit song, "Venus, My Shining Love," in 1893.

While the Four Cohans were earning a thousand dollars a week—a tremendous amount of money at the time—Cohan married actress Ethel Levy in 1899, and she joined the troupe. On August 26, 1900, the couple had a daughter, Georgette.

Tension grew between Ethel and Cohan's sister, so in 1904 Josie and her new husband signed on to their own production, breaking up the Four Cohans. The newly configured Four Cohans (Jerry, Nellie, George, and Ethel) was disrupted when Ethel left the cast in December, 1906, during the run of George Washington, Jr. Cohan had fallen in love with a chorus girl from Little Johnny Jones, and he married Agnes Mary Nolan on June 29, 1907. They had three children: Mary, Helen, and George, Jr.

Jerry and Nellie decided to retire from the stage at the conclusion of the run of Cohan's comedy Broadway Jones, and their thirty-five-year-old son said he would do the same. Performing since he was seven, Cohan told the press that his other ventures demanded more of his time. Even though he professed to wanting "to write an American play that will live," he returned to acting ten months later. His last appearance in New York, however, proved to be a disappointment, when his The Return of the Vagabond (1940) lasted only one week.

In 1941 Cohan was diagnosed with intestinal cancer, which killed him the following year at the age of sixty-four. His funeral was held in St. Patrick's Cathedral in New York City.

The Music

Although the Four Cohans were a hit on the vaudeville circuit, Cohan longed to be on Broadway in legitimate houses, not in musical revues or vaudeville. Since performers rarely transitioned from vaudeville to Broadway, twenty-two-year-old Cohan made a bargain with producer Louis Behman. He could book the Four Cohans for a year on his vaudeville circuit if he would produce them in their first musical on Broadway, The Governor's Son.

A modest success in New York, Cohan took the show on the road where he continued to refine the material.

Little Johnny Jones. By his third musical, Little Johnny Jones, Cohan had created that magical blend of song, dance, plot, and character that all raced to a climactic finish. This musical introduced "Yankee Doodle Dandy" and "Give My Regards to Broadway," and the latter was used in the opening montage in Hollywood's first musical film, The Broadway Melody (1929).

Little Johnny Jones does not feature harmonic breadth; indeed, in all of his compositions, Cohan relied on the four chords he could play using only the black keys on the piano. While based on the life of famous American jockey Tod Sloan, Little Johnny Jones is more about Cohan than about Sloan. With its naive sentimentality and its poetic justice, the musical permitted Cohan to turn the story of an American jockey unjustly accused of throwing a race in England into a tap-dancing tour de force. While he was born on July 3, Cohan always said he was born on July 4. Since telling reporters was not sufficient, he made it into a lyric: "I'm a Yankee Doodle dandy,/ A Yankee Doodle, do or die;/ A real live nephew of my Uncle Sam,/ Born on the Fourth of July."

On Broadway. Cohan became an established star on Broadway, a position he sustained for the next thirty years. While most of his early shows were written to showcase his family (and wife Ethel), the first Cohan musical that did not feature the author as a performer was Forty-five Minutes from Broadway, which introduced another set of standard tunes ("Mary's a Grand Old Name" and "So Long, Mary"). Fay Templeton and up-and-coming talent Victor Moore proved that Cohan's material did not require his stage presence to make it popular; Forty-five Minutes from Broadway is arguably Cohan's strongest libretto.

Many of Cohan's twenty-two musicals contain similar themes: America vs. Europe, Cinderella plots, stock characters (stage Yankee, plucky ingenues, daft old ladies), endings ruled by poetic justice, and lots of patriotic American flag waving, such as in his songs "You're a Grand Old Flag," "Any Place the Old Flag Flies," "For the Flag, for the Home, for the Family." Cohan idolized the American dream and Yankee ingenuity, and so his stage character was always a winner.

Cohan returned to writing for his family with George Washington, Jr. Despite a preposterous plot, the show was a success, no doubt buoyed by such hit songs as "You're a Grand Old Flag" (the first song written for a musical which sold more than a million copies of sheet music) and the rousing showstopper, "I Was Born in Virginia."

Reared in vaudeville, Cohan was uniquely situated to excel in the episodic nature of the musical revue. Hello, Broadway—called "A Musical Crazy Quilt Patched and Threaded Together with Words and Music and Staged by George M. Cohan"—and two editions of The Cohan Revue in 1916 and 1918 were well received.

The Show Doctor. Many of the plays and musicals produced by Cohan were rewritten and/or restaged by him, and in doing so he made another name for himself as a well-respected "show doctor," who could rectify weaknesses in a musical production. He did not always publicize these projects, but the Anselm Goetzl-William Cary Duncan operetta The Royal Vagabond became a hit once Cohan worked it over, and it was billed as a "Cohanized Opera Comique."

George M. Cohan. (Library of Congress)

Cohan's celebratory, positive librettos not only gave shape to American musical theater, they almost single-handedly elevated the stage Irishman from his role as a low comic and second-class citizen. With shows such as Little Nellie Kelly (at 276 performances, the longest run in Cohan's career), The Rise of Rosie O'Reilly, and The Merry Malones, and songs such as "Harrigan" and "Ring to the Name of Rosie," Cohan redeemed an ethnic group long derided in the press and on the stage.

During the peak of Cohan's artistic accomplishments, he was indeed The Man Who Owns Broadway (1909); in 1920 he had three productions running simultaneously on Broadway. By the 1920's, the swagger of Cohan's homespun songs was being eclipsed by younger writers: Irving Berlin, Jerome Kern, Noël Coward, and George and Ira Gershwin. Although Berlin acknowledged he was the songwriting heir of Cohan, the son eclipsed the father in terms of technical skill, versatility, and longevity. Cohan's last musicals sounded like period pieces, even though they were new. While Cohan revolutionized the Broadway musical with well-structured librettos, high-energy, and fast pacing, his work did not evolve with the times. In the late 1920's, his musical Billie contained none of the innovations ushered in by Show Boat (1927). After Billie, Cohan concentrated on writing nonmusical plays.

Cohan and Hollywood. Cohan rarely ventured into film, but he did appear in the Hollywood film The Phantom President (1932), with six songs by Richard Rodgers and Lorenz Hart. Cohan took the part, assuming he would write his own songs; resigned to singing someone else's material, Cohan generally made himself quite disagreeable during the filming. Much more successful was his work as an actor in Eugene O'Neill's Ah, Wilderness! (1933) on Broadway. Against their wishes, Rodgers and Hart were reunited with Cohan when he was signed to perform the lead in I'd Rather Be Right (1937).

Cohan the Playwright. The restless Cohan was not content to master vaudeville and the Broadway musical, he wanted to excel as a playwright as well. His first attempt at a nonmusical play, Popularity (1907), was not well-received, but Broadway Jones (1912) was a hit. Classic melodramas, Seven Keys to Baldpate (1913) and The Tavern (1920), have enjoyed success as revivals. Cohan ultimately penned twenty nonmusical plays.

Cohan the Businessman. Frustrated by the lack of success of his first two book musicals and his constant rejections from music publishers, Cohan teamed up with another artist, Sam Harris, thwarted by the Broadway establishment. Cohan and Harris's first joint venture was coproducing Little Johnny Jones, and it marked the beginning of one of the most successful producing firms on Broadway; in fifteen years, they produced twenty-two productions. In 1908 they started the Cohan & Harris Publishing Company. In 1911, proof of their success as producers, Cohan and Harris had six hit Broadway shows and controlled seven theaters. Other ventures included opening the George M. Cohan Theater in 1911, which was located in the heart of Broadway (at Broadway and Forty-third Street). With murals celebrating the career of the Four Cohans, the theater became a film house in 1932, and in 1938 it was demolished.

Cohan's multiple responsibilities in the theater came into conflict when Actor's Equity Association called for its first strike in 1919. As an actor, he could certainly see the need to protect actors from unscrupulous producers. As a businessman, he aligned himself with producers, only to see himself mocked and criticized by fellow actors. The experience so soured him that he announced his retirement from the stage, he dissolved his partnership with Harris, and he even resigned from the Lambs, the Players, and the Friar's Club. When the Actors' Equity Association signed with the Producer's Management Association, Cohan refused to join the union. For the next twenty-two years, even though he continued to act, it was always by special arrangement.

Musical Legacy

Almost every one of Cohan's five hundred songs reflects his individual performing style. Self-taught, he was not insecure about his lack of training; rather, he celebrated his limited musical and lyrical vocabulary. He once wrote he preferred "a Sousa strain/ Instead of a Wagner pain" (from "I Want to Hear a Yankee Doodle Tune," 1911). His music may have been naive, but his melodies are unforgettable. As a lyricist, Cohan was accused of being "unpoetic," but he was a master at shaping the colloquial into lyrics so that they sounded natural and conversational. Examples of this skill include "Life's a Funny Proposition After All" (1904), "When a Fellow's on the Level with a Girl That's on the Square" (1907), and "We Do All the Dirty Work" (1911). Leaving majestic Romantic rhetoric to the nineteenth century and witty Ivy-league patter to Hart and Cole Porter, Cohan embraced slang and short phrases so that his lyrics sounded up to date. Oscar Hammerstein II acknowledged this skill, noting "Cohan's genius was to say simply what everybody else was subconsciously feeling."

Cohan's single biggest hit song did not come from one of his shows: "Over There" was written about World War I. Initially selling more than two million copies, Cohan donated its royalties to war charities. Brought back into popularity during World War II, Congress approved a special Medal of Honor for Cohan in 1940, the first time a songwriter had ever been so decorated.

Cohan lived long enough to see himself wonderfully (though inaccurately) immortalized on film by James Cagney in Yankee Doodle Dandy (1942), for which Cagney won the Academy Award for Best Actor.

Using Cohan's life and songs, the musical biography George M! (1968)—book by Michael Stewart, John Pascal, and Francine Pascal—introduced a new generation to this brash, rich, arrogant, cantankerous, self-opinionated, egocentric, and talented showman.

In 1981 the Goodspeed Opera House in East Haddam, Connecticut, produced a rousing entertainment when they mounted Little Johnny Jones (albeit with a radically altered libretto by Alfred Uhry). While Cohan's musical and nonmusical plays are not often revived, his music lives on. He created a personality for the Broadway musical, one with a signature blend of grit, brashness, and inexhaustible energy, that has surfaced repeatedly in such later projects as Of Thee I Sing (1931), Annie Get Your Gun (1946), The Pajama Game (1954), Fiorello! (1959), The Music Man (1957), Guys and Dolls (1950), Barnum (1980), Annie (1976), and Hairspray (2002).

Seventeen years after his death, a statue of Cohan was erected at Broadway and Forty-seventh Street, so that once again, Cohan could survey the Great White Way. In the 1970's, the American Guild of Variety Artists named their annual awards the "Georgie," and the U.S. Postal Service released a stamp in Cohan's honor in 1978 to commemorate the centennial of his birth. While Cohan was followed on Broadway by many multifaceted artists, he was singular in performing so many aspects of theater: as a lyricist, a composer, librettist, a playwright, a theater owner, a performer, a director, a choreographer, a publisher, and a producer.

Bud Coleman

Further Reading

Cohan, George M. Twenty Years on Broadway and the Years It Took to Get There; The True Story of a Trouper's Life from the Cradle to the "Closed Shop." New York: Harper & Brother, 1925. Cohan's autobiography focuses only on the Four Cohans in vaudeville and his career up to 1900, so spends little or no time on his marriage to Ethel, his children, the Actor's Equity strike, or the dissolution of the Cohan-Harris partnership.

Fisher, James. "George M. Cohan." In Dictionary of Literary Biography, Volume 249: Twentieth-Century American Dramatists, edited by Christopher Wheatley. New York: The Gale Group, 2001. This analysis of Cohan's contribution to the formation of American musical comedy stresses that the musical-comedy texts and songs Cohan wrote were fresh and new in style.

Gottlieb, Robert, and Robert Kimball. Reading Lyrics. New York: Pantheon Books, 2000. This resource contains a brief biography of Cohan and reprints the lyrics to sixteen of Cohan's songs. The authors celebrate his "spunky, Irish-American patriotic swagger."

Hischak, Thomas S. Boy Loses Girl: Broadway's Librettists. Lanham, Md.: Scarecrow Press, 2002. The author notes Cohan's innovations, which led to a uniquely American shape and tone of the musical-theater libretto with "better stories, believable characters, and efficient staging."

_____. Word Crazy: Broadway Lyricists from Cohan to Sondheim. New York: Praeger, 1991. The author claims that Cohan's biggest achievement is the quality of his lyrics and that Cohan and Stephen Foster created an American song vernacular that distinguished itself from contemporary European models.

McCabe, John. George M. Cohan: The Man Who

Owned Broadway. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1973. This excellent biography uses information from many individuals who worked with Cohan.

Morehouse, Ward. George M. Cohan, Prince of the American Theatre. Philadelphia, Pa.: J. B. Lippincott, 1943. This New York Sun theater critic met Cohan in 1931 and published his first biography. Focusing on Cohan's life, the book contains little analysis of his art.

See also: Berlin, Irving; Caruso, Enrico; Coward, Sir Noël; Gershwin, George; Gershwin, Ira; Hammerstein, Oscar, II; Hart, Lorenz; Kern, Jerome; Porter, Cole; Rodgers, Richard.

Leonard Cohen

Canadian singer and songwriter

Established as a poet and novelist before embarking on a career as a folksinger, Cohen wrote lyrics of literary depth and emotional sophistication. Although his own albums have sold modestly, his songs remain among those most recorded by other performers.

Born: September 21, 1934; Montreal, Quebec, Canada

Also known as: Leonard Norman Cohen (full name)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Songs of Leonard Cohen, 1967; Songs from a Room, 1969; Songs of Love and Hate, 1971; New Skin for the Old Ceremony, 1974; Death of a Ladies' Man, 1977; Recent Songs, 1979; Various Positions, 1985; I'm Your Man, 1988; The Future, 1992; Ten New Songs, 2001; Dear Heather, 2004.

The Life

Leonard Norman Cohen (KOH-uhn) was born into one of Montreal's most prominent Jewish families. From his mother Masha, the daughter of a scholarly rabbi, he inherited a love of the literary arts. From his father, a successful clothier who died when Cohen was nine, he inherited a trust fund that provided him sufficient income to devote himself to his literary and musical interests. Although he had begun playing the guitar and performing country music while a teenager, it was as a poet that Cohen first distinguished himself, publishing his first book, Let Us Compare Mythologies, in 1956 under the auspices of the Canadian modernist poet Louis Dudek, five years after enrolling at Montreal's McGill University.

Let Us Compare Mythologies made Cohen a local celebrity and led to his first recordings: readings of his poetry for an album released by Folkways Records. His second volume of poetry, The Spice-Box of the Earth, followed in 1961, strengthening and spreading Cohen's reputation. By this time Cohen had moved to the Greek island of Hydra, where he would live and work for several years.

His next work was the semiautobiographical novel The Favorite Game (1963), in which Cohen, thinly disguised as protagonist Lawrence Breavman, traced his life and coming of age. After another book of poems, Flowers for Hitler (1964), Cohen wrote and published what would become his best-known prose work, the ambitiously experimental and controversially explicit Beautiful Losers (1966). His fourth volume of poems, Parasites of Heaven, appeared shortly thereafter.

By the publication of his Selected Poems, 1956-1968, Cohen had been discovered as a songwriter and performer by the folksinger Judy Collins, who recorded his "Suzanne" (a poem from Parasites of Heaven set to music) to considerable acclaim on her 1966 album, In My Life.

From 1969 to 2004, Cohen was prolific, releasing several albums and books, and he was the subject of two video documentaries. He also advanced the career of his occasional background singer Jennifer Warnes, whose critically well-received recording, Famous Blue Raincoat: The Songs of Leonard Cohen, appeared in 1987.

During the 1990's he practiced meditation at the Mount Baldy Zen Center in California and was ordained a Buddhist monk in 1996. In 2006 he oversaw the recording of Blue Alert, an album of unpublished Cohen lyrics, by Anjani Thomas, a singer with whom he was romantically involved.

The Music

Although popular musicians have occasionally been known to publish books of poetry or fiction, Cohen is the among the few poets and novelists to have successfully made the transition from a literary career to a musical one. Likewise, although popular musicians have been known to undergo religious conversions and in turn reflect these conversions in their work, Cohen is notable for so consistently, thoroughly, and unabashedly integrating the traditions, language, and sensibility of his faith into his music. It is this combination of highly developed literary and religious sensitivities, even more than Cohen's nearly obsessive exploration of the spiritual dimensions of romantic despair, that sets his work apart from that of other serious, verbally gifted performers and that, along with his preference for fashion-defying instrumental settings, gives it a uniquely timeless quality.

Songs of Leonard Cohen. Released in December, 1967, at a time when pop music was becoming increasingly ornate, Cohen's debut album exhibited a hauntingly stark acoustic mood that set the tone for his first four albums and resulted in his being categorized, along with Neil Young and Joni Mitchell, as part of a new folk movement. Although "Suzanne," which had been previously covered by Collins, was the album's best-known track, three others ("Sisters of Mercy," "So Long, Marianne," and "Hey, That's No Way to Say Goodbye") would become fixtures in the Cohen canon.

Songs from a Room. Even more sparse sounding than Songs of Leonard Cohen, Cohen's second album (1969) became a cult classic as much for its unrelenting bleakness as for its inclusion of "Bird on a Wire," a song that would become another Cohen favorite after "Suzanne" and that, like "Suzanne," had previously been recorded by Collins.

Songs of Love and Hate. Released in 1971 and similar in mood to Songs from a Room, Songs of Love and Hate is noted for its concluding track, "Joan of Arc," which joined "Suzanne" and "Bird on a Wire" as archetypes of Cohen finding erotic epiphanies in traditionally religious subject matter and vice versa.

Live Songs. Unlike most live albums of its time, this 1973 collection of Cohen's 1970 and 1972 performances in London, Paris, Berlin, Brussels, Tennessee, and the Isle of Wight was not padded with jams and drum solos, enhanced with postproduction studio overdubs, or marketed as a surrogate "greatest hits." Instead, it captured the extent to which an audience could bring out the performer in Cohen and help transform his songs from solitary meditations into a kind of communal liturgy.

Leonard Cohen. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The Best of Leonard Cohen. For almost thirty years, this 1975 sampling of Cohen's first four studio albums was the only remotely comprehensive Cohen compilation. It remains his best-selling title to date.

Death of a Ladies' Man. Following as it did the canon-defining The Best of Leonard Cohen, this 1977 album was scrutinized for indications of the new directions, if any, that Cohen would take during his next phase. Instead it was an anomaly. With the legendary "Wall of Sound" producer Phil Spector at the controls, the album was out of synch with the spare, hushed intensity that had characterized Cohen's previous recordings.

Various Positions. Because Columbia, unconvinced of its commercial potential, refused to release this album, it suffered from the underpromotion inevitable from being released by the independent Passport Records. In retrospect, its combination of bare-bones electronics and Cohen's seductively sinister whisper-singing indicated that he had discovered a sound that would both honor his past and allow him to age gracefully. The album's fifth track, "Hallelujah," would be recorded by more performers than any other post-1970 Cohen composition. Along with "If It Be Your Will," it imbued the album with a devotionally religious mood and made it a sound track of sorts to Cohen's 1984 literary collection, Book of Mercy.

I'm Your Man. Stylistically similar to Various Positions, this 1988 recording became Cohen's most celebrated and best-selling album in more than a decade, with the video to "First We Take Manhattan" transforming the reclusive Cohen into a presence on MTV.

The Future. In the wake of the renewed interest in Cohen created by Various Positions and I'm Your Man, this ambitiously diverse and (for Cohen) uncommonly topical and political 1992 album found an eager audience among the public in general and Hollywood film directors Oliver Stone, Curtis Hanson, and Alan Parker in particular, who included music from The Future in the sound tracks to Natural Born Killers, Wonder Boys, and The Life of David Gale respectively.

Ten New Songs. This is a 2001 collaboration with the American singer-songwriter and former Cohen background vocalist Sharon Robinson, who also produced the album.

Dear Heather. Like Ten New Songs, this 2004 album found Cohen again collaborating with Robinson. Unlike Ten New Songs, it found Cohen also collaborating with Thomas and covering or setting to music everything from "Tennessee Waltz" to the poetry of Lord Byron and Francis Reginald Scott, opening Cohen to charges that, at seventy, he was finally running out of ideas and perhaps energy.

The Essential Leonard Cohen. This two-disc 2002 compilation judiciously (and democratically) covered the highlights of every Cohen studio album from his debut through Ten New Songs.

Musical Legacy

The power of Cohen's music arises in large part from his ignoring traditional boundaries. Whether as a poet who wrote novels, a novelist who wrote songs, a Jew who mastered Zen Buddhism, or a religious man committed to the exploration of erotic love, he defied conventions and the expectations of his various audiences at every turn, discovering in the process a method for perpetually renewing the timelessness and sacramental appeal of humankind's most enduring archetypes. By choosing music as the medium most hospitable to his carefully crafted words, he imbued his notoriously dark meditations with a fragile buoyancy.

He also defied the notion that popular music was the exclusive domain of the young or that success was best measured in terms of airplay and album sales. Already thirty-three years old at the time of his first album's release, he was from the beginning a forceful if quiet voice of maturity and reflection in a genre usually identified with prolonged adolescence. Without ever placing a single on the Billboard Top 40 or selling a million copies of any one of his albums, he created an immensely influential body of work. From 1971 to 2007 his songs were used in the sound tracks of more than twenty films, and the roster of performers who have recorded his songs, which includes Sting, Elton John, the Neville brothers, and U2, is as varied as it is stellar.

Arsenio Orteza

Further Reading

Cohen, Leonard. Beautiful Losers. New York: Vintage, 1966. The better known of Cohen's two novels, notorious at the time of its publication for its explicit depiction of the seamier details of a love triangle among "losers" obsessed with the seventeenth century saint, Catherine Tekakwitha.

_____. Book of Longing. New York: HarperCollins, 2006. Drawings and song lyrics from the Ten Songs and Dear Heather albums, along with poems, most of which were composed during Cohen's residence at a Buddhist monastery in the 1990's.

_____. Book of Mercy. Toronto: McClelland & Stuart, 1984. Contemporary psalms and poems in the mystically biblical vein of the lyrics comprising Cohen's Various Positions album.

_____. The Spice-Box of the Earth. Toronto: McClelland & Stuart, 1961. The second and best known of the four volumes of poetry that Cohen published before beginning his career as a recording artist.

Green, Roger. Hydra and the Bananas of Leonard Cohen: A Mid-life Crisis in the Sun. New York: Basic Books, 2003. A quixotic multifaceted memoir by a British poet obsessed with Cohen's life on the Greek island of Hydra and the music that he composed there.

Nadel, Ira Bruce. Various Positions: A Life of Leonard Cohen. Austin: University of Texas Press, 2007. The latest version of this most thorough of the Cohen biographies takes into account his recordings through 2006 and benefits from the author's access to Cohen and his unpublished writings.

Sheppard, David. Leonard Cohen. New York: Da Capo Press, 2000. An examination of the complex intersection of the religious and the romantic in Cohen's work.

See also: Brel, Jacques; Collins, Judy; Diamond, Neil; Glass, Philip; John, Sir Elton; Kristofferson, Kris; Mitchell, Joni; Spector, Phil; Sting; Vega, Suzanne; Young, Neil.

Nat King Cole

American singer, jazz pianist, and songwriter

An innovative jazz pianist and one of the top vocalists in any musical genre in the 1950's, Cole proved that rock and roll was not the only music that would sell in the Elvis Presley era.

Born: March 17, 1919; Montgomery, Alabama
Died: February 15, 1965; Santa Monica, California
Also known as: Nathaniel Adams Coles (birth name)
Member of: The Nat King Cole Trio

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): Nat King Cole at the Piano, 1950; Penthouse Serenade, 1952; Top Pops, 1952; Nat King Cole Sings for Two in Love, 1954; Unforgettable, 1954; Tenth Anniversary Album, 1955; Vocal Classics, 1955; Ballads of the Day, 1956; In the Beginning, 1956; The Piano Style of Nat King Cole, 1956; After Midnight, 1957; Just One of Those Things, 1957; Love Is the Thing, 1957; This Is Nat King Cole, 1957; Cole Español, 1958; St. Louis Blues, 1958; To Whom It May Concern, 1958; The Very Thought of You, 1958; A Mis Amigos, 1959; Welcome to the Club, 1959; Every Time I Feel the Spirit, 1960; The Magic of Christmas, 1960; Tell Me All About Yourself, 1960; Wild Is Love, 1960 (lyrics by Dotty Wayne and Ray Rasch); The Nat Cole Story, 1961; The Touch of Your Lips, 1961; Dear Lonely Hearts, 1962; More Cole Español, 1962; Nat King Cole Sings, George Shearing Plays, 1962; Ramblin' Rose, 1962; Nat King Cole Sings My Fair Lady, 1963; Those Lazy-Hazy-Crazy Days of Summer, 1963; Where Did Everyone Go?, 1963; I Don't Want to Hurt Anymore, 1964; Let's Face the Music, 1964; Nat King Cole Sings His Songs from Cat Ballou and Other Motion Pictures, 1965; The Unreleased Nat King Cole, 1987; Night Lights, 2001.

ALBUMS (with the Nat King Cole Trio): Jumpin' at Capitol, 1943; The King Cole Trio, 1944; The King Cole Trio, Vol. 2, 1946; King Cole for Kids, 1948; The King Cole Trio, Vol. 3, 1948; The King Cole Trio, Vol. 4, 1949.

The Life

Nathaniel Adams Coles was born in Montgomery, Alabama, but his family soon relocated to Chicago when his father, Ed Coles, a deacon in the Baptist church, found a church of his own. His mother Perlina was the church organist, and Cole learned keyboards at her side. He had a natural talent, and he made his first public performance at age four. When he was twelve, his parents sent him for formal lessons, wanting him to learn classical music, but at night he sneaked out to absorb the new sounds of jazz in nightclubs, where he heard the trumpet of Louis Armstrong and the piano of Earl Hines.

Imitating Hines's style, Cole began playing piano in clubs in the mid-1930's. His older brother, Eddie Coles, had success as a bassist, and the two teamed up, recording under the name Eddie Cole's Solid Swingers for Decca Records in 1936. On the strength of those recordings, Cole was hired to play for the touring company of a revival of Eubie Blake's all-black musical Shuffle Along (1921). Cole fell in love with a dancer in the company, Nadine Robinson, and when the company disbanded in Los Angeles, Cole and Nadine stayed in Southern California, where they were married. In 1937 Bob Lewis asked Cole to lead the hotel band at his Hollywood nightclub the Swanee Inn, with just piano, guitar, and bass. Trios were a novelty in the big band era, so the King Cole Trio was a hit. Recording and touring with Lionel Hampton in 1939 led to recording sessions with Decca Records for the trio in 1940 and 1941, but it was their long-term contract with Columbia Records in 1943 that really launched Cole as a recording artist.

In the late 1940's, Cole began recording for a wider popular audience. In the midst of this rise to stardom, Cole and Nadine quietly divorced, and Cole married singer Maria Hawkins Ellington in 1948. Cole and Maria had five children, the eldest of which, Natalie, also became a pop singer.

In the 1950's, Cole was one of Columbia Records's top stars, and he had his own television variety show in 1956. That year he was assaulted on stage by members of the White Citizens Council during a concert in Birmingham, Alabama. He quietly continued the concert. He continued making hit records through the rock-and-roll era, until his death from lung cancer in 1965.

Nat King Cole. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The Music

Cole, who dropped the final "s" from his surname when he turned professional, was still in his teens when he first recorded his Hines-influenced jazz piano with his brother Eddie in 1936. His early sound was distinctive and energetic, and these early recordings remind us that, before he had ever sung a recorded note, Cole was a talented jazz pianist.

"Sweet Lorraine." Trios with the combination Cole invented—piano, guitar, and bass (no drums)—became so common in the World War II years that it is hard for today's jazz listener to appreciate how innovative it was in 1940. The development of the electric guitar, played in the trio by Oscar Moore, made possible a fuller sound with just three instruments. With Cole on piano and Wesley Prince on bass, the trio signed a contract with Decca Records (after a disappointing session the year before with a smaller studio), and they recorded eight sides in the winter of 1940-1941. It was in this session that Cole emerged as a solo singer. In their gigs at the Swanee Inn at that time, the trio was mostly playing instrumentals, when a patron asked to hear the 1928 jazz song "Sweet Lorraine." Cole loved the song (he had heard Louis Armstrong sing it), but he refused the request, insisting he was a pianist and not a singer. Nevertheless, because the patron was a regular and a big spender, owner Lewis pressured Cole to sing. He did, and it was such an immediate hit that the trio was obliged to include it in their sets from then on. The version recorded for Decca in 1940 was a hint of things to come. Cole's delicate piano opening in F major leads directly into the mellow vocals that would become familiar to listeners for the next two and a half decades.

"Straighten Up and Fly Right." After the Decca recordings, bassist Prince left, and he was replaced by Johnny Miller. This new version of the King Cole Trio signed with Capitol Records, and it went into the studio in 1943, for the first time recording Cole's own compositions. One of his songs became Cole's biggest seller of the war years, "Straighten Up and Fly Right," which sold half a million copies (a super hit by wartime standards). The song was partly a tribute to Cole's father and to his African American heritage. It was based on an African American folk tale his father had related in a sermon, about a buzzard who tried to trick a monkey into flying with him, thinking the monkey would be helpless in the air. The monkey got a choke hold on the buzzard, forcing him to "Straighten Up and Fly Right." While most white listeners interpreted this as a fable about justice, black audiences recognized it as a parable of how intertwined the fates of black and white Americans were. Any injustice on the part of the buzzard (representing white America) would be as fatal to him as to his passenger. The song set the tone for the low-key way in which Cole would oppose racism in his career.

Unforgettable. By the late 1940's, Cole had abandoned the trio, and he recorded with full orchestra supporting his vocals. Many jazz fans were disturbed that Cole had sold out to acquire a mainstream audience. The packaging of records had changed, too; as early as 1944 Columbia had been putting Cole's music on long-playing disks slowed down to fit several songs per side. His first ten-inch single without the trio was Nat King Cole at the Piano. Unforgettable would prove his most enduring album. It was released three times: first in the ten-inch long-playing format; then again in 1955 as a twelve-inch long-play (LP); rereleased a decade later when Cole's death caused a surge in sales of his records. The title song, which Cole had recorded as a single in 1951, with a rich Nelson Riddle orchestration, would hit the charts again forty years later, when Cole's daughter, Natalie Cole, remixed it so that she could sing a duet with her late father. The result was a hit on the Billboard charts. The song won seven Grammy Awards for Natalie and, posthumously, for her father.

St. Louis Blues. In 1958 Cole starred in a Paramount Pictures film about the life of composer W. C. Handy. Columbia Records took the opportunity to release an album of Handy songs from the film, performed by Cole and arranged by Nelson Riddle, who had written some of the film's soundtrack music. The film and the album were a perfect opportunity for Cole to return to his jazz and blues roots, since many jazz fans had accused him of turning his back on the genre of music that had produced his initial success in the music industry. (Cole had recorded an all-jazz album, After Midnight, only two years earlier in 1956.) The St. Louis Blues album proved so popular that Columbia reissued it in 1962 under the title Nat King Cole Sings the Blues.

Musical Legacy

A number of jazz pianists, including Charles Brown and Ray Charles, were influenced by Cole's distinctive keyboard style, and Cole's guitar-piano-bass formula for the trio was emulated by Oscar Peterson and Art Tatum. His unforgettable voice is inimitable. His daughter Natalie gave him a hit twenty-six years after his death. In 2001 an album Cole recorded in 1956 but never released was issued as Night Lights. In 1983 an archivist for Capitol Records' Dutch subsidiary discovered master tapes for an unreleased album of Cole singing in other languages—mostly Spanish, but also Japanese. It came out later as The Unreleased Nat King Cole. Cole's popularity was international: In 1958 he went to Havana to record an album in Spanish (Cole Español). Central and South American audiences already buying his English-language records responded favorably to this album and to two sequels, A Mis Amigos and More Cole Español. Cole is also remembered, though inaccurately, as the first black star of a network television variety show in America. That distinction belongs to another jazz pianist, Hazel Scott, whose 1950 variety show predated Cole's by seven years. From November, 1957, to December, 1958, Cole appeared each week with other singers as guests. However, the show failed to find a national sponsor willing to risk Southern boycotts for supporting the show.

John R. Holmes

Further Reading

Cole, Maria. Nat King Cole: An Intimate Biography. New York: William Morrow, 1971. Cole's wife provides intimate details about her husband's life and career in music. Includes photographs and discography.

Haskins, James, with Kathleen Benson. Nat King Cole: A Personal and Professional Biography. Chelsea, Mich.: Scarborough House, 1990. Interviews with family members, friends, and other musicians illuminate this biography of Cole.

Lees, Gene. You Can't Steal a Gift: Dizzy, Clark, Milt, and Nat. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 2001. The author chronicles the effect of racism on the careers of Dizzy Gillespie, Clark Terry, Milt Hinton, and Cole.

See also: Armstrong, Louis; Blake, Eubie; Burke, Johnny; Burke, Solomon; Campbell, Glen; Charles, Ray; Davis, Sammy, Jr.; Gaye, Marvin; Gordon, Dexter; Hampton, Lionel; Handy, W. C.; Jones, Hank; Leadbelly; Otis, Johnny; Peterson, Oscar; Ronstadt, Linda; Strayhorn, Billy; Tatum, Art; Tormé, Mel; Young, Lester.

Cy Coleman

American musical-theater composer and pianist

Though he began as a classical pianist who turned to jazz, Coleman is noted for his work in musical theater and popular song.

Born: June 14, 1929; New York, New York
Died: November 18, 2004; New York, New York
Also known as: Seymour Kaufman (birth name)

Principal works

MUSICAL THEATER (music): John Murray Anderson's Almanac, 1953 (music with Richard Adler and Jerry Ross; lyrics by Adler and Ross); Compulsion, 1957 (incidental music; lyrics by Carolyn Leigh); Wildcat, 1960 (lyrics by Leigh; libretto by Nathaniel Richard Nash); Little Me, 1962 (lyrics by Leigh; libretto by Neil Simon); Sweet Charity, 1966 (lyrics by Leigh; libretto by Simon); Seesaw, 1973 (lyrics by Dorothy Fields; libretto by Michael Bennett); Straws in the Wind, 1975 (lyrics and libretto by Betty Comden and Adolph Green); Hellzapoppin'!, 1976 (music by Coleman, Jule Styne, and Hank Beebe; lyrics by Leigh and Bill Heyer; libretto by Abe Burrows, Heyer, and Beebe); I Love My Wife, 1977 (lyrics by Michael Stewart; based on Luis Rego's play); On the Twentieth Century, 1978 (lyrics and libretto by Comden and Green); Home Again, Home Again, 1979 (lyrics by Barbara Fried; libretto by Russell Baker); Barnum, 1980 (lyrics by Stewart; libretto by Mark Bramble); Thirteen Days to Broadway, 1983 (lyrics by Fried; libretto by Baker); Let 'Em Rot, 1988 (lyrics by Coleman and A. E. Hotchner; libretto by Hotchner); City of Angels, 1989 (lyrics by David Zippel; libretto by Larry Gelbart); Welcome to the Club, 1989 (lyrics by Coleman and Hotchner; libretto by Hotchner); The Will Rogers Follies, 1991 (lyrics by Comden and Green; libretto by Peter Stone); The Life, 1997 (lyrics by Ira Gasman; libretto by David Newman, Gasman, and Coleman); Exactly Like You, 1998 (lyrics by Hotchner and Coleman; libretto by Hotchner).

SONGS (music; lyrics by Carolyn Leigh): "A Moment of Madness," 1957; "My, How the Times Goes By," 1957; "Witchcraft," 1957; "Firefly," 1958; "It Amazes Me," 1958; "Rules of the Road," 1961; "The Best Is Yet to Come," 1959; "Pass Me By," 1964; "When in Rome," 1964.

The Life

Cy Coleman (si KOHL-muhn) was born Seymour Kaufman, the son of Russian immigrants Max and Ida Kaufman. Coleman began playing the piano when one was left in their building by a family who moved out without paying the rent. A child prodigy, he played a recital at Steinway Hall at the age of six and at Carnegie Hall at the age of seven. At New York City's High School for the Performing Arts, Coleman focused on classical piano, composition, and conducting. However, his love for jazz would send him in a different musical direction. He changed his name to Cy Coleman at the age of sixteen when he began to write with lyricist Joseph A. McCarthy, Jr.; at the age of seventeen he was playing Manhattan clubs with the Cy Coleman Trio. Unusual for a Broadway composer, Coleman was an accomplished jazz pianist who loved to perform. He appeared occasionally in nightclubs for the rest of his life.

A longtime bachelor, Coleman married Shelby Brown in 1997, and they had a daughter, Lily Cye, in 2000. He died of heart failure at the age of seventy-five in 2004, leaving behind several unfinished projects, including Pamela's First Musical, with a libretto by Wendy Wasserstein.

The Music

The year he graduated from high school, Coleman began writing music for television shows, and in 1952 he had his first hit single, with lyricist McCarthy, "Why Try to Change Me Now," recorded by Frank Sinatra. Coleman and McCarthy's music first appeared on Broadway in the musical revue John Murray Anderson's Almanac ("Tin Pan Alley," 1953). When McCarthy's drinking began to get in the way, Coleman looked for a new lyricist.

Collaborations with Leigh. Even though their disagreements were legendary, the partnership between Coleman and Carolyn Leigh created two Broadway musicals (Wildcat and Little Me) and a string of some of the biggest nonrock hits of the 1950's and 1960's: "A Moment of Madness" (recorded by Sammy Davis, Jr.), "My, How the Time Goes By," "Witchcraft" (recorded by Sinatra), "Firefly," "It Amazes Me," "Rules of the Road," and "The Best Is Yet to Come." Their last successful pop songs were released in 1964: "When in Rome" (recorded by Barbra Streisand) and "Pass Me By" (recorded by Peggy Lee).

Lucille Ball's only Broadway show, Wildcat, closed when its star became ill, leaving behind the wonderful "You've Come Home" and "Hey, Look Me Over!" Another star vehicle, Little Me, featured Sid Caesar in 1962 and Martin Short in 1998, and it contains "I've Got Your Number" and "Le Grand Boom-Boom." For a 1982 revival, the Coleman-Leigh collaboration, which had ended twenty years before, was temporarily renewed when they contributed two new songs to the score.

Coleman's five-year collaboration with Leigh was particularly productive: approximately twenty popular songs (many of them hits), scores for two Broadway shows, and several numbers for motion pictures. Their wry, sophisticated songs became favorites of discriminating cabaret singers, such as Mabel Mercer. Following the team's acrimonious split after Little Me, Coleman wrote almost exclusively for musical theater.

Collaborations with Fields. Dorothy Fields thought her career was over by the late 1950's. Musical styles had changed, and she was reeling from the deaths of her brother and husband. When Coleman approached her at a party with an invitation to write together, however, she leaped at the opportunity. Joining the team of Coleman, librettist Neil Simon, and director-choreographer Bob Fosse, Fields was twenty-five years older than her collaborators, but together they created the steamy, edgy, sassy Sweet Charity. Instant classics from the score include "Hey, Big Spender," "If My Friends Could See Me Now," and "There's Gotta Be Something Better than This."

While they abandoned a project about Eleanor Roosevelt, Coleman and Fields did complete the romantic comedy Seesaw, working with director-choreographer Michael Bennett. "It's Not Where You Start (It's Where You Finish)" became a star turn for Tommy Tune. When Fields died in 1974, Coleman was once again without a lyricist.

Later Works. After writing four musicals with female lyricists, Coleman wrote his first Broadway musical with a male lyricist, Michael Stewart. Together they created I Love My Wife, undoubtedly the first musical about wife swapping in New Jersey. Coleman turned again to lyricist Stewart to pen the musical biography Barnum (1980), a lavish spectacle which ran for 854 performances.

The mock operetta On the Twentieth Century was the product of a new collaboration for Coleman, working with the lyric-writing team of Betty Comden and Adolph Green. Both I Love My Wife and On the Twentieth Century were financially successful, but Home Again, Home Again closed out-of-town in 1979. Working with his fourth female lyricist, Coleman teamed up with Barbara Fried on this epic story of a male protagonist's fifty-year search for life's meaning.

In 1989 Coleman opened two musicals on Broadway: Welcome to the Club and City of Angels. The former, with lyrics by Coleman and A. E. Hotchner, ran only twelve performances. City of Angels, on the other hand, won six Tony Awards, including Best Musical and Best Score, and it ran for 878 performances. With a book by Larry Gelbart and lyrics by David Zippel, City of Angels is set in 1940's Hollywood. (Many consider this jazz-infused score to be Coleman's best.) Two years later, Coleman was back on Broadway with The Will Rogers Follies, teaming again with Comden and Green. This show marked Coleman's return to musicalizing the biography of a show business personality, and for it he won his third Tony Award for Best Musical.

Musical Legacy

In an age when composing for musical theater was almost completely a male reserve, Coleman worked with nearly all the female lyricists of his generation: Comden, Fields, Fried, and Leigh. These were fortunate choices, because so many of Coleman's most memorable and heartfelt characters have been women, even when they are not the leads. Without a woman on his creative team, Coleman often found his shows taking on a decidedly misogynistic tone, especially Welcome to the Club with A. E. Hotchner (rewritten as Exactly Like You, 1999) and The Life, with lyrics by Ira Gasman.

Coleman won three Tony Awards for Best Score, three Emmy Awards, two Grammy Awards, an Academy Award nomination, and he was inducted into the Songwriters Hall of Fame in 1981. Although he may not be as well known as some of his contemporary songwriters, he has contributed to the stage some popular showstoppers: "It's Not Where You Start (It's Where You Finish)," "Hey, Look Me Over!," "If My Friends Could See Me Now," "Nobody Does It Like Me," and more.

Coleman's music has always been influenced by the stylistic flair and the energy of his collaborators. With Leigh, his music tended to be feisty and brittle, like her lyrics. Fields's verses were world-weary and wry, so Coleman gave her music for those colors in a way he did not for Hotchner (Welcome to the Club) or Ira Gasman (The Life), whose lyrics can be crass but funny. Comden and Green brought Coleman flamboyant, educated lyrics, and he responded with the zest of On the Twentieth Century and The Will Rogers Follies. Zippel (City of Angels) and Stewart (I Love My Wife) wrote lyrics that were quick and smart, reflected in Coleman's music.

Bud Coleman

Further Reading

Sheed, Wilfrid. The House That George Built: With a Little Help from Irving, Cole, and a Crew of About Fifty. New York: Random House, 2007. One of the few book-length histories of musical theater that celebrates the work of Coleman.

Suskin, Steven. Show Tunes, 1905-1985: The Songs, Shows, and Careers of Broadway's Major Composers. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1986. Suskin does a brief analysis of Coleman's work, suggesting that it peaked with Sweet Charity.

Vallance, Tom. "Obituary: Cy Coleman." The London Independent (November 22, 2004). Overview of Coleman's life, with references to his many musicals.

Viagas, Robert, ed. The Alchemy of Theatre: The Divine Science. New York: Playbill Books, 2006. Contains a brief interview with Coleman, who talks about his collaborators.

See also: Fields, Dorothy; Green, Adolph, and Betty Comden; Lee, Peggy; Sinatra, Frank; Streisand, Barbra; Styne, Jule.

Ornette Coleman

American jazz saxophonist and composer

Saxophonist Coleman, a leader of the avant-garde of the 1960's, pioneered new approaches to improvisation that expanded the boundaries of jazz.

Born: March 19, 1930; Fort Worth, Texas
Member of: Prime Time

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Something Else!!!! The Music of Ornette Coleman, 1958; Change of the Century, 1959; The Shape of Jazz to Come, 1959; Tomorrow Is the Question!, 1959; Free Jazz, 1960; Jazz Abstractions, 1960; This Is Our Music, 1960; The Art of the Improvisers, 1961; Beauty Is a Rare Thing, 1961; Ornette!, 1961; Ornette on Tenor, 1961; Twins, 1961; Town Hall, 1962; Chappaqua Suite, 1965; An Evening with Ornette Coleman, 1965; Who's Crazy, Vol. 1, 1965; Who's Crazy, Vol. 2, 1965; The Empty Foxhole, 1966; The Music of Ornette Coleman: Forms and Sounds, 1967; Saints and Soldiers, 1967; Love Call, 1968; New York Is Now, 1968; Ornette at Twelve, 1968; The Unprecedented Music of Ornette Coleman, 1968; Crisis, 1969; Friends and Neighbors, 1970; Science Fiction, 1971; J for Jazz Presents O.C. Broadcasts, 1972; Skies of America, 1972; Body Meta, 1976; Dancing in Your Head, 1976; Soapsuds, 1977; Of Human Feelings, 1979; Ornette and Prime Time: Opening the Caravan of Dreams, 1983; Prime Time/Time Design, 1983; Song X, 1985 (with Pat Metheny); In All Languages, 1987; Virgin Beauty, 1988; Naked Lunch, 1991; Sound Museum: Hidden Man, 1994; Sound Museum: Three Women, 1994; Tone Dialing, 1995; Sound Grammar, 2006.

The Life

Ornette Coleman was born and raised in Fort Worth, Texas. His father died when he was seven, and his seamstress mother raised him. He received his first saxophone, an alto, at age fourteen, and he began playing in local rhythm-and-blues bands shortly thereafter. He switched to tenor sax in his high school band, and local saxophonist Red Connors initiated Coleman into bebop. In 1949 Coleman began traveling the South with carnival and rhythm-and-blues bands. Stranded in New Orleans, he switched back to alto saxophone, and he solidified his personal style playing with drummer Edward Blackwell, with whom he would later record.

Coleman moved to Los Angeles in the early 1950's, and he began sitting in with jazz musicians, who widely rejected his radical style of playing. In 1954 he married Jayne Cortez, who later established an important career as a poet, and in 1956 their son Denardo was born. Cortez introduced Coleman to her friends in the Los Angeles jazz community, and by 1957 Coleman was rehearsing his original music with a group that included trumpeter Don Cherry. In 1958 Coleman secured a record contract with Los Angeles-based Contemporary Records. Although there remained some hostility toward his style of playing, Coleman had a small coterie of supporters, eventually including members of the Modern Jazz Quartet, who helped him gain a recording contract with Atlantic Records in 1959, yielding six albums over the next several years.

The New York debut of Coleman's quartet in 1959 was an important event in jazz history, sparking great controversy over the validity of his music. At age twenty-nine, with significant record label support, a steady gig in New York playing to curious crowds every night, and intense press coverage, Coleman achieved instant notoriety. For the next two years his group played steadily, gradually moving up the pay scale, commanding salaries that approached the more mainstream jazz groups.

At the end of 1962 Coleman dropped out of recording and public performance, apparently pricing himself out of the business. In the interim, he taught himself violin and trumpet, and he added those instruments to his performances and recordings when he began touring with his new group in 1965. He toured Europe through the 1960's, and he received Guggenheim Fellowships for composition in 1967 and 1974.

Coleman's interest in composing music for string and wind ensembles, recorded throughout the 1960's, had its most ambitious showing when his Skies of America debuted at the 1972 Newport Jazz Festival. Columbia Records issued a recording of it with the London Symphony Orchestra later that year. In 1975 Coleman unveiled his new group, Prime Time, which, with two electric guitars and an electric bass, moved him in the direction of the electric dance music of the time. Coleman continued touring and recording with Prime Time through the 1980's and 1990's, while also playing with versions of his 1960's groups.

Coleman's stature continued to grow in his sixties and seventies. In 1994 he received the prestigious MacArthur Fellowship; in 1997 he was featured for four consecutive nights at Lincoln Center (including a New York Philharmonic performance of Skies of America); and in 2007 he received a Pulitzer Prize for his album Sound Grammar, and a Grammy Lifetime Achievement Award.

The Music

From his initial recordings, Coleman's compositional and improvisational radicalism were evident, intertwined with his highly personal sound and his sense of melodic invention, uniquely accented by his use of a plastic, rather than a brass, alto saxophone. His most intense creative impact stems from his six albums on the Atlantic label recorded between 1959 and 1961, where his concept of small-group improvisation came to full fruition. Shortly thereafter, Coleman branched out and began writing for classically based string and wind ensembles. His Prime Time ensemble moved him toward a more rock-based and accessible style. In the 1980's he returned to his original format, occasionally adding a second bassist, a guitarist, a drummer, or a pianist. Throughout his career Coleman rarely abandoned a steady beat in his small ensembles, with the notable exception of slow ballads, wherein the melody was often through-composed. Even when his later ensembles tended toward nonmetric playing, Coleman's solo implied a steady tempo, if not an overriding meter.

Something Else!!!! and Tomorrow Is the Question. Something Else!!!! The Music of Ornette Coleman and Tomorrow Is the Question, Coleman's first two albums (on the Contemporary label), established him as a creative new compositional voice with an unusual sound. His compositions typically had surprising melodic turns and odd numbers of measures in their structure, although they were typically rounded out to twelve-bar blues and thirty-two-bar aaba forms during the solos. His soloing appeared to be unfettered by the looming influence of alto saxophonist Charlie Parker, although it was clear that he had absorbed the lessons of Parker. Despite the apparent freedom in the soloing, however, his band maintained the steady recurring cyclic structure that characterized jazz up to that point.

Ornette Coleman. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The Shape of Jazz to Come. Coleman's third album, The Shape of Jazz to Come (on the Atlantic label), established him as a controversial artist in jazz and the visible leader of the growing avant-garde movement. Both in performance and on records, the soloists (Coleman and trumpeter Cherry) and the rhythm section (bassist Charlie Haden and drummer Billy Higgins) would expand or contract the recurring cyclic form and at times even abandon it. This was a radical new development in jazz, with only Cecil Taylor and his group exploring the same territory. The pianoless quartet featured uncanny start-and-stop unison melody statements by Coleman and Cherry and extended trio improvising (one of the horns with bass and drums), in which the bass player could either retain the form of the composition ("Chronology" and "Peace") or follow Coleman and temporarily abandon the form ("Congeniality"). "Lonely Woman" represented a subgenre in the repertory, in which a long rubato melody would be played outside of any single governing beat; both Coleman and Cherry played the melody in unison, but the bass and drums appeared to be in their own separate meters.

Free Jazz. Coleman's Atlantic album Free Jazz not only gave its name to a musical movement and style but also opened the door to large ensemble improvisation. Performed by a double quartet (two groups, each containing bass, drums, trumpet, and bass clarinet or saxophone), the thirty-seven-minute recording took up both sides of the album, giving space for all eight of the musicians to solo. Still not abandoning a steady beat, "Free Jazz" (the title of the single piece on the album) featured composed unison melodies played by the horns alternating with one of the four horns soloing over the two bassists and two drummers. Occasionally other horns would join the soloist, providing the model for large group improvisation that developed later in the decade.

Skies of America. While the circumstances of rehearsing and recording a full symphony orchestra were not at all congenial for Coleman, Skies of America, a single piece more than forty minutes long in twenty-one movements taking up both sides of an album, represented the most ambitious recording project of Coleman's career. Although he had had his compositions recorded by string and wind chamber ensembles, those did not approach the large scale of Skies of America. The writing is reminiscent of Charles Ives's music, with its folklike, yet dense melodies. The solo phrases that Coleman plays on the saxophone over the orchestra throughout the piece are not novel in his repertory, but the juxtaposition of his soaring playing over the sometimes dense arrangements of his melodies represented something new.

Dancing in Your Head and Body Meta. With his new band, Prime Time, Coleman issued two albums, Dancing in Your Head (which also featured a short track of Coleman playing with Moroccan musicians in Jajouka, Morocco) and Body Meta. Prime Time was a dramatic departure for Coleman, consisting of two electric guitarists, an electric bassist, and a drummer. The Prime Time pieces on Dancing in Your Head, "Theme from a Symphony, Variations 1 and 2," were each more than ten minutes long and featured extended guitar-based dance grooves over which Coleman soloed. While Coleman's foray into non-Western music was a rare event in his career, Prime Time was his major focus for the next two decades. The ensemble's sound became more dense when Coleman later added a second bassist and drummer.

Sound Museum. Coleman released two extraordinary companion albums, both titled Sound Museum, but with the subtitle Hidden Man for one and Three Women for the other. The albums were extraordinary in two ways: Coleman rarely performed with a pianist (perhaps never recording with one in a quartet setting), and the two albums contained alternate takes of the same pieces. The pianist (Geri Allen) added a new dimension to Coleman's sound, avoiding the chord patterns that Coleman rejected early on and providing polyphonic lines, clusters, and harmonically ambiguous chords. The alternate takes ranged from close variants ("Home Grown") to dramatically different arrangements ("Mob Job").

Sound Grammar. In the 1980's and 1990's, Coleman collaborated with his colleagues from the 1960's (such as Haden, Higgins, and Dewy Redman), and he also made new partnerships (such as guitarist Pat Metheny and pianist Allen). Sound Grammar features him as soloist backed by two upright bass players and his son Denardo on drums. Coleman, in his mid-seventies, sounds fresh and inventive, yet he retains much of the blues and rhythm-and-blues melody and phrasing, which first brought him to great notoriety and acclaim in the late 1950's. "Turnaround," first recorded by Coleman more than forty-five years earlier, has all the familiar Coleman trademark phrases, floating over a rhythm section that suspends time in uncanny ways.

Musical Legacy

Coleman's most enduring contribution to twentieth century music stems from his live performances in the late 1950's and early 1960's and from his early albums on the Atlantic label. His performances and recordings revealed a highly original compositional voice combined with an improvisational spontaneity and freedom from harmonic constraint that inspired generations of musicians. Coleman's phrasing was often unencumbered by bar lines and chord changes, yet his compelling statements challenged conventional improvisational styles. He steadfastly adhered to his musical style in the face of criticism, even ridicule. Although he lacked formal training, Coleman's musical genius was evident in his system of improvisation based on an intuitive understanding of melody and harmony.

Eric Charry

Further Reading

Jost, Ekkehard. Free Jazz. New York: Da Capo Press, 1981. This is a classic text focusing on musical analysis and providing a capsule history of the new movement in jazz in the 1960's. One chapter is devoted to Coleman.

Litweiler, John. Ornette Coleman: A Harmolodic Life. New York: Da Capo Press, 1994. Extensive biography of Coleman, giving full coverage of his life and career through the late 1980's.

Mandel, Howard. Miles, Ornette, Cecil: Jazz Beyond Jazz. New York: Routledge, 2008. A personal appreciation of Coleman's place in twentieth century American music written by a veteran jazz journalist.

Spellman, A. B. Four Lives in the Bebop Business. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2004. Spellman, a perceptive African American jazz writer, provides a chapter on Coleman with a wealth of biographical material and a sympathetic analysis of Coleman's place in American music.

Wild, David, and Michael Cuscuna. Ornette Coleman, 1958-1979: A Discography. Ann Arbor, Mich.: Wildmusic, 1980. An excellent discography and sessionography of Coleman's career through the late 1970's, accompanied by finely detailed coverage of his life and music.

Wilmer, Valerie. As Serious as Your Life: John Coltrane and Beyond. London: Serpent's Tail, 1992. An excellent, intimate portrait of the movement that Coleman helped initiate in jazz, covering the 1960's and 1970's.

See also: Coltrane, John; Dolphy, Eric; Ives, Charles; Jones, Elvin; Metheny, Pat; Parker, Charlie; Taylor, Cecil.

Judy Collins

American singer and songwriter

With her pure voice, her appreciation of socially conscious lyrics, and her ear for good melodies, Collins was at the forefront of the urban folk revival movement of the 1960's.

Born: May 1, 1939; Seattle, Washington
Also known as: Judith Marjorie Collins (full name)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: A Maid of Constant Sorrow, 1961; Golden Apples of the Sun, 1962; Judy Collins #3, 1963; The Judy Collins Concert, 1964; In My Life, 1966; Wildflowers, 1967; Who Knows Where the Time Goes, 1968; Whales and Nightingales, 1970; True Stories and Other Dreams, 1973; Judith, 1975; Bread and Roses, 1976; Hard Time for Lovers, 1979; Running for My Life, 1980; The Times of Our Lives, 1982; Home Again, 1984; Trust Your Heart, 1987; Sanity and Grace, 1989; Baby's Bedtime, 1990; Baby's Morningtime, 1990; Fires of Eden, 1990; Judy Sings Dylan . . . Just like a Woman, 1993; Come Rejoice! A Judy Collins Christmas, 1994; Shameless, 1994; Voices, 1995; Christmas at the Biltmore Estate, 1997; All on a Wintry Night, 2000; Judy Collins Sings Leonard Cohen, 2004; Portrait of an American Girl, 2005; Judy Collins Sings Lennon and McCartney, 2007.

WRITINGS OF INTEREST: Trust Your Heart, 1987 (autobiography).

The Life

Judith Marjorie Collins was born in Seattle, where her father, a professional singer, hosted a radio show. The family moved to Boulder, Colorado, and then to Los Angeles before settling permanently in Denver. When Collins began piano lessons at the age of five, she was soon considered a prodigy. Her teachers predicted a concert career, a plan that was interrupted when she contracted polio shortly after her family moved to Denver. After her recovery, she continued her piano studies, making her public debut at the age of thirteen with the Denver Businessman's Symphony (conducted by her piano teacher, Antonia Brico) in a performance of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's Concerto for Two Pianos. As a teenager, Collins continued to study classical piano, but soon her interest turned to folk music. Collins attended college for one year, but she dropped out in 1958 to marry Peter Taylor. Her only child, Clark, was born the following year. She made her professional debut as a folksinger in a Boulder club in 1959, after which she performed in Denver, Chicago, and Boston. The couple divorced in 1962, and Collins lost a bitter custody battle for her son.

Collins migrated to New York's Greenwich Village, the center of an important folk scene. Like many musicians of the day, she became involved in the Civil Rights and anti-Vietnam War movements and, later, the feminist movement. Personal problems plagued her during the late 1970's and 1980's, including battles with alcoholism and bulimia. After her son committed suicide in 1992, Collins began campaigning on behalf of suicide prevention, and she wrote several books about the healing process after such a tragedy. She has also written an autobiography and a mystery novel, Shameless (1995), which includes an album of songs. In 1996 she married Louis Nelson, an industrial designer.

The Music

Early Works. In the early 1960's, New York's Greenwich Village was the center of a folk music revival. Many artists, such as Bob Dylan, John Sebastian, Richie Havens, and Paul Stookey, were attracted to clubs such as Gerde's Folk City and Art D'Lugoff's Village Gate. After she moved there in 1961, Collins signed her first recording contract with Elektra Records, with which she would remain until 1984. Her debut album, A Maid of Constant Sorrow, was praised by critics and folk-music audiences alike. Her second album, The Golden Apples of the Sun, was released in 1962, followed by Judy Collins #3 in 1963. Her first live album, The Judy Collins Concert, taken from her debut at New York's Town Hall, was released in 1964. During the mid-1960's many of her concerts across the United States and Canada drew standing-room-only crowds.

In My Life. Later in the decade, Collins began to diversify her repertoire and to move away from protest songs and folk material. Her watershed album In My Life featured lush orchestral arrangements by Joshua Rifkin, and it included a cabaret song by Jacques Brel, a theater song by Kurt Weill, and contemporary ballads by Canadian poet Leonard Cohen, as well as songs by Bob Dylan, the Beatles, and Randy Newman. In December, 1970, this became her first album (of an eventual six) to be certified gold.

Wildflowers. Collins soon began composing her own songs. Her first songs to be recorded—"Since You've Asked," "Sky Fell," and "Albatross,"—were included on Wildflowers, which also featured Rifkin's arrangements. The album's version of Joni Mitchell's "Both Sides Now" became a Top 10 hit for which Collins won a Grammy Award in 1968 for Best Folk Performance.

Judith. Personal problems during the later 1970's limited the number of new albums that Collins released, but rarely did they affect the quality of her work. Judith, issued in March, 1975, and certified gold before the end of the year, contains what is often considered the classic version of Stephen Sondheim's "Send in the Clowns."

Judy Collins. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

Later Work. During the 1980's, Collins chronicled a personal and spiritual renewal in such albums as Home Again and Sanity and Grace. In the 1990's, she focused on songs about family life and relationships. She performed children's songs and lullabies on Baby's Bedtime and Baby's Morningtime, two collections of poems by such writers as Robert Browning and Emily Dickinson, set to music by Ernest Troost. She recorded duets with Tom Chapin for an album of children's songs, Family Tree (1992). In 2000 Collins again collaborated with Chapin, this time on an album with an environmental theme, This Pretty Planet (2000). Later albums include Judy Collins Sings Leonard Cohen, Portrait of an American Girl, and Judy Collins Sings Lennon and McCartney.

Musical Legacy

Although Collins was a major figure in the 1960's Greenwich Village folk scene, working in a genre called urban folk that featured songs of social protest, she is also known for a wide variety of other musical styles. Her repertoire is broad, ranging from the Anglo American folk songs that began her career to cabaret songs, theater music, pop and contemporary ballads, children's songs, and soft rock. Many of her compositions attest to her ability as a songwriter. Her vibratoless soprano voice has been described as "liquid silver," and it is characterized by clarity, purity, coolness, and sweetness, if sometimes lacking in emotional depth. Her vocal range is wide, her intonation nearly perfect, and her articulation of lyrics flawless.

Mary A. Wischusen

Further Reading

Cohen, Ronald D. Rainbow Quest: The Folk Music Revival and American Society, 1940-1970. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 2002. A comprehensive and scholarly history of the folk music movement in the mid-twentieth century, with references to Collins.

Collins, Judy. The Judy Collins Songbook. New York: Grosset and Dunlap, 1969. Along with music to Collins's songs, this includes seven chapters of reminiscences.

_____. Morning, Noon, and Night: Living the Creative Life. New York: Tarcher/Penguin, 2005. Collins discusses her approach to singing and songwriting.

_____. Sanity and Grace: A Journey of Suicide, Survival, and Strength. New York: Tarcher/Penguin, 2003. A deeply moving memoir about the events leading up to the death of Collins's only child. She illuminates the healing process that took her from pain to survival.

_____. Trust Your Heart: An Autobiography. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1987. A touching memoir that chronicles the events in Collins's life and her progress from folk musician to multidimensional artist.

Vassal, Jacques. Electric Children: Roots and Branches of Modern Folkrock. New York: Taplinger, 1976. An overview of the folk-rock scene in the 1960's and early 1970's in which Collins played.

See also: Baez, Joan; Brel, Jacques; Cohen, Leonard; Crosby, David; Denny, Sandy; Lennon, John; McCartney, Sir Paul; Mitchell, Joni; Newman, Randy; Paxton, Tom; Powell, Bud; Sondheim, Stephen; Stills, Stephen.

Phil Collins

English singer, songwriter, and drummer

Collins gained fame as the drummer and front man for Genesis. This evolved into a successful solo career and writing hits for motion-picture sound tracks.

Born: January 30, 1951; London, England
Also known as: Philip David Charles Collins (full name)
Member of: Brand X; Genesis

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): Face Value, 1981; Hello, I Must Be Going!, 1982; No Jacket Required, 1985; But Seriously, 1989; Both Sides, 1993; Dance into the Light, 1996; A Hot Night in Paris, 1999; Testify, 2002.

ALBUMS (with Brand X): Unorthodox Behaviour, 1976; Moroccan Roll, 1977; Masques, 1978; Product, 1979; Do They Hurt?, 1980; Is There Anything About?, 1982; Xcommunication, 1992; Manifest Destiny, 1997; Missing Period, 1998.

ALBUMS (with Genesis): Nursery Cryme, 1971; Foxtrot, 1972; Selling England by the Pound, 1973; The Lamb Lies Down on Broadway, 1974; A Trick of the Tail, 1976; Wind and Wuthering, 1976; Seconds Out, 1977; And Then There Were Three, 1978; Duke, 1980; Abacab, 1981; Three Sides Live, 1982; Genesis, 1983; Invisible Touch, 1986; We Can't Dance, 1991.

The Life

Born into a prosperous family, Philip David Charles Collins had aspirations of being on stage. After receiving a toy drum set for Christmas at the age of five, he practiced so feverishly that his parents purchased a proper kit. To nurture his creativity, he enrolled in the Barbara Speake Stage School at fourteen, and his professional career started as an actor, notably in a childhood role as the Artful Dodger for a London presentation of Oliver! (1960). Other early appearances included a cameo in the Beatles' classic film A Hard Day's Night (1964).

In his teen years, Collins attended Chiswick Community School, and his passion for music, particularly drumming, blossomed. He formed and joined a variety of bands. By eighteen, he had released an album with the British rock band Flaming Youth. In 1970, he joined Genesis as the band's drummer. Collins became the group's lead singer in 1975, though he also explored jazz fusion as drummer for Brand X. He debuted on a record with Brand X in 1976, and he ceased involvement by the end of the 1970's. Collins branched out for a solo career in 1981, embarking on a whirlwind of band and individual tours throughout the 1980's and 1990's, along with additional acting appearances.

Collins was married to Andrea Bertorelli from 1975 to 1980, and they had a son, Simon. Collins adopted Bertorelli's daughter, Joely. Collins was married to Jill Tavelman from 1984 to 1996, and they had a daughter, Lily. In 1999 Collins married Orianne Cevey, and they moved to Switzerland. The pair had two children, Nicholas and Matthew, but they separated in 2006.

The Music

Collins's tenure in Flaming Youth ended when he answered an advertisement placed by Genesis, which was seeking a percussion player. Though the group played gentle acoustic pop songs throughout the late 1960's, during the 1970's it turned to twelve-string guitars and progressive rock arrangements. Collins fit into the new niche, and after passing an audition, he was hired to play on the album Nursery Cryme. At that time, Peter Gabriel served as primary lead vocalist, though Collins provided background (and occasionally lead) vocals while keeping beat.

Genesis. In 1974 Genesis released the grand concept album The Lamb Lies Down on Broadway, and the group embarked on an exhaustive tour. Following the extensive time on the road, Gabriel announced his departure, leaving Collins, keyboardist Tony Banks, bassist-guitarist Mike Rutherford, and guitarist Steve Hackett to audition new vocalists. Finding no one suited to the front-man position, Collins reluctantly stepped up to the microphone on A Trick of the Tail. The result was the band's best selling album to that point. It was also critically acclaimed, prompting the group to return to the studio to produce Wind and Wuthering. (While singing for Genesis, Collins branched out as drummer for jazz act Brand X, which debuted in 1976.)

Seconds Out and And Then There Were Three. Genesis' touring continued, spawning the live project Seconds Out (with Chester Thompson at the drums in concert), and Collins steered the group toward a mainstream rock sound. As a result of the constant touring and Genesis' move away from its progressive musical beginnings, Hackett exited the group, paving the way for And Then There Were Three (though bassist-guitarist Daryl Stuermer was added to bolster the live sound). The ballad "Follow You, Follow Me" put the group on the charts.

Duke, Abacab, and Face Value. Duke opened the new decade for Genesis, producing a series of hit singles such as "Turn It on Again" and "Misunderstanding." The creative Abacab featured Earth, Wind, and Fire's horn section on "No Reply At All." To launch his solo career, Collins created Face Value, an album connected instantly with Genesis listeners and introduced him to a new audience that appreciated the percussive "In the Air Tonight" and other songs with soul influences.

Phil Collins. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Three Sides Live. In 1982 Collins was featured on Genesis' Three Sides Live and on his solo follow-up, Hello, I Must Be Going!, which was anchored by a cover of the Supremes' "You Can't Hurry Love." By this time, Collins was trying to attract mainstream audiences, and in the process he was alienating some older listeners. With the album Genesis, Collins attempted to please both factions of his fan base. Although the project had several radio singles (notably "That's All"), it also concentrated on artistic material (such as "Second Home by the Sea").

No Jacket Required. Collins returned a favor to Earth, Wind, and Fire by dueting with the band's singer, Philip Bailey, on "Easy Lover." Collins sang the power ballad "Against All Odds" for the film of the same name, and he contributed to "Do They Know It's Christmas?," a single to aid African famine victims. Both became major hits for Collins as a solo artist, and they paved the way for a productive 1985 that included two Live Aid concert performances on the same day (London and Philadelphia) and the solo album No Jacket Required. Aside from exploring more radio-friendly sounds (the danceable "Sussudio" and the sing-a-long "Take Me Home"), the project was named Album of the Year at 1986's Grammy Awards.

Invisible Touch. Even with his enormous solo acclaim, Collins honored his Genesis commitments to release with the group Invisible Touch in 1986. The project was a radio success, with five U.S. Top 10 hits and with several memorable music videos (including MTV staples "Land of Confusion" and "Tonight, Tonight, Tonight"). In 1988 Collins appeared in the movie Buster (1988), and with "Two Hearts" and "A Groovy Kind of Love" he had number-one sound-track singles.

But Seriously. But Seriously took a serious and sophisticated pop tone, and the socially conscious "Another Day in Paradise" (about aiding the victims of poverty) won a 1990 Grammy Award for Record of the Year. Collins returned to Genesis in 1991 for We Can't Dance, which balanced his solo career's commercial aspects with ten-minute tracks of art rock.

Both Sides. Collins exhibited his experimental tendencies in his solo offering Both Sides, which turned to social and political themes, without the mainstream sounds of his earlier solo projects. As a result, the album did not fare well in sales or in radio play. To turn that around, Collins produced 1996's Dance into the Light (at which time Collins announced that he was officially leaving Genesis to pursue solo recording full time). Weary of the direction taken in Both Sides, fans did not support Dance into the Light. In response to slow sales, Collins changed course by forming the Phil Collins Big Band and by returning to drums for a short tour in 1998, which produced the concert album A Hot Night in Paris.

Hits and Sound Tracks. Hits was produced for mainstream fans in 1999, and Collins contributed to the sound track for Tarzan (1999), with, among other songs, the ballad "You'll Be in My Heart," which won an Academy Award for Best Original Song. In 2002 Collins's full-length solo project Testify was performing poorly.

Collins returned to the concert stage with Genesis in 2006. With Banks, Rutherford, Stuermer, and Thompson, the group embarked on its first tour in fifteen years, resulting in album box sets and the retrospective release Turn It on Again—The Hits: The Tour Edition.

Musical Legacy

Collins's early work as a drummer with Genesis helped lay the groundwork for the progressive-art rock movement (along with Yes and Rush). His diverse talents and his influences were exhibited in Brand X, his jazz fusion side project that showcased his playing and his writing abilities. Collins's role as a singer-songwriter in Genesis and as a solo performer made a major mark on pop and commercial rock from the late 1970's through 1990's, with Genesis selling approximately 150 million albums and his solo efforts selling more than one hundred million albums. In addition to this commercial success in music, Collins acted in motion pictures, and he occasionally backed up his screen work with contributions to film sound tracks.

Several acts from different genres have covered his material, from hard rock band Nonpoint reworking the staple "In the Air Tonight" to hip-hop act Bone Thugs-N-Harmony sampling "Take Me Home" within its own hit "Home."

Andy Argyrakis

Further Reading

Banks, Tony, Phil Collins, Peter Gabriel, Mike Rutherford, and Steve Hackett. Genesis: Chapter and Verse. New York: St. Martin's Griffin, 2007. The first official book on Genesis, with contributions from its prominent group members. This includes several anecdotes by or about Collins.

Brackett, Nathan, and Christian Hoard, eds. The New Rolling Stone Album Guide. 4th ed. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2004. The fourth edition of this exhaustive album guide provides detailed critical assessments of Collins's solo work and extensive time in Genesis.

Coleman, Ray. Phil Collins: The Definitive Biography. London: Simon & Schuster, 1997. This text traces Collins's early years through his late 1990's efforts as a solo artist. The book covers his personal life as well as his musical pursuits.

Russell, Paul. Genesis—A Live Guide, 1969-1975: Play Me My Song. London: SAF, 2004. The thoroughly researched text covers several Genesis concerts with Gabriel as lead vocalist. Collins's contributions as drummer and songwriter are covered.

Thompson, Dave. Turn It on Again: Peter Gabriel, Phil Collins, and Genesis. San Francisco: Backbeat Books, 2005. The text traces the two primary singers for the group, and it outlines Genesis's progressive rock beginnings, its artful stage presentations, and its demonstration of a mainstream sound in the studio and a commercial tone in concert.

Waller, Johnny. The Phil Collins Story. London: Zomba Books, 1985. Coverage of Collins's childhood, his early bands, his entry into Genesis, his role as the band's lead singer, his solo career, and his personal life.

See also: Dozier, Lamont; Eno, Brian; Gabriel, Peter; Jones, Quincy; Lennon, John; McCartney, Sir Paul; Plant, Robert; Sting; Turner, Tina.

Willie Colón

American Latin trombonist, singer, and songwriter

A pioneer of salsa music in the United States, Colón and his robust trombone style contributed to the development of the "New York sound" that spurred a renewed interest in Latin popular music in the 1970's.

Born: April 28, 1950; South Bronx, New York
Also known as: William Anthony Colón (full name); El Malo
Member of: Legal Aliens; the Fania All Stars

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): El malo, 1967 (with Héctor Lavoe); The Hustler, 1968 (with Lavoe); Cosa nuestra, 1969 (with Lavoe); Guisando, 1969 (with Lavoe); Asalto navideño, 1970 (with Lavoe); La gran fuga (the big break), 1970 (with Lavoe); El jucio, 1972 (with Lavoe); Asalto navideño, vol. 2, 1973 (with Lavoe); Lo mato, 1973 (with Lavoe); The Good, the Bad, the Ugly, 1975 (with Rubén Blades); There Goes the Neighborhood, 1975 (with Mon Rivera); Metiendo mano, 1977 (with Blades); El baquiné de angelitos negros, 1977; Déjà Vu, 1978 (with Lavoe); Siembra, 1978 (with Blades); Solo, 1979; Doble energía, 1980 (with Ismael Miranda); Canciones del solar de los aburridos, 1981 (with Blades); Fantasmas, 1981 (with Blades); Corazón guerrero, 1982; The Last Fight, 1982 (with Blades); Vigilante, 1983 (with Lavoe); Criollo, 1984; Tiempo pa' matar, 1984; Especial no. 5, 1987; Singers of the Cibao, 1994 (with Rivera); Tras la tormenta, 1995 (with Blades); Y vuelve otra vez!, 1995; Demasiado corazon, 1998; Mí gran amor, 1999; Idilio, 2000.

ALBUMS (with Legal Aliens): Top Secrets, 1989; Color Americano, 1990; Illegal Alien, 1990; Honra y cultura, 1991; Hecho en Puerto Rico, 1993.

The Life

Born in South Bronx to a Puerto Rican family, William Anthony Colón (koh-LOHN) began playing the trumpet at the age of twelve, but he switched to the trombone two years later. He was quickly signed to the nascent record label Fania Records, which produced his first album, El malo. Soon after his debut, he became an important member of the Fania All Stars, the large band comprising musicians that performed and recorded for Fania Records. Here he also developed a reputation as a bandleader and composer.

Between 1967 and 1975 Colón collaborated with singer Héctor Lavoe on several albums, including the two Asalto navideño albums. While directing the Latin Jazz All Stars in 1975, he formally studied music theory, composition, and orchestration. From 1976 to 1982, a fruitful period for Colón, he recorded several albums with Rubén Blades. In 1983 he began an active career as a bandleader, a lead vocalist, and a producer, often collaborating with salsa and Latin jazz stars such as Ismael Miranda and Celia Cruz. He has appeared on television as an actor, and he has composed music for several television productions. Colón has long been a champion of Latino rights.

Willie Colón. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The Music

Colón helped define the salsa and the Latin jazz genres of the late twentieth century. His innovative sound combines Puerto Rican, Cuban, and other Latin rhythms with elements of jazz and rock. As a young musician, he drew inspiration from the charanga music of Eddie Palmieri and the all-trombone brass sections of Mon Rivera's orchestra. Colón's first album, El malo, included several tunes in the bugalú style of the 1960's, a fusion of rhythm and blues, rock and roll, and mambo. By the 1970's, however, Colón was experimenting with various Latin rhythms and world music. Typical themes of his lyrics throughout his career include Pan-Latin solidarity, American imperialism, and barrio violence. Especially popular were the socially conscious albums he made with Blades in the late 1970's, including Siembra. In the late 1980's he formed a band called Legal Aliens, with which he recorded two albums as lead singer: Color Americano and Honra y cultura. Colón collaborated once again with Blades in the mid-1990's, recording Tras la tormenta and performing a series of concerts that began at the Hollywood Bowl in 1997. With a recording career spanning more than four decades, Colón had a prolific output, producing more than forty albums and earning eleven Grammy Award nominations.

"El malo." Composed in 1967 when he was just seventeen, "El malo" (the bad one) characterizes much of Colón's early career. In the lyrics he styled himself a modern barrio gangster. Taken from his debut album, which featured his "dirty" trombone sound, "El malo" became his nickname.

"Esta navidad." Recorded for Fania Records, Asalto navideño (assault on Christmas) almost instantly became a salsa classic. It incorporated Puerto Rican aguinaldos (traditional Christmas folk songs) in the style of salsa. "Esta navidad" (this Christmas), a track from this album, features the voice of Lavoe and the Puerto Rican cuatro, a distinctive guitar-like instrument with ten strings.

"Calle luna calle sol." After the release of Asalto navideño, Colón recorded this song of the barrio, "Calle luna calle sol" (moon street, sun street), which became one of his most famous. Like many of his songs, it addressed life in the violent Latin barrio of New York City.

"Plástico." Since both Colón and Blades wrote music that involved social commentary, their collaboration in the mid-1970's proved fruitful. One of the hits from the album Siembra was "Plástico," which begins by attacking materialism and superficiality in a pair of archetypal social climbers. The song begins with strings, horns, and a syncopated electric bass line in the distinctive style of disco, which can be read both as mockery (since disco music was quickly going out of fashion) and as a musical way to underscore the message of the lyrics.

Musical Legacy

As a composer, arranger, singer, trombonist, and producer, Colón contributed to recordings that have sold more than thirty million copies. His compositions set standards for the development of salsa and Latin jazz in rhythm, form, and instrumentation. Likewise, the lyrical content of his works combined nostalgia for the tropical land of his ancestors with the harsh realities of city life, a synthesis that defines much of Latin American popular music. In 1995 he became the first member of a minority to serve on the American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers (ASCAP) national board of trustees.

Stephanie N. Stallings

Further Reading

Boggs, Vernon. Salsiology: Afro-Cuban Music and the Evolution of Salsa in New York City. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1992. An introduction to the musical influences evident in salsa music, including interviews with key figures in the salsa industry.

Janson Perez, Brittmarie. "Political Facets of Salsa." Popular Music 6, no. 2 (May, 1987): 149-159. Discusses Colón's "El general," an antimilitary song.

Morales, Ed. "The Story of Nuyorican Salsa." In The Latin Beat: The Rhythms and Roots of Latin Music, from Bossa Nova to Salsa and Beyond. New York: Da Capo Press, 2003. A detailed study of how Puerto Rican and New York styles of music converged into salsa.

Roberts, John Storm. The Latin Tinge: The Impact of Latin American Music on the United States. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998. Discusses Puerto Rican contributions to salsa, including several useful insights into Colón's music.

Steward, Sue. Musica! The Rhythm of Latin America: Salsa, Rumba, Merengue, and More. San Francisco: Chronicle Books, 1999. Contains a preface by Colón.

See also: Blades, Rubén; Cruz, Celia.

John Coltrane

American jazz saxophonist and composer

Coltrane was a leading exponent of extended improvisation in jazz and expanded both the harmonic and modal vocabulary, utilizing his virtuosic saxophone technique to push the boundaries of expression. He also emphasized the spiritual dimension of jazz and its transcendent, transformative potential.

Born: September 23, 1926; Hamlet, North Carolina
Died: July 17, 1967; Long Island, New York
Also known as: John William Coltrane (full name)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): John Coltrane and the Jazz Giants, 1956; Mating Call, 1956; Tenor Conclave, 1956; Blue Train, 1957; Coltrane, 1957; Dakar, 1957; The Last Trane, 1957; Lush Life, 1957; Traneing In, 1957; Bahia, 1958; The Believer, 1958; Black Pearls, 1958; Countdown: The Savoy Sessions, 1958; Dial Africa, 1958; Gold Coast, 1958; Settin' the Pace, 1958; Soultrane, 1958; Stardust, 1958; Giant Steps, 1959; The Avant-Garde, 1960; Coltrane's Sound, 1960; My Favorite Things, 1960; Africa/Brass, 1961; Coltrane Jazz, 1961; Olé, 1961; Ballads, 1962; Coltrane Plays the Blues, 1962; Standard Coltrane, 1962; Impressions, 1963; John Coltrane and Johnny Hartman, 1963; Crescent, 1964; A Love Supreme, 1964; Ascension, 1965; First Meditations, 1965; The John Coltrane Quartet Plays, 1965; Kulu Sé Mama, 1965; Om, 1965; Sun Ship, 1965; Transition, 1965; Expression, 1967; Interstellar Space, 1967.

ALBUMS (with Kenny Burrell): Kenny Burrell and John Coltrane, 1958.
ALBUMS (with Miles Davis): The New Miles Davis Quintet, 1955; Cookin' with the Miles Davis Quintet, 1956; Miles Davis and the Modern Jazz Giants, 1956; Relaxin' with the Miles Davis Quintet, 1956; 'Round About Midnight, 1956; Steamin' with the Miles Davis Quintet, 1956; Workin' with the Miles Davis Quintet, 1956; Milestones, 1958; Kind of Blue, 1959.
ALBUMS (with Thelonious Monk): Thelonious Monk with John Coltrane, 1957.

The Life

As a youth, John William Coltrane (KOHL-trayn) was exposed to music by his parents, who both played instruments. His mother's father, the Reverend William Blair, shared with him the ideas of influential writers of the Harlem Renaissance. While attending school in High Point, North Carolina, Coltrane played band instruments such as clarinet and E-flat alto horn. He switched to alto saxophone and began practicing enthusiastically. After his father and his mother's father passed away, his mother, aunt, and cousin moved to Philadelphia, where John joined them after finishing high school in 1943. In Philadelphia, Coltrane studied at the Ornstein School of Music. During a year of service in the Navy, he played in Hawaii and, upon returning to Philadelphia in 1946, resumed studies at Granoff Studios and started to work professionally.

He played in many bands and combos and eventually with Dizzy Gillespie, one of the creators of the complex bebop style. Unfortunately, as his reputation grew, Coltrane fell victim to the drug and alcohol habits that were occupational hazards for jazz musicians at the time. Somehow, he managed to grow musically and attracted the attention of trumpeter Miles Davis, who in 1955 engaged him in a partnership that was to make some of the most influential recordings in jazz. In Davis's group, Coltrane achieved national recognition, although his substance-abuse problems continued. In 1957, after being fired by Davis, who had overcome his addiction to hard drugs, Coltrane freed himself from drugs and soon approached his music with a renewed sense of purpose and energy. While continuing to play with pianist Thelonious Monk and others, Coltrane led his own recording sessions, which included his compositions.

After a second and even more artistically significant period with Davis, Coltrane formed his own group in 1960 and from this time on performed primarily as a leader. Usually leading a quartet with piano, bass, and drums, Coltrane started playing the soprano saxophone, alternating with tenor. With an intense practice regimen that consumed most of his waking hours, he became regarded as one of the great virtuosos of these instruments.

In the process of recovering from addiction, Coltrane had reconnected with the religious background of his childhood, broadening it to Islam through his first wife, Juanita Naima Grubb, and continued to expand his interests through the study of Eastern and African spiritual traditions. He had deep respect for the music of those cultures as well. These trends converged in his 1964 album A Love Supreme, accompanied with text indicating that his music was offered as a spiritual expression. Coltrane avoided specific sectarian identification, and his new music was embraced by people of all faiths and backgrounds, who responded to its challenging, intense nature. In the last few years of his life, he continued to assert the spiritual purpose of his music, which became increasingly experimental. He was joined in some of his final projects by his second wife, pianist Alice Coltrane, as well as other colleagues from the jazz community. Tragically, John Coltrane died of liver cancer at age forty.

The Music

During Coltrane's Philadelphia period, he worked in a variety of idioms, including the rhythm-and-blues style, which stressed vocal-style inflections on the saxophone, as well as the more dissonant style of bebop. He developed a vast repertoire of standard pieces and became known as someone with a good memory for chord progressions. Coltrane's initial influences were alto saxophonists: Johnny Hodges, who had contributed to the distinctive sound of the Duke Ellington orchestra, and Charlie Parker, the brilliant innovator who had helped to create bebop. Although Coltrane did not change to tenor saxophone until around 1947, he had listened to tenor saxophonists, including Lester Young, of the rhythmically driving Kansas City style, and Coleman Hawkins, whose bold arpeggios have been considered a precedent for the "sheets-of-sound" style that Coltrane would later develop.

Coltrane's first chance for national prominence came when Gillespie hired him to play in his big band, and Coltrane recorded with the group in 1949. Gillespie attempted to combine the fast tempi and intricate melodies of bebop with the popular appeal and power of the large ensemble. It was an exciting experiment but not commercially viable. After the group disbanded, Gillespie employed Coltrane in a smaller group until 1951. The next prominent musician to employ him was Hodges, who worked in an older style closer to the big band era in sound. A great admirer of Hodges, Coltrane deeply enjoyed this experience, but his debilitating drug habit prevented a long-term association.

John Coltrane. (Library of Congress)

'Round About Midnight. In 1955 Coltrane began his first period as a member of the Miles Davis Quintet when Miles needed a replacement for saxophonist Sonny Rollins. In spite of continued substance-abuse problems, Coltrane made significant artistic breakthroughs in his work with Davis during this period, which ended in 1956. Miles allowed his sidemen a great deal of freedom, and this situation encouraged Coltrane to develop a more verbose style that displayed his considerable technique. Also, Coltrane formed strong musical relationships with the other musicians in the quintet, including bassist Paul Chambers, pianist Red Garland, and drummer Philly Joe Jones, consummate players he would soon employ on his own projects. Their harmonic and rhythmic support gave Coltrane the confidence he needed to explore his ideas. In 1956 the quintet recorded four albums for Prestige Records, as well as 'Round About Midnight for Columbia. Monk, a master of harmonic dissonance who had coauthored "'Round Midnight," hired Coltrane for his own group and encouraged further stylistic developments in the saxophonist.

Trane Albums. Building on his work with Miles, Coltrane engaged some of his colleagues from that group, and others, to record his own albums. The first of these, titled simply with his name, was released by Prestige Records, and the second, Blue Train, was recorded for Blue Note, both in 1957. Blue Train featured several of his original compositions. He also collaborated on recordings with guitarist Kenny Burrell, Garland, and other musicians during this period. A third album, Soultrane, was released in 1958, and a fourth, Lush Life, was also recorded during this period. These albums contrasted Coltrane's delicate rendering of ballads with exciting, rhythmically precise excursions in the hard-bop style.

Kind of Blue. Coltrane made a triumphant return to Davis's group in 1958, and his dense melodic structures, which had blossomed during the intervening period, formed a perfect contrast to Davis's more minimalist and plaintive soloing. This reunion allowed Coltrane to participate in an important stylistic development for Davis, with a new emphasis on modes. The blues, with its many branches of oral tradition, had always been a modal music. Davis took advantage of this connection as he crafted new pieces, primarily in the mixolydian and dorian modes, which featured slow harmonic rhythm, permitting the soloists to be free and relaxed in their melodic invention. The group recorded two albums, Milestones and Kind of Blue, and also made live recordings before Coltrane left to pursue his career as a group leader and composer.

Giant Steps. Coltrane's first album to consist entirely of his own compositions, Giant Steps was recorded in 1959. Two of the pieces, "Naima" and "Cousin Mary," were named for family members, and a third, "Mr. P.C.," was named for bassist Paul Chambers, who provided a strong foundation for the project. The title piece uses the traditional theme-and-variations approach for a progression that is only sixteen measures long. Although the immediate structures at any given time are familiar, the phrase targets outline the notes of an augmented triad. This, in conjunction with the rapid tempo, weakens the sense of a tonal center. In both "Giant Steps" and "Countdown," which appeared on the same album, the rapid harmonic rhythms of bebop are paired with key areas progressing by major thirds, demanding an unprecedented level of concentration on the part of the soloist. In this premier recording, Coltrane roared through the changes with the same confidence that he displayed in his later work, when he was able to respond immediately and definitively to relatively unpredictable piano chords offered to him in a more open structural context.

A Love Supreme. After Giant Steps, Coltrane continued to record many albums under his own name and explored the modal style, frequently playing the soprano sax, which he used for My Favorite Things, one of his most popular albums. By this time, he had been joined by McCoy Tyner on piano and Elvin Jones on drums. When Jimmy Garrison joined the group in 1962 to play bass, what came to be regarded as Coltrane's classic quartet was complete. In 1964 this group made its most famous recording, a four-movement suite entitled A Love Supreme. Jones, one of the few drummers who could sustain multiple layers of contrasting patterns over a long period of time, provided an unprecedented level of polyrhythmic tension, which would be occasionally released at the beginnings of new phrases. The effect was similar to the great ensemble percussion traditions of West Africa. Although there was plenty of hard swinging jazz content in the suite, for the final movement Coltrane returned to his religious roots, adopting the inflections and phrasing of gospel preaching and spirituals. All of these elements were harmonized with sophisticated modernist voicings that underscored the music's presentation as serious concert music. Tyner's parallel quartal harmonies formed complex inversions and neighboring structures over Garrison's lines and, like Jones's polyrhythms, would occasionally resolve at key points in the structure.

Interstellar Space. During this period, Coltrane's groups played much more experimentally in concert than in the studio and were influenced by the free jazz movement introduced by Ornette Coleman, as well as such modernist composers as Cecil Taylor, Sun Ra, and the musicians in their groups. For Coltrane, melodic lines and intensity became more important than vertical structures, and this became even more pronounced when the piano was dropped. Although the emphasis on melody and rhythm could have made this music more similar to the modal traditions of Asia and Africa, Coltrane often maintained the full chromatic spectrum in his sequences and superimposed lines, obscuring the sense of a strong tonal center and keeping the modernist dimension shared with atonal or pantonal music. Eventually, Coltrane even dropped the bass for his second-to-last recording, Interstellar Space, a duo album with drummer Rashied Ali in 1967.

Musical Legacy

Aside from his unquestioned virtuosity on the saxophone, Coltrane has been a powerful influence on subsequent generations of musicians, who continue to be inspired by his intense creativity, his specific musical techniques, and his contributions to the standard repertoire. Along with Davis, he was one of the chief proponents of the modal style, while at the same time pushing the limits of the harmonic vocabulary into polytonality. He provided the world with a deep and lasting affirmation of the essential spirituality of music in general and of jazz in particular. In 2007 the Pulitzer Prize Board awarded him a posthumous special citation honoring his achievements and contributions.

John Myers

Further Reading

Brown, Leonard. "Sacred Music for Secular Space, in Honor of John Coltrane." In The Triumph of the Soul: Cultural and Psychological Aspects of African American Music, edited by Ferdinand Jones and Arthur C. Jones. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 2001. Comprehensive study on the root genre of African American music. Index.

Cole, Bill. John Coltrane. New York: Da Capo Press, 2001. Looks at the religious dimension of Coltrane's life and music and his connections to West African traditions. Photographs, music transcriptions.

Kahn, Ashley. A Love Supreme: The Story of John Coltrane's Signature Album. New York: Viking Penguin, 2002. Includes interviews with the musicians and others associated with the recording. Photographs, index, extensive notes, discography.

Porter, Lewis. John Coltrane: His Life and Music. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1998. Well-researched biography focuses on the music and chronology, with music examples, analysis, illustrations, references, index.

Thomas, J. C. Chasin' the Trane. Garden City, N.Y.: Da Capo Press, 1975. Biography, including statements from people who knew Coltrane at various periods. Photographs, discography.

See also: Adderley, Cannonball; Corea, Chick; Davis, Miles; Dolphy, Eric; Ellington, Duke; Gillespie, Dizzy; Gordon, Dexter; Hancock, Herbie; Hawkins, Coleman; Jones, Elvin; Jones, Hank; Kirk, Rahsaan Roland; Legrand, Michel; McGuinn, Roger; McPartland, Marian; Marsalis, Wynton; Masekela, Hugh; Monk, Thelonious; Montgomery, Wes; Palmieri, Eddie; Parker, Charlie; Rollins, Sonny; Sanders, Pharoah; Shankar, Ravi; Shorter, Wayne; Taylor, Cecil; Tyner, McCoy.

Sean Combs

American rap vocalist and songwriter

Combs is a rap artist who expanded his involvement in entertainment by founding a record company, Bad Boy Entertainment, that promotes hip-hop and rhythm-and-blues artists.

Born: November 4, 1969; New York, New York
Also known as: Sean John Combs (full name); P. Diddy; Puff Daddy; Diddy

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: No Way Out, 1997; Forever, 1999; Thank You, 2001; Press Play, 2006.

The Life

Sean John Combs (kohmz) spent a large portion of his childhood in Mt. Vernon, New York, before attending Howard University. While enrolled at Howard, Combs secured an internship at Uptown Records, and he eventually dropped out of college to focus on a music career. He was quickly promoted to vice president of artists and repertoire at Uptown Records, and he discovered, developed, produced, and styled such acts as Jodeci, Mary J. Blige, and Christopher Wallace, better known as the Notorious B.I.G. In 1993 Combs was fired from Uptown Records, but he quickly found a distributor for his own record label, Bad Boy Entertainment.

Following Combs to his new label were two artists Combs had signed at Uptown Records: Craig Mack and Notorious B.I.G. Mack released the label's first album, Project: Funk Da World, in 1994, while the Notorious B.I.G. released his debut, Ready to Die, the following year. Produced by Combs, Ready to Die propelled the Notorious B.I.G. to the top of the rap world and solidified his position as Bad Boy Entertainment's premier star. Over the next two years, Combs added several other successful acts to the label, such as rhythm-and-blues singer Faith Evans and rapper Mase, and he continued to serve as a producer for such high-profile artists as Mariah Carey and Boyz II Men. This period also saw the development of a rivalry between Bad Boy Entertainment and the West Coast label Death Row Records, which was initiated through accusations by Death Row artist Tupac Shakur that Combs and Wallace been involved in an incident in 1994 in which Shakur had been shot. The feud, which was expressed both lyrically in songs and through public appearances, eventually ended with the shooting deaths of Shakur in 1996 and Wallace in 1997.

In the wake of Wallace's death, his second solo album, Life After Death, was released, as was Combs's solo debut as Puff Daddy, No Way Out. Both albums were highly successful, but the sales of Combs's next album, Forever, were disappointing. In 1999 Combs and Bad Boy Entertainment experienced other setbacks. Prominent rapper Mase and rap group the LOX left the label, and Combs encountered a number of legal problems. He was accused of beating Interscope Records executive Steve Stoute, a charge that was eventually reduced to second-degree harassment, and in December of 1999 he was in attendance at a New York City nightclub when a shooting occurred. Combs, found with an unregistered gun, was charged with illegal possession of a firearm. The charges were eventually dropped, and in the aftermath Combs changed his stage name from Puff Daddy to P. Diddy. Bad Boy Entertainment began to reverse its fortunes with the release of the compilation albums The Saga Continues in 2001 and We Invented the Remix in 2002, and it was in full resurgence by 2006, when albums by rapper Yung Joc, singer Cassie, the female vocal group Danity Kane, and Combs were released to great success.

In addition to his activities as an artist and label head, Combs has been involved in other successful ventures. His clothing line, Sean John, figures prominently in hip-hop fashion, and he produces the MTV reality show Making the Band. As an actor, Combs has appeared in the films Made (2001) and Monster's Ball (2001) and in the 2004 Broadway revival of A Raisin in the Sun (1959).

The Music

Best known as a label head and producer, Combs has also released a number of solo albums since 1997 under the names Puff Daddy, P. Diddy, and Diddy. For these solo efforts he enlists the help of guest artists, and he frequently utilizes his own songs to promote artists on his Bad Boy Entertainment label. Musically, Combs heavily utilizes samples, which frequently serve as the sole basis for his songs. Combs has been criticized for his overreliance on samples, but nevertheless his songs have demonstrated large commercial appeal.

No Way Out. Released after the Notorious B.I.G.'s death in 1997, No Way Out marks Combs's debut as a solo artist. A big success, the album has been certified seven times platinum, contains two Billboard Hot 100 number-one singles and two number-two singles, and won the 1998 Grammy Award for Best Rap Album. Like all of Combs's solo albums, No Way Out features appearances by guest artists, including several artists signed to Combs's Bad Boy Entertainment label. The first single from the album, "Can't Nobody Hold Me Down," established Combs as a solo artist, and it held the top position on the singles chart for six weeks. The song prominently features Bad Boy rapper Mase and relies on samples drawn from previous hit singles "The Message" by Grandmaster Flash and the Furious Five and "Break My Stride" by Matthew Wilder. The next single released from the album was "I'll Be Missing You," which featured Evans and the rhythm-and-blues quartet 112. This song, which won the 1998 Grammy Award for Best Rap Performance by a Duo or Group, is a tribute to the Notorious B.I.G. and samples the melody of "Every Breath You Take" by the Police. The final two singles, "Been Around the World" and "It's All About the Benjamins," both contain posthumous appearances by the Notorious B.I.G. and prominently utilize samples.

The Saga Continues. Released in 2001 under his new stage name P. Diddy, The Saga Continues attempted to regain some of the fans that Combs lost apparently because of his legal troubles at the time. The album prominently features other Bad Boy Entertainment artists, especially rappers G-Dep and Black Rob, and it intersperses several spoken interludes and skits between songs. Throughout the album, Combs attempts to reestablish his credibility by declaring his innocence in his legal affairs and by assuring listeners that his Bad Boy Entertainment empire is still intact. Unlike previous albums, The Saga Continues relies less on samples and more on original beats, another attempt by Combs to demonstrate his authenticity as an artist.

Press Play. In the middle of Bad Boy Entertainment's resurgence in 2006, Combs released the solo album Press Play. Similar to his other albums, Press Play features a significant number of collaborators, and they are notable for their prominence in the music business. Among the guest artists are Christina Aguilera, Twista, Nas, Brandy, Mary J. Blige, and Jamie Foxx, and Combs shares production duties with such high-profile producers as Timbaland, Kayne West, and the Neptunes. The music presents an eclectic mix of rhythm and blues, soul, hip-hop, and techno, and Combs, in addition to rapping, debuts as a singer. The album produced five singles, including two that reached the Top 10 on the Billboard Hot 100 singles chart. The first Top 10 single, "Come to Me," features Nicole Scherzinger of the group the Pussycat Dolls, and it utilizes a sparse electronic beat that is well suited for a dance club. "Last Night," the other Top 10 single, features rhythm-and-blues singer Keyshia Cole and samples Prince's "Erotic City," creating a 1980's-style beat. The other three singles—"Tell Me," "Diddy Rock," and "Through the Pain (She Told Me)"—feature a prominent guest artist, with the album showcasing his collaborators as much as Combs.

Musical Legacy

Although he began as a rapper, Combs made his primary musical contributions as a producer and record executive. Through his activities as the head of Bad Boy Entertainment, he has launched the careers of numerous acts, such as the Notorious B.I.G., Evans, Mase, and Danity Kane. As a producer, Combs helped popularize rap with mainstream audiences, creating an accessible sound by relying heavily on samples. In addition to the artists he has produced on the Bad Boy record label, he has produced a number of outside acts as well, including Jay-Z, TLC, Mary J. Blige, and Aretha Franklin. His concurrent activities as a record producer, rapper, entrepreneur, label head, and actor have provided the template for other versatile artists to follow. It is now common for rap artists to run their own label, have their own clothing line, and appear in films, just as Combs has done.

Throughout his career, Combs has a received a number of awards and recognitions. In addition to the Grammy Awards he received for No Way Out and "I'll Be Missing You," Combs received the 2004 Grammy Award for Best Rap Performance by a Duo or Group, along with Nelly and Murphy Lee, for "Shake Ya Tailfeather," and in 1996 he was named the American Society of Authors, Composers, and Publishers (ASCAP) Songwriter of the Year. He also received MTV Video Music Awards for "I'll Be Missing You" in 1997 and "It's All About the Benjamins (Rock Remix)" in 1998.

Matthew Mihalka

Further Reading

Cable, Andrew. A Family Affair: The Unauthorized Sean "Puffy" Combs Story. New York: Ballantine Books, 1998. This book chronicles the early portion of Combs's life and career, from his birth to his work at the MCA Records subsidiary Uptown to his founding of Bad Boy Entertainment and his ascension as a solo artist in the wake of the Notorious B.I.G.'s death. Includes several photographs of Combs with various hip-hop artists.

Nelson, George. Hip-Hop America. New York: Viking, 1998. Portions of this book describe Combs's early years at Uptown and the formation of his Bad Boy record label, as well as his role in the East Coast-West Coast feud.

Oliver, Richard, and Tim Leffel. Hip-Hop, Inc.: Success Strategies of the Rap Moguls. New York: Thunder's Mouth Press, 2006. This source includes a chapter on Combs's activities as a hip-hop music executive, focusing on Combs as an entrepreneur, as the head of Bad Boy Entertainment and the Sean John clothing line, and as a television and film producer.

Ro, Ronin. Bad Boy: The Influence of Sean "Puffy" Combs on the Music Industry. New York: Pocket Books, 2001. This biography of Combs focuses primarily on his activities from the founding of Bad Boy in 1993 to the Notorious B.I.G.'s death in 1997.

_____. Have Gun Will Travel: The Spectacular Rise and Violent Fall of Death Row Records. New York: Doubleday, 1998. This book documents the East Coast-West Coast rivalry between Combs's Bad Boy Entertainment and Suge Knight's Death Row Records.

See also: Blige, Mary J.; Carey, Mariah; Franklin, Aretha; Grandmaster Flash; Hammer, M. C.; LL Cool J; Notorious B.I.G.; Prince.

Harry Connick, Jr.

American popular singer, pianist, and composer

Known for reviving jazz vocals in the style of 1940's crooners epitomized by Frank Sinatra, Connick fell in love with jazz and singing as a child and eventually introduced these classic American styles to a new generation. While some critics were initially quick to dismiss him as simply a "Sinatra wannabe," Connick has earned respect as both a consumate performer and a humanitarian.

Born: September 11, 1967; New Orleans, Louisiana

Also known as: Joseph Harry Fowler Connick, Jr. (full name)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Dixieland Plus, 1977; Eleven, 1978; Harry Connick, Jr., 1987; Twenty, 1988; When Harry Met Sally, 1989 (all songs by Harry Connick, Jr.); Lofty's Roach Shuffle, 1990; We Are in Love, 1990; Blue Light, Red Light, 1991; Twenty-five, 1992; When My Heart Finds Christmas, 1993; Imagination, 1994; She, 1994; Star Turtle, 1995; Whisper Your Name, 1995; To See You, 1997; Come by Me, 1999; Songs I Heard, 2001; Thirty, 2001; Harry for the Holidays, 2003; Other Hours: Connick on Piano, Vol. 1, 2003; Only You, 2004; Occasion: Connick on Piano, Vol. 2, 2005; Harry on Broadway, Act 1, 2006; Chanson du vieux carré, 2007; Oh, My NOLA, 2007.

The Life

Joseph Harry Fowler Connick (KAH-nihk), Jr., was born in New Orleans, Louisiana, on September 11, 1967. His mother, Anita, who died when Connick was thirteen years old, was a judge, lawyer, and former Louisiana Supreme Court justice. His father, Harry Connick, Sr., was the district attorney of New Orleans for twenty-six years, successfully running against Jim Garrison, who was best known for his investigation into the assassination of President John F. Kennedy. Connick's sister, Suzanna, became an intelligence officer for the U.S. Army.

Growing up in a family of overachievers was not intimidating to Connick. He quickly made his own mark, perhaps influenced by the fact that his parents also owned a record store. He learned to play the keyboard at age three, gave his first public performance three years later, and recorded with a local jazz band when he was ten years old. Under the tutelage of jazz pianists Ellis Marsalis and James Booker, Connick developed his musical talents at the New Orleans Center for Creative Arts. A few years later, he moved to New York City, where he attended the prestigious Manhattan School of Music. In New York, an executive from Columbia Records persuaded Connick to sign a record deal.

After Connick had released a self-titled album of instrumental standards, his reputation in the jazz community quickly grew, and he worked as a pianist in jazz clubs. He added his now-trademark crooner vocals in the album Twenty, which garnered even more respect for him within the New York jazz world. Although it would have been easy to develop a career covering already successful jazz standards, Connick instead branched out, alternating between jazz, big band, and funk genres. He also became an actor, earning fame as a guest on several television programs, including Will and Grace. In 1994, Connick was married to Jill Goodacre, a former model; the couple would have three daughters.

No matter how famous he became, Connick remained committed to his roots. After Hurricane Katrina wreaked havoc on his hometown of New Orleans in August, 2005, Connick not only helped organize fund-raising efforts but also spent several days touring the city and lending a helping hand. On September 6 of that year, he was made honorary chair of Habitat for Humanity's Operation Home Delivery, a long-term rebuilding plan for families left homeless by the hurricane in New Orleans and along the neighboring Gulf Coast.

The Music

While most of his peers were studying their multiplication tables, Connick was already recording music. In 1977, he recorded Dixieland Plus with local New Orleans musicians for ADCO Productions. Only two years later, eleven-year-old Connick recorded Eleven with another ensemble cast of New Orleans musicians. Eight years later came Connick's self-titled debut with Sony Records, an instrumental album of jazz standards that showcased his piano-playing prowess.

When Harry Met Sally. Connick officially became a household name with the release of director Rob Reiner's film When Harry Met Sally. When Reiner heard of Connick's talent, he asked him to provide the sound track for the film. The movie was a favorite at the box office in 1989, and the accompanying sound track, with Connick's songs, was equally successful. The album went double platinum, with sales of more than two million, and garnered for Connick his first Grammy, for Best Jazz Male Vocal Performance.

We Are in Love. With his silky-smooth vocals, good looks, charm, and a musicial sensibility that spanned genres and therefore appealed to diverse audiences, Connick was well suited to singing romantic ballads, as evidenced by his 1990 release We Are in Love. Featuring the wedding favorite "I've Got a Great Idea," as well as classic Connick love songs such as "Recipe for Love," the whimsical title track, and "I'll Dream of You Again," this album solidified his reputation and popularity.

When My Heart Finds Christmas. In 1993, this release of holiday songs would become a classic for the younger generation. The album mixed popular carols and four new contributions by Connick, including the spirited gospel song "I Pray on Christmas." The disc enjoyed multiplatinum sales and remains popular.

She. Eager to prove that his musicianship was not limited to jazz or nostalgic standards, in 1994 Connick released She. The album ushered in the era of funk experimentation for Connick. While some fans were taken aback by this huge sonic shift, critics applauded his rootsy New Orleans style on "Here Comes the Big Parade" and "Trouble." Crossing over into mainstream pop, as in "(I Could Only) Whisper Your Name," Connick soon proved that he could write more accessible fare as well.

To See You. Connick returned to his jazz roots with his well-received To See You. Recorded with a symphony orchestra, this album was, according to Connick, inspired by a flight attendant's request for a romantic album. Adding ambience to the tour that introduced the album, Connick hit the road with a full symphony orchestra. The tour culminated with a Valentine's Day performance in Paris that was aired by the Public Broadcasting Service.

Songs I Heard. Connick's Songs I Heard reverted to his childhood with tracks from movies he remembered watching in his youth. Featuring everything from "Ding Dong! The Witch Is Dead!" (from 1939's The Wizard of Oz) to "The Lonely Goatherd" (from 1965's The Sound of Music), Connick's exploration of his inner child was aimed at both children and adults.

Oh, My NOLA. As a valentine to his beloved hometown, Connick decided to record an album's worth of songs associated with New Orleans, as well as four new songs of his own composition. For the album Oh, My NOLA, Connick served not only as a performer, singing and playing the piano, but also as conductor, arranger, and orchestrater. Continuing his charitable work, he directed that a portion of the album's proceeds be donated to Musicians' Village, one of Connick's pet projects in New Orleans.

Harry Connick, Jr. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Musical Legacy

Despite his association with American standards, Connick has never been satisfied with doing something the way it has been done before. Whether serving up a gumbo of funk and blues on 1994's She or covering old jazz standards on 2005's Only You, Connick always takes his own approach to his material, consistently delivering the high-quality vocals and instrumentals that have earned him the respect of musical legends, contemporaries, and public alike. Hence, while he will be remembered for preserving and renewing jazz classics and popular standards, he has also made his mark as something of a renaissance talent: vocalist, pianist, actor, and humanitarian.

Christa A. Banister

Further Reading

Feather, Leonard, and Ira Gitler. The Biographical Encyclopedia of Jazz. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999. Contains and authoritative entry on Connick.

Felix, Antonia. Wild About Harry? The Illustrated Biography. Dallas, Tex.: Taylor, 1995. In a revealing biography, Felix gets to know the man behind the music.

See also: Burke, Johnny; Chevalier, Maurice.

Sam Cooke

American soul singer

Cooke was a singer and writer of gospel, rhythm-and-blues, and popular songs. His melding of these three forms in his pure but intense vocals was a major factor in the birth of soul music.

Born: January 22, 1931; Clarksdale, Mississippi
Died: December 11, 1964; Los Angeles, California
Also known as: Samuel Cook (birth name); Dale Cooke

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Encore, 1958; Sam Cooke, 1958; Hit Kit, 1959; Tribute to the Lady, 1959; Cooke's Tour, 1960; Hits of the Fifties, 1960; I Thank God, 1960; Swing Low, 1960; The Wonderful World of Sam Cooke, 1960; My Kind of Blues, 1961; Twistin' the Night Away, 1962; Mr. Soul, 1963; Night Beat, 1963; Ain't That Good News, 1964; Shake, 1965.

The Life

Samuel Cook was born in Mississippi in 1931, the fifth of eight children of the Reverend Charles and Annie Mae Cook. When Sam was two, his family moved to Chicago, where his father worked at the Reynolds Metal Plant, while pastoring Christ Temple Church and having his children sing in area churches. After graduating from Wendell Phillips High School in 1948, Cooke began singing in gospel groups, and in 1950 he joined the Soul Stirrers. In 1953 Cooke married Delores "Dee Dee" Mohawk; their son Joey was born shortly afterward. Three other women would bear Sam children that year as well. Sam's success with the Soul Stirrers prompted him to start recording popular songs in 1956. His 1957 recording of his composition "You Send Me" became an overnight hit, selling more than a million records and reaching number one on the Billboard charts. During this time Cooke left the Soul Stirrers, moved to Los Angeles, divorced Delores, and added an "e" to his last name.

A stream of hits followed as well as appearances in leading theaters and nightclubs, including a live recording at New York's Copacabana. On October 11, 1959, Cooke married his childhood sweetheart, Barbara Campbell, with whom he already had a daughter, Linda. In addition to signing a contract with RCA's flamboyant young record producers Hugo Peretti and Luigi Creatore, Cooke started his own record label. In 1960 his daughter Tracey was born. The following year the family moved into a mansion in an exclusive neighborhood, and Barbara gave birth to their son Vincent. (Tragically, Vincent died in the backyard swimming pool as a toddler.) Cooke became friendly with activist Malcolm X and boxer Cassius Clay, soon to be known as Muhammad Ali, who invited Cooke into the ring after his celebrated knockout of Sonny Liston.

By all accounts Cooke was polite, charismatic, urbane, and handsome. He was an avid reader and a supporter of the Civil Rights movement. However, he could never settle down to married life, which would prove his undoing.

Sam Cooke. (AP/Wide World Photos)

On December 11, 1964, Cooke and a woman named Elisa Boyer went to the Hacienda Motel near the Los Angeles airport. While Cooke was undressed in the bathroom, Boyer fled the motel with his clothes, which also contained his wallet. An inebriated Cooke demanded that the motel manager, Bertha Lee Franklin, produce Boyer. Franklin and Cooke tussled, and Franklin shot Cooke through the heart with her gun. Cooke died minutes later. (A coroner's jury would acquit Franklin on the grounds of "justifiable homicide.")

The Music

Cooke began his musical career with the Singing Children, a group consisting of his siblings that performed in local churches. At sixteen he joined a gospel quartet, the Highway QC's. In 1950 Cooke joined the well-known Soul Stirrers, soon becoming their lead tenor and one of the top stars in gospel music.

"Jesus, I'll Never Forget." Cooke's recording of "Jesus, I'll Never Forget" not only was one of the most acclaimed Soul Stirrer singles but also foreshadowed the hallmarks of his popular music. In this song Cooke began with a melismatic call ("o-o-o-h-h-h, Jesus"). Although his style was calm and lyrical, he instilled his vocals with a subtle passion, intensified by cries of "oh-oh-oh" and "no-no-no" that evoke the call-and-response of the Pentecostal service.

"You Send Me." With Cooke's ascendant star in gospel music, he was approached by record producers to cross over into popular music. In deference to his gospel fans, he made his first pop recordings in late 1956 under the pseudonym Dale Cooke. In 1957 he recorded George Gershwin's "Summertime" for release as a 78-rpm single. The B side featured Cooke's own composition, which his producer thought "ridiculous" as it consisted mostly of Cooke crooning the song's title, "You Send Me." Nevertheless when the record was released, it was the B side that listeners requested and the radio disc jockeys played. Within a few months it had sold more than a million copies and topped both the rhythm-and-blues and pop Billboard charts. Cooke's singing represented a unique synthesis of gospel intensity, popular rhythms, and captivating articulation, glissandi, and phrasing. Most of all, many of his fans were able to imagine that he was singing personally to them.

Cooke followed "You Send Me" with a stream of rhythm-and-blues hits that were heartfelt and smooth with a rough-edged core—in other words, soulful. Cooke's composition "Wonderful World" was charming with its lilting rhythms, lighthearted lyrics, and Cooke's mellifluous singing, reinforced at each refrain by his background singers. Cooke flavored the song's conclusion with enchanting "ta-ta-ta's" and "mm-hmm's." In his composition "Chain Gang," Cooke sweetened a tale of convict labor with an array of enticing grunts and moans. In "Cupid," he sang an innocent valentine to Cupid's arrows over an infectious calypso rhythm. In "Ain't That Good News," he recalled his gospel roots with the title's evangelical refrain transformed into an optimistic love call. In 1963 he issued Night Beat, an album of blues-inflected songs.

"A Change Is Gonna Come." Cooke was farsighted not only in his style of singing but also in the progress of his musical career. He wrote many of his own songs and increasingly took the lead in producing them. In 1958 he formed his own record company, SAR Records, to develop and record young black singers Cooke thought were mistreated by the established record companies. His last and what many critics consider his greatest song, "A Change Is Gonna Come," recorded a few months before his death, would become an anthem of the Civil Rights movement. Recalling Cooke's gospel roots, it spoke of personal transformation and spiritual longing, and it echoed the call of civil rights leaders for a new society. Accompanied by a mournful French horn, ominous kettledrums, and weeping strings, Cooke's vocal is both elegiac and hopeful, pure but fervent, serene yet stirring.

Musical Legacy

Often described as the inventor of soul music, Cooke drew upon his gospel roots, his affinity for relaxed balladry, and phrasing influenced by Louis Armstrong and Billie Holiday to produce a distinctively lyrical yet intense sound that is the epitome of urbane soul. As Cooke once said, whenever he sang he was trying "to grab hold of someone's heart." His beautiful tenor voice, perfect melisma (singing several notes during a single vocal syllable), floating high notes, charming yodeling phrases, soothing timbre, and precise delivery directly influenced such soul singers as Otis Redding, Smokey Robinson, Al Green, Marvin Gaye, and the Temptations' David Ruffin and Eddie Kendricks, and can be detected in much of soul, Motown, and popular music.

Howard Bromberg

Further Reading

Greene, Erik. Our Uncle Sam: The Sam Cooke Story from His Family's Perspective. Victoria, B.C.: Trafford, 2006. By his great-nephew, this questions the accounts of Cooke's death, cynically suggesting he was murdered for financial gain by business syndicates.

Guralnick, Peter. Dream Boogie: The Triumph of Sam Cooke. New York: Little, Brown, 2005. Comprehensive life of Cooke and everyone who came into his circle.

McEwen, Joe. Sam Cooke: The Man Who Invented Soul. New York: Sire Books, 1977. First full-length biography.

Wolff, Daniel. You Send Me: The Life and Times of Sam Cooke. New York: William Morrow, 1995. Lengthy biography with an insider perspective on the recording industry.

See also: Armstrong, Louis; Blackwell, Otis; Brown, Roy; Burke, Solomon; Dylan, Bob; Gaye, Marvin; Green, Al; Hendrix, Jimi; Holiday, Billie; Jagger, Sir Mick; Nelson, Ricky; Neville, Aaron; Pickett, Wilson; Redding, Otis; Robinson, Smokey; Ross, Diana; Rush, Otis.

Aaron Copland

American classical composer

Departing from European styles, Copland helped define the musical identity of America, drawing on American ethnic and folk music and themes and on his assiduous study of the visual arts.

Born: November 14, 1900; Brooklyn, New York
Died: December 2, 1990; North Tarrytown, New York
Also known as: Aaron Kaplan (birth name)

Principal works

BALLETS (music): Grohg, composed 1925, first performed 1992; Hear Ye! Hear Ye!, 1934; Billy the Kid, 1938; Rodeo, 1942; Appalachian Spring, 1944; Dance Panels, 1963.

CHAMBER WORKS: Vitebsk, 1928 (for piano, violin, and cello); Nonet, 1961 (for three violins, three violas, and three cellos); Duo for Flute and Piano, 1971.

CHORAL WORKS: Four Motets, 1924; In the Beginning, 1947 (for mixed voices); Canticle of Freedom, 1955 (text by John Barbour).

FILM SCORES: The City, 1939; Of Mice and Men, 1939; Our Town, 1940; The North Star, 1943; The Cummington Story, 1945; The Red Pony, 1948; The Heiress, 1949; Something Wild, 1961.

OPERAS (music): The Second Hurricane, Op. 2, 1937 (libretto by Edwin Denby); The Tender Land, 1954 (libretto by Horace Everett).

ORCHESTRAL WORKS: Music for the Theatre, 1925; Symphony for Organ and Orchestra, 1925; Piano Concerto, 1927; Symphony No. 1, 1928; Dance Symphony, 1931; Symphonic Ode, 1932;

Short Symphony, 1934 (Symphony No. 2); Statements: Militant, Cryptic, Dogmatic, Subjective, Jingo, Prophetic, 1935; El Salón México, 1937; Music for Radio: Saga of the Prairie, 1937; An Outdoor Overture, 1938; The Five Kings, 1939 (incidental music for Orson Welles's play); The Quiet City, 1939 (incidental music for Irwin Shaw's play); Lincoln Portrait, 1942 (for speaker and orchestra); Fanfare for the Common Man, 1943; Music for Movies, 1943; Sonata for Violin and Piano, 1943; Letter from Home, 1944; Symphony No. 3, 1946; Clarinet Concerto, 1950 (for clarinet, strings, harpsichord, and piano); Variations on a Shaker Melody, 1956; Orchestral Variations, 1958; Connotations, 1962; Down a Country Lane, 1964; Emblems, 1964 (for wind band); Music for a Great City, 1964; Inscape, 1967; Three Latin American Sketches, 1972.

PIANO WORKS: Scherzo Humoristique: The Cat and the Mouse, 1921; Passacaglia, 1923; Piano Variations, 1931; Dance of the Adolescent, 1933 (for two pianos); Piano Sonata, 1941; Danzón cubano, 1942 (for two pianos); Piano Quartet, 1950; Piano Fantasy, 1957; Night Thoughts, 1972.

VOCAL WORKS: Old American Songs, 1950; Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson, 1950 (for voice and piano); Old American Songs, Set II, 1952.

WRITINGS OF INTEREST: What to Listen for in Music, 1939; Our New Music, 1941; Music and Imagination, 1952; Copland on Music, 1960; The New Music, 1900-1960, 1968; Copland: 1900 Through 1942, 1984 (with Vivian Perlis); Copland: Since 1943, 1989 (with Perlis).

The Life

Aaron Copland (EH-ruhn KOHP-luhnd) was born in Brooklyn of Russian-Jewish immigrant parents who owned and managed a prosperous Brooklyn department store. He grew up in a musically inclined family, and as a teenager he discovered Maurice Ravel and Claude Debussy. He began his musical education with teachers who included Leopold Wolfsohn and Rubin Goldmark (who had taught George Gershwin). Later, Copland studied under Nadia Boulanger, the French music teacher who had taught Astor Piazzolla and Leonard Bernstein.

As a young man, Copland became involved with cultural and political radicals, absorbing the ideas of those who challenged the status quo in the arts and who sought artistic freedom. Novelist and critic Waldo Frank and composer Paul Rosenfeld introduced him to the philosophy of American modernism, bringing him into a circle of like-minded people that included expressionist pianist Leo Ornstein, visual artist William Zorach, and writer James Oppenheim, founder of The Seven Arts, a magazine that promoted the modernization of art. Paradoxically, after this long period in search of modernism, Copland was drawn to America's primitive art, and he attempted to redefine the identity of American music.

Copland spent three years studying in Paris under Boulanger, who introduced him into a circle of modernist Parisian artists. After Copland's arrival in Paris in 1921, he developed a friendship with Surrealist painter Marcel Duchamp, and he was exposed to the futurist work of filmmaker Jean Cocteau and composer Francis Poulenc, among others. Copland was impressed by the modernity of avant-garde music, which was reaching audiences in unprecedented ways, both shocking them and enthralling them. Again, paradoxically, Copland's experiences in Paris brought him to the realization that his development as a composer should be tightly connected to his native background rather than to that of Europe.

In June, 1924, he returned to New York to search for his own voice. When he found that voice, Copland became a prominent composer. During this period, along with finding a musical idiom that was innate to America, Copland was developing socialist inclinations, demonstrated by his subscriptions to the liberal journals The New Republic and The Nation, his avid reading of Vladimir Lenin's and Karl Marx's doctrines, and his active promotion and advocacy of socialist literature among his friends, who at that time included film director Elia Kazan, playwright Clifford Odets, and others who wrote for The New Masses, a Marxist publication. With the rise of the fascist Nazi Party in Germany, Copland became sympathetic with the anti-fascist communist cause, identifying with the masses and the proletariat. During this period, his political involvement was directly related to his musical philosophy—music for the common man, for his country, for freedom. His later years were largely free of political activity, bringing a peaceful period that allowed him to teach, to lecture, to write books and articles on music-related subjects, and to conduct his work and that of others. Copland died of Alzheimer's disease in 1990.

The Music

Stimulated by his exposure to the music of his contemporaries, especially Igor Stravinsky, and to the work of visual artists, Copland became prolific in his creative output of a distinctly American musical idiom and in his intellectualization of music. In his writings, Copland used the term "musical cubism" to describe the work of composer Charles Ives; he commented on "musical perspective," drawing from visual-arts terminology; he referred to his work as "using jazz cubistically"; and he coined the phrase "imposed simplicity," describing a style that would reach the masses.

Native Sounds. Copland's affiliation with the Jazz Composers Collective after his return to New York fostered his growing interest in jazz and in folk music. Adding this to his extensive research on ethnic music led to his composition of Music for the Theatre in 1925. His search for the native sounds that would enrich his compositional style took him to Mexico, a trip arranged by Mexican composer Carlos Chávez (whose work reflected Indian chants), where he was influenced by the culture and indigenous folk songs. Copland composed a one-movement symphonic piece, El Salón México, that was based on four Mexican folk songs and that depicted a scene in a dance hall.

Aaron Copland. (Library of Congress)

A two-month stay in Santa Fe, New Mexico, revived in him an interest in his ethnicity. Inspired by the Jewish themes the Polish playwright S. Ansky used in his play The Dybbuk (1920), Copland composed the chamber piece Vitebsk, which portrayed the Russian village that was Ansky's home. By the time his residence in Santa Fe came to an end, his compositional style had solidified in an eclectic amalgam of American rhythms and Jewish melodies that would become the landmark of his musical style.

At a time when art for art's sake was the cultural norm, Copland took an opposing stand. He believed that music should reflect the social and political struggle of the people. While his musical philosophy had been once considered progressive, it soon began to be suspected of being seditious and subversive. Among other accusations, he was said to have signed a letter to President Franklin Delano Roosevelt defending the Communist Party. As a result, in April of 1953, Copland's name was added to the State Department's blacklist, which resulted in his music being banned from American libraries.

Fanfare for the Common Man. This is probably Copland's most recognized work. Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, commissioned several composers to create fanfares that would make, as he said, "stirring and significant contributions to the war effort." They were to be played before concerts. Of the eighteen works that were contributed, Copland's is most enduring. With a title reflecting the composer's social and political ideals, Fanfare for the Common Man was written for four French horns, three trumpets, three trombones, tuba, timpani, bass drum, and tam-tam or gong. The bright brasses lift the soaring melodies to a dramatic, crowd-pleasing, and moving conclusion. Copland said about the work that he "used bichordal harmonies that added 'bite' to the brass and some irregular rhythms." With its long-lasting appeal, the piece has been played by such rock groups as the Rolling Stones, Styx, and Emerson, Lake, and Palmer. It is often heard as a theme song for television shows, in the United States and other countries, including Australia, Scotland, Mexico, and Canada.

Billy the Kid and Rodeo. Billy the Kid was commissioned by Lincoln Kirstein, director of Ballet Caravan, for a ballet to be choreographed by Eugene Loring based on the legend of the cold-blooded killer William Bonney. Copland, who had been exposed to cowboy songs as a child, incorporated some of them in the work. The quotations from "Whoopee Ti Yi Yo (Git Along Little Dogies)" and "The Dying Cowboy" contributed greatly to the work's critical success. Another ballet written by Copland was Rodeo. With its rich orchestration evoking the music of the West, Rodeo set the stage for the depiction of a barn dance, complete with fiddlers.

Appalachian Spring. Perhaps Copland's most famous music for ballet, Appalachian Spring was composed during World War II for choreographer Martha Graham, who shared with Copland an interest in Puritanism. Copland's score shows his manipulation of the basic folk music of the Shakers, a religious sect well established in the United States by the 1840's. The Shakers were noted for their culture of simplicity and their work ethic, elements perfectly suited to Copland's style and reflected in American values in the period from the Great Depression of the 1930's through World War II. Copland repeats several folk-based themes throughout the work, intermingling and layering them to evoke a pastoral, mid-twentieth century America. Horns and violins paint the broad expanse of the American landscape, flutes and piccolos mimic birdsong, and, perhaps most famously, the Shaker hymn "Simple Gifts ('Tis a Gift to Be Simple)" creates the score's emotional climax.

Lincoln Portrait. This thirteen-minute work for narrator and full orchestra was commissioned by the conductor André Kostelanetz after the bombing of Pearl Harbor by the Japanese in 1941. It was a patriotic piece, a portrait of Abraham Lincoln, as Copland described it, an addition to the many representations of the sixteenth president in various art forms: Daniel Chester French's sculpture Seated Lincoln, in the Lincoln Monument in Washington, D.C.; Marsden Hartley's several portraits of Lincoln, including Young Worshipper of the Truth and Weary of the Truth; and Walt Whitman's Elegy to Lincoln (1865).

Symphonies. Copland composed in large scale for orchestras, and he became a sought-after conductor of his music. Symphony for Organ and Orchestra, which was dedicated to Boulanger, was an early three-movement work, and later it was rewritten, omitting the organ, to become Symphony No. 1. Symphony No. 2, only fifteen minutes long, is also known as the Short Symphony, and it is arranged for piano, clarinet, and string quartet. Symphony No. 3, which follows the standard symphonic format in four movements, was said to reflect the progressive politics of the era, with an allusion to the speeches of Henry Wallace, the politician made famous for his oration on the common man. In fact, the third movement incorporates references to Fanfare for the Common Man. Copland's Dance Symphony was part of his unproduced ballet Grohg.

Film Scores. In his search for a larger audience and for financial benefits Copland saw in the film industry a fruitful opportunity. His score for Of Mice and Men, which was based on John Steinbeck's novel, received two Academy Award nominations, for Best Score and Best Original Score. He subsequently composed scores for films based on famous American plays and novels, such as Thornton Wilder's Our Town (1938) and The Heiress (1947), inspired by Henry James's novel Washington Square (1880). He also composed the music for two documentaries, The City and the Office of War Information's documentary The Cummington Story.

Musical Legacy

Throughout his life, Copland was concerned with the role of the artist in society. All his creative efforts focused on his country's artistic needs in times of peace and of war, in what has been called his "aestheticization of politics" and his "politization of aesthetics." He believed art should mean something to the everyday citizen. During the passage from World War I to the Great Depression and World War II, he remained committed to making music aesthetically accessible and socially relevant, and he wrote in the simplest possible terms to appeal to all people. His innovative attempts to merge the traditional with the classic and to establish a connection between the composer and the audience earned him praise as well as scorn.

Copland advanced music by incorporating percussive orchestration, changing meter, polyrhythms, and polychords, and he thereby influenced the compositional style of many musicians, including his protégé Bernstein, who became a superb conductor of Copland's works. Copland was awarded the Pulitzer Prize in composition for Appalachian Spring, and he earned an Academy Award for his score for The Heiress. Copland House, a foundation that is located in the composer's restored house in the Hudson River Valley of New York, supports composers by inviting six to eight artists to live there for three weeks to two months, to work in privacy and to focus on the creative compositional process.

Sylvia P. Baeza

Further Reading

Copland, Aaron, and Vivian Perlis. Copland: 1900 Through 1942. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1984. This autobiography covers the early life and career of Copland, beginning with his childhood in Brooklyn and continuing through his years in Paris and his first compositions.

_____. Copland: Since 1943. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1989. In this second volume of his autobiography, Copland chronicles the U.S. political scene as it affected his creativity and helped him shape his patriotic pieces and his career as conductor and author. Includes interviews, letters, and previously unpublished scores.

Crist, Elizabeth B. Music for the Common Man: Aaron Copland During the Depression and War. New York: Oxford University Press, 2005. Describes communism and the cultural front from the 1930's to the 1950's, covering the intellectual impact of Copland's music rather than its structure or aesthetics. Includes coverage of his collaborative projects for stage and screen, which gave way to creative alliances and artistic community, thereby relating the personal and political to the aesthetic.

Crist, Elizabeth B., and Wayne Shirley. The Selected Correspondence of Aaron Copland. London: Yale University Press, 2006. Perhaps the best text to get a view of the composer's personal side, this presents Copland's conception of modern music and his musical triumphs as seen from the man's point of view rather than from the composer's. Copland's correspondence touches on his musical development and the cultural circumstances that informed his compositions during times of both peace and war.

Levin, Gail, and Judith Tick. Aaron Copland's America: A Cultural Perspective. New York: Watson-Guptill, 2000. With twenty-four chapters covering every aspect of Copland's rise to the stature of leading American composer, this beautifully illustrated volume documents Copland's travels, friendships, connections, reactionary philosophy, and legacy.

Pollack, Howard. Aaron Copland: The Life of an Uncommon Man. New York: Henry Holt, 1999. A detailed portrait of the composer with emphasis on each of his major works, based on documentation from the Copland Collection at the Library of Congress. Drawing from interviews with Copland's colleagues, friends, and lovers, Pollack endows the portrait of Copland the composer with insight into Copland the man.

See also: Beach, Amy; Bernstein, Leonard; Boulanger, Nadia; Carter, Elliott; Chávez, Carlos; Debussy, Claude; Gershwin, George; Gershwin, Ira; Golijov, Osvaldo; Ives, Charles; Koussevitzky, Serge; Lucier, Alvin; Previn, Sir André; Rampal, Jean-Pierre; Rota, Nino; Sandburg, Carl; Seeger, Charles; Seeger, Ruth Crawford; Serkin, Rudolf; Takemitsu, Tłru; Thomas, Michael Tilson; Thomson, Virgil.

Chick Corea

American jazz pianist and composer

A keyboardist of prodigious technique, Corea was at the forefront of several musical movements, including modal jazz, Latin jazz, avant-garde, and fusion. His compositional style melds large-scale, formal structures and classical developmental processes with the harmonic and rhythmic vocabulary of jazz.

Born: June 12, 1941; Chelsea, Massachusetts
Also known as: Armando Anthony "Chick" Corea (full name)

Member of: Return to Forever; the Elektric Band; the Akoustic Band; Origin; Circle; the New Trio; Touchstone

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Inner Space, 1966; Tones for Joan's Bones, 1966; Jazz for a Sunday Afternoon, 1967; La Fiesta, 1967; Now He Sings, Now He Sobs, 1968; Is, 1969; Sundance, 1969; Song of Singing, 1970; A. R. C, 1971; Piano Improvisations, Vol. 1, 1971; Piano Improvisations, Vol. 2, 1971; Crystal Silence, 1972 (with Gary Burton); Return to Forever, 1972; The Leprechaun, 1975; My Spanish Heart, 1976; Corea/Hancock, 1978 (with Herbie Hancock); Delphi I: Solo Piano Improvisations, 1978; Friends, 1978; The Mad Hatter, 1978; Secret Agent, 1978; Tap Step, 1978; Chick Corea, Herbie Hancock, Keith Jarrett, McCoy Tyner, 1981; Three Quartets, 1981; Trio Music, 1981 (with Miroslav Vitous and Roy Haynes); Again and Again, 1982; Lyric Suite for Sextet, 1982 (with Gary Burton); Touchstone, 1982; Children's Songs, 1983; Septet, 1984; Voyage, 1984 (with Steve Kajula); Expressions, 1993; Hot Licks: Seabreeze, 1993; Paint the World, 1993 (with Elektric Band II); Time Warp, 1995; Native Sense: The New Duets, 1997 (with Burton); Remembering Bud Powell, 1997 (with others); Akoustic Band, 1999 (with the Akoustic Band); Come Rain or Shine, 1999; Spain for Sextet and Orchestra, 1999; Waltz for Bill Evans, 2000; Past, Present, and Futures, 2001 (with the New Trio); Rendezvous in New York, 2003; Fiesta Gillespie and Milhaud Jazz, 2005; The Ultimate Adventure, 2006; Chillin' in Chelan, 2007; The Enchantment, 2007 (with Bela Fleck); From Miles, 2007; Duet, 2008 (with Hiromi Uehara).

ALBUMS (with the Elektric Band): The Elektric Band, 1986; Light Years, 1987; Eye of the Beholder, 1988; Inside Out, 1990; Beneath the Mask, 1991; To the Stars, 2004.

ALBUMS (with Return to Forever): Light as a Feather, 1972; Hymn of the Seventh Galaxy, 1973; Where Have I Known You Before, 1974; No Mystery, 1975; Romantic Warrior, 1976; Musicmagic, 1977.

The Life

Armando Anthony "Chick" Corea (koh-REE-ah) was born into a musical family in Chelsea, Massachusetts, on June 12, 1941. His father Armando, a composer and arranger who played trumpet and bass, performed in the Boston area during the 1930's and 1940's. Corea began playing piano at age four and drums at age eight. While still in high school, he played piano in his father's band.

Living in New York City after graduating from high school, he briefly attended Columbia University and then the Juilliard School, but he left school to play professionally. In the 1960's his reputation as a gifted pianist grew, and he worked as a sideman with a number of established musicians. In the late 1960's, primarily through his first recordings as a leader, he gained a reputation as a creative and innovative composer.

In 1968 he replaced Herbie Hancock in Miles Davis's band, and he worked with Davis for two years, performing on the recordings and concerts that defined the emerging style of jazz-rock fusion. His work with electronic instruments, for which he would later become legendary, began at this time. His tenure in Davis's band gave him the stature and recognition he needed to strike out on his own as a bandleader. Corea's strong personal association with Scientology also began at this time.

After working with an avant-garde trio in the early 1970's, he formed the highly influential jazz fusion ensemble Return to Forever. Throughout the 1970's, he recorded and toured with various groups of musicians under this name. While jazz fusion was controversial among musicians, Return to Forever was extremely popular with fans and critics, winning a Grammy Award in 1976.

After disbanding Return to Forever in 1978, Corea recorded and performed in a wide variety of settings and styles, with a number of diverse musicians, including Hancock, Michael Brecker, Eddie Gomez, Steve Gadd, Joe Henderson, Gary Burton, and Freddie Hubbard. In the mid-1980's he revisited jazz fusion, forming the Elektric Band, in which he played a vast array of electronic keyboards. Later in the decade, in an attempt to maintain a musical balance and to find a vehicle for his acoustic piano playing, he formed the Akoustic Band.

In the 1990's and later, Corea was active as a performer and composer, releasing numerous critically acclaimed recordings. He has received fourteen Grammy Awards, and The Ultimate Adventure, inspired by L. Ron Hubbard, the founder of Scien-tology, won Grammy Awards for Best Jazz Instrumental Album and Best Instrumental Arrangement.

The Music

Corea strongly influenced jazz piano and composition. While he was heavily in demand as a sideman when he first began performing professionally, most of his career has been marked by long-term associations with such players as Burton, Gadd, Haynes, and Brecker and with a series of ensembles that have been important vehicles for his compositions and playing. His bands Return to Forever, the Akoustic Band, the Elektric Band, and Origin have performed and recorded widely over the last four decades. Corea's work has been characterized by the freshness and innovation of his writing and the flair and technical prowess of his keyboard playing.

Sideman. In the early 1960's, Corea worked in the Latin jazz idiom as a sideman with percussionists and bandleaders Mongo Santamaria and Willie Bobo. From 1964 to 1966 he played with trumpeter Blue Mitchell. During this time he worked with flutist Herbie Mann and saxophonist Stan Getz. As Corea's reputation began to grow, he performed and recorded with a growing roster of first-rate musicians, such as Cal Tjader, Donald Byrd, Dizzy Gillespie, and Sarah Vaughn.

Corea's most important gig as a sideman came in 1968 when he replaced Hancock in Davis's band. Corea recorded a number of important albums with Davis, including Filles de Kilimanjaro, In a Silent Way, Bitches Brew, and Live-Evil. Corea left the band in late 1970, ending his career as a sideman. After his stint with Davis, he was either the leader or coleader of all of his performing and recording projects.

Now He Sings, Now He Sobs. Through his work as a sideman, Corea came to the attention of the major jazz record labels. His first opportunity to act as a leader in the studio came in 1966, when he recorded Tones for Joan's Bones for Atlantic Records. With this recording he began a long association with saxophonist and flutist Joe Farrell.

In 1968 Corea recorded Now He Sings, Now He Sobs with Haynes and Miroslav Vitous. Considered one of the greatest trio recordings in jazz history, this album has been enormously influential on the development of the contemporary jazz piano and the piano trio. Corea's linear and harmonic approach represents a distillation and codification of the groundbreaking modal explorations of McCoy Tyner in his work with John Coltrane. The fluidity and inventiveness of his right-hand lines set the standard for jazz piano improvisation in the second half of the twentieth century. His compositions for the recording are wonderfully effective vehicles for the trio's rhythmic interplay.

Return to Forever. His work with Davis and others and the critical acclaim accorded his first two solo recordings established Corea as an important figure in jazz. After leaving Davis's band, he formed a quartet with bassist Dave Holland, called Circle, recording several albums of experimental, avant-garde music for the ECM label. He also recorded a number of improvisations for solo piano, released by ECM Records in a two-volume set in 1971.

In 1971 Corea formed the first incarnation of Return to Forever, featuring the Brazilian husband-and-wife team of Airto Moreira on percussion and Flora Purim on vocals, Stanley Clark on bass, and Farrell on flute and saxophone. This group recorded a number of Corea's compositions that have since become standards, including "Spain," arguably Corea's most well-known piece.

The second edition of Return to Forever, formed in 1973, displayed a heavier rock influence, when Farrell's woodwinds were replaced by Bill Connors's electric guitar and Moreira's light Latin jazz drumming was replaced by Lenny White's funk-rock drumming. Corea added synthesizers to his Fender Rhodes. The group focused on extended compositions, highly complex and difficult individual parts requiring extreme instrumental virtuosity and a broad stylistic palette. Al Di Meola later replaced Connors. Though the group's recordings—like the entire genre of jazz fusion—were highly controversial, 1975's No Mystery received a Grammy Award for Best Jazz Instrumental Performance.

The final incarnation of the band included a horn section, Corea's wife Gayle Moran on keyboards and vocals, and the return of Farrell. In 1977, feeling that the band had run its course, Corea disbanded Return to Forever.

Musical Partnerships. Corea formed a number of partnerships throughout his career, to which he would return at various points. Perhaps the most important is with vibist Burton. Their association began with the ECM recording Crystal Silence in 1972. The duo has won three Grammy Awards. Other important collaborators include Gadd, Brecker, and Gomez, with whom Corea recorded Three Quartets and Friends, another Grammy Award-winning record.

Drawing from his wide circle of musical friends, Corea released a number of unique recordings, including The Leprechaun, The Mad Hatter, My Spanish Heart, and others.

The Akoustic Band and the Elektric Band. In the mid-1980's, Corea drew on the next generation of virtuoso players to form two bands, one a return to jazz fusion and the other an acoustic jazz trio. Drummer Dave Weckl and bassist John Patituci played in both ensembles. For the Elektric Band, Corea added guitarist Frank Gambale and saxophonist Eric Marienthal. This group focused on complex compositions, technical virtuosity, and wide stylistic variety. Both bands recorded and toured until 1993, when Corea moved on to other projects.

Origin and the New Trio. In 1997 Corea formed an acoustic sextet, Origin, which recorded several albums, including a critically acclaimed six-compact-disc release of the group's performances at the Blue Note in New York City. In 2001 he began recording and performing with the New Trio, an acoustic trio with drummer Jeff Ballard and bassist Avishai Cohen. Corea also released a number of diverse recordings, including an extended work for orchestra, several albums of solo piano recordings, another duet recording with Burton, and the Grammy Award-winning The Ultimate Adventure. Later Corea formed a band with drummer Tom Brechtlein, percussionist Rubem Dantas, saxophonist-flutist Jorge Pardo, and bassist Carles Benavent, called Touchstone.

Musical Legacy

Corea's work is inspiring for its sheer volume and diversity. During his decades-long career, his creativity and output never flagged. As a player, his crisp, fluid lines have been imitated widely by generations of pianists. His codification of the modal language first explored by Tyner has become an important component of the vocabulary of contemporary jazz. His work with electronic keyboards has defined the textural palette of fusion.

His influence as a composer—combining materials and processes from classical music (in particular, extended formal structures) with the methods and vocabulary of jazz—is significant. In both his writing and his playing, he was an important pioneer in fusing the rhythms, textures, and harmonies of Spanish and Latin American music with jazz.

While his writing and his playing exhibit a spirit of playful spontaneity and innovation, the seriousness of his commitment to music has never been questioned, even by those who doubt the validity of the jazz fusion genre.

Matthew Nicholl

Further Reading

Case, Brian, and Stan Britt. The Harmony Illustrated Encyclopedia of Jazz. 3d ed. New York: Harmony Books, 1986. An extensive well-written entry about Corea, with profiles of many of his collaborators. Includes a detailed discography.

Corea, Chick. A Work in Progress, Volume 1. La Crescenta, Calif.: Chick Corea Productions, 2002. A short but illuminating series of essays about music, playing the piano, and life in general.

Doerschuk, Robert. 88: The Giants of Jazz Piano. San Francisco: Backbeat Books, 2001. Outlining the history of jazz piano through profiles of important pianists, this book provides details about Corea's style and puts his work in perspective.

Lyons, Len. The Great Jazz Pianists: Speaking of Their Lives and Music. New York: Morrow, 1983. After a brief introduction to the history of jazz piano, Lyons presents interviews with a number of important and influential pianists, including Corea.

Nicholson, Stuart. Jazz-Rock: A History. New York: Schirmer Books, 1998. A look back at jazz-rock fusion, this book provides historical background and cultural context. Corea's work with Return to Forever and the Elektric Band are chronicled and critiqued. Includes an extensive discography and separate indexes of musicians, group names, and recordings.

Tirro, Frank. Jazz: A History. 2d ed. New York: W. W. Norton, 1993. Although this excellent general history of jazz provides only a small amount of information about Corea, the book places the various styles in which he worked—modal jazz, Latin jazz, avant-garde, and fusion—in historical context.

See also: Burton, Gary; Davis, Miles; Evans, Bill; Getz, Stan; Gillespie, Dizzy; Hancock, Herbie; Jarrett, Keith; McFerrin, Bobby; Monk, Thelonious.

Elvis Costello

English rock singer, guitarist, and songwriter

Leader of the British Third Wave of the late 1970's, Costello infused pop punk with a multitude of influences, from soul to big band to reggae.

Born: August 25, 1954; Liverpool, England
Also known as: Declan Patrick McManus (birth name)
Member of: Elvis Costello and the Attractions; Elvis Costello and the Imposters

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): My Aim Is True, 1977; Spike, 1989; Mighty Like a Rose, 1991; The Juliet Letters, 1993 (with the Brodsky Quartet); Brutal Youth, 1994; G. B. H., 1994 (with Richard Harvey); Kojak Variety, 1995; Costello and Nieve, 1996 (with Steve Nieve); Jake's Progress (Original Music from the Channel Four Series), 1996 (with Harvey); Terror and Magnificence, 1997 (with John Harle); Painted from Memory, 1998 (with Burt Bacharach); The Sweetest Punch: The Songs of Costello and Bacharach, 1999 (with Burt Bacharach and Bill Frisell); For the Stars, 2001 (with Anne Sofie von Otter); North, 2003; Il Songo, 2004 (with the London Symphony Orchestra); Piano Jazz, 2005 (with Marian McPartland); The River in Reverse, 2006 (with Allen Toussaint).

ALBUMS (with the Attractions): This Year's Model, 1978; Armed Forces, 1979; Get Happy!!, 1980; Almost Blue, 1981; Trust, 1981; Imperial Bedroom, 1982; Punch the Clock, 1983; Goodbye Cruel World, 1984; Blood and Chocolate, 1986; King of America, 1986; All This Useless Beauty, 1996.

ALBUMS (with the Imposters): Cruel Smile, 2002; When I Was Cruel, 2002; The Delivery Man, 2004; Momofuku, 2008.

SINGLES (solo): "Radio Radio," 1979; "Veronica," 1989; "Thirteen Steps Lead Down," 1994.

The Life

Elvis Costello (kahs-TEHL-loh) was born Declan Patrick MacManus on August 25, 1954, to musician-bandleader Ronald MacManus and record-store manager Lillian MacManus. The family moved to many different locations in and around West London during the first years of Declan's life. When his parents separated in 1962, Declan and his mother relocated to Liverpool. With the early musical training provided by his father and the relocation to Liverpool, Declan explored many genres of music.

By the early 1970's, Declan was writing and singing. Soon he and musician-producer Nick Lowe started a band called Flip City. While the band was not commercially successful, it provided Declan with valuable performance experience and the ability to formulate his own musical voice based on his many songwriting influences (Rick Danko of the Band, Bob Dylan, Van Morrison, and Randy Newman). After Flip City dissolved, Declan needed work in order to support his wife Mary Burgoyne, whom he had married in 1974, and their child, Matthew. Declan recorded acoustic demos in his bedroom and presented them to record labels. He turned down an offer from Island Records and, on the recommendation of Lowe, accepted one from Stiff Records. It was around this time that Declan adopted the last name of his paternal great-grandmother, Costello, and at first used an abbreviation of his first and middle names, forming D. P. Costello. D. P. soon transformed into Elvis, and with his new name, wide-rimmed glasses, and record contract in hand, Elvis Costello launched his musical career.

After forming the Attractions for his second record, This Year's Model, the band quickly received attention for its aggressive, cynical attitudes and controversial live shows that often featured Costello berating the audience or performing for only twenty-five minutes before leaving the stage. Raw and unpredictable, the Attractions had a certain appeal that was complemented by Costello's mature songwriting and the band members' fine musicianship. The aggressive nature of Costello and the band dissipated, however, on March 15, 1979, when an intoxicated Costello joked about singers James Brown and Ray Charles in a bar with fellow musician Stephen Stills. Stills's backup singer relayed the comments to the press, and soon Costello was apologizing on national television and declaring he was not a racist. This unfortunate incident stalled Costello's career and cooled the punk fervor for the Attractions.

In 1984 Burgoyne filed for divorce, after a long struggle to keep afloat a marriage that had gone through rough times, including Costello's affair with model Bebe Buell. In 1986 Costello married Caitlin O'Riordan of the Pogues, and they divorced in 2002. In 2003 Costello married jazz pianist and vocalist Diana Krall.

The Music

My Aim Is True. Costello's debut, My Aim Is True, was recorded at Pathway Studios in Islington, England, in late 1976 and early 1977. The core backing band was Clover, which, with the addition of Huey Lewis, would later become Huey Lewis and the News. The Lowe-produced record is filled with a wide array of energetic tunes: the Motown-girl-group-inspired "No Dancing"; the popular ballad "Alison"; the humorously crude, punk-inspired "Mystery Dance"; the pop "(The Angels Wanna Wear My) Red Shoes"; the politically charged "Less than Zero"; and the reggae-infused "Watching the Detectives." The album was universally well received, and it introduced to the world stage a skilled songwriter with a penchant for controversy.

This Year's Model. This Year's Model was Costello's first with the Attractions, with Steve Nieve on keyboards, Bruce Thomas on bass and backing vocals, and Pete Thomas on drums. Here the Attractions managed to create a sound all their own, with a blend of punk, rock, and soul. The interesting interplay between Bruce Thomas, a rhythmically minded bass player, and Pete Thomas, a melodically driven, composition-conscious drummer, is complemented by the driving Farfisa organ of Nieve. "No Action," the first track, displays the band's raw energy and cohesiveness. The funky, soul-inspired songs "This Year's Girl," "The Beat," "(I Don't Want to Go to) Chelsea," and "Living in Paradise" contrast with the energetic arena rockers "Lipstick Vogue," "Radio Radio," and "Pump It Up."

Armed Forces. Armed Forces is more musically sophisticated than its predecessors, incorporating a wider variety of keyboards and other electronics, presaging the band's 1980's new wave direction and leaving behind the furious punk elements. Some of the more experimental new wave-influenced tunes ("Goon Squad," "Green Shirt," "Moods for Moderns") along with the new wave pop classics ("Accidents Will Happen," "Oliver's Army," "Party Girl," "(What's So Funny 'Bout) Peace, Love, and Understanding?") resulted in a successful union of musical sophistication and pop success within the new wave format.

Get Happy!! Get Happy!!, Trust, Almost Blue, and Imperial Bedroom developed the interplay between the Attractions and Costello's songwriting style. Get Happy!! was heavily soul-inspired, with James Jamerson-inspired bass lines (featured prominently in the album's mix) and layered soul harmonies. Representative songs include "Love for Tender," "High Fidelity," and "I Can't Stand Up for Falling Down," a Sam and Dave B-side written by Homer Banks and Alan Jones.

Trust. Trust retains some soul elements from Get Happy!!, but it largely returns to the new wave-inspired pop punk songwriting with "Clubland," "New Lace Sleeves," and "From a Whisper to a Dream," a collaboration with Glenn Tillbrook and Martin Belmont of Squeeze.

Almost Blue. Almost Blue represents the band's foray into country-influenced music, with "I'm Your Toy" the sole hit from this album, which met with mixed critical reviews.

Imperial Bedroom. Imperial Bedroom, a concept album produced by Geoff Emerick (the first Costello album not produced by Lowe), was deemed Costello's masterpiece and most cohesive album by countless critics and fans. Whether or not the music compares favorably to the initial Attractions' releases, most reviews commented on the elaborate literary lyrical content and overall musical progression from start to finish. "Beyond Belief," "Shabby Doll," "Man out of Time," "Almost Blue," and "Kid About It" are representative of the sound and content of the 1982 tour de force.

Internal Conflicts. Internal tensions, mostly between Costello and bassist Bruce Thomas, led to some of the harshly reviewed records of Costello's career with the Attractions. Punch the Clock featured the hit "Everyday I Write the Book," but the album failed to reach the level of consistency of previous Attractions' records. Goodbye Cruel World, created amid countless studio squabbles, was a weak project, and the Attractions disbanded soon after its release.

King of America. Costello took the hiatus from the Attractions to experiment with different musical styles and musicians. He formed the Confederates, a touring band, which featured many of the musicians who performed on his country-roots rock solo record King of America (Jim Keltner on drums, Jerry Scheff on bass, and James Burton on guitar; Scheff and Burton played frequently with Elvis Presley). The T-Bone Burnett-produced record is a complete departure from the Attractions' sound, featuring far more acoustic instrumentation. "Brilliant Mistake," "Indoor Fireworks," and "I'll Wear It Proudly" are among the representative tracks.

All This Useless Beauty. The Attractions reunited for a record in 1986, Blood and Chocolate; a second reunion in 1996 produced All This Useless Beauty. Both records had fine moments, from "Uncomplicated" and "Battered Old Bird" from Blood and Chocolate to "All This Useless Beauty" and "Complicated Shadows" from All This Useless Beauty. The quality of and critical praise for All This Useless Beauty sparked rumors of a permanent reunion, but it ultimately marked the final album billed as Elvis Costello and the Attractions. Costello reformed the Attractions with Davey Faragher (formerly of Cracker and John Hiatt) on bass, Nieve, and Pete Thomas as Elvis Costello and the Imposters. In 2004 they released the critically acclaimed The Delivery Man, Costello's second concept album, with highlights including "Country Darkness," "Either Side of the Same Town," and "Monkey to Man."

Solo Work. Between the demise of the Attractions and the rise of the Imposters, Costello released albums under his own name. Spike featured collaborations with Paul McCartney and a career-revitalizing hit with "Veronica." Mighty Like a Rose began a two-record collaboration with musician-producer Mitchell Froom. In 1994 the two collaborated on Brutal Youth, regarded by critics as Costello's finest solo work. Although billed as a solo record, it featured Nieve, Pete Thomas, Lowe, and Bruce Thomas. In 1993 Costello collaborated with the Brodsky Quartet for a chamber-music-inspired release, The Juliet Letters. Kojak Variety was a collection of mostly rhythm-and-blues covers, featuring many of the musicians from the King of America sessions and Nieve and Pete Thomas. In 2003 Costello released North, a collection of jazz-adult contemporary songs backed by a small big band, allowing him to return to his roots by way of his father's long-standing career as a big band vocalist.

Musical Legacy

Costello fused punk, rock, and soul music with the lyrical and musical sophistication of a music historian. His knowledge of doo-wop, big band, folk-rock, blues, and classical music (apart from the punk, rock and roll, and soul that were apparent in his own music) provided him with the freedom to experiment stylistically on his records. With the gifted musicians in the Attractions, he created memorable songs in dynamic performances and influenced the punk and rock bands that followed. At the end of the 1970's and in the early 1980's, when disco was on the decline, Costello and the Attractions arrived from England with their innovative lyrics, music, and live performances, reinvigorating the American music scene. Along with Sting and the Police, they embodied the third-wave attitude that inspired many bands to follow in their footsteps.

Elvis Costello and the Attractions were inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 2003. Costello has twice received the Igor Novello Award for Outstanding Songwriting, and he won a Grammy Award in 1998 for "I Still Have That Other Girl," a collaboration with songwriter Burt Bacharach.

Eric Novod

Further Reading

Hinton, Brian. Let Them All Talk: The Music of Elvis Costello. London: Sanctuary, 1999. A biography and discography with emphasis on Costello's musical legacy and its effect on British culture.

Perone, James E. Elvis Costello: A Bio-Bibliography. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1998. A brief biography with a comprehensive discography, a bibliography, a filmography, and a guide to musical scores.

Sheppard, David. Elvis Costello. New York: Thunder's Mouth Press, 2000. A basic biography, with a discography and a section titled "The Legacy," discussing Costello's contribution to post-1980's popular music.

Smith, Larry David. Elvis Costello, Joni Mitchell, and the Torch Song Tradition. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 2004. An academic study of the meaning and progression of elements of confrontation and rebellion in Costello's music and lyrics.

Thomson, Graeme. Complicated Shadows: The Life and Music of Elvis Costello. New York: Canongate, 2004. A comprehensive journalistic biography, with equal emphasis on personal life and musical career.

See also: Axton, Hoyt; Bacharach, Burt; Bennett, Tony; Burke, Solomon; Dylan, Bob; Jamerson, James; McCartney, Sir Paul; Mitchell, Joni; Morrison, Van; Newman, Randy.

James Cotton

American blues singer, harmonica player, and songwriter

Virtuosic blues harmonica player for Muddy Waters, James "Superharp" Cotton contributed to the electrification of Delta blues, paving the way for rhythm and blues and rock and roll.

Born: July 1, 1935; Tunica, Mississippi
Also known as: Superharp
Member of: The James Cotton Blues Band

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (with the James Cotton Blues Band): Cut You Loose!, 1967; The James Cotton Blues Band, 1967; Cotton in Your Ears, 1968; Pure Cotton, 1968; Taking Care of Business, 1970; 100% Cotton, 1974; High Energy, 1975; Live and on the Move, 1976; High Compression, 1984; Two Sides of the Blues, 1984; Live from Chicago: Mr. Superharp Himself, 1986; Live at Antone's, 1988; Take Me Back, 1987; Harp Attack!, 1990; Mighty Long Time, 1991; Living the Blues, 1994; Three Harp Boogie, 1994; Deep in the Blues, 1996; Fire Down Under the Hill, 2000; 35th Anniversary Jam of the James Cotton Blues Band, 2002; Got My Mojo Workin', 2003; One More Mile, 2002; Baby, Don't You Tear My Clothes, 2004.

The Life

Born in the Mississippi Delta in 1935, James Cotton was the youngest of eight children of farmers Mose and Hattie Cotton. Hattie gave her little son a fifteen-cent harmonica, and Cotton listened to Sonny Boy Williamson II (aka Aleck Miller) play blues harmonica (or blues harp) on the historic King Biscuit Time radio show. Cotton's parents had died by the time he was nine years old, so his uncle, Wiley Creen, brought him to Williamson, who informally adopted him. Cotton played harmonica on the steps of the juke joints where Williamson was performing. When Williamson moved to Milwaukee in 1950, Cotton played with Howlin' Wolf and Hubert Sumlin, recording his first songs. In 1952 he began playing on the radio and working as an ice-truck driver. In December, 1954, after hearing Cotton's recording of "Cotton Crop Blues," Muddy Waters invited Cotton to join his band, replacing Junior Wells. Cotton played with Waters for twelve years, working closely with Waters's pianist Otis Spann and acquiring a commanding stage presence.

Cotton, his wife Ceola, and their child lived upstairs in Waters's Chicago house. In 1966 Cotton was shot five times by a deranged fan. After recovering, Cotton left Waters to form his own band. The James Cotton Blues Band was prolific in the recording studio and in touring. In 1991, after Ceola died, Cotton married Jacklyn Hairston, who served as his manager, and they moved to Austin, Texas. In 1994 Cotton had surgery followed by radiation treatments for throat cancer. Despite his illness, he performed regularly.

The Music

Cotton grew up surrounded by blues music, singing in the fields while he worked. As a protégé of Williamson, he played harmonica on the street and in juke joints. In 1952 he had his own show on Arkansas radio station KWEM.

James Cotton. (AP/Wide World Photos)

"Cotton Crop Blues." In 1953 legendary music producer Sam Philips invited Cotton to make his first recordings. Cotton recorded "Straighten Up Baby," "Hold Me in Your Arms," "Oh, Baby," and, in 1954, his classic composition "Cotton Crop Blues." When Waters heard "Cotton Crop Blues," he was moved by Cotton's virtuosic harmonica playing and biting lyrics. Cotton's signature piece, "Cotton Crop Blues" is a classic twelve-bar blues in aab form that came to life with his characteristic wailing harmonica style and boisterous voice.

"Got My Mojo Workin'." Cotton suggested to Waters that he record a version of a song composed by Preston Foster and recorded by Ann Cole, "Got My Mojo Workin'." It became one of the Waters band's best known songs. Perhaps the definitive version was captured on film when Waters played for the first time at the Newport Jazz Festival on July 3, 1960. Cotton plays an exuberant, attacking harp while Waters roars the lyrics. At one point, Waters grabs Cotton to dance a two-step—although a surprised Cotton looks eager to return to his harmonica. When Cotton formed the James Cotton Band in 1966, "Got My Mojo Workin'" became a standard in the band's repertoire.

James Cotton Band. The band recorded Cut You Loose! in 1967. The title song begins with a haunting bass guitar riff, followed by Cotton's plaintive singing to his troublesome woman. The Pure Cotton, Cotton in Your Ears, and The James Cotton Blues Band albums that followed featured Cotton's propulsive, electric blues style with his hard-blowing, explosive harp playing and throaty, rambunctious singing.

"Rocket 88." Cotton's gritty renditions of the early rock-and-roll tune "Rocket 88" associated him with the song. Cotton, a car lover, made the most of the harmonica's limited register, blowing the sounds of a train, a car, and a piston engine.

Taking Care of Business and the 1970's. In the 1970's Cotton, like many blues musicians, began playing with rock performers and for rock audiences. Taking Care of Business was infused with a rock sound. The James Cotton Band became an opening act for Janis Joplin. Cotton also opened or sat in with leading rock bands such as the Grateful Dead, Santana, and Led Zeppelin. In 1977 he joined with Waters, Pinetop Perkins, and blues rocker Johnny Winter on tour, live recordings of which were released in 2007 on Breakin' It Up, Breakin' It Down. Cotton's Buddah label records—100% Cotton, High Energy, Live and on the Move—reflect rhythm-and-blues, soul, and rock influences.

1980's and Later. For the Alligator label, Cotton recorded the funk-oriented High Compression as well as Live from Chicago: Mr. Superharp Himself, culled from three days of performances with an eight-piece band in Chicago's Biddy Mulligan's. Take Me Back on the Blind Pig label reflected a return to his blues roots; Harp Attack! featured Cotton with three other blues harmonica players. He recorded Live at Antone's (1988) at Antone's nightclub in Austin, Texas; the Antone label also released his Mighty Long Time album. Cotton's 1996 trio recording, Deep in the Blues, won a Grammy Award. His sixty-three years of performing blues harmonica earned Cotton the nickname Superharp.

Musical Legacy

Cotton was a vital figure in the postwar Chicago blues wave that electrified and urbanized Delta acoustic blues. Cotton's blaring, rhythmic harmonica riffs fit well with the added volume and amplification of the electric guitar. Cotton and other Chicago bluesmen were progenitors of rhythm and blues and rock and roll.

Following in the footsteps of his mentor Williamson, Cotton helped establish the harmonica as a vital instrument in an electric blues band. His driving harmonica solos energized such songs as "Cotton Crop Blues," "Rocket 88," and "Got My Mojo Workin'." Cotton popularized the innovative techniques of Chicago blues harpists: microphone amplification combined with varieties of cupped-hand holds to produce moaning and wailing sounds, bending and distorting notes, propulsive harmonica rhythms, and cross-harp technique (playing in the second position to accent the low reeds). Cotton's ferocious singing added to the effect. Modern blues harpists Paul Butterfield and Peter Wolf learned directly from Cotton; Boz Scaggs, Bonnie Raitt, Steve Miller, and Mike Bloomfield have all acknowledged Cotton as a key influence. Canadian guitarist Sue Foley decided to become a blues musician at the age of fifteen after attending a Cotton concert.

Howard Bromberg

Further Reading

Gordon, Robert. Can't Be Satisfied: The Life and Times of Muddy Waters. Boston: Little, Brown, 2002. Cotton supplies much of the account of the Waters band in the 1950's and 1960's.

Shadwick, Keith. The Encyclopedia of Jazz and Blues. London: Quantum, 2007. Brief article on Cotton.

Williamson, Nigel. The Rough Guide to the Blues. London: Rough Guides, 2007. In-depth features on blues musicians, including Cotton.

See also: Howlin' Wolf; Joplin, Janis; Raitt, Bonnie; Waters, Muddy; Watson, Doc; Williamson, Sonny Boy, II.

Sir Noël Coward

English musical-theater and film-score composer and lyricist

Coward wrote music and lyrics of inimitable wit for hundreds of songs. He also composed operettas, film scores, and ballets and wrote plays and films. An actor and singer, he performed on the stage, in film, and on television.

Born: December 16, 1899; Teddington, Middlesex, England
Died: March 26, 1973; Port Royal, Jamaica
Also known as: Noël Pierce Coward (full name); Hernia Whittlebot

Principal works

BALLETS (music and scenarios): London Morning, 1958; The Grand Tour, 1971 (orchestrated by Hershey Kay).

FILM SCORES: In Which We Serve, 1942; The Astonished Heart, 1950; The Grass Is Greener, 1960.

MUSICAL THEATER (music, lyrics, and libretto unless otherwise stated): London Calling!, 1923 (music with Philip Braham); André Charlot's Revue, 1924 (music); On with the Dance, 1925 (music with Braham); This Year of Grace, 1928; Bitter Sweet, 1929 (operetta); Cochran's 1931 Revue, 1931; Words and Music, 1932; Conversation Piece, 1934; Operette, 1938; Set to Music, 1939 (revision of Words and Music); Pacific 1860, 1946; Sigh No More, 1946; Ace of Clubs, 1950; After the Ball, 1954 (based on Oscar Wilde's play Lady Windermere's Fan); Sail Away, 1961; The Girl Who Came to Supper, 1963 (libretto by Coward and Harry Kurnitz; based on Terence Rattigan's play The Sleeping Prince); Noël Coward's Sweet Potato, 1968 (revue); Oh Coward! A Musical Comedy Revue, 1970; Cowardy Custard, 1972 (revue); Oh! Coward, 1972 (revue).

WRITINGS OF INTEREST: Collected Sketches and Lyrics, 1931; Present Indicative, 1937 (first autobiography); Future Indefinite, 1954 (second autobiography); Past Conditional, 1986 (third autobiography, unfinished).

The Life

Noël Pierce Coward's parents were Arthur Coward, an unsuccessful piano salesman, and Violet Veitch Coward, who took in lodgers to support the family. She encouraged Coward's single-minded childhood desire to succeed onstage, and he entertained wherever he could find an audience. He took dancing lessons and, though he could not read music well, somehow learned how to play the piano. By 1907 he had appeared in school and community concerts and in 1911 made his first professional appearance. A diagnosis of tuberculosis briefly sidetracked him, but in 1916 he toured as Charley in Brandon Thomas's Charley's Aunt (1892) and in 1917 appeared as an extra in D. W. Griffith's silent film Hearts of the World (1918). In 1918 he entered the military, receiving a medical discharge nine months later.

His first major successes were sketches and songs for André Charlot's 1923 revue London Calling! In 1924 he became famous for his play The Vortex, in which he starred as the drug-addicted son of a promiscuous mother. The play caused the first of many usually successful confrontations with English censorship. The Vortex was still playing in 1925 when two comedies, Fallen Angels and Hay Fever, and a revue, On with the Dance, opened in London. The strain of work brought on his first nervous breakdown. Recovering, he directed and appeared in the New York production of Charles B. Cochran's revue This Year of Grace (1928), contributing book, lyrics, and much music.

His successes continued with Private Lives (1930), which introduced the song "Someday I'll Find You," and he starred with longtime friend Gertrude Lawrence. Cavalcade (1931) was a historical pageant, including the song "Twentieth Century Blues." The American-made Fox film starring British actors Diana Wynyard and Clive Brook won a best picture Oscar in 1934. Design for Living (1933) was scandalous for its time, with two men and a woman in love. That year Coward became president of the Actors' Orphanage, initiating reforms and sending the children to America during World War II. (He resigned in 1956 when he decided to live abroad.) In 1936 he directed and played in Tonight at Eight-Thirty, a sequence of ten plays, any three of which might be staged on a given night. One, Red Peppers, is "An Interlude with Music." Director David Lean created a classic film, Brief Encounter (1945), from another, Still Life.

Coward was frequently the target of newspaper criticism, which increased in the late 1930's. Although he was not indifferent to politics and strongly opposed English attempts to appease Adolf Hitler, his plays were not political. Seeking useful work during World War II, he was not taken seriously, and his efforts were sharply criticized. He countered with an escapist comedy about death, Blithe Spirit (1941), which ran for almost two thousand performances, then a record, and the film In Which We Serve (1942). This account of the sinking of a navy ship and, in flashbacks, the men's lives, brought new confrontations with censorship and objections, probably based on Coward's homosexuality and lower-middle-class origin, to his determination to play a British naval officer. Coward also produced, codirected, and wrote the musical score. He received Oscar nominations for best picture and screenplay, and he accepted a special award for outstanding production achievement. Coward also entertained hospital patients and troops in England and abroad.

During the next ten years, Coward had few successes and suffered much newspaper criticism. From 1951 on, he attracted renewed attention as an entertainer. He appeared in films, most notably in the movie version of Graham Greene's novel Our Man in Havana (1959). In 1964 the National Theatre revived Hay Fever; which Coward directed. He was knighted in 1970, and his seventieth birthday was marked by gala celebrations and a Tony award for achievement in the theater. Vindicated by renewed interest in his work, Coward died at his Jamaica home after years of failing health, leaving—in addition to his musical works and plays—short stories, poems, revue sketches and parodies, published diaries, essays, an autobiography, and a novel, Pomp and Circumstance (1960), which became an American best seller.

The Music

Early Works. Coward's first major song success was "Parisian Pierrot" for London Calling! With that revue, Coward began a twenty-year association with Elsie April, who wrote down his music. Of the many songs that followed, some were simple comedy, for example, "Any Little Fish" and "Something to Do with Spring." His most popular songs, however, tended to be either satiric or love songs. Despite his loyalty to England and its traditions, evidenced in such songs as "London Pride" and "There Have Been Songs in England," he satirized the British middle and upper classes in others: "Mad Dogs and Englishmen," "I Wonder What Happened to Him?," "Even Clergymen Are Naughty Now and Then," "The Stately Homes of England," "Uncle Harry," and "What's Going to Happen to the Children?" (revised for Las Vegas as "What's Going to Happen to the Tots?"). Political extremists were skewered in such songs as "Down with the Whole Damn (Darn) Lot!," "When Women Come into Their Own," and "Britannia Rules the Waves." Two World War II songs, the comic "Could You Please Oblige Us with a Bren Gun" and the biting "Don't Let's Be Beastly to the Germans," brought complaints, and the latter was banned from BBC radio. The love songs are marked by wistfulness and yearning, reflecting the sadness at the heart of Coward's art, the realization that human relations are fragile and individuals are at the mercy of time and history. Among these songs are "I'll See You Again," "If Love Were All," "Zigeuner," "That Is the Time to Go," "I Travel Alone," "Someday I'll Find You," and "The Party's Over Now." He ended his cabaret performances with the last.

Bitter Sweet. In the successful operetta Bitter Sweet (1929), Coward created one of the strongest female parts in early twentieth century musical theater. The story begins in the present, with Sari Linden, now an old woman and marchioness of Shayne, talking with a girl who must, like Sari in the past, decide whether to defy her parents and social class to marry for love or as society dictates. The second act reveals that, as a girl, Sari had run off with her music teacher, lived with him in poverty, and watched him die protecting her. She has transcended tragedy and pain to become a renowned singer. She regrets nothing; her courage and lack of self-pity are qualities that define heroism in other Coward works. The play's first London appearance ran for 697 performances. It was filmed twice, once in England (1933) and once in a Jeanette MacDonald and Nelson Eddy Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer version (1940) that appalled Coward with its garish Technicolor, sentimentality, and softened portrayal of Sari.

Later Operettas. Bitter Sweet was Coward's greatest success. Later works include Conversation Piece (1934) with its hit song "I'll Follow My Secret Heart"; Operette (1938) with its songs "Dearest Love," "The Stately Homes of England," and "Where Are the Songs We Sung?"; Pacific 1860 (1946) with "This Is a Changing World"; and Sail Away (1961). Musical adaptations of Terence Rattigan's play The Sleeping Prince (1953) as The Girl Who Came to Supper (1963) and of Oscar Wilde's Lady Windermere's Fan (1893) as After the Ball (1954) failed.

Performances. While Coward performed as singer and dancer from childhood, only in his final decades was his ability as a performer fully recognized. Recognition began with a series of cabaret performances that won him a new and enthusiastic audience. The first was a concert at the Theatre Royal in Brighton, England, in 1951. From 1951 to 1954 he gave a series of performances at London's Café de Paris and in 1955 was spectacularly successful at the Desert Inn in Las Vegas. He appeared with Mary Martin in 1955 in the first CBS color television special, Together with Music (she had starred in his unsuccessful Pacific 1860). He performed on the Ed Sullivan Show, a popular television variety show, in 1956 and 1957. NBC honored him with a two-hour "Salute to Noël Coward" in 1963. There were many other appearances. In 1967 he starred in an NBC musical version of George Bernard Shaw's Androcles and the Lion (1912); Shaw had been the first major playwright to encourage the young Coward. Coward's seventieth birthday was the occasion for a number of television and other appearances.

Sir Noël Coward. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Musical Legacy

Many Coward plays—for example, Blithe Spirit, Hay Fever, Private Lives, and Design for Living—have proved timeless. In 1964 Hugh Martin and Timothy Gray debuted the successful musical High Spirits from Blithe Spirit, while Caedmon Audio used excerpts from several comedies in its five-disc The Noël Coward Audio Collection (2005). Numerous Coward stories and plays have been televised. Operettas such as Bitter Sweet, however, fell out of favor by the mid-twentieth century, when the stage was dominated by the musicals of Richard Rodgers and Oscar Hammerstein II. Similarly, elaborate variety revues such as those staged by Cochran and Charlot were supplanted by television variety shows.

Coward's individual songs are his greatest legacy. Since the musical plays defy revival, a number of revues have been created by anthologizing popular Coward songs. In 1968 Robert L. Steele produced Noël Coward's Sweet Potato (originally And Now Noël Coward) in New York. Coward biographer Sheridan Morley devised a gala concert, A Talent to Amuse, to honor Coward's seventieth birthday and, in 1982, created a play with music, Noël and Gertie, from his biographies of Coward (A Talent to Amuse, 1969) and Gertrude Lawrence (1981). It was produced in America in 1998 and retitled If Love Were All in 1999. Another revue, Cowardy Custard (1972), ran for almost two years in London. A similar revue was produced in Toronto, Canada (1970), as Oh Coward! A Musical Comedy Revue and retitled Oh! Coward for its New York production; it ran for 294 performances. Coward's records, transferred to compact discs, have remained popular. The numerous collections include Noël Coward in New York (1957), Noël Coward at Las Vegas (1955), and Noël Coward Centenary Celebration (1998). Many artists have recorded Coward's romantic songs; the comic songs tend to thrive best when sung in his own voice.

Betty Richardson

Further Reading

Citron, Stephen. Noël and Cole: The Sophisticates. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993. Biography, detailed musical analysis of Coward's songs, and glossary of musical terms.

Coward, Noël. Collected Plays. 8 vols. London: Methuen, 1999-2000. Contains Bitter Sweet and dramas, including Cavalcade and Private Lives, for which Coward wrote important music. Each volume has detailed chronology and is individually introduced.

Day, Barry. Coward on Film: The Cinema of Noël Coward. Lanham, Md.: Scarecrow Press, 2005. Illustrated study of productions based on Coward's plays, productions in which Coward was involved, and films in which he acted, including musical television appearances and productions of his plays and short stories.

_____, ed. Noël Coward: The Complete Lyrics. Woodstock, N.Y.: Overlook Press, 1998. Comprehensive resource gives lyrics in context with annotations. Includes early songs, lyrics never used, and a list of songs known to exist but now lost.

Hoare, Philip. Noël Coward: A Biography. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1995. Details of Coward's numerous attacks by government, media, corporate, and individual censors.

Lesley, Cole. Remembered Laughter: The Life of Noël Coward. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1977. Affectionate biography by Coward's longtime companion.

Mander, Raymond, and Joe Mitchenson. Theatrical Companion to Coward: A Pictorial Record of the Theatrical Works of Noël Coward. 2d ed., updated by Barry Day and Sheridan Morley. London: Oberon, 2000. Originally published 1957. Essential resource provides cast lists, descriptions of works, excerpts from critics, and sections on film, radio, and television appearances.

Morley, Sheridan. A Talent to Amuse: A Biography of Noël Coward. Boston: Little Brown, 1985. Provides a readable, balanced view. Includes chronology.

Vlasto, Dominic. "The Potency of Cheap Music." In Look Back in Pleasure: Noël Coward Reconsidered, edited by Joel Kaplan and Sheila Stowell. London: Methuen, 2000. Discusses songs and contributions of arrangers, important since Coward did not write down his own music.

See also: Hammerstein, Oscar, II; Rodgers, Richard.

Henry Cowell

American classical composer

An eclectic figure in experimental composition, Cowell was a theorist, a teacher, and an indefatigable champion for new American music. His early works challenged the conventional notions of how a piano was to be played, while his later pieces explored techniques and styles of non-Western music and eighteenth century American hymnody.

Born: March 11, 1897; Menlo Park, California
Died: December 10, 1965; Shady, New York
Also known as: Henry Dixon Cowell (full name)

Principal works

CHAMBER WORKS: Irish Suite, 1929; String Quartet No. 4, 1936 (United Quartet); String Quartet No. 3, 1939 (Mosaic Quartet); Suite for Piano and String Orchestra, 1942; Concerto No. 1, 1964; Concerto No. 2, 1965.

ORCHESTRAL WORKS: Sinfonietta, 1928; Four Assorted Movements, 1939; Four Irish Tales, 1940; Symphony No. 2, 1941; Symphony No. 3, 1942 (Gaelic); Exultation, 1943; Hymn and Fuguing Tune No. 1, 1944; Hymn and Fuguing Tune No. 2, 1944; Hymn and Fuguing Tune No. 5, 1946; Symphony No. 4, 1947; A Curse and a Blessing, 1949; Symphony No. 5, 1949; Hymn and Fuguing Tune No. 3, 1951; Fantasie, 1952; Symphony No. 7, 1952; Symphony No. 11, 1954 (Seven Rituals of Music); Symphony No. 6, 1955; Persian Set, 1957; Symphony No. 13, 1959 (Madras); Symphony No. 16, 1963 (Icelandic); Twilight in Texas, 1968.

PIANO WORKS: Dynamic Motion, 1916; The Building of Bamba, 1917 (performance written by John O. Varian; revised 1930); The Tides of Manaunaum, 1917; The Banshee, 1925.

WRITINGS OF INTEREST: New Musical Resources, 1930.

The Life

Henry Dixon Cowell (KOW-ehl) was born in Menlo Park, California, thirty miles south of San Francisco. His parents, Harry Cowell and Clarissa Dixon, were both writers who espoused the progressive, intellectual bohemianism of late nineteenth century California, and their son's upbringing and education were nontraditional. After a few unsuccessful attempts to integrate young Cowell into the public school system, his mother decided to educate him herself. Her curriculum emphasized literature, politics, and art over such mundane subjects as spelling and mathematics. Cowell's early exposure to music was erratic: He studied the violin and took piano lessons, but he proved to be too free-spirited to accept formal training. He showed great interest in composing, but he lacked the ability to properly notate his ideas. His first pieces reveal an attempt to imitate the classical European masters, while simultaneously defying the traditional rules of form and tonality.

In 1914 Cowell began studies with Charles Seeger at the University of California, Berkeley. Impressed with Cowell's musical potential, Seeger encouraged him to organize his creative and unusual composition methods into theoretically useful concepts. This eventually led to the creation of Cowell's influential book, New Musical Resources. Seeger also urged Cowell to broaden his education and in 1916 arranged for him to study in New York at the Institute of Musical Art (later renamed the Juilliard School). Although Cowell rejected the school's conservative approach and returned to California within a few months, he did learn something from Manhattan's cultural life. He met the fiery, virtuosic composer Leo Ornstein, whose piano compositions were famous for aggressive dissonances created through small clusters of notes. Upon his return to the Bay Area, Cowell had a renewed sense of himself as a composer, and he began writing a series of strikingly original compositions for the piano. At this time Cowell began to give regular recitals, and he soon became a significant figure in the American musical avant-garde.

In the 1920's and early 1930's Cowell performed in Europe and in the Soviet Union. At the same time Cowell was actively promoting his own career, he was diligently working on behalf of others. In 1925 he formed the New Music Society, an organization that sponsored concerts and published scores by new American composers. In addition, Cowell taught innovative courses in composition and world music at the New School for Social Research in New York and at Stanford University and Mills College in California.

In May, 1936, Cowell was arrested on a morals charge for engaging in sexual acts with teenage boys. He was sentenced to fifteen years in San Quentin State Prison. The dedicated support of his family and his colleagues ultimately secured his release in 1940, after only four years. During his incarceration, Cowell stayed active as a composer and teacher, leading a band at San Quentin and teaching music to his fellow inmates.

Upon his release in 1940, Cowell took his career and his compositional style in new directions. He married Sidney Robertson in 1941, and he took a job as a music editor for the U.S. Office of War Information. He also resumed his teaching career on the East Coast, and he became more actively involved in the study of world music.

In the late 1950's and early 1960's, he journeyed around the world, visiting more than a dozen countries as both a musical ambassador for the United States and an interested musician. The longest portion of his travels was spent in Iran, where he worked closely with government officials, advising them on the development of their music schools and their radio programming. His experiences abroad resulted in a number of new and significant compositions that showed not only the immediate impact of his firsthand encounters with non-Western musical practices but also a coalescence of his lifelong interest in world music.

Despite suffering a series of painful and debilitating illnesses in the late 1950's and early 1960's, Cowell continued to teach and prolifically compose. He died on December 10, 1965, at the age of sixty-eight.

The Music

Seemingly unconcerned with developing a personal style, Cowell allowed his many interests to guide each of his compositions. No single piece accurately represents his immense catalog of more than nine hundred works. He composed quickly and rarely revised his compositions. His earliest published works are brash and full of experimental devices, such as tone clusters, dissonant counterpoint, elaborately complex polyrhythms, and unconventional playing techniques. The second half of his career, however, is marked by a more judicious use of experimental devices, a greater adoption of traditional tonality and modality, and a deeper exploration of the hybridization of Western art music practices with the practices of non-Western music.

Early Works. Cowell's best-known and most influential compositions are undoubtedly his early solo piano works. Though he already had composed a large number of pieces, it was after visiting New York in 1916 and encountering the ultramodern music of Ornstein that his musical style would find direction. Cowell began cultivating a new repertoire of compositions based on extended methods of producing new sounds from the piano. His Dynamic Motion, which depicts the rumbling subways of Manhattan, combines a jovial little melodic motif with crashing groups of clustered, adjacent notes on the piano (known as tone clusters) produced with the performer's fists, palms, and forearms. The following year, Cowell was asked to provide music for a play based on Irish mythology, and he again found an opportunity to employ tone clusters. The overture to The Tides of Manaunaun combines a lilting Irish tune with palm and forearm clusters that sonically imitate the crashing of waves upon the shore. As Cowell gained notoriety for his brazen new works and performances, he continued to cull new sounds from the piano. The Banshee, again based upon Irish mythology, portrays the deathly screech of a banshee through direct contact with the piano strings, using both the flesh of the finger and the fingernail. The sheer originality and shocking effect of this piece made it one of Cowell's most famous compositions.

String Quartet No. 4. While Cowell gained international fame in the 1920's as a composer and performer of shocking, modern compositions for the piano, his interests had always been much broader. He had long contemplated concertial ideas found in non-Western music, but, aside from a few small examples, this interest is not directly apparent in his early compositions. In his fourth string quartet, which he dubbed the "United Quartet," Cowell sought to reconcile musical techniques and concepts from other cultures with Western art music practices, searching for the commonalities among various musical styles in order to form a hybrid of compatible elements. The melodic and harmonic content of the quartet is derived from intervals and scales that Cowell believed were universally comprehensible. His studies of non-Western music led him to the conclusion that a three-note scale, for instance, was common among primitive musical cultures. Its inclusion in this quartet, along with other globally common musical devices, such as droning fifths, pentatonic scales, and percussive effects, was Cowell's way of bringing the common musical procedures of the non-Western world into harmony with the Western classical tradition of the string quartet, presumably rendering the composition universally comprehensible.

Hymn and Fuguing Tunes. Following his incarceration, Cowell's musical language evolved in unpredictable ways. While many have viewed the more tonal, conservative language of Cowell's compositions during the second half of his career as a regression and a denial of his ultramodern style from the previous decades, it was in fact a deeper, more mature search for a distinctly American musical sound. He found inspiration in the pre-Civil War tradition of shape-note singing, particularly represented by William Walker's 1835 collection of hymns titled The Southern Harmony. Cowell was attracted to the modal quality of the melodies and the nonacademic approach to harmonizing them (featuring parallel fifths and octaves, and almost completely eschewing chromaticism). These tunes were often set homophonically as hymns, or they were turned into "fuging tunes" with imitative counterpoint. Cowell adopted these two approaches and combined them with the prelude and fugue structure made famous by Johann Sebastian Bach in order to form a wholly original hybrid genre Cowell called the Hymn and Fuguing Tune. Between 1944 and 1964 Cowell composed eighteen such works, each for a different ensemble of instruments.

Hymn and Fuguing Tune No. 2, scored for strings, is the best-known of this series, and it perfectly exemplifies the style. The opening hymn movement features a completely diatonic setting of a tune that suggests the Dorian mode commonly encountered in early shape-note singing. The harmonization unabashedly explores the parallel sonorities also distinctive to the hymns in Walker's collection. The intertwining imitation of the subsequent fuguing tune movement advances almost entirely in stepwise motion, relying on the beautiful simplicity of clearly comprehensible counterpoint.

Persian Set. At the end of 1956 and the beginning of 1957, during his nearly three-month stay in Iran, Cowell recorded his experience in a composition that again sought to hybridize disparate musical traditions. In Persian Set, Cowell merged the Western classical four-movement structure with analogous formal structures found in traditional Persian musical suites, and he also scored the work for a mix of Western and Persian musical instruments. The piece calls for strings, piano, clarinet, and piccolo, as well as a tar (a Persian lutelike instrument) and a drum, which most performers interpret as a Persian tombak drum. In addition, Cowell imitated the largely improvised and monophonic tradition of melodic development and variation found in Persian music, casting it within traditional Western forms with suggestions of harmonic motion.

The first and third movements are pseudoimprovisational dialogues between the melodic instruments, accompanied by droning tonic and dominant tones. The second movement is more rhythmically charged, featuring a strongly defined pattern in the drum, while the main theme is presented monophonically in the strings. Cowell suggests harmonic motion with a subtly articulated bass line in the piano part. The work's finale is a full realization of Cowell's goals toward hybridization. It is simultaneously a rondo, typical of final movements within a Western classical four-movement structure, and a Persian reng, a fast dance movement in triple meter often heard at the end of instrumental suites. Persian Set premiered in Tehran in September of 1957, and it remains Cowell's most successful transcultural composition.

Musical Legacy

Despite his large number of works and various methods of composing, Cowell is noted more for his innovative ideas and fearless approach to expanding the Western classical tradition than for his compositions. His writings inspire modern composers to look beyond the inherited traditions of European classicism and to reexamine the ways in which modern music can be constructed. As a teacher, he introduced countless students (including John Cage and Lou Harrison) to musical traditions outside the Western world. Even the U.S. government recognized his unique understanding and employed him as a musical ambassador and as a general source of cultural knowledge. His enormous and eclectic oeuvre—with its exploration of styles and techniques futuristic and retrospective, within and outside Western tradition—presaged the trend toward postmodernism.

Peter Schimpf

Further Reading

Hicks, Michael. Henry Cowell: Bohemian. Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 2002. This substantial biographical treatment of the composer examines his life until his incarceration in 1936 and places in context his upbringing within the bohemian culture of early twentieth century California.

Lichtenwanger, William. The Music of Henry Cowell: A Descriptive Catalog. New York: Institute for Studies in American Music, Conservatory of Music, Brooklyn College CUNY, 1986. An annotated catalog of Cowell's compositions, including dates of performance, locations of manuscripts and sketches, and detailed commentary on each piece.

Mead, Rita. Henry Cowell's Concerti, 1925-1936: The Society, the Music Editions, and the Recordings. Ann Arbor, Mich.: UMI Research Press, 1981. A detailed study of Cowell's New Music Society that traces the specific activities of this organization, including concerts, publications, recordings, and correspondence.

Nicholls, David. American Experimental Music, 1890-1940. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1990. In-depth analyses of the most significant and groundbreaking compositions by Cowell and his contemporaries prior to 1940.

_____, ed. The Whole World of Music: A Henry Cowell Symposium. The Netherlands: Harwood, 1997. A collection of articles treating various aspects of Cowell's career and music. Personal recollections from Harrison and Sidney Robertson Cowell are included.

See also: Cage, John; Carter, Elliott; Harrison, Lou; Nancarrow, Conlon; Schoenberg, Arnold; Seeger, Charles; Seeger, Ruth Crawford; Theremin, Léon.

Bing Crosby

American singer

In the 1920's Crosby was the first white American jazz singer, borrowing from the work of Louis Armstrong and other black jazz musicians. From the 1930's to the 1950's, he enjoyed success singing popular songs.

Born: May 3, 1903; Tacoma, Washington
Died: October 14, 1977; Near Madrid, Spain
Also known as: Harry Lillis Crosby (full name)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Going My Way, 1950; Holiday Inn, 1950; Le Bing: Song Hits of Paris, 1953; A Musical Autobiography, 1954; Some Fine Old Chestnuts, 1954; White Christmas, 1954; Bing Sings Whilst Bregman Swings, 1956; High Society, 1956; Bing with a Beat, 1957; The Christmas Story, 1957; New Tricks, 1957; A Christmas Sing with Bing Around the World, 1958; Fancy Meeting You Here, 1958; Bing and Satchmo, 1960; Join Bing and Sing Along, 1960; El Señor Bing, 1961; 101 Gang Songs, 1961; Holiday in Europe, 1962; I Wish You a Merry Christmas, 1962; On the Happy Side, 1962; Swingin' on a Star—Bing Crosby and Frank Sinatra, 1962; Return to Paradise Islands, 1964; Robin and the Seven Hoods, 1964 (with Frank Sinatra, Dean Martin, and Sammy Davis, Jr.); Bing Crosby Sings the Great Country Hits, 1965; That Travelin' Two-Beat, 1965 (with Rosemary Clooney); Hey Jude/Hey Bing!, 1969; Bing and Basie, 1972; Bingo Viejo, 1975; A Southern Memoir, 1975; That's What Life Is All About, 1975; At My Time of Life, 1976; Beautiful Memories, 1976; A Couple of Song and Dance Men, 1976; Feels Good, Feels Right, 1976; Seasons, 1977.

WRITINGS OF INTEREST: Call Me Lucky, 1953 (autobiography).

The Life

Harry Lillis Crosby was the fourth son of Harry Lowe Crosby and Catherine Harrington. In 1906 the family moved from western to eastern Washington, from Tacoma to Spokane, where Crosby grew up and was educated. An amateur singer, his father loved music. The singer's nickname dated from his childhood fondness for a newspaper feature called the Bingville Bugle. Even his schoolteachers called him Bing.

After graduating from Gonzaga University High School, Crosby attended Gonzaga University. He left shortly before graduation at the urging of his friend Al Rinker, a piano player who urged Crosby to pursue a musical career. In 1925 they went to Los Angeles, and there they became a popular attraction. In 1927 they caught the attention of Paul Whiteman, the successful bandleader. Later the two were joined by Harry Barris, and they performed as Paul Whiteman's Rhythm Boys.

In 1930 Crosby married Dixie Lee, a motion picture actress, and the couple had four boys. In the 1930's, when singers were featured with bands, Crosby became a solo performer. His intimate and nuanced singing style worked well in the new era of the microphone, the use of which Crosby mastered, and he became a popular radio performer. He cultivated a breezy conversational style, and he displayed a knack for comedy routines with his guests. In addition to his many recordings, he appeared in Hollywood films, developing a comedy style that he put to use in the 1940's in The Road to Singapore (1940) and in a series of other "road" films with comedian Bob Hope. In a more serious vein were his performances in Going My Way (1944) and The Bells of St. Mary (1945), in which he portrayed a Catholic priest. In these films, as in the road films, he sang songs, nearly always written by Johnny Burke and James Van Heusen.

Two of his outstanding performances were as an alcoholic husband in The Country Girl (1954) and as a playboy ex-husband in the musical comedy High Society (1956). Although his days of film stardom were over by the late 1950's, he continued to perform for the next twenty years.

Dixie died in 1952, and in 1957 Crosby married actress Kathryn Grant. They had two sons and a daughter. Crosby sponsored a major professional golf tournament every year, and he died of a heart attack in 1977 while playing golf near Madrid, Spain.

The Music

Jazz Influences. In Crosby's early years as a performer, he was influenced by minstrelsy, by Al Jolson, and by music from the South, especially as played by jazz musicians, many of whom were black. A great lift came to his career when Whiteman hired him. Although Whiteman was a well-trained musician, the bandleader sought to add jazz musicians to his popular dance band. Most of these performers, including Rinker and Barris, arrived after Crosby joined the band.

Bing Crosby. (AP/Wide World Photos)

In 1927 and 1928 Crosby recorded "Mississippi Mud" three times; today this song is considered offensive to blacks, although Crosby would not have thought so at the time. This period saw the rise to prominence of Louis Armstrong, and the Rhythm Boys began to practice the scat singing that Armstrong popularized: the singing of a string of nonsense syllables instead of words. Crosby got to know the great cornetist Bix Beiderbeck, and he also became friends with two men who joined the Whiteman band in 1929, Eddie Lang and Joe Venuti. Lang on guitar and Venuti on violin were ranked as the best jazzmen of their time, and they performed regularly with Crosby. The musicians in Whiteman's band recognized Crosby's keen sense of pitch and rhythm.

"I Surrender, Dear." The Rhythm Boys drifted apart, but one of them aided Crosby early in his solo career by writing the music for "I Surrender, Dear," which Crosby performed to great applause at the Cocoanut Grove nightclub in Los Angeles in 1930. Crosby's handling of the song's changes in key and in tempo distinguished this first hit recording. Singing it in a Mack Sennett short film brought him to the attention of William S. Paley, the president of CBS Radio, who signed Crosby to a radio contract. He recorded the song in 1931, as well as two other notable new songs: Hoagy Carmichael's "Stardust" and a tune that became his radio broadcasts' theme, "Where the Blue of the Night Meets the Gold of the Day."

Crosby's lone recording date with Duke Ellington came in 1932, when he sang "St. Louis Blues." Although he practiced just about every other form of popular music, Crosby seldom sang the blues.

Jazz-Backed Ballads. In the 1930's, Crosby was able to blend recordings backed by top jazz musicians with ballads that his audiences craved, such as "Please," which Crosby introduced in his first full-length film, The Big Broadcast of 1932 (1932), and "Shadow Waltz" the following year. His jazz style is well represented by a song that became a jazz band standard, "Someday Sweetheart," in 1934. In 1936 he demonstrated his versatile style in a Carmichael song seldom heard today, "Moonburn," complemented by Joe Sullivan's striking piano accompaniment.

Crosby found one of the best of his numerous singing partners in the 1930's: Connee Boswell of New Orleans, who had been performing as part of a sister combination and as a soloist. One of their most successful duets was their 1937 rendition of "Basin Street Blues." Always fond of working with Southerners, Crosby performed with two Texans, Mary Martin and Jack Teagarden, one notable example being "The Waiter and the Porter and the Upstairs Maid," featured in The Birth of the Blues (1941).

By 1936 Armstrong was universally recognized as the greatest name in jazz, but he had never appeared in a film. Crosby insisted that Armstrong be prominently featured in Pennies from Heaven (1936). Crosby had already successfully recorded a song of the same title, and he sang it again in the film, with Crosby and Armstrong doing separate choruses. "Pennies from Heaven" was one of the most popular of the cheery songs with which performers tried to lift the public's spirits during the Great Depression.

The Mellow Pipe Organ. In the 1930's, Crosby attracted young female admirers, as Frank Sinatra and Elvis Presley did later, but by the end of that decade, his style had changed, along with his audiences. The husky quality of his voice disappeared, and his voice became what one critic called a "mellow pipe organ." Crosby sometimes recorded with the orchestra fronted by his younger brother, Bob. The bassist of that orchestra, Bob Haggart, devised a melody for which Burke, Crosby's favorite songwriter, supplied the lyrics. Crosby's recording of "What's New" illustrates this change in Crosby's style. Although he never lost his penchant for jazz, his singing became mellow and assured.

Other high points include his enormously popular recording of "White Christmas," which appeared in the film Holiday Inn (1942), and the musical High Society (1956), in which Crosby sang several Cole Porter songs: "Little One," "I Love You, Samantha," "True Love" with Grace Kelly, and "Well, Did You Evah?" with Sinatra. By this period, Crosby was taping radio programs instead of doing them live. He appeared on television in Christmas specials with family members from his second marriage, and even in his seventies he continued to perform in theater concerts, including one at the London Palladium just four days before his death.

Musical Legacy

In his autobiography, Crosby attributed his popularity to the notion that every man in America thought he could sing just as well, especially in the bathroom. Although he was famous for his relaxed, casual style, he expected perfection from himself and from others—a trait that sometimes made working with him difficult. In this respect he was like the great dancer, Fred Astaire: Both made what was difficult look easy. To listen carefully to Crosby's baritone voice is to become aware of his fine sense of rhythm, his true pitch, his skillful use of mordents (the quick alternation of a principal tone with the tone immediately below it), and his sensitive interpretation of lyrics. His recording of "White Christmas," for example—with its respectful attention to songwriter Irving Berlin's artfully simple one- and two-syllable words—is typical of Crosby's considerable contributions to the lyricist's art.

Crosby made about sixteen hundred studio recordings, a number that rivals the output of any other singer in history, and "White Christmas" is among the most popular records ever. Of all these recordings, 368 reached the best-seller charts, more than achieved by Sinatra or Presley. Thirty-eight of Crosby's recordings were number-one hits, more than Presley or the Beatles managed to achieve. In the 1940's, he ranked as the number-one box-office attraction for five consecutive years. On three occasions he was nominated for best actor, and he won the Academy Award for Going My Way in 1944.

Robert P. Ellis

Further Reading

Crosby, Bing, with Pete Martin. Call Me Lucky. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1953. This autobiography is Crosby's typically relaxed and low-key account of the first fifty years of his life.

Crosby, Gary, with Ross Firestone. Going My Own Way. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1983. In the course of relating the drug dependency and alcoholism of his life, Crosby's eldest son, who performed with his father, calls attention to his father's deficiencies as a parent.

Friedwald, Will. "Mr. Satch and Mr. Cros." In Jazz Singing. Cambridge, Mass.: Da Capo Press, 1996. This chapter in a history of jazz singing focuses on the relationship between a great jazz trumpeter and singer and a man who studied Armstrong's work from his early days as a performer.

Giddins, Gary. Bing Crosby: A Pocketful of Dreams—The Early Years, 1902-1940. Boston: Little, Brown, 2001. A jazz expert offers an excellent account of the jazz influences on Crosby. It includes a discography up to 1940, a complete filmograpy, and thorough documentation.

MacFarlane, Malcolm. Bing Crosby: Day by Day. Lanham, Md.: Scarecrow Press, 2001. This expansive book contains many details about Crosby, satisfying to readers who find that biographical trivialities can teach much about the subject.

Prigozy, Ruth, and Walter Raubicheck. Going My Way: Bing Crosby and American Culture. 2007. Essays relate the importance of Crosby's life to popular music, motion pictures, and the entertainment industry in general.

Shepherd, Donald, and Robert F. Slatzer. Bing Crosby: The Hollow Man. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1981. This book offers severe criticisms of Crosby's personality as it affected his family and others who knew him. This provides a one-sided view of the singer.

See also: Andrews, Dame Julie; Basie, Count; Beiderbecke, Bix; Bennett, Tony; Berlin, Irving; Burke, Johnny; Domino, Fats; Ellington, Duke; Garland, Judy; Heifetz, Jascha; Jordan, Louis; Lee, Peggy; Mercer, Johnny; Merman, Ethel; Merrill, Robert; Nichols, Red; Paul, Les; Porter, Cole; Presley, Elvis; Sinatra, Frank; Smith, Kate; Tormé, Mel; Van Heusen, Jimmy; Whiteman, Paul; Willson, Meredith.

David Crosby

American rock singer, songwriter, and guitarist

Crosby was a major contributor to folk-rock, a genre that blended traditional acoustic folk music with electronically amplified rock.

Born: August 14, 1941; Los Angeles, California
Also known as: David Van Cortlandt Crosby (full name)

Member of: Byrds; Crosby, Stills, and Nash; Crosby, Stills, Nash, and Young

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): If I Could Only Remember My Name, 1971; Oh Yes I Can, 1989; Thousand Roads, 1993.

ALBUMS (with the Byrds): Mr. Tambourine Man, 1965; Turn! Turn! Turn!, 1965; Fifth Dimension, 1966; Younger than Yesterday, 1967; The Notorious Byrd Brothers, 1968; Sweetheart of the Rodeo, 1968; Ballad of Easy Rider, 1969; Dr. Byrds and Mr. Hyde, 1969; Untitled, 1970; Byrdmaniax, 1971; Farther Along, 1971; The Byrds, 1973.

ALBUMS (with Crosby, Stills, and Nash): Crosby, Stills, and Nash, 1969; CSN, 1977; Daylight Again, 1982; Live It Up, 1990; After the Storm, 1994.

ALBUMS (with Crosby, Stills, Nash, and Young): Déjà Vu, 1970; American Dream, 1988; Looking Forward, 1999.

David Crosby. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The Life

Born in Los Angeles, California, David Van Cortlandt Crosby is the son of Oscar-winning cinematographer Floyd Delafield Crosby and artist Aliph Van Cortlandt Whitehead Crosby. As a student at Montecito's Crane Country Day School, he often performed in musicals. Shortly after he graduated from Cate School in Carpinteria, his parents divorced.

Originally intending to become an actor—he later appeared in several movies and television shows—Crosby instead took up music, and he sang folk songs with his older brother Floyd, Jr. (known as Ethan, who committed suicide in the late 1990's). By the early 1960's, he had connected with other musicians who would soon form the core of the popular group the Byrds. In the late 1960's, he became part of the folk-rock group Crosby, Stills, and Nash, which periodically performed with Neil Young as Crosby, Stills, Nash, and Young.

Crosby, who began using drugs and alcohol as a teenager, sank further into substance abuse after girlfriend Christine Hinton died in a 1969 automobile accident. Often in legal difficulties throughout the 1970's and 1980's because of drug use and weapons possession, he went through rehabilitation after a stint in the Texas State Penitentiary. However, he was arrested for drug possession as late as 2004. His hard living necessitated a liver transplant in 1995. In 2000 it was revealed that Crosby was the sperm donor for two children produced by artificial insemination for singer Melissa Etheridge and her partner Julie Cypher. Married since 1987 to record producer Jan Dance, he is the father of their son Django.

The Music

As a songwriter, singer, instrumentalist, and performer, Crosby first made an impact in the early 1960's with the band the Byrds. The Byrds created a fresh, new sound that inspired such artists as Bob Dylan, the Beatles, and many others. After internal squabbles led to Crosby leaving the Byrds, he united in the late 1960's with Graham Nash and Stephen Stills to form Crosby, Stills, and Nash, a group that developed the concept of folk-rock. Featuring close harmonies, creative arrangements, and musical subjects that captured the times, Crosby, Stills, and Nash (and later with Young) helped define a generation in song. Crosby, who has released a number of critically acclaimed solo albums since 1971, continues to perform with Crosby, Stills, and Nash; with Crosby, Stills, Nash, and Young; and with Jeff Pevar, and James Raymond.

Fifth Dimension. The third album by the Byrds, released in 1966, featured a number of songs written or cowritten by Crosby. Notable among these was the psychedelic anthem "Eight Miles High," which made it into the Top 20. The album stayed for more than six months on the Billboard charts, and it sold well both in the United States and in England.

Crosby, Stills, and Nash. This 1969 debut album combined elements of blues, rock, folk, and jazz to produce an instant classic that rose to number six on album charts, helping to set a new direction in American music. Showcasing Crosby's talent for tapping into society's concerns, Stills's skills in formulating interesting and complicated musical arrangements, and Nash's ability to develop pop hooks, the album produced the Top 40 hits "Marrakesh Express" and "Suite: Judy Blue Eyes" (written for singer Judy Collins), as well as such popular standards as "Guinnevere," "Wooden Ships," "Helplessly Hoping," and "Long Time Gone."

Déjà Vu. The follow-up to Crosby, Stills, and Nash and the first to feature Neil Young, this 1970 release solidified the band's position as a musical force. Déjà Vu reached the top position on pop album charts—the first of three consecutive album chart-toppers—and it spawned three Top 40 singles: "Teach Your Children," "Our House," and "Woodstock." Flavored with country, Western, rock, folk, and blues, the album offered something for every musical taste, from the soaring harmonies of Stills's "Carry On" to Crosby's tongue-in-cheek "Almost Cut My Hair," which perfectly captured the dichotomy between straight and freak elements existing then.

If I Could Only Remember My Name. Crosby's first solo album, this 1971 release jocularly refers to the artist's well-documented drug problems, and it has remained popular since its debut. Though Crosby is the featured performer throughout, many guest artists contributed to the effort, including Young, Nash, Joni Mitchell, and members of the Grateful Dead, Jefferson Airplane, and Santana. The album rose as high as number twelve on album charts, with such cuts as "Music Is Love," "Laughing," and "I'd Swear There Was Somebody Here."

Musical Legacy

An important member of two seminal folk-rock bands—the Byrds and Crosby, Stills, and Nash—Crosby has had a significant influence on music, both in content and in style. The subject matter of his songs has a wide range, covering the whole of human experience, from concerns about fitting in ("Almost Cut My Hair") to consideration of a ménage à trois ("Triad"). In addition, politically charged and socially relevant statements have always been a mainstay in his compositions. Crosby's music has cut across an amazing variety of genres—folk, country, Western, psychedelic, jazz, and rock—and combinations of styles. His strong voice, capable of carrying lead vocals, has added depth and substance to group efforts. Crosby was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame twice: for his work with the Byrds and with Crosby, Stills, and Nash. Crosby makes periodic and highly acclaimed tours with his longtime bandmates, building upon an impressive body of original work.

Jack Ewing

Further Reading

Crosby, David, and Carl Gottleib. Long Time Gone: The Autobiography of David Crosby. New York: Doubleday, 1988. This is Crosby's own story of his role with the Byrds and with Crosby, Stills, Nash, and Young, and it details his abuse of drugs. Includes photographs.

_____. Since Then: How I Survived Everything and Lived to Tell About It. New York: Berkley, 2007. A continuation of Crosby's memoir, this takes up where his autobiography left off. Profusely illustrated.

Hoskyns, Barney. Hotel California: The True-Life Adventures of Crosby, Stills, Nash, Young, Mitchell, Taylor, Browne, Ronstadt, Geffen, the Eagles, and Their Many Friends. Hoboken, N.J.: Wiley, 2007. This is an overview of the 1960's-1970's California rock scene, as told by those who were there. Includes photographs.

Walker, Michael. Laurel Canyon: The Inside Story of Rock and Roll's Legendary Neighborhood. London:

Faber & Faber, 2006. This is an examination of the Los Angeles suburb where many of California's top musicians lived. Includes photographs.
Zimmer, Dave. 4 Way Street: The Crosby, Stills, Nash, and Young Reader. Cambridge, Mass.: Da Capo Press, 2004. An in-depth look at the popular band over thirty years, comprising articles and interviews.

See also: Browne, Jackson; Collins, Judy; Elliot, Cass; Etheridge, Melissa; King, Carole; Mitchell, Joni; Parsons, Gram; Santana, Carlos; Stills, Stephen; Taylor, James.

Andraé Crouch

American gospel singer-songwriter and pianist

Crouch was one of the first African American gospel musicians to cross over into mainstream modern Christian music and appeal to multiracial audiences. A key artist in the Jesus Music movement of the 1960's and 1970's, he was a pioneer in combining the lyrical, spiritual essence of traditional gospel music with contemporary popular musical styles.

Born: July 1, 1942; Los Angeles, California
Also known as: Andraé Edward Crouch (full name)
Member of: Andraé Crouch and the Disciples

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): Just Andraé, 1972; Don't Give Up, 1981; No Time to Lose, 1985; Finally, 1990; Contemporary Man, 1991; Let's Worship Him, 1993; Mercy, 1994; Pray, 1997; Gift of Christmas, 1998; Hall of Fame, 1999; Legends of Gospel, 2002; Kings of Gospel, 2003; He's Everywhere, 2004; Mighty Wind, 2005; Soulfully, 2005; Take the Message Everywhere, 2005; Platinum Praise Collection, 2008.

ALBUMS (with Andraé Crouch and the Disciples): Autograph, 1970; I Don't Know Why Jesus Loved Me, 1974; Keep on Singin', 1971; Take Me Back, 1975; This Is Another Day, 1977; Andraé Crouch and the Disciples, 1978; I'll Be Thinking of You, 1979.

WRITINGS OF INTEREST: Through It All, 1974 (with Nina Ball).

The Life

Andraé (AHN-dray) Edward Crouch was born into a devout Christian family. Crouch, his twin sister Sandra, and his older brother Benjamin attended Sunday school regularly. Their parents, Benjamin Jerome and Catherine Dorothea Crouch, owned a dry-cleaning business. His father did street-corner preaching in his free time but eventually became minister of a Church of God in Christ (COGIC), a pentecostal church. Crouch enjoyed listening to various styles of music, including gospel, classical, rhythm and blues, rock and roll, and jazz. At the age of nine, he became a church pianist, and he was only fourteen when he wrote his first hit song, "The Blood Will Never Lose Its Power."

In 1960 Crouch formed the COGIC Singers, which included his sister Sandra, Edna Wright, and Billy Preston. Five years later, he founded a gospel rock group, called Andraé Crouch and the Disciples. Crouch's unique combination of diverse musical styles appealed to multiethnic audiences. He and the Disciples appeared on The Tonight Show (hosted by Johnny Carson) and Saturday Night Live, also performing before sold-out crowds in more than fifty countries. The Disciples disbanded in 1981, but Crouch continued to compose and record.

Between 1993 and 1995, Crouch experienced several life-changing events, the deaths of his mother, father, and older brother. He replaced his father as pastor at Christ Memorial COGIC in Pacoima, California, and moved on, releasing nearly an album per year.

The Music

Crouch revolutionized gospel music with his unique combination of traditional gospel with popular contemporary musical styles. During the 1970's, Andraé Crouch and the Disciples was the best-selling group in a new genre that would be called contemporary Christian music (CCM). Their recordings, all on the Light label, included Autograph, I Don't Know Why Jesus Loved Me, Keep on Singin', Take Me Back, This Is Another Day, the self-titled Andraé Crouch and the Disciples, and I'll Be Thinking of You.

Meanwhile, Crouch had released his first solo album, Just Andraé, in 1972. His lyrics reflected traditional themes about personal testimony, God's love, worship, and praise. However, his performances and recordings used jazz, rhythm-and-blues, soul, and other secular styles. Crouch also used a large variety of instruments, including electric guitars, drums, synthesizers, horns, vibraphone, and electric bass. Thus, his music appealed to secular as well as religious audiences.

Andraé Crouch. (AP/Wide World Photos)

"The Blood Will Never Lose Its Power." This song, also known simply as "The Blood," was written in 1956, when Crouch was only fourteen. It was an immediate crossover hit, popular among both black and white church congregations and radio listeners. The famous Caravans were the first group to record it. Consisting of thirty-two measures with sixteen bars for the verses and sixteen for the refrain, or chorus, this song has a traditional gospel style. The simple, powerful lyrics affirm the never-ending power of the blood of Jesus to calm fears and provide strength every day. One of Crouch's most commercially successful songs, "The Blood" became part of the standard hymnal repertoire. Many artists have recorded it over the years, including Cece Winans, Selah, and Clay Aiken.

"Through It All." Written in 1971, this song expressed Crouch's total faith and trust in God to help him through any situation. The lyrics expressed thanks for God's blessings "through it all": tears, sorrows, loneliness, and doubt. The score called for a moderate tempo and thirty-two measures, with three sixteen-measure verses and a chorus, but various recordings have rearranged this format. The hymn was so widely identified with Crouch that Crouch named his 1974 autobiography after it. In 1975, he sang the song at a Billy Graham crusade in New Mexico. "Through It All" has become a gospel standard, included in many Christian hymnals.

"My Tribute (To God Be the Glory)." First appearing in 1971 in the classic Keep on Singin' album, this slow ballad has become one of the most recorded gospel songs, with more than six hundred versions. Its simple and direct lyrics express Crouch's sincere gratitude to God, and the phrase "To God Be the Glory" is repeated nine times. The song is divided into three parts, and rather than the more typical alternation between verses (with the same melody but different words) and a repeated chorus, this piece has a single chorus but two contrasting verses—all of which are repeated musically. Although the original chords were relatively simple, musicians have extended them and used them as vehicles for improvisation. Also, various interpretations of the song have included further embellishments, such as key changes and the addition of extra melodic lines, as well as special endings, all designed to heighten the hymn's emotional impact.

"My Tribute" established Crouch as a pioneer in worship music. In 1996, CCM artists honored Crouch in the recording, Tribute: The Songs of Andraé Crouch. "My Tribute" was the finale piece, in which Crouch conduced a seventy-voice all-star choir. In 1997, the album won the Grammy Award for Best Contemporary Gospel Album.

Musical Legacy

One of the most significant artists in modern Christian music, Crouch was a leader in the Jesus Music movement begun in California in the 1960's. This genre's informal worship practices and pop musical styles laid the foundation for the contemporary Christian music industry and many modern evangelical denominations. Crouch's blending of traditional gospel music with soul, jazz, rhythm-and-blues, and mainstream pop styles appealed to diverse audiences. He performed church music in what were then unconventional venues, such as on television and in stadiums and concert halls.

Crouch wrote more than three hundred gospel pieces, many of which have become classics or standards. Major gospel singers and groups have recorded or performed his works, and Crouch himself sold millions of albums and earned many honors: Grammy Awards, GMA (Gospel Musica Association) Dove Awards, and even a star on the Hollywood Walk of Fame. He has collaborated with some of the world's most famous artists, including Whitney Houston, Michael Jackson, Elvis Presley, and Quincy Jones, as well as contributing music to films including The Color Purple (1985), Free Willy (1993), and The Lion King (1994).

Alice Myers

Further Reading

Crouch, Andraé, and Nina Ball. Through It All. Waco, Tex.: Word Books, 1974. Crouch's candid autobiography reveals his deep religious faith during difficult times. Illustrated.

Cusic, Don. The Sound of Light: The History of Gospel and Christian Music. Milwaukee, Wis.: Hal Leonard, 2002. Describes Crouch's significance in the development of contemporary Christian music. Bibliography, index, notes, and appendix.

Darden, Bob. People Get Ready! A New History of Black Gospel Music. New York: Continuum, 2004. The chapter on gospel's evolution establishes Crouch as the first popular proponent of contemporary gospel. Illustrated; discography, bibliography, and index.

Taff, Toni, and Christa Farris. CCM Top 100 Greatest Songs in Christian Music. Nashville, Tenn.: Integrity, 2006. Includes the stories behind three of Crouch's songs: "Jesus Is the Answer," "Soon and Very Soon," and "My Tribute." Illustrated.

Terry, Lindsay. Stories Behind Fifty Southern Gospel Favorites. Grand Rapids, Mich.: Kregel, 2005. Contains an interview with Crouch about his classic song "The Blood Will Never Lose Its Power." Index.

See also: Cleveland, James; Dorsey, Thomas A.; Grant, Amy; Jackson, Mahalia; Smith, Michael W.; Staples, Pops; Ward, Clara.

George Crumb

American classical composer

Crumb is best known for his idiosyncratic compositional style, which features timbral effects produced by playing instruments or singing in a nontraditional manner. Despite the incorporation of exotic scales, unmetered rhythms, and other twentieth century practices, his music is familiar and deeply expressive.

Born: October 24, 1929; Charleston, West Virginia
Also known as: George Henry Crumb, Jr. (full name)

Principal works

CHAMBER WORKS: Four Pieces, 1945; String Trio, 1952; String Quartet, 1954; Four Nocturnes (Night Music II), 1964; Eleven Echoes of Autumn (Echoes I), 1966; Black Angels: Thirteen Images from the Dark Land (Images I), 1970; Vox Balaenae, 1971; Dream Sequence (Images II), 1976; An Idyll for the Misbegotten (Images III), 1986; Quest, 1994; Mundus Canis, 1997.

INSTRUMENTAL WORKS: Sonata, 1955 (for cello); Pastoral Drone, 1982 (for organ); Easter Dawning, 1991 (for carillon).

ORCHESTRAL WORKS: Gethsemane, 1947; Violin Sonata, 1949; Viola Sonata, 1953; Diptych, 1955; Variazioni, 1959; Echoes of Time and the River (Echoes II), 1967; A Haunted Landscape, 1984.

PIANO WORKS: Piano Sonata, 1945; Prelude and Toccata, 1947; Five Pieces, 1962; Makrokosmos, Vol. I, 1972; Makrokosmos, Vol. II, 1973; Music for a Summer Evening (Makrokosmos III), 1974; Celestial Mechanics (Makrokosmos IV), 1979; A Little Suite for Christmas, A.D. 1979, 1980; Gnomic Variations, 1981; Processional, 1983; Zeitgeist, 1987; Eine Kleine Mitternachtmusik, 2002 (A Little Midnight Music); Otherworldly Resonances, 2003.

VOCAL WORKS: Three Early Songs, 1947; Night Music I, 1963; Madrigals, Book I, 1965; Madrigals, Book II, 1965; Songs, Drones, and Refrains of Death, 1968; Madrigals, Book III, 1969; Madrigals, Book IV, 1969; Night of the Four Moons, 1969; Ancient Voices of Children, 1970; Lux aeterna, 1971; Star-Child, 1977; Apparition, 1979; The Sleeper, 1984; Federico's Little Songs for Children, 1986; Unto the Hills, 2001; A Journey Beyond Time, 2003; River of Life, 2003; Winds of Destiny, 2004.

The Life

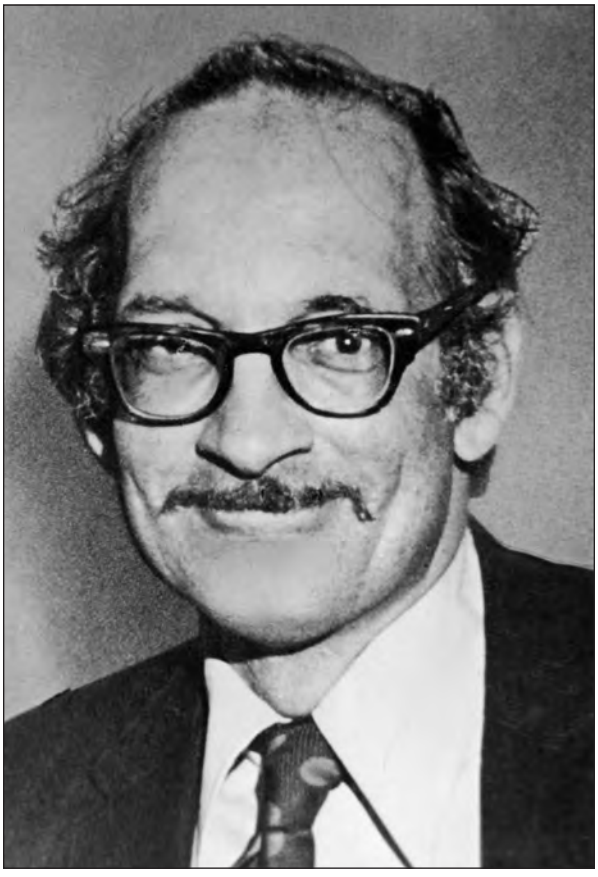
George Henry Crumb, Jr., was born in Charleston, West Virginia, on October 24, 1929, a date better known as Black Thursday, the day of the stock market crash that triggered the Great Depression. His parents, George, Sr., a clarinetist, and Vivian, a cellist, were professional musicians who played in the Charleston Symphony. Crumb began clarinet lessons with his father at age seven and by age nine had taught himself to play the piano by ear. Music was an integral part of daily life in the Crumb household, and Crumb and his younger brother, who played the flute, often performed duets, trios, and other chamber music with their parents. Crumb began composing during his high school years, and two of his early works were performed by the Charleston Symphony. He met his future wife, Elizabeth May Brown, in high school. They went on to attend Mason College of Music together and were married in 1949. After graduating from college in 1950 with a bachelor of music degree, Crumb pursued graduate studies at the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign, where he studied with Eugene Weigel. He graduated with a master's degree in 1952. During this time Crumb also studied with Boris Blacher at Tanglewood and continued his studies with Blacher at the Hochschule für Musik in Berlin from 1955 to 1956 under a Fulbright fellowship. He completed his doctorate in composition at the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor in 1958 after studying with Ross Lee Finney. Crumb held teaching positions at Virginia's Hollins College (1958-1959), the University of Colorado at Boulder (1959-1964), and the University of Pennsylvania (1964-1997), where he was appointed professor emeritus after retiring. He and his wife had three children, two of whom built successful musical careers of their own. Ann Crumb became a Tony-nominated Broadway singer and actress, and composer David Crumb became a member of the faculty at the University of Oregon.

The Music

Crumb's music can be divided into two distinct periods. The first dates from his student days and ends somewhat abruptly in 1959 upon the completion of his orchestral work Variazioni. Crumb's early music incorporates the modernist musical vocabulary characteristic of such twentieth century composers as Béla Bartók, Alban Berg, Anton von Webern, and Arnold Schoenberg. Strongly Western in character, the music of this period follows classical formal schemes and incorporates metrical and rhythmic regularity.

In the late 1950's and early 1960's, Crumb became increasingly unhappy with the direction his music was taking. In recalling this crisis, Crumb once remarked in an interview, "I can remember quite literally waking up one night in a cold sweat with the realization that I had thus far simply been rewriting the music of other composers." In 1962 David Burge, Crumb's friend and colleague at the University of Colorado at Boulder, commissioned Crumb to write a new work for piano. The result of this effort was a piece entitled Five Pieces. This composition diverges sharply from the music of Crumb's early period and marks the advent of what Crumb refers to as his "personal style." An important feature of the music of Crumb's second period is the appearance of the scores. Crumb uses cutaway scores in which staves are left out when the corresponding part is silent. This, along with special notation for nontraditional performance techniques, a plethora of expressive markings, and unusual meters, causes the score to take on the appearance of visual art. In some cases, staves form geometric shapes reflective of their titles. In Makrokosmos, Vol. I, for example, the staves in the fourth movement, "Crucifixus," take the shape of a cross, while the staff in the eighth movement, "The Magic Circle of Infinity," forms a circle.

Aside from the presence of familiar pitch structures, the music of Crumb's mature style departs sharply from traditional Western music, containing unusual meters or lacking meter altogether. In addition, it is saturated with timbral effects created by nontraditional performance techniques. While these sometimes mimic those produced electronically, Crumb does not use synthesizers or other electronic instruments in his compositions. The one exception is the use of microphones for amplification. One of Crumb's common instrumental effects is produced by strumming or picking the strings inside the piano. While this practice originated with John Cage, Crumb's music has little in common with that of the older avant-garde composer. Cage's music is meant to challenge traditional aesthetic values; in contrast, Crumb uses nontraditional sounds and effects as a means to express such extramusical concepts as cyclical conceptions of time, nature, life, death, the human condition, and supernatural events. Although Crumb incorporates radically new sounds, these are meant to recall those heard before, both in music and in nature.



George Crumb. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

It is a hallmark of the composer's style that motives, themes, and other pitch constructions maintain the same interval throughout a piece. Among the most common devices is the gradual buildup of pitch collections along with the reordering of the notes in subsequent repetitions. Although triads are rare in Crumb's music, other familiar structures, such as pentatonic and whole-tone collections, are prevalent. Crumb often alludes to the influences of his native West Virginia (the sounds of everyday life he heard growing up there as well as its folk traditions and music) and those composers of the past he most admires (Claude Debussy and Bartók). The importance of these influences is manifested in his music by expressive markings that refer to natural sounds, the incorporation of folk instruments such as the musical saw, and the frequent use of musical quotations.

Five Pieces. This 1962 composition is the first of Crumb's mature style. In it may be found nearly all of the features characteristic of his music dating from the early 1960's, such as nontraditional ways of playing, including plucking the strings inside the piano, the use of a microphone placed near the piano strings, graphic notation, unmetered rhythms, and inversional pitch symmetry. Certain aspects of the work—including its title, which reflects the structure rather than, as in many of Crumb's later works, its expressive content—recall the music of Crumb's first period. The work as a whole constitutes an arch form and for this reason Crumb stipulates in the program notes that Five Pieces should always be performed in its entirety since the work was conceived as an organic whole." Much of the pitch material is derived from chromatic tri-chords and tone clusters. In keeping with the arch-form organization, the fifth movement ends with the same tri-chord that occurs at the beginning of the first movement, while the tri-chords in the second movement are inverted in the fourth. The middle movement incorporates the arch-form idea on a smaller scale in that the second half of the movement is a near literal retrograde of the first half.

Madrigals, Books I, II, III, and IV. The poetry of Federico García Lorca plays a central role in the music Crumb wrote between 1965 and 1969, and this is nowhere more evident than in the four books of madrigals. Characteristic of these pieces and others is Crumb setting to music only a single line or two from García Lorca's poems. Crumb's atmospheric musical settings amplify the brief textual quotes. Each book consists of three madrigals for soprano and a small instrumental chamber group, and the vocal part is often treated as an instrument. For example, in the first madrigal, "Verte desnuda es recordar la tierra" (to see you naked is to remember the earth), the soprano, in addition to singing in a traditional manner, hums and vocalizes nonsense syllables, adding new timbres to those articulated by the vibraphone and contrabass. Always important in Crumb's music, inversional pitch symmetry is prevalent in the madrigals, featured prominently in the three madrigals of books I and II, the first movement of book III, and the last movement of book IV.

An Idyll for the Misbegotten. Many of the devices Crumb uses in the early compositions of his mature style also appear in his later compositions. In An Idyll for the Misbegotten, various pitch motives are extracted from the opening theme and altered rhythmically, intervallically, and by means of pitch additions. Like many of Crumb's compositions, the piece sounds improvised but nevertheless has a ternary structure in which the opening material returns at the end. In this work, Crumb seems to express his own philosophical angst over not only humankind's mistreatment of the natural environment but also the silent suffering of nature itself. The original version for flute contains two literal quotations from Debussy's Syrinx for solo flute and two lines from a poem by eighth century Chinese poet Ssu-k'ung Shu, which the flutist recites across the flute mouthpiece, producing a flute-like whisper. The mournful quality produced by descending glissando patterns seems to allude to Syrinx's sorrow over her loss of innocence at the hands of Pan, who, according to the Greek myth, turns Syrinx into a pan flute.

Musical Legacy

Crumb has received a number of prestigious awards and grants, including a Pulitzer Prize in 1968 for Echoes of Time and the River, the Edward MacDowell Medal for composition in 1995, and a Grammy award for Star-Child in 2001. In 2004 he was named Musical America's Composer of the Year. Crumb's most important legacy may well be the elevation of timbre to a central expressive role in musical structure.

Edward Pearsall

Further Reading

Bruns, Steven, and Ofer Ben-Amots, eds. George Crumb and the Alchemy of Sound: Essays on His Music. Colorado Springs: Colorado College Music Press, 2005.Analytical and biographical essays on George Crumb and his music.

Cohen, David. George Crumb: A Bio-Bibliography. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 2002. Annotated listing of Crumb's work along with biographical information.

Gillespie, Don, ed. George Crumb: Profile of a Composer. New York: C. F. Peters, 1986. Interviews with, as well as articles by the composer, and excerpts from his published works. Includes photographs of the composer at work, in master classes, and at postperformance receptions.

See also: Bartók, Béla; Berg, Alban; Cage, John; Debussy, Claude; Golijov, Osvaldo; Schoenberg, Arnold; Tan Dun; Webern, Anton von; Wolfe, Julia.

Celia Cruz

Cuban Latin singer

Known as the Queen of Salsa, Cruz was a consummate entertainer, with one of the finest voices ever to come out of Cuba. She gained broad popularity across the United States, performing with distinguished Latin artists from around the world.

Born: October 21, 1924; Havana, Cuba
Died: July 16, 2003; Fort Lee, New Jersey
Also known as: Úrsula Hilaria Celia Caridad Cruz Alfonso (full name)
Member of: La Sonora Mantancera

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): Canciones premiadas, 1965; Cuba y Puerto Rico son, 1966 (with Tito Puente); Son con

guaguanco, 1966; A ti Mexico, 1967; Bravo Celia Cruz, 1967; La excitante, 1968; Serenata guajira, 1968; Quimbo quimbumbia, 1969 (with Puente); Etc. Etc. Etc., 1970 (with Puente); Celia and Johnny, 1974 (with Johnny Pacheco); Tremendo cache, 1975 (with Pacheco); Only They Could Have Made This Album, 1977 (with Willie Colón); A todos mis amigos, 1978; The Brillante, 1978; Eternos, 1978 (with Pacheco); La ceiba, 1979; Celia/Johnny/Pete, 1980 (with Pacheco and Pete Rodriguez); Celia and Willie, 1981 (with Colón); Feliz encuentro, 1982; Tremendo trio, 1983 (Ray Barretto and Adalberto Santiago); De nuevo, 1986 (with Pacheco); La candela, 1986; The Winners, 1987 (with Colón); Ritmo en el corazon, 1988 (with Barretto); La guarachera del mundo, 1990; Canta Celia Cruz, 1991; La reina del ritmo Cubano, 1991; La verdadera historia, 1992; Tributo a Ismael Rivera, 1992; Azúcar negra, 1993; Homenaje a Beny More, Vol. 3, 1993 (with Puente); Homenaje a los santos, 1994; Irrepetible, 1994; Las guarachera de la guaracha, 1994; Merengue, 1994; Cuba's Queen of Rhythm, 1995; Double Dynamite, 1995 (with Puente); Festejando navidad, 1995; Irresistible, 1995; Celia Cruz, 1996; Cambiando ritmos, 1997; Duets, 1997 (with others); Fania All Stars with Celia Cruz, 1997 (with Fania All Stars); También boleros, 1997; Afro-Cubana, 1998; Mi vida es cantar, 1998; Habanera, 2000; Inigualable, 2000; Salsa, 2000; Siempre vivire, 2000; La negra tiene tumbao, 2001; Unrepeatable, 2002; El carnaval de la vida, 2003; Regalo del alma, 2003.

ALBUMS (with La Sonora Matancera): La incomparable Celia, 1958; Mi diario musical, 1959; Sabor y ritmo de pueblos, 1965; Mambo del amor, 1994; Las Estrellas de la Sonora Matancera, 2003.

The Life

Born Úrsula Hilaria Celia Caridad Cruz Alfonso on October 21, 1924, in Havana, Cuba, Celia Cruz (SEEL-yah krewz). In 1947 she won the La Hora del Té talent competition on Radio García Serrá. Although her father, Simón Cruz, believed that music was a disgraceful profession for a woman, her mother, Catalina Alfonso, supported her daughter's ambitions. Cruz studied at the Havana Conservatory and began singing full time. In Cuba she worked with Las Mulatas del Fuego (the Blazing Mulatto Women) and the Orchestra Gloria Matancera before joining La Sonora Matancera in August of 1950. Cruz worked with La Sonora Matancera for about fifteen years, touring the Caribbean, South and Central America, and the United States. After Fidel Castro's 1959 revolution, Cruz and her band left Cuba. They spent a year and a half in Mexico, performing music and appearing in films. Eventually they moved to New York, and Cruz married the band's trumpeter, Pedro Knight, in 1962.

From the 1960's to the 1990's Cruz was the undisputed top vocalist of salsa, a genre that experienced a significant surge in popularity in the 1970's. Part of her time was spent performing at the Hollywood Palladium, a California venue that commonly promoted swing bands, but to accommodate the large Mexican population, it instituted Latin Holidays. This extended engagement allowed Cruz and her band to apply for U.S. residency. Besides La Sonora Matancera, Cruz regularly worked with Tito Puente, Johnny Pacheco, Willie Colón and their respective bands, as well as several artists from the Fania record label. Mindful of the New York Latin community, Cruz performed on weekends, indicating that these shows allowed the workaday Latin laborers access to their own music. Not completely abandoning her motion-picture career, Cruz appeared in 1991's The Mambo Kings. In 2003 Cruz died of a brain tumor at her home in Fort Lee, New Jersey.

The Music

Salsa is an umbrella term that includes many highly specific Cuban, Puerto Rican, Dominican, and other Latin song and dance genres. It also implies a social movement born from a variety of Latin diasporic communities in New York City. As the people took pride in their heritage, the popularity of salsa soared. With her rich, contralto voice, Cruz mastered this genre. She occasionally sang Santería religious chants in the Yoruba language. Incredibly vibrant even in her seventies, Cruz had a quick wit and energetic theatrical stage presence that were as legendary as her voice. Her shouts of "Azúcar!" (sugar), which originated as a punch line to a joke, were sprinkled throughout many songs. Cruz recorded more than seventy albums with the top names in salsa and with several popular American musicians.

"En el tiempo de la colonia." "En el tiempo de la colonia" is closer to a brisk ballad or bolero than to Cruz's typical danceable salsa music. It is a different style of Cuban music, slower and more stately, with a simpler, instrumental accompaniment, particularly in the percussion section. The trumpet takes a brief melodic role, along with its usual solo or percussive function. In this song, Cruz tells the story of colonial Cuba, her nostalgic memories focusing on how the black people played the drums. The irony is that Afro-Cubans were enslaved in colonial times and treated poorly.

"Quimbara." This tune, released on Celia y Johnny, is a guaguancó, a type of rhumba. Cruz displays her quick articulation abilities with the repeated phrase "Quimbara cumbara cumaquín bambá." Interestingly, this phrase refers to the sounds and dialogue of Afro-Cuban drums. The chorus section features Cruz and her band engaging in call and response, and while Cruz varies her lyrics, the band repeats the song's signature line. Cruz's love for music and dancing is another subject of the song. "Quimbara" was composed by Puerto Rican Júnior Cepeda, and it became one of the prominent songs of the salsa movement.

"Cúcala." When Pacheco changed the musical style of "Cúcala" from a Puerto Rican bomba plena to a Cuban guaracha, Cruz was interested. It was first recorded live in 1975, at a concert in Madison Square Garden, and later it was studio edited. This developed into one of Cruz's most popular hits. In musical terms, this song showcases the horns during various instrumental breaks as well as a driving piano montuno (highly syncopated melodic and rhythmic ostinatos). Call and response, likely a carryover from assorted African music traditions, is utilized again, as well as a percussion section for punctuation. Lyrically, Cruz is referring to a girl by the name Cúcala, exalting her for her prowess in life and appearance.

"Usted abuso." Although musically upbeat, Cruz presents the listener with lyrics from a broken heart. The theme "you took advantage of me, you took advantage of my love for you" repeats throughout. From The Brilliante, "Usted abuso" puts Cruz's powerful and warm vocal timbre at the forefront, rather than her speed and agility. "Usted Abuso" was composed by Antonio Batista, Carlos Figuiero, and Pierre Delanoë. The album was compiled in 1978 to feature her works done on the Vaya Records label, a subsidiary of Fania Records.

Celia Cruz. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

"La negra tiene tumbao." This song is the title track to the album, which won a Grammy Award for Best Salsa Album. The synthesized instrumentation and stylistic differences heard in this selection are quite unlike the bulk of Cruz's work, but they are an illustration of how diverse her recording and performing career was. Prominent stylistic differences include influences from American rap to Hispanic reggaetón, which is characterized by the "Dem Bow" rhythm. The subject of Cruz's song, the negrita, is being advised on how to live a good and enjoyable life: move straight, avoid obstacles, and consider one's actions. Toward the end, a male rapper attempts to seduce the negrita, calling her beautiful and sweet.

Musical Legacy

Cruz received numerous honors, including two Grammy Awards, three honorary doctorates, a star on the Hollywood Walk of Fame (1990), the Golden Eagle Award (1991), and the National Medal of Arts (1994). These tributes recognized her exceptional musicianship and character. Her tenacity and talent allowed her to become prominent in a male-dominated performance field. Cruz paved the way for later female musicians, such as Gloria Estefan and Sheila Escovedo, and she inspired salsa artists, such as Rubén Blades and Willie Colón. Issues of racism and women's rights were frequently addressed in her lyrics. Musically, she gave a voice to the salsa movement in the United States, a voice with which both immigrant and American-born Hispanics could identify. Moreover, her sound and energy captivated non-Hispanics, introducing the general population of the United States to salsa.

Janine Tiffe

Further Reading

Aparicio, Frances R. Listening to Salsa: Gender, Latin Popular Music, and Puerto Rican Cultures. Hanover, N.H.: University Press of New England, 1998. The text focuses on gender issues in salsa music, and several essays discuss Cruz, her repertory, and its feminist implications.

Boggs, Vernon W. Salsiology. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1992. This resource addresses the history of salsa, significant individuals (such as Cruz) in the genre, popularization, and transculturation. Includes photographs and a musical score for "Gonna Salsalido."

Cruz, Celia, and Ana Cristina Reymundo. Celia: My Life. New York: HarperCollins, 2004. Cruz's autobiography recounts her thoughts and feelings regarding her personal life and her career. Includes photographs, discography, and a list of awards and honors.

Gerard, Charley, and Marty Sheller. Salsa! The Rhythm of Latin Music. Crown Point, Ind.: White Cliffs Media, 1989. An educational tool that provides historical context, musical samples, two arrangements, a glossary, and a discography to familiarize the reader with the genre of salsa.

Koskoff, Ellen, ed. The Garland Encyclopedia of World Music: The United States and Canada. New York: Garland, 2001. This series volume contains a wealth of information, and it places Cruz and her music in a geographical context.

See also: Barretto, Ray; Blades, Rubén; Colón, Willie; Puente, Tito.

Xavier Cugat

Cuban Latin violinist and songwriter

A charismatic bandleader of Latin American dance music, Cugat introduced Latin rhythms to North American audiences through live performance, radio, recordings, television, and motion pictures. During the Latin music craze of the 1930's and 1940's, he helped to popularize rumba, tango, cha-cha-cha, conga, and mambo.

Born: January 1, 1900; Girona, Spain
Died: October 27, 1990; Barcelona, Spain
Also known as: Francisco de Asís Javier Cugat Mingall de Bru y Deulofeo (birth name)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Tropical Bouquets, 1949; Xavier Cugat, 1949; Relaxing with Cugat, 1952; Cugat's Favorite Rhumbas, 1954; Mambo at the Waldorf, 1955; The King Plays Some Aces, 1958; Chile con Cugie, 1959; Cugat in Spain, 1959; Cugat in France, Spain, and Italy, 1960; Cugat Plays Continental Favorites, 1961; Viva Cugat!, 1961; Cugi's Cocktails, 1963; Cugat Caricatures, 1964; Xavier Cugat y su oro merengue, 1986.

The Life

Because of his father's political activities, Xavier Cugat (ZAY-vyahr KEW-gaht), at four years of age, and his family fled Spain, sailing from Barcelona to Havana. In Cuba he received his first violin, a quarter-sized version, and quickly demonstrated his aptitude for playing the instrument. While still young, Cugat played for a silent motion-picture theater, foreshadowing his future endeavors in Hollywood.

Cugat embarked on a career as a classical violinist, touring Europe and North America. He made his professional debut at Carnegie Hall in 1918 to tepid reviews. After the New York concert, he returned to Spain to perform with greater success. During the 1920's he joined Vincent Lopez's dance orchestra at the Casa Lopez in New York.

Encountering difficulties as a professional musician, Cugat moved to Los Angeles and worked as a caricaturist for the Los Angeles Times. While in California, he met actor Rudolph Valentino, leading to the formation of a tango orchestra that appeared in the actor's silent film Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse (1921). Cugat and his orchestra, known as Cugat and His Gigolos, also began performing at the Coconut Grove Room at the Ambassador Hotel, playing tangos and teaching audience members the Argentine dance. Cugat formed a new orchestra at the Waldorf Astoria Hotel in New York City in 1930, and that same year, he composed music for the film Gay Madrid. In 1934 he appeared on a weekly radio show Let's Dance. However, he did not reach a national audience until appearing on the radio program The Camel Caravan.

Possibly appearing on film more than any other American bandleader, Cugat was extremely comfortable in front of the camera. For Cugat, motion pictures served as a venue to promote his conception of Latin American dance music. Playing himself in film, Cugat appeared in Let's Go Latin (1937), You Were Never Lovelier (1942), Stage Door Canteen (1943), Two Girls and a Sailor (1944), Bathing Beauty (1944), Weekend at the Waldorf (1945), No Leave, No Love (1946), Holiday in Mexico (1946), This Time for Keeps (1947), A Date with Judy (1948), Luxury Liner (1948), Neptune's Daughter (1949), and more.

Making frequent headlines for his numerous marriages and divorces, Cugat carried out stormy relationships with Rita Montaner, Carmen Castillo, Lorraine Allen, Abbe Lane, and Charo. In 1971 he suffered a stroke, becoming partially paralyzed. Because of his medical difficulties, he retired from music and returned to Spain. In 1990 Cugat died of heart failure in Barcelona.

The Music

During the 1930's and 1940's, Cugat was the bandleader associated with Latin American dance music. He recognized that many North Americans were unfamiliar with Latin music, but they enjoyed its rhythms and musical traits. In the United States and to a lesser degree in Latin America, Cugat and his orchestra appeared on stage, radio, records, and motion pictures, performing numerous Latin American dance genres. Primarily marketing his music to a North American public, he performed rumbas, mambos, tangos, sambas, congas, and cha-chachas; however, his music was a hybrid of Latin American models. In Cuban music, ostinatos built around the son rhythm are crucial for performance. In addition, layered percussion and polyrhythms embraced the Afro-Cuban heritage of Cuba. When Cugat worked as a bandleader in New York at the Waldorf Astoria Hotel during the 1930's and 1940's, two styles of Latin music, uptown and downtown, existed. Uptown music catered to a Latin American diaspora living in the Latin barrio of Harlem. Music that was intended for non-Latinos was performed downtown. Initially, Cugat provided audiences with a Latin dance music that was inauthentic, but eventually he began moving the music closer to traditional Latin American practices. As a bandleader, Cugat arranged the compositions of others for his Latin jazz ensemble.

Xavier Cugat. (AP/Wide World Photos)

"La paloma." Spanish for the dove, the song is by Spanish composer Sebastián Yradier. In Cugat's arrangement, the bandleader employed the characteristic clave rhythm, an Afro-Cuban rhythmic pattern that provides the structural framework of countless Cuban musical works. He arranged the work for a large Latin jazz ensemble, utilizing such Latin percussion instruments as the congas, bongos, and clave. Muted trumpets, piano, and guitar complete the ensemble. Cugat arranged the work as a conga, a song and dance associated with carnival processions that became popular in the United States in the 1940's. The popularity of the conga dance in North America is largely attributed to Desi Arnaz, a former member of Cugat's orchestra, who appeared on the long-running television series I Love Lucy as the husband of Lucille Ball. The choreography of the dance consists of three short steps and a leap that accompanies a repeated rhythmic figure. It can be danced as a couples dance or in a conga line. The term conga became synonymous with Latin American music.

"Perfidia." By Mexican composer Alberto Domínguez, the song takes its title from the Spanish word for perfidy. Cugat arranges the treacherous nature of the music in an ironically gleeful manner. An instrumental version, his arrangement opens with a slow and rhythmically free violin introduction. Strict dance rhythms soon follow, providing a rhythmic ostinato. In place of vocals, instruments trace the melody. He orchestrates the bolero for marimba, muted trumpets, saxophones, and piano, with maracas, bongos, and congas marking time. Intended for dancing, the bolero is in duple meter with a characteristic slow-quick-quick rhythm.

"My Shawl." The song opens with the characteristic rhythm of the rumba foxtrot, a hybrid of the Cuban rumba with the ballroom foxtrot. At a slow tempo, the Latin percussion section, consisting of clave, maracas, bongos, and congas, marks the long-long-short-short rhythm of the dance. Cugat's arrangement employs strings to play the melody and countermelody. Intended for North American audiences, the lyrics are in English, and they alternate against the extended instrumental sections. The rumba originates from Cuba, and Cugat believed that the dance was too difficult for North Americans, especially those he encountered on the dance floor. As a solution, Cugat assembled a simplified version of the Afro-Cuban dance, emphasizing the bass conga-drum accent on the fourth beat. By removing the complex Afro-Cuban polyrhythms associated with the native Cuban model, he made the duple meter of the dance more obvious. In addition, he brought the melody to the forefront of the song.

"Babalú." The song opens with a tribal-like drum introduction, followed by a rhythmically free vocalization on the word babalú. The introduction sets the exotic mood, and claves and cowbell mark the strict dance rhythms within a slow tempo. Highlighted in the arrangement, the piano and muted trumpets alternate with the vocalist. The lyrics are in Spanish, and on occasion the singer comically delivers the lyrics in rapid succession. The song is a mambo, and a large percentage of Cugat's repertoire consists of mambos. In the 1940's, the big band format of North America combined with Afro-Cuban rhythms to create a new genre called the mambo. Arrangers of big band music preferred to write for contrasting instruments in sections. The saxophone section often played an ostinato borrowing from the son, a rhythmic ostinato, and other sections such as trumpet and trombone made musical interjections. Although there are vocals for mambo, it is first and foremost instrumental dance music. Credited with creating the mambo is Cuban bandleader Pérez Prado, and the dance may be described as a slower-tempo rumba.

Musical Legacy

Often leading the band with his violin bow, the engaging bandleader of Latin American dance music introduced Latin rhythms to North American audiences. Believing that North American audiences were more visually than aurally oriented, Cugat created an amalgamated Latin persona. Known for his showmanship and self-parodying, the Spanish-born musician was often seen with a chihuahua in hand, wearing a sombrero, or wrapped in a serape, a traditional blanket shawl. Furthermore, he frequently surrounded himself with beautiful women, perpetuating the image of the Latin lover.

Cugat impacted the popular culture of the United States, appearing in all forms of media. He first reached American homes through the radio, performing his renditions of Latin American music, and then he elevated his persona in motion pictures, in which he portrayed himself.

Most of his childhood musical development occurred in Havana, and the repertoire for Cugat's orchestra included numerous Cuban genres, such as the rumba, conga, mambo, and cha-cha-cha. In addition to the Cuban genres, his orchestra performed Argentine tangos and Brazilian sambas. The Latin music craze of the 1930's and 1940's facilitated the introduction of Latin American music; however, the bandleader altered Latin music to suit the musical tastes of North Americans. Cugat situated the melody in the forefront, as was popular, and simplified the syncopated Latin rhythms by removing layers of percussion. By popularizing Latin American dance music, Cugat paved the way for many other Latin artists, such as Arnaz, Miguelito Valdés, and Tito Rodríguez.

Mark E. Perry

Further Reading

Cugat, Xavier. Rumba Is My Life. New York: Didier, 1948. An early autobiography, written after Cugat's successful career in the United States.

Leymarie, Isabelle. Cuban Fire: The Story of Salsa and Latin Jazz. London: Continuum, 2002. The author explores the history of Cuban music as it spread throughout the United States. She focuses on the development of hybrid genres. Includes illustrations, glossary, discography, and bibliography.

Lowinger, Rosa, and Ofelia Fox. Tropicana Nights: The Life and Times of the Legendary Cuban Nightclub. Orlando, Fla.: Harvest Books, 2005. The authors provide a history of the Tropicana, a Havana nightclub that was significant in the cultural nightlife of prerevolutionary Cuba. The book includes a list of shows at the Tropicana. Includes bibliography.

Morales, Ed. The Latin Beat: The Rhythms and Roots of Latin Music from Bossa Nova to Salsa and Beyond. Cambridge, Mass.: Da Capo Press, 2003. The book is a journalistic approach to the study and history of Latin music in the United States. Includes bibliography.

Orovio, Helio. Cuban Music from A to Z. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 2004. A reference work that provides comprehensive coverage of Cuban music and musicians.

Roberts, John Storm. The Latin Tinge: The Impact of Latin American Music on the United States. 2d ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999. The author explores the influence of Latin American music and musicians on music in the United States. Includes illustrations, glossary, discography, and bibliography.

See also: Blades, Rubén; Prado, Pérez; Puente, Tito.

D

D. M. C.

American rapper and songwriter

A pioneer in hip-hop music, McDaniels is one of the founders of the influential hip-hop group Run-D. M. C., which is credited with creating a commercially viable form of rap and with introducing the genre to mainstream music audiences.

Born: May 31, 1964; New York, New York
Also known as: Darryl Matthews McDaniels (birth name); Darryl Lovelace; DMcD; Grandmaster Get High; Easy D
Member of: Run-D. M. C.

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): Checks, Thugs, and Rock n Roll, 2006.

ALBUMS (with Run-D. M. C.): Run-D. M. C., 1984; King of Rock, 1985; Raising Hell, 1986; Tougher than Leather, 1988; Back from Hell, 1990; Down with the King, 1993; Crown Royal, 2001.

The Life

Darryl McDaniels taught himself to deejay after being inspired by the work of Grandmaster Flash. In the early 1980's, McDaniels joined with Joseph "Run" Simmons to form Run-D. M. C. McDaniels served as the group's deejay until Jason "Jam Master Jay" Mizell joined the group, at which point Simmons encouraged McDaniels to focus on rapping. The group released six albums between 1984 and 1993.

In the late 1990's, D. M. C. was diagnosed with spasmodic dysphonia, a condition that causes spasms of the larynx, a condition he believed was caused by his singing in Run-D. M. C.'s aggressive vocal style and his years of heavy drinking. As a result of his vocal problems (and rumors of creative differences with Simmons), D. M. C. appeared on only three tracks from Run-D. M. C.'s Crown Royal. The group officially disbanded in November, 2002, after Mizell was murdered.

In 2001 McDaniels released his autobiography, King of Rock: Respect, Responsibility, and My Life with Run-D. M. C. During the course of his research for this book, he discovered he had been adopted when he was three months old. A documentary on D. M. C.'s search for his birth mother, D. M. C.: My Adoption Journey, aired on VH1 in February, 2006. D. M. C. released his first solo album, Checks, Thugs, and Rock n Roll, in March, 2006. Later that year D. M. C. was presented with the Congressional Angels in Adoption Award for his work with the Felix Organization, a charity he founded to help provide children waiting to be adopted with a home experience.

The Music

Prior to the work of Run-D. M. C., rap was seen primarily as street music. A few performers, such as the Sugar Hill Gang and Grandmaster Flash, had begun to transform it into a viable recording genre. However, it was the music of Run-D. M. C. that persuaded listeners and recording executives that rap and hip-hop would sell beyond the inner cities. It was one of the first groups to move away from using exclusively background music, or beats, that came from sampling dance records on turntables by tapping into electronic instruments such as synthesizers and drum machines. It also introduced hard rock guitars into a genre that was dominated by the sounds of disco. Run-D. M. C.'s forceful vocal style laid the groundwork for the hardcore rap styles that followed, forcing listeners to pay attention to the words instead of just getting caught up in the music.

"It's Like That." From the first self-titled album, "It's Like That" is largely regarded as the first song to present rap as a commercially viable style. It was one of the first hip-hop songs to use a synthesized accompaniment rather than samples. The song features the two rappers trading lines and uniting for the refrain, "It's like that, and that's the way it is." It is an early example of what has become known as conscious rap, or rap that focuses on social issues rather than boasting or materialism. At times the lyrics forshadow the religious sentiments expressed on Back from Hell and Down with the King.

"Walk This Way." Raising Hell included a cover of Aerosmith's "Walk This Way," in collaboration with Aerosmith's Steve Tyler and Joe Perry. This became the first hip-hop song to break the Top 10 on the Billboard Hot 100 (peaking at number four). As such, it is often considered to be the song that introduced rap to mainstream audiences, primarily because of the video's strong presence on MTV.

The song features a combination of sampling and live music. The underlying drumbeat was played on turntables by Jam Master Jay, and so was the song's signature guitar riff. Tyler's vocals and Perry's guitar solos, which follow each chorus, were performed live in the studio.

"Run's House." This song became an unofficial anthem for Run-D. M. C. after its release on Tougher than Leather. The song is a fairly typical rap about the artists' skills. The two rappers alternate verses, proclaiming their hip-hop superiority and their disdain for those who think rap is just a passing fad that requires no skill. Unlike some songs of this type, neither rapper boasts about his sexual prowess, his physical toughness, or the acts of violence he has committed. "Run's House" is designed for audience participation in a live setting by encouraging listeners to respond to the question "Whose house?" with the response "Run's house!"

"Can I Get a Witness." Run-D. M. C.'s albums Back from Hell and Down with the King reflect the spiritual awakening of the two rappers. In "Can I Get a Witness" from Down with the King, the lyrics demonstrate the same themes as "Run's House," particularly the skills of both rappers and warnings to those who are "pretenders to the throne." However, Run's verses feature blatant references to his Christian faith. Like many of the songs on this album, "Can I Get a Witness" features some samples of jazz and blues instrumental figures.

"Just Like Me." The first single from D. M. C.'s solo debut, Checks, Thugs, and Rock n Roll, "Just Like Me" features D. M. C.'s rapping and the vocals of Sarah McLaughlin. The background is taken from Harry Chapin's "Cat's in the Cradle," the chorus of which is sung by McLaughlin between D. M. C.'s verses. The song is autobiographical, and it focuses on D. M. C.'s adoption.

Musical Legacy

D. M. C.'s legacy is tied to that of Joseph "Run" Simmons and Jason "Jam Master Jay" Mizell. Run-D. M. C. brought rap and hip-hop music out of the inner city to mainstream listeners, encouraging record companies to promote the music of the streets. The group opened the door for a generation of rappers who followed in their footsteps, including LL Cool J, Ice-T, Will Smith, Eminem, and 50 Cent.

Eric S. Strother

Further Reading

Adler, Bill. Tougher than Leather: The Rise of Run-D. M. C. Los Angeles: Consafos, 2002. A look at the tough Queens neighborhood in New York, where the members of Run-D. M. C. lived, and at the birth of rap.

Light, Alan. The Vibe History of Hip-Hop. New York: Three Rivers Press. 1999. This thorough history covers the origins of rap and hip-hop, the effect of the regional rivalries on the development of the music, and the money and power generated by the successful artists. Includes numerous references to Run-D. M. C., a discography, and photographs.

McDaniels, Darryl. King of Rock: Respect, Responsibility, and My Life with Run-D. M. C. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2001. D. M. C. gives an account of his life, including insights into other artists working in rap and hip-hop. He frankly recounts the struggles the members of Run-D. M. C. had with the abuse of drugs and alcohol. His message, "Maturity is not a matter of age," is reflected in his efforts to move rap beyond its sordid gang, sexual, and misogynistic elements.

See also: 50 Cent; Grandmaster Flash; LL Cool J; Simmons, Joseph "Run."

Roger Daltrey

English rock singer and songwriter

Daltrey is considered the voice of the Who, and his energetic stage presence and powerful interpretations of their music were key elements to the success of the band.

Born: March 1, 1944; Hammersmith, London, England
Also known as: Roger Harry Daltrey (full name)
Member of: The Who

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): Daltrey, 1973; Ride a Rock Horse, 1975; One of the Boys, 1977; McVicar, 1980; Parting Should Be Painless, 1984; Under a Raging Moon, 1985; Can't Wait to See the Movie, 1987; Rocks in the Head, 1992.

ALBUMS (with the Who): The Who Sings My Generation, 1965; A Quick One, 1966; Happy Jack, 1967; The Who Sell Out, 1967; Magic Bus, 1968; Tommy, 1969; Who's Next, 1971; Quadrophenia, 1973; The Who by Numbers, 1975; Who Are You, 1978; Face Dances, 1981; It's Hard, 1982; Endless Wire, 2006.

The Life

Roger Harry Daltrey (DAHL-tree) was born to working-class parents in London, and although he excelled at school, he was a born rebel, and he was expelled. After listening to Elvis Presley, he turned to rock music. Initially he played lead guitar in his band, the Detours, which ultimately included members of the Who: John Entwhistle, Pete Townshend, and Keith Moon. When the band's singer departed, Daltrey took over the vocals and Townshend took over the lead-guitar duties.

Daltrey was notorious for being a controlling taskmaster, reportedly hitting band members with whom he disagreed. As the Who's music developed and Townshend became a prolific songwriter, tensions grew, and the band fired Daltrey in 1965. Later they took back the chastened singer in a subordinate role. As the band's popularity grew, its members becoming international stars, Daltrey's stage antics—his bare chest, his microphone twirling, and his booming vocals—came to be a centerpiece of shows.

Tensions arose once more, and after the death of drummer Moon, Daltrey was outspoken in his dissatisfaction of Kenny Jones, the replacement drummer. As the band wound down its activities, Daltrey embarked on solo music projects and launched a successful film, stage, and television acting career.

The Music

The Who began as a cover band, specializing in rhythm and blues and attracting a passionate following among fans known as the Mods. The band's early signature song, "My Generation," owes as much to Townshend's lyrics as to Daltrey's unique delivery, a stuttering that perfectly captures adolescent frustration and rage. Over a series of albums, Daltrey developed from a passionate shouter into a more refined singer, interpreting Townshend's material with sensitivity and insight.

Tommy. The apogee of this partnership began with Tommy, Townshend's rock opera about a deaf, dumb, and blind boy who unwittingly becomes the leader of a generation. Daltrey so energizes and inhabits the songs that he becomes Tommy, as was clearly evident in director Ken Russell's cinematic interpretation of the opera. The range of Daltrey's expression runs the gamut from the sensitive "See Me, Feel Me," to the ecstatic "I'm Free," to the defiant "We're Not Gonna Take It." The record is a tour de force, as much for Townshend's arrangements and often eloquent lyrics as for Daltrey's impassioned singing.

Who's Next. The partnership grew with Who's Next, a mixed collection of songs, some of which were left over from Townshend's aborted Lifehouse project, another putative rock opera. By this point the formerly marginalized Daltrey was now a confident lead man, again revealing a breadth of vocal interpretations from the wistful "The Song Is Over" to the anthemic "Won't Get Fooled Again," a song that aggressively appraised the loss of generational ideals and the despondent realization that the status quo is not easily dismantled. Many regard this as a quintessential rock album, and Daltrey is a major part of that success.

Quadrophenia. Quadrophenia represented another return to Townshend's operatic aspirations, in this case a personal retrospective about his youth as a Mod and about the frustrations and confusions of adolescent yearnings and confused ambitions. The songs chronicle the life of Jimmy, a melancholic teenager who cannot find a comfortable place in the world, except when he is riding his motor scooter or popping pills. Once again, Daltrey metamorphoses into the protagonist, perfectly capturing adolescent angst and trepidation. He delivers another bravura performance, with energetic rocking in "The Real Me" and "Dr. Jimmy," vulnerable pleading in "Sea and Sand," and elegiac serenity in "Love, Reign o'er Me." So involved was he with the project that in 1996 he reunited with Townshend to perform the opera for a royal Prince's Trust concert in Hyde Park. Later, as the band began its tortured disintegration and moved through some desultory offerings, Daltrey delivered stellar performances with "Squeeze Box," "Who Are You," "You Better You Bet," and "Athena."

McVicar. One of Daltrey's most commercially successful solo albums was McVicar, the sound track for a film of the same name starring the singer.

Roger Daltrey. (AP/Wide World Photos)

It included contributions from the other members of the Who, and it produced two hit singles, "Free Me" and "Without Your Love." In 1994, in celebration of his fiftieth birthday, Daltrey performed two shows of Who songs at Carnegie Hall, which led to a tour of the United States.

Later Tours and Albums. In 1996 and 1999 Daltrey rejoined Townshend for Who tours, and in 2001 the band once again re-formed to perform at the Concert for New York, after the September 11 attack on the World Trade Center. The success of that venture led to another tour in 2002, during which Entwhistle died of a drug overdose. In 2006 Daltrey and Townshend, along with other musicians, released the first new Who album in twenty-four years, Endless Wire.

Musical Legacy

While the success of the Who was always a group effort, Daltrey provided unique vocals and extraordinary stage presence that were essential to the band's long and popular career. A key element of the band's longevity, in spite of all the turmoil and clashes of will, was the magical, hypnotic connection between Townshend and Daltrey. On a number of occasions Townshend admitted that without Daltrey there would be no Who, since no one else was capable of interpreting Townshend's material the way the singer does.

Daltrey became one of rock music's iconic front men, handsome, swaggering, and confident. His work extended into other musical idioms, such as traditional Irish music with the Chieftains, with whom he won a Grammy Award in 1991 for An Irish Evening: Live at the Grand Opera House. Daltrey was also extremely supportive of various charities, for which he was given a Commander of the Order of the British Empire for services to music, the entertainment industry, and charity.

David W. Madden

Further Reading

Barnes, Richard. The Who: Maximum Rhythm and Blues. London: Plexus, 2004. Examines the development of the band and analyzes the successes and controversies that have affected individual members.

Ewbank, Tim. Roger Daltrey: The Biography. London: Portrait Books, 2006. A full-length biography of Daltrey, placing him in the context of rock history.

Hearn, Marcus. The Who (Rex Collections). Surrey, England: Reynolds & Hearn, 2005. Traces the band's history from its origins to the summer of 2005. Includes impressive photographs.
Marsh, Dave. Before I Get Old: The Story of the Who. London: Plexus, 2003. Excellent assessment of the band and individual members by a prolific music critic.
Neill, Andrew, and Matthew Kent. Anyway, Anyhow, Anywhere: The Complete Chronicle of the Who, 1958-1978. London: Sterling, 2005. With a foreword by Daltrey, this is a day-to-day diary that chronicles the formation and development of the band.

See also: Morrison, Jim; Plant, Robert; Presley, Elvis; Strummer, Joe; Townshend, Pete.

Hal David

American film and musical-theater composer/lyricist

Best known for his collaboration with composer Burt Bacharach, with whom he wrote dozens of top hits of the 1960's and 1970's, David also wrote lyrics for songs in the big band and country-music genres.

Born: May 25, 1921; New York, New York

Principal works

MUSICAL THEATER (lyrics): Promises, Promises, 1968 (libretto by Neil Simon; music by Burt Bacharach); The Look of Love, 2003 (libretto by David Thompson; music by Bacharach).
SONGS (written with Burt Bacharach): "The Story of My Life," 1957 (recorded by Marty Robbins); "Magic Moments," 1958 (recorded by Perry Como); "The Night That Heaven Fell," 1958 (recorded by Tony Bennett); "Loving Is a Way of Living," 1959 (recorded by Steve Lawrence); "I Could Make You Mine," 1960 (recorded by the Wanderers); "Gotta Get a Girl," 1961 (recorded by Frankie Avalon); "Don't Make Me Over," 1963 (recorded by Dionne Warwick); "Anyone Who Had a Heart," 1964 (recorded by Warwick); "Send Me No Flowers," 1964 (Doris Day); "(There's) Always Something There to Remind Me," 1964 (recorded by Lou Johnson); "Walk on By," 1964 (recorded by Warwick); "I Say a Little Prayer," 1965 (recorded by Jackie DeShannon); "Make It Easy on Yourself," 1965 (recorded by Warwick); "What the World Needs Now Is Love," 1965 (recorded by DeShannon); "What's New Pussycat?" 1965 (recorded by Tom Jones); "Alfie," 1966 (recorded by Warwick); "Promise Her Anything," 1966 (recorded by Jones); "The Look of Love," 1967 (recorded by Dusty Springfield); "Do You Know the Way to San Jose," 1968 (recorded by Warwick); "Don't Go Breakin' My Heart," 1968 (recorded by Johnny Mathis); "I'll Never Fall in Love Again," 1968 (recorded by Warwick); "This Guy's in Love with You," 1968 (recorded by Herb Alpert); "Raindrops Keep Fallin' on My Head," 1969 (recorded by B. J. Thomas); "One Less Bell to Answer," 1970 (recorded by the Fifth Dimension); "(They Long to Be) Close to You," 1970 (recorded by the Carpenters).
SONGS: "The Four Winds and the Seven Seas," 1949 (with Don Rodney; recorded by Vic Damone); "The Good Times Are Comin'," 1970 (with John Barry; recorded by Mama Cass Elliot); "Ninety-Nine Miles from L.A.," 1975 (with Albert Hammond; recorded by Art Garfunkel); "Almost Like a Song," 1977 (with Archie Jordan; recorded by Ronnie Milsap); "To All the Girls I've Loved Before," 1984 (with Hammond; recorded by Willie Nelson and Julio Iglesias).

The Life

Hal David was the youngest of three sons born to Gedalier David, owner and operator of a delicatessen on Pennsylvania Avenue in Brooklyn, and his wife Lina Goldberg. Though his parents wanted him to be a musician, and his older brother Mack was already writing songs for Tin Pan Alley by the time David was a teenager, David decided to study journalism at New York University. A summer internship in his sophomore year led to a job offer at the New York Post. However, when the United States entered World War II, David was drafted, and he was assigned to an entertainment section of Special Services in Hawaii, where he wrote comedy sketches and song lyrics for shows with fellow soldier Carl Reiner, who became a television comedy writer.

After the war, David went to Broadway, but he did not find success until bandleader Sammy Kaye bought "Isn't This Better than Working in the Rain" in 1947 and hired David for his radio show. That Christmas Eve David married schoolteacher Anne Rauchmann. His first hit came in 1949 with "The Four Winds and the Seven Seas," a folksy ballad cowritten with bandleader Guy Lombardo's vocalist Don Rodney. After a string of minor successes, David met composer Burt Bacharach in 1957, and a classic partnership began.

The Music

While his hit-making is popularly linked with Bacharach, David wrote successful lyrics before and after his Bacharach partnership. His first hit with Bacharach was not on the Top 40 pop charts but rather on the country-western charts. "The Story of My Life" hit big for Marty Robbins in 1957. After his success with Bacharach, David would return to country music, and in 1984 he was inducted into the Nashville Songwriters Hall of Fame. The Bacharach-David team scored again with "Magic Moments" for Perry Como in February of 1958. However, it was their collaboration with singer Dionne Warwick that brought Bacharach and David their biggest success.

"What the World Needs Now Is Love." This 1965 hit is David's favorite example of "slow growth" in the creative process and making the lyric fit the mood. The main idea and phrase, "What the world needs now is love," came immediately to him, and then he built the first stanza around it. Then he wanted to contrast the idea with a list of what the world does not need. At first, David listed airplanes and other technological boons, but none of those fit the mood. He put away the lyric for several years, until Jackie DeShannon was looking for an inspirational song. David pulled out the song, intuitively realizing that the contrary elements should be from the natural world. DeShannon recorded the hit version in 1965, but David's personal favorite was Warwick's 1971 recording. It has been covered by several pop and country stars, including Barry Manilow, Wynona Judd, Ed Ames, and the Supremes. Warwick remarked that this song should be a second national anthem.

"Make It Easy on Yourself." David had an astonishing twenty-one Top 40 hits recorded by Warwick throughout the 1960's. David and Bacharach had written "Make It Easy on Yourself" for Warwick, but the more established vocalist Jerry Butler heard her demo, liked it, and recorded his own version first, which went to number twenty. Angry at what she saw as betrayal by the songwriters, Warwick told them, "Don't make me over, man!" David had never heard the idiom, which means "don't try to cheat me," and he turned it into a song for Warwick, which made peace between them—especially when it became a Top 40 hit, peaking at number twenty-five on the Billboard Hot 100 and going all the way to number five on the rhythm-and-blues charts. There were multiple Bacharach-David hits for Warwick in the 1960's, and ironically the string ended in 1970 with "Make It Easy on Yourself"—the song that should have been Warwick's first hit. It did not climb as high as the Butler version on the Billboard Hot 100, but it reached number two on the rhythm-and-blues charts.

Country-Western. After the Bacharach-David partnership broke up over the failure, artistically and financially, of a film they had scored (Lost Horizon in 1972), David wrote a number of country-western hits with various composers. His 1977 "Almost Like a Song" (with music by Archie Jordan) rose to the top spot on the country charts for Ronnie Milsap, and it became a crossover hit in the adult contemporary category, where it hit number seven. Another crossover hit was recorded by the unconventional duo of operatic tenor Julio Iglesias and country superstar Willie Nelson. Written by David with Albert Hammond, "To All the Girls I've Loved Before" reached the top of the country charts in May, 1984, and peaked at number five on the Billboard Hot 100.

Musical Legacy

One measure of David's influence on the recording industry is his leadership in its professional organizations. From 1980 to 1986, he served as president of the American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers (ASCAP), and in 2008 he served on its board of directors. In 1998 he became chairman of the board of the National Academy of Popular Music, which oversees the Songwriters Hall of Fame, and he continued in the chair for more than a decade. In 1969 David and Bacharach won an Academy Award for Best Song for "Raindrops Keep Fallin' on My Head," from Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid (1969). Three David songs—"Don't Make Me Over," "(They Want to Be) Close to You," and "Walk on By"—are in the Grammy Hall of Fame (a designation for songs at least twenty-five years old with "qualitative or historical significance").

John R. Holmes

Further Reading

David, Hal. What the World Needs Now and Other Love Lyrics. New York: Trident Press, 1968. David gives the lyrics to sixty-two of his hit songs, and they are liberally annotated with background stories.

Friedlander, Paul. Rock and Roll: A Social History. 2d ed. Boulder, Colo.: Westview Press, 2006. While this general history specifically focuses on the rock idiom, which was not the category in which David placed his lyrics, it is a good introduction to the musical milieu in which David created his most enduring work.

Platts, Robin. Burt Bacharach and Hal David: What the World Needs Now. New York: Collector's Guide, 2003. Although this is primarily a discography and a guide for collectors of David-Bacharach material, this book also includes a substantial biography of both David and Bacharach.

Pollock, Bruce. In Their Own Words. New York: Collier Books, 1975. This series of interviews with rock songwriters of the 1960's is prefaced by an interview with David, billed as a transitional figure from the big band era to the 1960's.

Toop, David. Exotica. New York: Serpent's Tale, 1999. While this book canvasses exotic music, avoiding the Top 40 material that made David's career, Toop includes a revealing interview with Bacharach discussing his work with David.

See also: Alpert, Herb; Bacharach, Burt; Carpenter, Karen; Elliot, Cass; Garfunkel, Art; Iglesias, Julio; Mathis, Johnny; Milsap, Ronnie; Nelson, Willie; Warwick, Dionne.

Ray Davies

English singer, guitarist, and songwriter

Davies was the leader, singer, and songwriter of the Kinks, one of the most innovative of the British Invasion bands.

Born: June 21, 1944; London, England
Also known as: Raymond Douglas Davies (full name)
Member of: The Kinks

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): Return to Waterloo, 1985; The Storyteller, 1998; Other People's Lives, 2006.

ALBUMS (with the Kinks): You Really Got Me, 1964; Kinda Kinks, 1965; The Kink Kontroversy, 1965; Face to Face, 1966; Something Else, 1967; The Kinks Are the Village Green Preservation Society, 1968; Arthur: Or, The Decline and Fall of the British Empire, 1969; Lola Versus Powerman and the Moneygoround, 1970; Muswell Hillbillies, 1971; Everybody's in Show-Biz, 1972; Preservation, Act I, 1973; Preservation, Act II, 1974; Schoolboys in Disgrace, 1975; Soap Opera, 1975; Sleepwalker, 1977; Misfits, 1978; Low Budget, 1979; One for the Road, 1980; Give the People What They Want, 1981; State of Confusion, 1983; Word of Mouth, 1984; Think Visual, 1986; U.K. Jive, 1989; Phobia, 1993; To the Bone, 1996.

WRITINGS OF INTEREST: X-Ray, 1994 (autobiography).

The Life

Raymond Douglas Davies was born in a north London working-class district, one of eight children. Davies briefly attended art college, and he then turned to music, playing in jazz bands until he joined his younger brother, Dave (David Russell Gordon Davies), to play rock and roll. Initially known as the Ravens, they changed their name in 1963 to the Kinks, and they scored a huge hit with "You Really Got Me," which topped the British charts and went to number seven in the United States. A string of other popular songs followed, all written by Davies, that established the band as one of the most popular and prolific of the 1960's.

The Kinks produced twenty-three albums over the next three decades, and when their popularity waned in England, they continued to be a major draw in the United States, where their records continued to sell well. In 1990 Davies and the band were inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame and into England's Music Hall of Fame in 2005. In 2003 he was named a Commander of the British Empire, and shortly thereafter he was shot in the leg by a mugger while visiting a nephew in New Orleans. After the dissolution of the Kinks in 1996, he released several solo albums.

The Music

The Kinks' first two American albums contained some original material, but they also relied upon cover versions of others' songs. Their third album, The Kink Kontroversy, included only one cover song (an inspired version of "Milk Cow Blues"), and Davies compositions, which were tuneful as well as considerably thoughtful. Face to Face came after Davies had suffered a nervous breakdown, which he commented on in the sardonic "Sunny Afternoon," and the album included a number of songs of social commentary that would characterize his songwriting throughout his career.

Something Else and Concept Albums. Something Else continued in the same vein, with songs that moved completely away from the band's hard-rocking early efforts and into an increasingly meditative strain. "Waterloo Sunset," the album's highlight, is considered one of Davies's most beautiful songs. Their next album, The Kinks Are the Village Green Preservation Society, was an early concept album built around nostalgic reflections on village life, and it sold poorly. Some criticized the album for its sentimentality, though in later years it has come to be regarded as one of the band's best. Ar- thur: Or, The Decline and Fall of the British Empire, originally written as the sound track for an unreleased television play, stands as another concept album, inspired by Davies's, his sister's, and his brother-in-law's emigration to Australia, and it was a critical success.

Ray Davies. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Lola Versus Powerman and the Moneygoround. Lola Versus Powerman and the Moneygoround was Davies's ironic look at the music industry, which he believed had not treated him and the band well. The songs were the most varied of any album up to that point, and it produced the huge hit, "Lola," a mainstay of the Kinks' live shows. After this success, the band switched labels, produced one excellent album that observed their working-class origins (Muswell Hillbillies), and then embarked on a series of ill-fated concept albums that offered little in the way of serious music.

Sleepwalker and the 1980's. With the release of Sleepwalker on yet another new label, the band regained some of its vigor. Gone were the self-conscious concepts and tired performances, as Davies reflected seriously on his career and musical ambitions. Misfits, an upbeat work, featured ironic lyrics and an excellent single, "A Rock 'n' Roll Fantasy." Low Budget was a strong effort, which found the band playing with renewed energy and which reestablished it as a determinedly rock band. Low Budget earned the band its first gold record since the 1960's. A second gold record followed in 1980 with the live recording One for the Road.

In the 1980's the band was writing and playing almost exclusively for an American audience, their sound streamlined and punchy. Albums such as Give the People What They Want, State of Confusion, Word of Mouth, and Think Visual produced modest radio successes, and they kept the band on the road and in the public eye. Although none of these matched their earlier efforts, many good songs were collected for Come Dancing with the Kinks.

To the Bone and Solo Works. To the Bone, a twenty-nine-song retrospective that includes two excellent new compositions, was recorded just before the Kinks split. After disbanding the group, Davies started a solo tour when his autobiography was published, reading excerpts, then playing various songs, which were collected on the album The Storyteller. The success of that show led VH1 to create a series titled Storytellers, on which artists would play selected songs and reminisce about their careers. Another solo album, Other People's Lives, appeared in 2006.

Musical Legacy

Davies crafted a remarkable musical career out of an astounding catalog of songs that deal with frustration, social commentary, cultural decay, and a flinty appreciation for the past and traditions. His song "Twentieth Century Man" is a deeply personal anthem of a man trapped in a modern world he finds depraved. Although Davies often betrays his deep emotions, his songs are rarely maudlin, and they are frequently marked by an astringent sense of irony.

Rock musicians have paid tribute to the Kinks for the visceral appeal of their early songs, some even contending that the concept of power chords originated with the band. Davies's sense of theatricality led to many experiments and concept albums, and in the 1970's the group often toured in costume, not only playing music but also acting out the dramas Davies had created. In his songs, Davies has continually denounced power, corruption, and commercialism, always championing the outsider, the iconoclast, and the forgotten. For these reasons, he has been extolled as a rocker with a conscience.

David W. Madden

Further Reading

Davies, Dave. Kink: An Autobiography. New York: Hyperion, 1998. Written in response to his brother's autobiography, Davies reveals alternate views of the band and his older brother, who cast such a broad shadow.

Davies, Ray. X-Ray. Woodstock, N.Y.: Overlook Press, 1996. An imaginative, often hilarious, look into Ray Davies's life, his inspirations, and his creative ambitions. Full of revealing insights into the band, its inception, its leader's often ambivalent attitudes toward his mates, and its dealings with the music industry.

Marten, Neville, and Jeff Hudson. The Kinks. London: Sanctuary, 2001. An authoritative look at the band, revealing details about each member (with a focus on Ray Davies) and about the band's development.

Mendelssohn, John. The Kinks Kronikles. New York: Morrow, 1984. The first biography of the band by a journalist who had followed the band for years. Without the cooperation of the band members, the writer relied on band associates for much of his information. Mendelssohn praises the band's early work, but he is a critic of its later efforts in the 1980's.

Savage, Jon. Kinks: The Official Biography. London: Faber & Faber, 1985. A straightforward, though superficial, examination of the band and its principal members. Savage gained the band's cooperation in preparing the book, but he is not always successful in exploring personalities or presenting details.

See also: Costello, Elvis; Hynde, Chrissie; Jagger, Sir Mick; Lennon, John; McCartney, Sir Paul; Strummer, Joe.

Miles Davis

American jazz composer and trumpet player

An important figure in jazz, Davis became famous for his trumpet playing, which managed to convey sensitivity and thoughtfulness. In addition, he was influential as a bandleader, with a striking ability to put together highly creative groups of musicians.

Born: May 26, 1926; Alton, Illinois
Died: September 28, 1991; Santa Monica, California
Also known as: Miles Dewey Davis III (full name)
Member of: The Miles Davis Quintet; the Second Quintet

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): Birth of the Cool, 1949; Blue Period, 1951; Conception, 1951 (with Stan Getz); Diggin', 1951; The New Sounds of Miles Davis, 1951; Blue Haze, 1953; Miles Davis Quartet, 1953 (with Miles Davis Quartet); Bags' Groove, 1954 (with Modern Jazz Giants); Miles Davis and the Modern Jazz Giants, 1954 (with Modern Jazz Giants); Walkin', 1954 (with others); Miles Davis and Horns, '51-'53, 1955; Miles Davis and Milt Jackson Quintet/Sextet, 1955 (with Milt Jackson); Miles Ahead, 1957 (with Gil Evans); Milestones, 1958; Porgy and Bess, 1958 (with Evans); Kind of Blue, 1959; Sketches of Spain, 1959; Someday My Prince Will Come, 1961; Quiet Nights, 1962 (with Evans); The Man with the Horn, 1981; Star People, 1982; Decoy, 1983; Aura, 1985; You're Under Arrest, 1985; Tutu, 1986; Music from Siesta, 1987; Amandla, 1989; Bags' Groove, 1990; Dingo, 1990 (with Michel Legrand); Miles and Horns, 1990; Doo-Bop, 1991.

ALBUMS (with the Miles Davis Quintet): Miles Davis Quintet, 1954; The Musings of Miles, 1955; The New Miles Davis Quintet, 1955; Round About Midnight, 1955; Cookin', 1956; Relaxin', 1956; Steamin', 1956; Workin', 1956; Seven Steps to Heaven, 1963; E. S. P., 1965; Miles Smiles, 1966; Nefertiti, 1967; Sorcerer, 1967; Water Babies, 1967; Filles de Kilimanjaro, 1968; Miles in the Sky, 1968; Big Fun, 1969; Bitches Brew, 1969; In a Silent Way, 1969; Live-Evil, 1970; A Tribute to Jack Johnson, 1970; Get Up with It, 1972; On the Corner, 1972.

The Life

Miles Dewey Davis III grew up in East St. Louis, Illinois, in a middle-class African American family. His father was a respected dentist, and his mother was a capable violinist and pianist. Davis took up the trumpet at the age of nine or ten, beginning lessons with a teacher from the local school district. By the time Davis was sixteen, he was playing professionally around St. Louis. At the age of eighteen, he moved to New York, ostensibly to study at the Juilliard School, but he soon teamed up with his musical idol, Charlie Parker. Davis shared a room briefly with Parker, and Davis began to play in Parker's quintet as well as in other combos and big bands. In the early 1950's, Davis became addicted to heroin. Although he made several recordings for the Prestige label, his work suffered, he became unreliable, and he resorted to pimping and to theft. He reported that he felt himself "sinking . . . toward death." He went back to his parents' house, got off drugs completely, and in 1954 he returned to New York in good health and fully focused on his music.

Davis's comeback was marked by a notable appearance at the Newport Jazz Festival in 1955. As a result, Davis was signed to Columbia Records, a company that had money to spend on production and on advertising. New projects included quintet and sextet recordings and some orchestral records in arrangements by Gil Evans. He became a recognizable figure. In 1959 he released one of his most famous recordings, Kind of Blue.

Miles Davis. (AP/Wide World Photos)

In the early 1960's, Davis's life was troubled by illness, by the death of his parents, by another marital failure, and by uncertainty about his own music. Gradually, Davis managed to form a new group, one made up of younger players, which became known as the Second Quintet. It toured widely and produced several recordings. From 1968 to 1975, Davis was involved in jazz-rock fusion. Because of the popularity and greatly enhanced sales of Davis's recordings in this style, he was called variously a visionary and a sell-out.

From the mid-1970's until 1980, Davis withdrew entirely from performing, living a reclusive existence, listening to music, taking up painting, and indulging in alcohol, cigarettes, and drugs. In 1980 he began to record again, and in 1981 he returned to touring. During this last period of his life, Davis enjoyed his popularity, almost worshipped by his fans and admired by his fellow musicians.

Davis's personal life was revealed in his autobiography and in several biographies. He was a difficult man, abusive to his wives, and an unreliable father to his children. In terms of his musical accomplishments, he is regarded as one of the most creative and influential jazz musicians. After a stroke, Davis died at the age of sixty-five of respiratory failure.

The Music

Davis lived during an active time in jazz history, when musical styles were changing radically every few years. Remarkably, Davis was responsible for many of the stylistic shifts. He despised repetition, and he was constantly reinventing himself and his music. From bop, to cool, to hard bop, to modal, to post-bop and fusion, Davis was either associated with the change or single-handedly introduced it. His trumpet skills were not virtuosic. He preferred a straight vibratoless tone, and he tended to play mostly in the middle register of the instrument. His improvisations were epigrammatic, relying on an expressive use of pauses and silence. After moving to New York, he began playing in a small bebop combo with Parker, whose jazz improvisations were legendary. Early recordings show Davis to be a nervous and uncertain trumpeter playing next to Parker, a saxophone player nearing the height of his powers. By 1949, however, Davis had gained enough musical maturity to be asked to form a temporary group, which, under the guidance of skilled composer and arranger Gil Evans, ultimately recorded twelve sides. A few years later, these became known collectively as the Birth of the Cool. After his comeback in the mid-1950's, Davis began to focus on a new technique, in which he played close to the microphone through a Harmon mute without the central stem, creating a sound that was both expressive and intimate. Some of the recordings from this time demonstrate Davis's new path, a funky kind of blues known as hard bop. In the late 1950's, new projects included several quintet recordings with Davis's principal foil, John Coltrane, on tenor saxophone, and some orchestral records, with Davis primary in a large group of players in arrangements by Evans. The best of these are Miles Ahead, Porgy and Bess, and Sketches of Spain. Perhaps the most influential recording was the classic Kind of Blue.

With his Second Quintet in the mid-1960's, Davis forged flexible and free music known as post-bop. By the late 1960's, Davis took another direction, melding rock music and jazz in fusion. Among Davis's last recordings was a move in the direction of the latest musical trend, toward jazz versions of pop tunes and incorporations of rap music. The recordings of his last ten years were culled by his longtime producer, Teo Macero, from hours of free-flowing performances, involving many players and with Davis's horn fitted out with a microphone and attached electronically to a wah-wah pedal. Critics are strongly divided about the musical quality of these recordings. Davis often attached his own name to compositions by his sidemen, so which pieces are indisputably his is unclear. Nevertheless, several compositions attributed to him have become jazz standards.

Birth of the Cool. These twelve sides from recording sessions in 1949 evoke a new sound—smoother, more contrapuntal, more arranged, and less frenetic than bop—with a nine-piece band made up of only one instrument on each part and weighted toward the mellow range of the sound spectrum. Notable tracks include "Move," "Deception," and "Boplicity."

"Walkin'," "Oleo," and "Bags' Groove." These quintet tracks, whose new expansiveness was made possible by the introduction in the early 1950's of the long-playing record, are trailblazers of the hard bop style—more bluesy, simpler, and catchier than bebop and cool jazz.

Kind of Blue. For this album, the standard quintet group was joined by Julian "Cannonball" Adderley on alto saxophone and by the lyrical and expressive Bill Evans on piano. The new style was later named modal jazz, with its long stretches of unchanging harmony and its unusual scales. The music is moody and introspective. There is one of the most famous albums in the history of jazz.

Miles Smiles. The Second Quintet, with Wayne Shorter (tenor saxophone), Herbie Hancock (piano), Ron Carter (bass), and Tony Williams (drums), toured widely, and it made several recordings in Davis's new approach to the musical possibilities in jazz: post-bop. This flexible style incorporated elements of modal jazz and free jazz, with more balanced and interactive roles among the participants.

In a Silent Way and Bitches Brew. These albums were Davis's new challenge to jazz (or capitulation to rock). The music incorporates the bass-heavy, repetitive riffs and electric instruments (particularly bass and keyboard) of rock music, over which Davis improvises with originality and flair. His groups expanded to include a constantly changing mix of participants, including John McLaughlin, Chick Corea, Keith Jarrett, Joe Zawinul, Dave Holland, and others, many of whom went on to form their own fusion groups.

Doo-Bop. Released posthumously, this album features Davis collaborating with rap producer Easy Mo Bee. The instrumental numbers are strong and inventive, though the rapping on the vocal tracks is weak. The experiment shows that Davis never lost his enthusiasm for new music.

Musical Legacy

Davis was far more than a trumpet player: He once said that the trumpet was "just a tool . . . a magic wand." He possessed an uncanny ability to envision significant stylistic shifts in jazz and to make them happen, partly by utilizing his sheer creativity, insight, and ego and partly by putting together groups of musicians who inspired him and each other to play at the top of their abilities. Davis was single-handedly responsible for moving bebop toward cool and then hard bop. He invented (with Bill Evans) modal jazz and (with the Second Quintet) the post-bop style. Finally, he was responsible for creating new styles that merged jazz and rock, jazz and pop, and jazz and rap. His personal style, his intensity, and his signature sound on his muted trumpet influenced generations of jazz musicians. With his remarkable skill in forging new directions for music, he changed the way musicians and listeners regarded jazz.

Jeremy Yudkin

Further Reading

Carr, Ian. Miles Davis: The Definitive Biography. Rev. ed. New York: Thunder's Mouth, 1998. The author, a trumpet player, offers a thorough account of Davis's life, with general discussions of albums, a detailed discography, and insightful comments on Davis's playing.

Chambers, Jack. Milestones: The Music and Times of Miles Davis. New York: Da Capo, 1998. This full-length biography of Davis gives detailed and thorough discussions of recordings, organized by studio dates.

Cook, Richard. It's About That Time: Miles Davis On and Off Record. New York: Oxford University Press, 2005. This source presents a systematic discussion of Davis's recordings.

Davis, Miles, with Quincy Troupe. Miles: The Autobiography. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1989. A detailed and unsparing autobiography contains important insights into Davis's views on his life, his music, and that of other musicians.

Tingen, Paul. Miles Beyond: The Electric Explorations of Miles Davis, 1967-1991. New York: Billboard, 2003. A thoughtful and sympathetic review of the electric period of Davis's work, from 1967 until his death. With more than fifty interviews, this resource passionately defends the seriousness of Davis's work in this sometimes controversial genre.

Yudkin, Jeremy. Miles Davis, Miles Smiles, and the Invention of Post-Bop. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2008. A survey of Davis's career and discussions of his best tracks from the late 1940's to the mid-1960's. Includes an analysis of the post-bop album Miles Smiles and pinpoints the musical elements of cool, hard bop, modal, and post-bop styles.

See also: Adderley, Cannonball; Alpert, Herb; Belafonte, Harry; Burton, Gary; Carter, Benny; Coltrane, John; Corea, Chick; Evans, Bill; Getz, Stan; Hancock, Herbie; Hawkins, Coleman; Jarrett, Keith; Jones, Elvin; Jones, Hank; Jones, Quincy; Legrand, Michel; Marsalis, Wynton; Montgomery, Wes; Parker, Charlie; Roach, Max; Rollins, Sonny; Shorter, Wayne; Slick, Grace; Stone, Sly; Young, Lester.

Sammy Davis, Jr.

American jazz and popular music singer

Davis's many performances in Las Vegas and nightclubs around the country, as well as his membership in Frank Sinatra's famous Rat Pack, served to make white audiences more accepting of black entertainers. African American entertainers such as Ben Vereen, Gregory Hines, and Michael Jackson would owe much of their success to Davis's trailblazing career.

Born: December 8, 1925; New York, New York
Died: May 16, 1990; Beverly Hills, California
Also known as: Samuel George Davis, Jr. (full name)
Member of: The Will Mastin Trio

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Just for Lovers, 1955; Starring Sammy Davis, Jr., 1955; Here's Looking at You, 1956; Boy Meets Girl, 1957 (with Carmen McRae); Sammy Swings, 1957; Mood to be Wooed, 1958; Porgy and Bess, 1959; Sammy Davis Jr., at Town Hall, 1959; I Got a Right to Swing, 1960; Sammy Awards, 1960; Wham of Sam, 1961; All-Star Spectacular, 1962; Belts the Best of Broadway, 1962; As Long as She Needs Me, 1963; Forget-Me-Nots for First Nighters, 1963; California Suite, 1964; Salutes the Stars of the London Palladium, 1964; The Shelter of Your Arms, 1964; Sings the Big Ones for Young Lovers, 1964; If I Ruled the World, 1965; The Nat King Cole Songbook, 1965; Our Shining Hour, 1965 (with Count Basie); Sammy's Back on Broadway, 1965; Try a Little Tenderness, 1965; The Sammy Davis, Jr. Show, 1966; Sammy Davis, Jr. Sings and Laurindo Almeida Plays, 1966 (with Laurindo Almeida); Sammy Davis, Jr. Sings the Complete Dr. Doolittle, 1967; I've Gotta Be Me, 1968; Lonely Is the Name, 1968; The Goin's Great, 1969; Something for Everyone, 1970; Portrait of Sammy Davis, Jr., 1972; Sammy Davis, Jr. Now, 1972; Sammy Davis, Jr., 1984.

WRITINGS OF INTEREST: Yes I Can, 1965; Why Me?, 1989.

The Life

The parents of Samuel George Davis, Jr., were vaudeville dancers who separated when he was three. Davis's father taught him to dance, and the boy also learned to play several instruments. Together with Davis, Sr.'s friend Will Mastin, they formed the Will Mastin Trio, which Sammy included in his billing through much of his career. Davis was drafted into the army during World War II, where he served in an entertainment unit and where, for the first time, he also encountered widespread racism. After the war he again joined his father and Mastin to tour the country playing nightclubs. Davis lost his left eye in an automobile accident in 1954, which led to his conversion to Judaism.

The five-foot three-inch Davis began to gain nationwide prominence in the 1950's. His first single, "Hey There," from the musical Pajama Game (1954), was a success. In 1959 he joined Frank Sinatra's group of buddies and performers, which the press had dubbed the Rat Pack. Davis made several films with the group and often performed with them in Las Vegas, where he was the headliner at the Frontier Casino.

Davis played an important role in the Civil Rights movement. His political activity attracted controversy when he was snubbed by John F. Kennedy over his marriage to a white woman, the Swedish actress May Britt, and again when he endorsed Richard Nixon for president in 1972. Throughout his life, he fought not only this sort of overt racism but also a subtler form of racism, in that he was often the victim of tokenism as a highly intelligent, articulate, and multitalented African American who found himself touted as a positive example by well-meaning but insensitive whites.

Davis, who smoked six packs of cigarettes per day and struggled with alcohol and drugs, died of throat cancer in 1990. A nation that had witnessed the Civil Rights movement, the decline of segregation, and the beginnings of a transformation in race relations, deeply mourned his death.

The Music

The arc of Davis's career encompassed four periods: his early career as he made a name for himself in clubs and Las Vegas, the years during which he starred in the Rat Pack films and two Broadway musicals, a period of decline brought on in part by Davis's addiction to drugs and alcohol, and his final years, when new audiences cheered his now classic performances of "Mr. Bojangles" and "The Candy Man." The focus here is on his heyday on Broadway, though he later became equally well known for playing the role of Big Daddy Brubeck singing "Rhythm of Life" in Bob Fosse's Sweet Charity (1968), along with performances on many television variety shows. A film of Davis performing when he was sixty—only a few years before his death—shows that his singing, dancing, and impersonation skills were as strong as they had been thirty years earlier.

Mr. Wonderful. Composer Jule Styne (later famous for his 1964 musical Funny Girl) conceived this 1956 musical about a young New York entertainer who eventually makes it big at a Palm Beach nightclub. The musical was a vehicle to show off Davis's talents, but composer Jerry Bock, who would go on to write Fiorello! (1959) and Fiddler on the Roof (1964), wrote the songs in his first full score for Broadway. Davis's supporting cast were given most of the songs designed to move the weak plot along, because Davis had little prior acting experience. In "Without You I'm Nothing," however, he was able to display his formidable impersonation skills. Davis's big number from the show, which he included in many of subsequent his nightclub and television performances, was "Too Close for Comfort." The title song was recorded by Sarah Vaughan and Peggy Lee.

Golden Boy. By the time this 1964 musical (based on Clifford Odets's acclaimed 1937 play) was created for Davis, with songs by Charles Strouse and Lee Adams, Davis had honed his acting skills in the Rat Pack pictures. The last, the musical Robin and the Seven Hoods (1964), premiered the same year as this musical.

Golden Boy tells the tragic story of young boxer, Joe Wellington (Davis), as he is groomed for success by a white promoter, but he loses his love and ultimately his life in the process. The songs for Davis's second musical have a harder edge than those for Mr. Wonderful, reflecting the bitter tone of the plot. The protagonist in Odets's play had been Italian; the racial elements were added for Davis and to make the material relevant to Civil Rights era America. Davis's falling in love with a white woman was a shocking subject for a musical in 1964, although most audiences knew of his marriage to Britt. None of the songs was a major hit, although Davis's performance of "Night Song" prompted a later recording by Sarah Vaughan.

Porgy and Bess. Davis's first film appearance was at the age of seven, when he sang and danced in the twenty-one-minute film Rufus Jones for President (1933), with Ethel Waters. His first major film role was as Sportin' Life in director Otto Preminger's troubled 1959 production of George Gershwin's Porgy and Bess (1935), costarring Sidney Poitier and Dorothy Dandridge. Cab Calloway sang Davis's songs on the long-playing recording because of contractual conflicts, but a television performance of Davis singing "There's a Boat Dat's Leavin' Soon for New York" was later recorded on DVD in a compilation of Davis performances.

Musical Legacy

Davis was a consummate performer who lived to go on stage and be cheered by an audience. Few performers in his own era or today have matched his ability to sing, dance, play musical instruments, and do dead-on impersonations. Davis possessed a technically remarkable tenor voice; although he never created a distinctive or innovative vocal style, as did singers such as Sinatra and Vaughan, his ability to tell a story in delivering his many signature tunes, such as "Mr. Bo Jangles," moved audiences deeply.

Davis's contribution lay in breaking through the color barrier for black performers in the 1950's and 1960's, becoming the most popular nightclub performer of his era next to Sinatra. Davis was nominated for a Tony for Golden Boy and was an honoree at the Kennedy Center Honors in 1987. Equally important to him were his awards from the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) in 1968 and 1989. When Davis died, Las Vegas turned off the lights on The Strip for ten minutes in his honor.

David E. Anderson

Further Reading

Davis, Sammy, Jr., Jane Boyar, and Burt Boyar. Sammy: The Autobiography of Sammy Davis, Jr. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2000. Burt Boyar revised Davis's two volumes of autobiography, Yes I Can (1965) and Why Me? (1989), and added new material for this one-volume survey of the singer-actor-activist's extraordinary life.

Davis, Tracey, and Dolores A. Barclay. Sammy Davis Jr.: My Father. Los Angeles: General, 1996. Davis's daughter by his second wife, actress May Britt, fleshes out her father's account of his later career, including the poignant story of their reconciliation a year before his death.

Fishgall, Gary. Gonna Do Great Things: The Life of Sammy Davis, Jr. New York: Scribner's, 2003. Fishgall tends to skim the surface of Davis's life and focus on the glitz and the glamour, but he includes information gleaned from interviews with Davis's friends and family as well as details of his most important performances.

Haygood, Wil. In Black and White: The Life of Sammy Davis Jr. New York: Knopf, 2003. Haygood uses a psychosexual approach to try to explain Davis's swings from Black Power to Richard Nixon, Judaism to devil worship. An excellent portrayal of a complex man trying to fit into an era of social upheaval.

See also: Coleman, Cy; Crosby, Bing; Horne, Lena; Jones, Quincy; Newley, Anthony.

Claude Debussy

French classical composer

Debussy's harmony, melody, and orchestration were radical departures from both classic and Romantic idioms. They promoted a color-based approach to music and foreshadowed the nontonal language of the twentieth century.

Born: August 22, 1862; Saint-Germain-en-Laye, France
Died: March 25, 1918; Paris, France
Also known as: Achille-Claude Debussy (full name)

Principal works

BALLETS (music): Jeux, 1913; La Boîte à joujoux, 1919 (The Box of Toys); Khamma, 1947.
CHAMBER WORKS: Premier Quatuor, 1894; Première

Rapsodie, 1910; Morceau à déchiffrer pour le concours de clarinette de 1910, 1910; Sonata, 1915; Syrinx, 1927; Premier Trio, 1986.

OPERAS (music): Pelléas et Mélisande, 1902 (libretto by Maurice Maeterlinck); La Chute de la maison Usher, 1977 (libretto by Edgar Allan Poe; revised by Claude Debussy); Rodrigue et Chimène, 1993 (libretto by Guillén de Castro; revised by Catulle Mendes).

ORCHESTRAL WORKS: Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune, 1895 (Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun); Deux Gymnopédies, 1898; Deux Danses, 1904; La Mer, 1905 (The Sea); Ibéria, 1910; Rondes de printemps, 1910; Marche écossaise sur un thème populaire, 1911; Première Rapsodie, 1911; Gigues, 1913; Berceuse héroïque, 1915; Rapsodie, 1919; Fantaisie, 1920; Le Triomphe de Bacchus, 1928; Symphony, 1933; Intermezzo, 1944.

PIANO WORKS: Valse romantique, 1890; Ballade slave, 1891; Deux Arabesques, 1891; Rêverie, 1891; Tarentelle styrienne, 1891; Nocturne, 1892; Pour le piano, 1901; Estampes, 1903; Mazurka, 1903; D'un cahier d'esquisses, 1904; L'Îsle joyeuse, 1904; Masques, 1904; Images, Series 1, 1905; Pièce pour piano, 1905; Suite bergamasque, 1905; Children's Corner, 1908; Images, Series 2, 1908; Sérénade à la poupée, 1908; The Little Nigar, 1909; Homage à Haydn, 1910; La Plus que lente, 1910; Préludes, Book 1, 1910; Préludes, Book 2, 1913; Berceuse héroïque, 1915; En blanc et noir, 1915 (In Black and White); Élégie, 1916; Études, 1916; Lindaraja, 1926; Danse bohémienne, 1932; Pièce pour le vêtement du blessé, 1933; Images, 1978.

The Life

Achille-Claude Debussy (ah-KEEL klohd deh-byew-SEE) was the eldest of five children born to Manuel-Achille Debussy and Victorine Manoury. When the family moved to Paris in 1867, the father took a succession of menial jobs, and the mother, who worked as a seamstress, schooled Debussy at home. His first contact with the sea occurred in 1869 at Cannes, in the South of France. The sensitive child was impressed by the size of this body of water and its constant change of color; as an adult, Debussy vividly recalled the sea "stretching out to the horizon."

In Cannes, Debussy took his first piano lessons with the Italian Jean Cerutti; two years later, he became the student of Mme Mauté de Fleurville, the poet Paul Verlaine's mother-in-law, who claimed to have been a pupil of Frédéric Chopin. In 1872 Debussy was admitted to the Paris Conservatory, where he spent twelve years as a student. In 1880 Debussy met Nadezhda von Meck, Peter Ilich Tchaikovsky's patroness, and this enabled him to travel, as a musician of the household, to Switzerland, Italy, and Russia, in the process becoming acquainted with the music of Tchaikovsky, Nikolay Rimsky-Korsakov, and Aleksandr Borodin.

Claude Debussy.

Having unsuccessfully proposed to the sixteen-year-old Sophie von Meck in 1880, Debussy turned his attention to the singer Marie Vasnier, his first true love and his muse, who performed many of the songs he composed in the 1880's. In 1884 he won the prestigious Prix de Rome, for which he had been preparing since 1881.

Debussy spent 1885 and 1886 at the Villa Medici in Rome, where he complained about isolation and "having to compose music to order." However, while there, he had the opportunity to play for Franz Liszt, to listen to the sacred music of Giovanni Pierluigi da Palestrina and Orlando di Lasso performed at Santa Maria dell'Anima, to study the organ works of Johann Sebastian Bach, and to read the most recent magazines produced by the French Symbolists, whose philosophy was a reaction to realism, advocating a metaphorical and mysterious approach to the truth.

In 1887 he returned to Paris, which was in the midst of a craze for Richard Wagner, a trend of definite appeal to Debussy, and where Symbolist poetry flourished. Within the next two years, the composer met Verlaine, Stuart Merrill, and Pierre Louÿs and embraced their chief aesthetic: Poetry and music should be one. Debussy became acquainted with James McNeill Whistler, the painter of the famous views of the Thames titled Nocturnes. Édouard Manet, Edgar Degas, J. M. W. Turner, and Henri de Toulouse-Lautrec were also counted among his favorite painters. In 1891 he befriended the eccentric composer Eric Satie; their friendship lasted for nearly three decades.

The Exposition Universelle of 1889 brought to Paris music from Northern and Eastern Europe, as well as from Africa, Arabia, and the Far East. Debussy was fascinated with the complex rhythmic polyphony, the timbre, and the pentatonic melodies of the Javanese gamelan orchestra, an ensemble comprising single-string instruments, a flute, and gongs and bells. Debussy's later orchestral idiom—especially as seen in Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune, La Mer, and the series Images—reflected the influence of such rhythmic sophistication. After 1889, pentatonic scales became part of his vocabulary as well.

In addition to being a composer, a conductor, and a performer, Debussy was a perceptive music critic. His first critical writings were published in the literary-artistic magazine La Revue blanche (1901) under the nom de plume "Monsieur Croche"; later, he was published in the daily Gil Blas (1903) and in La Revue S. I. M. (1912-1914). Several of these articles were later selected by Debussy as representative of his musical philosophy, and they were published posthumously as Monsieur Croche, antidilettant (1921).

After a tempestuous and long-standing affair with Gabrielle Dupont, Debussy married Rosalie (Lilly) Texier in 1899; the marriage was informally dissolved when the composer met Emma Bardac and started living with her in 1904. They were married in 1908; their daughter, Claude-Emma, affectionately called Chouchou, was the dedicatee of a piano suite Debussy composed between 1906 and 1908, Children's Corner. Noted for its humorous slant, the suite incorporates a musical caricature of Muzio Clementi's Gradus ad Parnassum and a French nursery song, "Dodo, l'enfant do," which had been alluded to in Estampes and would be put to further use in the orchestral Images series.

The first signs of cancer, the illness that would ultimately cause the composer's death, appeared in 1909, while Debussy was visiting England. A colonoscopy was performed in 1915, and throughout his last years the composer was in physical pain, as well as depressed because of the events of World War I. He died in Paris on March 25, 1918.

The Music

Debussy's fully matured style, already apparent in works of the late 1880's, fuses several sources into a single, coherent, highly personal language, whose aesthetic foundation is that music should evoke moods and colors. In terms of harmony, this translates into treatment of discords as concords; intense use of chromaticism; abrupt modulations and rapidly shifting key areas; Russian-like modality; exploration of chord structures derived from pentatonic and whole-tone scales; and, above all, understanding harmony as a color-generating device. His melodies are fluid, elastic, and highly ornamental, in the style of Oriental arabesques, and look like embellished improvisations frozen on the page.

Pelléas et Mélisande. Debussy began work on this five-act lyric drama in 1893, two years after returning from his second trip to Bayreuth, Germany, where he had seen Wagner's operas Parsifal (1882), Die Meistersinger (1867), and Tristan und Isolde (1859). Debussy traveled to Ghent, in Belgium, to obtain Maurice Maeterlinck's permission to adapt his Symbolist play as an opera libretto. A tragic love story involving a mysterious princess (Mélisande) and her husband's half-brother (Pelléas), Debussy's Pelléas et Mélisande went through a long period of gestation and continuous revisions: The premiere took place in 1902, but the composer continued to revise the score up to and beyond 1905, the year of its publication. Consistent avoidance of cadences, and the intersection of whole-tone scales and their chord-derivatives with chromatic and modal harmonies, infuse the opera with astonishing colors and suggest an atemporal quality. The fluid, quasi-recitative style of the vocal parts, already present in many of Debussy's songs, stems from limited melodic ranges, pitch repetition, and extraordinary rhythmic variety. Somewhat in the spirit of Wagner's music, heroes and situations are characterized through specific motives; these journeys through multiple hypostases suggest alterations in both characters and events. In a similar vein, the orchestral interludes connecting the various scenes take on narrative function and suggest emotions not overtly expressed by the heroes.

Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun. This orchestral piece was originally intended as incidental music to a dramatic monologue based on a poem by Stéphane Mallarmé. The proposed scope was never achieved; the music was described by Debussy as "a general impression of the poem." The whole work is generated from a single motive heard in the flute in the first four measures, later reprised, transformed, reharmonized, reorchestrated, and extended. Orchestral colors and dynamic ranges are of astounding variety, from subtle and refined pianissimos to luscious fortes. In this, as in his works for piano solo, Debussy showed himself to be the master of an arabesquelike, quasi-improvisatory style, probably based on similar treatments by Rimsky-Korsakov and Borodin in their works of Oriental inspiration. In most of his Symbolist and mature works, Debussy cultivated instrumental color for its own sake and for evoking a certain atmosphere. In Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun Debussy utilized instruments familiar and expected in late Romantic orchestras, but also small, antique cymbals to convey the idea of spatial and temporal remoteness of the lascivious faun's musings. Additional color was created through division of strings as well as muted brass. Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun perhaps best illustrates the composer's belief that the substance of music resides in sound color and rhythm.

The Sea. Debussy's longtime love affair with the sea, his father's sea stories, Turner's sea paintings (which the composer might have seen during his visits to London in 1902 and 1903), and Katsushika Hokusai's Japanese seascapes have all been cited as extramusical sources for these three symphonic sketches composed between 1903 and 1905. The Sea might be understood as a cyclical symphony in three related movements, all based on pentatonic material and employing timbre as a building block. A depiction of light and color changes on the sea as the day progresses from early morning to noon, the first movement ("From Dawn to Noon on the Sea") exploits gamelanlike sonorities; the second ("Wave Play") involves ostinatos, chromaticism, and glissandi in the harp as well as timbre innovations, such as the use of muted trumpets in fortissimo to represent perpetual yet unpredictable aquatic motion; and the third ("Dialogue of Wind and Sea") alternates two themes, pitched against each other as if in a state of natural combat, with the sea theme in the lower strings and the wind theme in the oboes, English horn, and bassoon.

Images, Series 1 and Images, Series 2. This piano suite series comprises six delicate etchings (three in each book); among these are depictions of ephemeral, shimmering reflections of light in water; muffled bell sounds traversing dense leafage; and water splashing as goldfish play in a bowl in a frenzy of trills and tremolos. The second piece in Images, Series 1 is an homage to Baroque composer Jean-Philippe Rameau, and it tells of Debussy's fascination with the French clavecinists (or harpsichordists) of the eighteenth century. The second piece in Images, Series 2 uses the gamelan effect to depict the majestic descent of the moon on an Oriental temple.

Préludes. Debussy, who revered J. S. Bach and Chopin (both of whom had penned keyboard preludes), was an exquisite piano player. The two books of Préludes offer a singular view of this genre: All pieces (with the exception of No. 11 in Book 2) have descriptive or evocative titles, and all use a fully developed Debussyan idiom. Some are evocative of dances and rhythms of Italy and Spain ("The Hills of Anacapri" in Book 1; "La Puerta del Vino" in Book 2); others are obvious narrative programmatic music ("La Cathédrale engloutie" in Book 1, a musical adaptation of the legendary cathedral of Ys in Brittany, emerging from water to the sound of bells, organ pedal, and Gregorian chant).

Études. Each study in this cycle, composed in 1915 and dedicated to the memory of Chopin, is an in-depth exploration of one major piano technique. There are finger exercises in Nos. 1 and 6; interval-based exercises in Nos. 2, 4, and 5 (studies in thirds, sixths, and octaves, respectively); and chord- and arpeggio-based exercises in Nos. 11 and 12. Thus Debussy turned from symbolism, mystery, and subtle evocation to "pure music," as he described it in a letter to composer Igor Stravinsky.

Musical Legacy

Debussy viewed his works as musical echoes of Symbolist poetry rather than as musical extensions of Impressionist painting. His constant preoccupation with sound color led to instrumentation experiments of unique refinement, possibly equaled only in some of Maurice Ravel's works. Contemporary reception of his music was mixed: Some critics denounced it as unmoving, emotionless, or Impressionistic, and Debussy's stylistic idiosyncrasies were dubbed Debussyism. Stravinsky, Giacomo Puccini, and Béla Bartók admired Debussy's harmonic language, and Max Reger, Gustav Holst, Cyril Scott, and Aaron Copland were all influenced by him. Debussy was France's true musical modernist.

Luminita Florea

Further Reading

Debussy, Claude. Debussy on Music: The Critical Writings of the Great French Composer Claude Debussy. Edited by François Lesure, translated by Richard Langham Smith. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1977. English translation of all of Debussy's critical works, including Monsieur Croche, antidilettante and several interviews Debussy gave to journals and newspapers.

Lederer, Victor. Debussy: The Quiet Revolutionary. New York: Amadeus Press, 2007. Discussions of Debussy's piano, orchestral, and operatic music.

Roberts, Paul. Images: The Piano Music of Claude Debussy. Portland, Oreg.: Amadeus Press, 1996. Thorough analyses of Debussy's piano music, complemented by studies of fin de siècle Paris and its cultural climate and special references to Debussy's bonds with Impressionist painting and Symbolist poetry. Includes glossary, illustrations, and musical examples.

Thompson, Oscar. Debussy: Man and Artist. New York: Dover, 1967. Includes short discussions of all of Debussy's works, arranged by genre, and some illustrations. (The bibliography is outdated.)

Trezise, Simon, ed. The Cambridge Companion to Debussy. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2003. Anthology of studies by fourteen authors examining topics as diverse as Debussy the man and music critic, his exploration of nature and the erotic, and his experiments with sound color, rhythm, and form. Includes illustrations, bibliography, and index.

See also: Bartók, Béla; Cliburn, Van; Copland, Aaron; Crumb, George; Evans, Bill; Grappelli, Stéphane; Hancock, Herbie; Heifetz, Jascha; Hindemith, Paul; Kodály, Zoltán; Martin, Frank; Martinů, Bohuslav; Messiaen, Olivier; Mingus, Charles; Paderewski, Ignace Jan; Piazzolla, Astor; Poulenc, Francis; Ravel, Maurice; Rubinstein, Artur; Satie, Erik; Scott-Heron, Gil; Shaw, Artie; Sibelius, Jean; Sousa, John Philip; Stravinsky, Igor; Strayhorn, Billy; Szigeti, Joseph; Takemitsu, Tōru; Tiomkin, Dimitri; Watts, André; Williams, John.

Sandy Denny

English folksinger and songwriter

Denny's songwriting and haunting, stentorian lead vocals set the standard for male and female folk-rock singers on both sides of the Atlantic Ocean in the late 1960's and early 1970's.

Born: January 6, 1948; London, England
Died: April 21, 1978; London, England
Also known as: Alexandra Elene Maclean Denny (full name)
Member of: The Strawbs; Fairport Convention; Fotheringay; the Bunch

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): The Original Sandy Denny, 1967; Sandy Denny, 1970; The North Star Grassman and the Ravens, 1971; Sandy, 1972; Like an Old-Fashioned Waltz, 1973; Rendezvous, 1977.
ALBUMS (with the Bunch): Rock On, 1972.
ALBUMS (with Fairport Convention): Fairport

Convention, 1968; Liege and Lief, 1969; Unhalfbricking, 1969; What We Did on Our Holidays, 1969; Full House, 1970; Angel Delight, 1971; Babbacombe Lee, 1971; Nine, 1973; Rosie, 1973; Rising for the Moon, 1975; Gottle o' Geer, 1976; The Bonny Bunch of Roses, 1977; Tipplers' Tales, 1978.

ALBUMS (with Fotheringay): Fotheringay, 1970.

ALBUMS (with the Strawbs): All Our Own Work, 1968; Sandy Denny and the Strawbs, 1968.

The Life

Alexandra Elene Maclean Denny was born in London and studied piano and voice at an early age. She became known in the mid-1960's at London-area folk clubs—the Scots House, Bunjies, Les Cousins—as a nursing student who sang old folk songs. She dropped out of nursing school to pursue a solo career, singing traditional folk songs in the public domain as well as covering songs by Tom Paxton and Bob Dylan. A BBC radio broadcast landed her a record deal, and soon she was asked to join the Strawbs.

Denny recorded only one album with the Strawbs, which included one of her first achievements as a singer-songwriter, "Who Knows Where the Time Goes?" While the album was in production in 1968, Judy Collins chose the song as the title track on one of her albums. At the same time the members of Fairport Convention persuaded Denny to replace Judy Dyble in their folk-rock group. Over the next several years, Fairport Convention produced three signature albums of the folk-rock movement: What We Did on Our Holidays, Unhalfbricking, and Liege and Lief.

Denny's romance with guitarist Trevor Lucas contributed to the breakup of Fairport Convention in 1971, and Lucas and Denny formed Fotheringay, the name of the first song on the first Fairport album, which Denny had written.

Denny and Lucas married on September 20, 1973. They briefly rejoined Fairport Convention in 1974 and 1975, touring and releasing a live album, although the group disbanded again. Denny gave birth to a daughter, Georgia, in July, 1977, but her relationship with Lucas was deteriorating. Lucas was seen with other women, and Denny went on drinking binges with John Bonham and Jimmy Page of Led Zeppelin, sometimes joined by actor Peter O'Toole. In March, 1978, at her parents' house in Cornwall, she fell and suffered a head injury. This may have contributed to a brain hemorrhage in April, which put her in a coma from which she never recovered. She died on April 21, 1978.

The Music

Although Denny entered the London folk scene as a vocalist and guitarist who played songs written by others, during the last decade of her life she developed into a premier songwriter.

Early Works. The Strawbs' All Our Own Work displays Denny's distinctive voice as well as her songwriting abilities. The first signature song of her own creation, "Who Knows Where the Time Goes?," was included not only on the Strawbs' album but also as the title track on noted American folksinger Collins's album. As the twenty-one-year-old Denny was becoming recognized as a significant singer and songwriter, she was in the process of leaving the Strawbs to join Fairport Convention.

What We Did on Our Holidays. The first Fairport Convention album with Denny was an instant critical and commercial success. Although most of the songs on the album were written by virtuoso guitarist and songwriter Richard Thompson, with covers of songs by Joni Mitchell ("Eastern Rain") and Bob Dylan ("I'll Keep It with Mine"), the first side of the album opens with Denny's "Fotheringay." The album demonstrated the musical prowess and the commercial viability of the band.

Unhalfbricking. This album included more Dylan covers ("Si tu dois partir," "Percy's Song," and "Million-Dollar Bash"); a remarkable eleven-minute arrangement of a traditional British folk song in the public domain ("A Sailor's Life"); and two songs each by Denny and Thompson, showing that the group recognized its two gifted songwriters. Denny's solo song, also recorded with the Strawbs, "Who Knows Where the Time Goes?," finally made a Fairport album, and "Autopsy" provided a poetic lead-in to "A Sailor's Life," which concluded the first side of the album. Unfortunately, in the week before the album's release, drummer Martin Lamble, driving back from a concert in Birmingham with Thompson's girlfriend Jeannie Franklyn, crashed, and both perished. The accident had personal and artistic ramifications among the members of Fairport for many years.

Liege and Lief. With Dave Mattacks replacing Lamble on drums and with Dave Swarbick added on violin and viola, Fairport Convention recorded this album in two short weeks late in 1969. The album is mostly traditional British folk songs, except for the opening musical call-to-arms, "Come All Ye," written by Denny with input from bassist Ashley Hutchings. Such songs as "Matty Groves" and "The Deserter" chronicle England's storied past. Thompson's two songs for the album, "Farewell, Farewell" and "Crazy Man Michael," remained in his repertoire after he left Fairport Convention.

Fotheringay. When Denny left Fairport Convention to start Fotheringay with Lucas, she continued her professional relationship with Sound Techniques Studio and producer Joe Boyd, who had produced the last three Fairport albums. The album was a commercial and critical success, but internecine struggles within the band, combined with alcohol and drug abuse, caused the band to break up after the album and a single tour. Denny's songwriting finally achieved center-stage status in this group, which she codirected with Lucas. "Nothing More" and "The Pond and the Stream" are superior works of poetry and music, and "The Sea" and "Winter Winds" are compelling original pieces. She cowrote "Peace in the End" with Lucas, and on the album are the expected Dylan cover ("Too Much of Nothing") and a Gordon Lightfoot cover ("The Way I Feel").

Musical Legacy

Denny's voice was remarkable for its range and clarity, and her songwriting exhibited a remarkable creativity. Her finesse on the guitar complemented the lyrical qualities of her songs. The albums recorded and released between 1968 and 1970, with Fairport Convention and Fotheringay, are among the enduring achievements in the folk-rock movement on both sides of the Atlantic Ocean.

Richard Sax

Further Reading

Brocken, Michael. The British Folk Revival, 1944-2002. Aldershot, England: Ashgate, 2003. Details the British postwar folk-music renaissance, including the convergence of folk and pop music in the 1960's.

Heylin, Clinton. No More Sad Refrains: The Life and Times of Sandy Denny. London: Helter Skelter, 2001. Drawing on personal interviews (some with British musicians, including Pete Townshend) and other eyewitness accounts, the author places Denny within the social and musical scenes of the era.

Humphries, Patrick. Meet on the Ledge: A History of the Fairport Convention. London: Eel Pie, 1982. Brief but well-written and balanced retrospective of the band.

See also: Collins, Judy; Dylan, Bob; Mitchell, Joni; Page, Jimmy; Paxton, Tom.

John Denver

American singer and songwriter

Denver was a successful crossover star in pop, folk, and country music whose wholesome image and memorable songs, celebrating nature and the simple pleasures of life, made him the top-selling solo artist in the 1970's. One of the first musicians from his generation to have a successful film and television career, Denver used his immense popularity to promote environmental and humanitarian causes worldwide.

Born: December 31, 1943; Roswell, New Mexico
Died: October 12, 1997; Monterey Bay, near Pacific Grove, California
Also known as: Henry John Deutschendorf, Jr. (birth name)
Member of: The Chad Mitchell Trio

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): Rhymes and Reasons, 1969; Take Me to Tomorrow, 1970; Whose Garden Was This?, 1970; Poems, Prayers, and Promises, 1971; Aerie, 1972; Rocky Mountain High, 1972; Farewell Andromeda, 1973; Back Home Again, 1974; Rocky Mountain Christmas, 1975; Windsong, 1975; Spirit, 1976; I Want to Live, 1977; A Christmas Together, 1979 (with the Muppets); John Denver, 1979; Autograph, 1980; Perhaps Love, 1981; Some Days Are Diamonds, 1981; Seasons of the Heart, 1982; It's About Time, 1983; Dreamland Express, 1985; One World, 1986; Higher Ground, 1988; Stonehaven Sunrise, 1989; Earth Songs, 1990; The Flower That Shattered the Stone, 1990; Different Directions, 1991.

ALBUMS (with the Chad Mitchell Trio): That's the Way It's Gonna Be, 1965.

The Life

Born to Erma Louise Swope and Air Force officer Henry John Deutschendorf, Sr., John Deutschendorf started playing music at eleven when his grandmother gave him a Gibson guitar. After studying architecture at Texas Tech University, he moved to Los Angeles to pursue a music career. He changed his stage name to Denver, after the capital city of Colorado.

In 1965 Denver became the lead singer for the popular folk group the Chad Mitchell Trio, and he became famous when in 1969 Peter, Paul, and Mary's recording of his song "Leaving on a Jet Plane" became the number-one song in America. Denver's first single to sell a million copies was "Take Me Home, Country Roads" in 1971. During the 1970's he became an internationally known recording artist, songwriter, and performer. Denver also starred opposite George Burns in the movie Oh, God! (1977) and made numerous television specials, including a classic Christmas program with Jim Henson's Muppets and An Evening with John Denver (1975), which won an Emmy award. His career slowed down after the 1970's, but in 1996 Denver was inducted into the Songwriters Hall of Fame.

Denver married and divorced twice: His first wife was Annie Martell and his second wife was Cassandra Delaney. He had three children: Zachary, Anna Kate, and Jesse Belle. In 1997 Denver died when the home-built aircraft he was piloting crashed into Monterey Bay in California.

The Music

Denver reached the peak of his commercial success during the 1970's. By 1975 he had become the best-selling recording artist in America and an internationally celebrated folk poet. By 1979 Denver had sold more than a hundred million records. Eight albums had sold more than two million copies each.

John Denver. (AP/Wide World Photos)

He wrote songs about the beauty of nature and universal human experiences and emotions, with lyrics and melodies that were simple, direct, personal, and memorable. In their Album 1700, Peter, Paul, and Mary had included one of Denver's early compositions, "Leaving on a Jet Plane," which became a number-one hit single in 1969. Sentimental but melodic, the song expressed the universal feeling of sadness when a couple separates but also the hope and joy of the future reunion and even marriage.

"Take Me Home, Country Roads." In his first million seller, released in 1971 on the album "Poems, Prayers, and Promises," Denver sang nostalgically of West Virginia, the Blue Ridge Mountains, and the Shenandoah River. "Rocky Mountain High" (1972) was Denver's personal song of rebirth in the place where he most wanted to be. During his first summer in the Rocky Mountains, Denver went on a camping trip to watch the Perseid meteor shower, when it was "raining fire in the sky," and he remembered a close friend who had just been killed in a motorcycle accident. The song described a natural high from experiencing the starlight, cathedral mountains, silver clouds, flying eagles, and a clear mountain lake. However, Denver also expressed a fear of the mountains being torn down for commercial development.

"Sunshine on My Shoulders" was created on a dreary, gray, cold day in Minnesota during late winter. Denver had been asked to write a theme song for a television movie about two dying people spending their last day together. Thinking of their sadness and his wish for spring, Denver wrote about how sunshine almost always lifted his spirits. Released as a single in 1973, it reached number one on the charts in 1974.

"Thank God I'm a Country Boy." Originally recorded on his album Back Home Again (1974), "Thank God I'm a Country Boy" was released as a single in February, 1975, and was number one on the pop charts and a million seller by June. The homegrown lyrics extolled the joys of rural living and being happy as long as a man had a farm, his wife, fiddle, and food on the griddle.

"Annie's Song." Denver wrote this for his wife Annie after some problems in their relationship, when they had reconciled and created a closer bond. One day, during the ten minutes it took to go up a ski lift, Denver composed "Annie's Song." As his enjoyment of the mountains, forest, ocean, and all of nature filled his senses, he realized how the woman he loved also filled up his senses completely. Intensely romantic but simple, the lyrics are about a lover who asks for a lifetime with his love, for his senses to be filled again and again, and to die in his love's arms.

Musical Legacy

Denver produced thirty albums and won fourteen gold and eight platinum albums. Reaching a worldwide audience, he used his music and fame to promote peace and environmental and humanitarian causes.

Denver believed in the global community. In 1985 he became the first American artist to perform in the Soviet Union since the beginning of the Cold War. This experience inspired the song "Let Us Begin (What Are We Making Weapons For?)"on his One World album (1986). In 1987 he did a benefit concert for the victims of the nuclear-plant accident at Chernobyl in the Ukraine, and in 1992 Denver became the first Western artist to do a multicity tour of mainland China.

Denver's philanthropic work included innumerable causes, including Friends of the Earth, the Hunger Project, Save the Children, the Human Dolphin Foundation, and UNICEF (the United Nations Children's Fund), which chose Denver's "Rhymes & Reasons" as its official song. In 1993 Denver became the first nonclassical musician to receive the Albert Schweitzer Music Award for humanitarianism.

Denver was one of the first musicians to support environmental causes through his songs. In 1975 he wrote "Calypso" in honor of Jacques Cousteau and his efforts to protect the ocean. Denver often closed his concerts with this song, one of this favorites. The Windstar Foundation, which Denver cofounded in 1976 to promote wildlife and land conservation, continues its mission in the twenty-first century.

Alice Myers

Further Reading

Collis, John. John Denver: Mother Nature's Son. Edinburgh: Mainstream, 2003. A biography that emphasizes Denver's private life and emotional turmoil. Illustrated. Discography and bibliography.

Denver, John. John Denver: The Complete Lyrics. Covers more than two hundred songs, with Denver telling the story behind many of them. Annotated discography. Illustrated.

_____. Poems, Prayers, and Promises: The Art and Soul of John Denver. New York: Cherry Lane Music, 2004. Songbook featuring concert memorabilia, never-before-published nature and travel photography, and new interviews. Illustrated. Bonus compact disc.

Denver, John, and Arthur Tobier. Take Me Home: An Autobiography. New York: Harmony Books, 1994. A personal account covering his unhappy childhood, life as a performer, and marital failures. He describes how he wrote some of his most popular songs. Illustrated. Index and discography.

Smith, Christine. A Mountain in the Wind: An Exploration of the Spirituality of John Denver. Findhorn, Scotland: Findhorn Press, 2001. The author shows how Denver's music revealed a deeply religious person devoted to humanity and the environment, despite his personal struggles. Illustrated.

See also: Domingo, Plácido; Galway, Sir James; Harris, Emmylou; Paxton, Tom.

Paul Desmond

American jazz saxophonist and composer

As the frantic tempi and technical virtuosity of bebop faded, Desmond emerged as a leading proponent of the new era of cool jazz. Paired with the flamboyant Dave Brubeck, Desmond produced an intimate, warm tone and innovative improvisations.

Born: November 25, 1924; San Francisco, California
Died: May 30, 1977; New York, New York
Also known as: Paul Emil Breitenfeld (birth name); the Stork

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Quartet, 1952 (with Gerry Mulligan); The Paul Desmond Quartet with Don Elliott, 1956; Blues in Time, 1957 (with Mulligan); First Place Again, 1959 (with Jim Hall); Paul Desmond and Friends, 1959; Desmond Blue, 1961 (with Hall); Late Lament, 1962; Two of a Mind, 1962 (with Mulligan); Glad to Be Unhappy, 1963; Take Ten, 1963 (with Hall); Bossa Antigua, 1964; Easy Living, 1966; Summertime, 1968; Bridge over Troubled Water, 1969; From the Hot Afternoon, 1969; Skylark, 1973; The Duets, 1975 (with Dave Brubeck); Like Someone in Love, 1975; Pure Desmond, 1975; The Only Recorded Performance, 1982 (with the Modern Jazz Quartet).

The Life

Born Paul Emil Breitenfeld in San Francisco, Paul Desmond legally changed his name in 1946 after supposedly choosing Desmond out of a phone book. His father, an organist, accompanied silent films in theaters. His mother suffered from severe emotional problems. As a result, Desmond spent part of his childhood with relatives in New York. Desmond attended Polytechnic High School in San Francisco, and he began playing the clarinet during his freshman year at San Francisco State College. During World War II, Desmond enlisted in the Army in 1943 to play in the band as a saxophonist. He was stationed in San Francisco, where he was introduced to pianist Dave Brubeck. They went their separate ways following their discharge from the Army, but they reunited in 1951 in forming the Dave Brubeck Quartet. The quartet experienced a few personnel changes on bass and drums before finally settling on bassist Eugene Wright and drummer Joe Morello. "Take Five," from the 1959 landmark album Time Out, introduced unusual time signatures to the jazz world. After the quartet disbanded in 1967, Desmond continued to perform as a freelance saxophonist.

Residing in a New York penthouse, Desmond lived comfortably among friends, writers, and fellow musicians. His royalty earnings from "Take Five" alone allowed him to indulge his fondness for Scotch and cigarettes. Eventually, he was weakened to the point that his once-notorious ability to sustain a long phrase on a single breath became impossible. His final concert with Brubeck, in February, 1977, was witnessed by a full house of appreciative fans. However, Desmond was physically unable to perform an encore. Having developed lung cancer from a lifetime of heavy smoking, he died in New York on May 30, 1977.

The Music

The hot jazz of the 1920's, the danceable swing tempi of the 1930's, and the blistering tempi and complex harmonies of the bebop era set the stage for a decidedly different approach to jazz known as cool jazz. The cool jazz period of the late 1940's and 1950's utilized subdued volume, understated textures, improvisational economy, avoidance of dissonance, and little or no vibrato.

On Desmond's first encounter with Brubeck, the saxophonist took note of Brubeck's unusual, almost avant-garde style of piano playing, individualistic for the time. Their paths crossed again after World War II, when Desmond was a civilian and Brubeck was playing at the Geary Cellar with the Darryl Cutler trio. Desmond hired Brubeck and bassist Norman Bates from the trio to form his own jazz group. The role of leader did not appeal to Desmond, however, so he enrolled in San Francisco State College to become a writer. In the late 1940's, he joined Brubeck's octet.

The Dave Brubeck Quartet. In 1950 Desmond went on tour with the Jack Fina band, ending the tour in New York. Just one year later, Desmond was back in San Francisco to become a member of the legendary Dave Brubeck Quartet. A series of recorded concerts followed at universities. Jazz at Oberlin and Jazz at the College of the Pacific led to a recording contract with Columbia Records. Appropriately, the Dave Brubeck Quartet's first recording was Jazz Goes to College in 1954. Critics and fans took notice of Desmond's elegant tone and remarkable lyricism in improvised solos. Critics described Desmond's tone as a "dry martini."

Paul Desmond. (Library of Congress)

The addition of drummer Morello in 1956 and bassist Wright in 1958 solidified the quartet's personnel until 1967, when the group disbanded. Morello's competence with unusual time signatures allowed the quartet to experiment with the 5/4 time signature.

"Take Five." "Take Five," the group's signature composition on the 1959 album Time Out, sold more than one million copies. Brubeck's thick chord voicings and Desmond's light, airy tone complemented each other effectively. Completely at ease together, Brubeck and Desmond quoted popular songs in their musical interplay, and they could change moods simultaneously. In a sense, they engaged in musical conversations. The quartet toured the world, performing three hundred concerts a year and recording numerous albums.

After the Quartet. The breakup of the Dave Brubeck Quartet in 1967 gave Desmond a second chance at becoming a writer. He abandoned his saxophone for about three years, and he completed his memoirs about his time with the quartet with an essay titled How Many of You Are There in the Quartet?—a question purportedly asked by an airline flight attendant. The memoirs were never released as a book, but a chapter was published in the British magazine Punch.

In semiretirement, Desmond performed concerts with baritone saxophonist Gerry Mulligan, guitarists Jim Hall and Ed Bickert, and with the Modern Jazz Quartet. A silver anniversary reunion tour with the Dave Brubeck Quartet in 1976 hastened the end of his career. In 1977 Desmond performed a farewell concert with Brubeck at New York's Lincoln Center.

Musical Legacy

Desmond personified cool jazz with his lyrical and wispy tone quality. Although more introspective than extroverted, he interacted with other musicians on a personal level with a wit and charm that also reached audiences. His audiences rewarded him by voting him to the top of the jazz polls year after year. The success and musical worth of the Dave Brubeck Quartet will be forever linked to Desmond's distinctive sound and style.

Part of Desmond's estate was bequeathed to the American Red Cross, and after his death the proceeds from his recording royalties were donated to the American Red Cross. The Paul Desmond papers are housed in the Holt-Atherton Special Collections at the University of the Pacific, the site of an early Dave Brubeck Quartet concert.

Douglas D. Skinner

Further Reading

Feather, Leonard. The New Encyclopedia of Jazz. Oxford, England: Oxford University Press, 1999. Short biographical entries of more than three thousand jazz musicians and their discographies include one devoted to Desmond.

Hall, Fred M. It's About Time: The Dave Brubeck Story. Fayetteville: University of Arkansas Press, 1996. This covers Desmond's life and career with the Dave Brubeck Quartet, and it includes discussions of experimentation with polytonality and unusual time signatures.

McPartland, Marion. All in Good Time. Oxford, England: Oxford University Press, 1987. One of the few women to succeed in jazz performance, McPartland writes about her experiences with various jazz musicians, including Desmond.

Ramsey, Doug. Take Five: The Public and Private Lives of Paul Desmond. Seattle, Wash.: Parkside, 2005. This biography was written by a jazz musician who was a friend of Desmond, and it includes commentary from other jazz musicians, two hundred photographs, and transcriptions of his improvised solos.

Tirro, Frank. Living with Jazz. Orlando, Fla.: Harcourt Brace, 1996. A jazz history textbook, with a focus on developing an appreciation for jazz, makes references to Desmond.

See also: Brubeck, Dave; McPartland, Marian; Parker, Charlie.

Neil Diamond

American rock singer, guitarist, and songwriter

With his steady output of albums and relentless worldwide touring, Diamond is one of most successful adult contemporary performers in the world. As a songwriter, he produces tunes with catchy hooks and simple, unforgettable melodies.

Born: January 24, 1941; Brooklyn, New York
Also known as: Neil Leslie Diamond (full name)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Just for You, 1967; Velvet Gloves and Spit, 1968; Brother Love's Traveling Salvation Show, 1969; Touching You, Touching Me, 1969; Tap Root Manuscript, 1970; Stones, 1971; Moods, 1972; Serenade, 1974; Beautiful Noise, 1976; I'm Glad You're Here with Me Tonight, 1977; Carmelita's Eyes, 1978; You Don't Bring Me Flowers, 1978; September Morn, 1979; The Jazz Singer, 1980; On the Way to the Sky, 1981; Heartlight, 1982; Primitive, 1984; Headed for the Future, 1986; The Best Years of Our Lives, 1988; Lovescape, 1991; The Christmas Album, 1992; Up on the Roof: Songs from the Brill Building, 1993; The Christmas Album, Vol. 2, 1994; Tennessee Moon, 1996; The Movie Album: As Time Goes By, 1998 (with Elmer Bernstein); Three Chord Opera, 2001; Twelve Songs, 2005.

The Life

Neil Leslie Diamond was born in Brooklyn, New York, to Jewish parents who had emigrated from Russia and Poland. An erstwhile shopkeeper, Diamond's father kept the family on the move around Brooklyn's neighborhoods with a series of stores before attaining middle-class prosperity during Diamond's teenage years. Diamond attended Erasmus Hall High School, the alma mater of other stars, such as Paul Anka and Barbra Streisand. Dropping out of New York University, Diamond sought his fortune writing pop songs. His most famous song of this era is the Monkees' version of "I'm a Believer."

The business of popular music was changing, however, and soon Diamond began performing his own songs rather than selling them to other acts. He had a number of hits, including two gold records, and he was a soothing alternative to the more anarchic rock and roll of the Woodstock era. Diamond reached a pinnacle of success in 1972 with ten sold-out shows at the Greek Theater in Los Angeles. His 1978 duet with Streisand, "You Don't Bring Me Flowers," went platinum. Though Diamond's album sales began to drop off in the mid 1980's, his tours remained highly successful. In 2005 he grossed seventy-one million dollars, the third highest earner on tour that year.

The Music

Diamond's work embodies the pop genre. He began his career in New York City's Brill Building, writing songs alongside such legends as Carole King, Jerry Leiber and Mike Stoller, and Ellie Greenwich and Jeff Barry. (Greenwich and Barry later produced Diamond's first solo albums on the Bang Records label.) Diamond's songs follow a traditional pop structure of verse-chorus-verse, relying on romantic themes and memorable melodies. From the 1970's through the 1990's, these songs were elaborately arranged and performed with embellishments, such as brass and rhythm sections and back-up singers.

Brother Love's Traveling Salvation Show. One of Diamond's best-known hits, "Sweet Caroline," was recorded a few months after Brother Love's Traveling Salvation Show was released in 1969. This was his first album with Uni, the label he signed with after leaving Bang. "Sweet Caroline" hit number four and was included on the second release of Brother Love's Traveling Salvation Show. The title track, which tells the tale of an itinerant preacher, hit number twenty-two. Diamond originally intended Brother Love's Traveling Salvation Show as a concept album, exploring revival meetings, but many of the songs stray from this theme back to Diamond's common subjects of love found and thwarted and of memories of home and youth. Late in 2007, Diamond admitted in an interview that "Sweet Caroline" was inspired by a picture in a magazine of the young Caroline Kennedy, President John F. Kennedy's daughter.

Hot August Night. This live double album was recorded on August 24, 1972, during a ten-day gig at the Greek Theater, and it solidified Diamond's renown for his live performances. Legendary rock critic Lester Bangs reviewed it favorably in Rolling Stone, and it went gold less than a month after it was released. The line-up of songs included early classic hits, such as "Solitary Man" and "Cherry, Cherry," and more recent fare from Stones and Moods. Diamond was at the height of his career during these performances in Los Angeles, and the recording captures his passion and his energy, as well as his characteristic mix of orchestration and spontaneity.

Beautiful Noise. Beautiful Noise, another platinum record, was notable for being produced by the Band's Robbie Robertson. The single "If You Know What I Mean" peaked at number eleven on the Billboard charts. Known for making hard-driving Dixie-influenced American rock and roll with his bandmates, Robertson seemed like an odd fit for Diamond's sometimes corny mainstream pop music. A connoisseur of songwriting, however, Robertson was able to help Diamond hone his lyrics and his arrangements into perfectly crafted popular songs. This was Diamond's third album for Columbia Records, and the company spent an unheard-of sum of $450,000 on the production of Beautiful Noise.

Twelve Songs. Though Diamond recorded many albums in the 1980's and 1990's and continued to reap gigantic profits from his tours, he was often written off as an oldies act or consigned to middle-of-the-road status. After 2001's Three Chord Opera, he began working on the songs that would eventually form Twelve Songs. He met Rick Rubin, whose career spans cofounding Def Jam Records, deejaying for the Beastie Boys, and cochairing Columbia Records. Diamond teamed with Rubin to produce an album that harked back to the rawness and energy of his earliest recordings. Diamond played guitar in the studio for the first time since the era of Hot August Night. The album debuted at number four, and it received widespread critical acclaim.

Musical Legacy

Diamond's impact on popular music is significant. His songs have been covered by artists as diverse as Johnny Cash, Elvis Presley, Deep Purple, and Urge Overkill, and he has inspired legions of impersonators and cover bands, such as the steadily popular San Francisco-based Super Diamond. His greatest accomplishment is transcending genres and time periods to appeal to a fan base made up of all ages. Simple lyrics and common themes sung with sincerity appealed to generations of Americans, and his worldwide fans are no less enthusiastic. Diamond took elements of the music he liked, ranging from the political folk music of Pete Seeger to the pop stylings of his compatriots in the Brill Building, and mixed in elements of other famous songwriters, such as Joni Mitchell and Leonard Cohen, to create a recognizable sound that has endured for decades.

Lacy Schutz

Further Reading

Blackwell, Roger, and Tina Stephan. "Madonna and Neil Diamond: Sex in Branding" In Brands That Rock: What Business Leaders Can Learn from the World of Rock and Roll. Hoboken, N.J.: John Wiley & Sons, 2004. A close look at Diamond's appeal as a branded product.

Jackson, Laura. Neil Diamond: His Life, His Music, His Passion. Toronto, Ont.: ECW Press, 2005. This biography recounts Diamond's life from his childhood in Brooklyn to international stardom.

Karanikas Harvey, Diana, and Jackson Harvey. Neil Diamond. New York: MetroBooks, 1996. This biography is heavily illustrated with photographs of Diamond.

Wiseman, Rich. Neil Diamond: Solitary Star. Toronto, Ont.: PaperJacks, 1988. A popular early biography, Wiseman provides a detailed picture, especially of early recording sessions.

See also: Bacharach, Burt; Cohen, Leonard; King, Carole; Leiber, Jerry; Newman, Randy; Robertson, Robbie; Sainte-Marie, Buffy; Stoller, Mike; Streisand, Barbra; Valens, Ritchie.

Bo Diddley

American rock and rhythm-and-blues singer, songwriter, and guitarist

Diddley—singer, guitarist, and songwriter—was a pivotal transition figure between blues and rock and roll. He is credited with popularizing the Latin-tinged Diddley beat and the rectangular Gretsch guitar.

Born: December 30, 1928; McComb, Mississippi
Died: June 2, 2008; Archer, Florida
Also known as: Ellas Otha Bates (birth name)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Bo Diddley, 1957; Go Bo Diddley, 1959; Have Guitar, Will Travel, 1959; Bo Diddley in the Spotlight, 1960; Bo Diddley Is a Gunslinger, 1961; Bo Diddley Is a Lover, 1961; Bo Diddley, 1962; Bo Diddley and Company, 1962 (with Norma-Jean Wofford); Bo Diddley's a Twister, 1962; Hey! Bo Diddley, 1962; Bo Diddley's Beach Party, 1963; Surfin' with Bo Diddley, 1963; Two Great Guitars, 1964 (with Chuck Berry); 500% More Man, 1965; Hey, Good Lookin', 1965; Let Me Pass, 1965; The Originator, 1966; Boss Man, 1967; Road Runner, 1967; Super Blues, 1968 (with Muddy Waters and Little Walter); The Black Gladiator, 1970; Another Dimension, 1971; Where It All Began, 1972; The London Bo Diddley Sessions, 1973; Big Bad Bo, 1974; Pay Bo Diddley, 1989; Bo's Guitar, 1992; This Should Not Be, 1992; Who Do You Love, 1992; Promises, 1994; The Mighty Bo Diddley, 1995; A Man Amongst Men, 1996; Mona, 1996.

The Life

Rock-and-roll pioneer Bo Diddley (DIHD-lee) was born Ellas Otha Bates in McComb, Mississippi. He was subsequently adopted by his mother's first cousin, Gussie McDaniel, with whom he moved to Chicago at age seven. The family settled on the city's south side, where Diddley studied violin and trombone before turning to the electric guitar as a teenager. During his youth, he experimented with instrument construction and sound modification, creating distorted amps through which he filtered his self-made rectangular guitars.

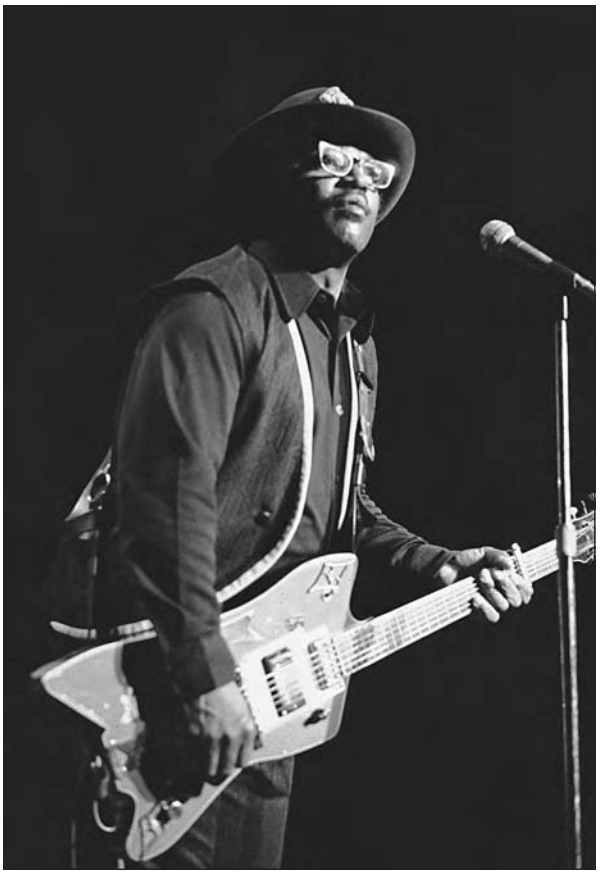
Diddley's musical career began on the corners of Chicago's famous Maxwell Street with his band, the Hipsters. By 1951 their repertoire, inspired by Louis Jordan and John Lee Hooker, helped them become regulars at the 708 Club. Diddley's flamboyant performing style and his idiosyncratic, clave-style rhythm attracted the attention of Chess Records, with which he had his first chart hit with the double-sided "Bo Diddley" and "I'm a Man" in 1955. A series of musical successes continued into the early 1960's. Although his popularity flagged during mid-decade, Diddley's stature as a rock-and-roll innovator was enhanced as popular British bands, such as the Rolling Stones, the Yardbirds, and the Animals, covered his songs.

Diddley subsequently established himself as a prolific touring musician; his frequent European appearances were documented in the 1973 documentary Let the Good Times Roll. From the late 1970's through the 1990's, he made brief appearances in Hollywood films (Trading Spaces in 2000 and Blues Brothers 2000 in 1998), music videos (George Thorogood's 1982 "Bad to the Bone"), and ad campaigns (Nike's "Bo Don't Know Diddley" with Bo Jackson). He was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 1987, and he was the recipient of the National Recording Arts and Sciences Lifetime Achievement Award and the Rhythm and Blues Foundation Lifetime Achievement Award. In 2008

Diddley died of heart failure at seventy-nine; fans sent to his funeral a floral tribute in the shape of his trademark rectangular guitar.

The Music

"I'm a Man" and "Bo Diddley." The original demo of these two songs, featuring Clifton James on drums, Billy Boy Arnold on harmonica, and Hipster Roosevelt Jackson on bass, caught producer Leonard Chess's attention in 1954. He signed Diddley and rerecorded with session musicians Lester Davenport (harmonica), Frank Kirkland (drums), Otis Spann (piano), and Jerome Green (maracas). This double-sided disc featured Diddley's distorted, tremolo-laden guitar sound; the faster, driving beat of jump blues; and the signature Diddley beat. This rhythm is alternately described as hambone rhythm or Latin three-two clave; coupled with Diddley's playing style, it formed the basis of rock and roll that relied on short, recognizable, syncopated rhythmic and melodic riffs. Of note is the guitar tremolo, a Diddley innovation he achieved by creating his own guitar effects processor. The album's eponymous A side reached number two on the rhythm-and-blues charts in 1955, while side B became a featured single for Muddy Waters, Jimi Hendrix, the Yardbirds, and the Who.



Bo Diddley. (AP/Wide World Photos)

"Who Do You Love." The title of this 1956 Chess release offers a play on words: "Who do" is the unlucky "hoodoo" of African American folk practices. The song was not as successful as his hit, "Diddley Daddy," released that same year, yet it is notable for its virtual absence of melodic line and the complete dominance of the Diddley beat and rhythmic tension. Diddley's playing style here draws upon his early experience as a violinist, as he offers brash, scratched rhythms on a few strings at a time without offering complete chords. It, too, became a popular cover for artists such as the Rolling Stones and the Yardbirds, although Thorogood's 1978 version achieved the greatest commercial success.

"Say Man." Diddley's only Billboard Top 20 success came in 1959 with "Say Man," the humorous result of recorded studio banter between Diddley and percussionist Jerome Green. It is in line with the African American oral tradition of "playing the dozens," in which participants verbally contest their wit and mental acumen. The entertaining track presaged the commercial success of novelty songs throughout the 1960's and 1970's.

A Man Amongst Men. As the United States moved away from rock and roll to embrace newer popular music trends in the 1970's and 1980's, Diddley's recording career diminished and he had to carve out a living as a traveling performer. He did not enter the studio for a serious recording effort until 1996. A Man Amongst Men featured the Shirelles, Richie Sambora, Ron Wood, and Keith Richards, and it was nominated for a 1997 Grammy Award in the Best Contemporary Blues Album category. It was a departure from his late Chess recordings in its simplicity, offering pared-down arrangements and straightforward, driving beats rather than thick orchestration. The variety of beats and musical styles, including an attempt at hip-hop on "Kids Don't Do It," showcased Diddley's musical evolution and his reluctance to rely on older formulas.

Musical Legacy

Diddley was a key innovator in the development of rock and roll. His signature Latin-tinged beat and rhythmic innovations, his use of special effects such as reverb and tremolo, and his preference for distorted guitar sounds signaled the advent of a new popular music. As his career faltered in the United States, Diddley was lionized by a generation of 1960's British blues-influenced rockers, whose covers of Diddley's original material far outpaced the commercial success of his own. Over the years he fostered a group of young female guitarists in his bands, including Norma Jean "The Duchess" Wofford, Peggy "Lady Bo" Jones, and Cookie Redmond, at a time when women guitarists were an anomaly. His instrument and amplification adaptations expanded the power and range of the guitar and secured its role as the anchor of the rock ensemble. Diddley was the progenitor of 1970's funk, early hip-hop, and the late twentieth century blues revival.

Margaret R. Jackson

Further Reading

Gates, Henry Louis, Jr., ed. African American Lives. New York: Oxford University Press, 2004. This effort of the W. E. B. Du Bois Institute for African and African American Research at Harvard University includes a biographical sketch of Diddley and contextualizes him among key African American historical figures.

Kiersh, Edward. Where Are You Now, Bo Diddley? The Stars Who Made Us Rock and Where They Are Now. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1986. Kiersch examines the fate of forty-seven early rock-and-roll figures. Short chapters combine interviews, photographs, and career synopses.

Lydon, Michael. Boogie Lightning: How Music Became Electric. New York: Dial Press, 1974. Lydon offers critical insight into Diddley's musical innovations and the role humor played in his music's success.

Traum, Artie, and Arti Funaro. The Legends of Rock Guitar. New York: Oak, 1986. This source includes a biography of Diddley and chronicles his influence on notable guitarists Keith Richards and Jeff Beck.

White, George R. Bo Diddley, Living Legend. Surrey, England: Castle Communications, 1995. This biography of Diddley includes extensive interviews with the artist and photographs spanning the breadth of his career. Includes a list of Diddley's recordings (with U.S. and U.K. releases), a list of recordings released on compact disc, a list of recordings of associates with whom Diddley appeared, a list of Diddley songs that made the Billboard rhythm and blues, Top 100, and British Record Retailer charts, and a compilation of Diddley's television and film appearances.

See also: Beck, Jeff; Berry, Chuck; Dixon, Willie; Domino, Fats; Eddy, Duane; Hendrix, Jimi; Howlin' Wolf; Jagger, Sir Mick; Jordan, Louis; Otis, Johnny; Paderewski, Ignace Jan; Waters, Muddy.

Marlene Dietrich

German pop and cabaret singer

Dietrich began entertaining as a singer in cabarets and in musical theater, and she later enjoyed a successful film career. When she appeared on concert stages toward the end of her life, her signature smoky voice and nostalgic songs enchanted audiences.

Born: December 27, 1901; Schöenberg, Germany
Died: May 6, 1992; Paris, France
Also known as: Marie Magdalene Dietrich (full name)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Souvenir Album, 1950; American Songs in German for the OSS, 1952; Dietrich in Rio, 1953; Lili Marlene, 1959; Marlene, 1965; The Magic of Marlene, 1969; Marlene Dietrich's Berlin, 1974.

The Life

Marie Magdalene Dietrich, who would take the stage name Marlene Dietrich (mahr-LEEN-eh DEE-trihk) was born Marie Magdalene Dietrich in Schöenberg, near Berlin. At age eleven she contracted her names into the shorter Marlene. In 1921 Dietrich began working as a chorus girl in theaters, and in 1922 she did a bit part in a film. Soon after, she met and married Rudolf Sieber, a minor film director, and had a daughter, Maria Sieber. In 1929 she performed the breakthrough role of Lola Lola in Josef von Sternberg's film The Blue Angel (1930). With a contract from Paramount Pictures, Dietrich and Sternberg moved to Hollywood, where they did six films from 1930 to 1935. Sternberg then left the United States, and Dietrich did not have an important film until Destry Rides Again (1939).

Germany's leader Adolf Hitler pleaded with Dietrich to return to Germany, but she refused. She became an American citizen and worked on raising money for war bonds that would help fund U.S. military efforts during World War II. She traveled to the front lines to entertain U.S. troops and to record anti-Nazi songs in German. She was awarded the Medal of Freedom by the United States and the Légion d'Honneur by France.

After the war, Dietrich performed worldwide as a concert singer. During a 1975 performance in Australia, she broke her leg and never fully recovered. Her husband died in 1976, but she was estranged from him and had numerous love affairs with well-known personalities. Mostly bedridden during her last decade, Dietrich died of kidney failure.

The Music

Dietrich presented her songs in a low, sensual, smoky, and world-weary voice, with a slight German accent that made the lyrics more intriguing. Her singing style is described as speak-sing, that is, speaking the lines of a song with a musical note in her voice. Her special vocal quality was reinforced by film directors who presented her visual image in strongly contrasting light and shadow, often emerging from clouds of cigarette smoke. Dietrich's unique musical personality was further enhanced by her androgynous look. From the time of her first major film, her upper body often was costumed in a coat and tie or bow tie and tuxedo, capped by a bowler or a top hat, and her long, beautiful, shapely legs were exposed in silk stockings held up by garters.

Signature Songs. Dietrich began singing professionally in cabarets and musical-theater productions when she was twenty years old, and in 1929 she played Lola Lola in the first German talkie film, Der Blaue Engel, released in the United States as The Blue Angel. In it, Dietrich sang "Falling in Love Again," which became one of her signature songs. In the film Destry Rides Again, Dietrich sang "See What the Boys in the Back Room Will Have," in a scene where she turns a chair backward, sits down, brazenly raises her leg, and directs her attention to her costar, James Stewart, seated in the audience. Throughout the song, cigarette smoke from the audience passes between Dietrich and the camera, making visual her smoky vocal quality. The song's jaunty rendition runs counter to the morbid lyrics.

During World War II, while entertaining American troops on the front lines, Dietrich became associated with the nostalgic ballad "Lili Marlene," from which she took her nickname in later life. A German-language song that she performed throughout her career was "Du, Du Liebst Mir in Herzen."

After the war, Dietrich appeared in the 1947 film Golden Earrings, singing the title song, which became a popular hit. In the 1950 film Stage Fright, she sang "La Vie en rose" and the Cole Porter composition "The Laziest Gal in Town."

Cabarets and Concerts. During the late 1950's Dietrich gave up her film career and traveled the world as a cabaret singer and a major concert star. She also affected a more feminine image, her usual costume being a long white silk dress decorated with sequins. She sang all the songs associated with her past, and she sang new works, such as the powerful ballad "Where Have All the Flowers Gone?" Wistful songs such as this, presented in her nostalgic speak-sing style, moved Dietrich's audience.

Musical Legacy

Dietrich transformed the image of a vampish cabaret singer into the ideal of a Hollywood star. She appeared in almost sixty films, and her sensuality, expressed through her dark, moody songs, would be emulated by such stars as Sophia Loren and Elizabeth Taylor. In 1950 Dietrich signed with Columbia Records to record most of her well-known works. In the 1960's she joined with composer-conductor Burt Bacharach in recording her important performances. In 1964 she parted with Bacharach, but in 1967 and 1968 she appeared on Broadway, and for those performances she won a special Tony Award. In 1992 a plaque was unveiled in Berlin at the site of her birth, and in 1997 a stamp bearing her portrait was issued in Germany.

August W. Staub

Further Reading

Dietrich, Marlene, and Salvator Attanasio. Marlene. New York: Grove Press, 1989. Dietrich's autobiography, with a co-author, covers her life until three years before her death.

McLellan, Dianna. The Girls: Sappho Goes to Hollywood. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2001. A study of possible bisexual relationships between important film stars, including Dietrich.

Pascall, Jeremy. Hollywood and the Great Stars. New York: Crescent Books, 1976. A detailed discussion of Dietrich's career, along with impressive images from many of her films.

Riva, J. David. A Woman at War: Marlene Dietrich Remembered. Detroit, Mich.: Wayne State University Press, 2006. By her grandson, a presentation of Dietrich's contributions to the American World War II effort.

Riva, Maria. Marlene Dietrich by Her Daughter. New York: Random House, 1993. In a book published a year after her mother's death, Dietrich's daughter presents a touching story of her mother's life and accomplishments, with information gleaned from her mother's papers.

See also: Bacharach, Burt; Brel, Jacques; Piaf, Édith; Porter, Cole; Seeger, Pete.

Willie Dixon

American blues singer, bassist, and songwriter

Dixon was an indispensable "behind-the-scenes" musician in the postwar Chicago blues scene. He was a notable songwriter, and his compositions for Muddy Waters, Howlin' Wolf, Little Walter, Koko Taylor, and Otis Rush became part of their signature repertoires.

Born: July 1, 1915; Vicksburg, Mississippi
Died: January 29, 1992; Burbank, California
Also known as: Willie James Dixon (full name)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Memphis Slim and Willie Dixon, 1959 (with Memphis Slim); Willie's Blues, 1959; The Blues Every Which Way, 1960 (with Slim); I Am the Blues, 1970; Peace, 1971; Catalyst, 1973; Maestro Willie Dixon and His Chicago Blues Band, 1973; What's Happened to My Blues?, 1976; Mighty Earthquake and Hurricane, 1983; Hidden Charms, 1988; Ginger Ale Afternoon, 1989.

WRITINGS OF INTEREST: I Am the Blues: The Willie Dixon Story, 1989 (with Don Snowden; autobiography).

The Life

Willie James Dixon was born in Vicksburg, Mississippi, in 1915, and as a child he learned from his mother how to rhyme, which became an important tool for his songwriting. His earliest intensive contact with music was with barrelhouse pianist Little Brother Montgomery, and Dixon started writing songs as a teenager. In 1936 he moved to Chicago, where he became a boxer. In 1940 he and his friend Leonard "Baby Doo" Caston formed the Five Breezes with three other musicians, and Dixon learned to play bass. In 1941 and 1942 he was involved in a dispute over his refusal to serve in the military, and after the war he resumed musical activity with the Four Jumps of Jive. He reunited with Caston, and they formed the Big Three Trio with Bernardo Dennis (later replaced by Ollie Crawford). Dixon developed his compositional techniques and record production with this group.

In 1948, Dixon began his relationship with Aristocrat Records (later Chess Records) as a sideman. After the Big Three Trio broke up in 1953, Dixon became a staff member at Chess Records and also signed a contract as a recording artist for the Chess subsidiary Checker. In 1954 his composition for Muddy Waters, "Hoochie Coochie Man," became a big hit. As a vocalist, Dixon had his own hit, "Walking Blues." In 1956, because of a financial disagreement with the label owners, Dixon left for the newly founded Cobra Records, but in 1958 he returned to Chess and worked for there until 1971. In 1977 he sued Arc Music, the publishing company that belonged to Chess Records, to retrieve royalties from and copyrights of his compositions. In 1985 he sued Led Zeppelin for copyright infringement over "Whole Lotta Love," a reworking of his song "You Need Love." In 1989 Dixon published his autobiography I Am the Blues. After a period of declining health, complicated by diabetes, Dixon died in 1992.

Willie Dixon. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

The Music

Dixon is best known as a blues songwriter, but he consciously departed from conventional blues. He claimed that Montgomery's ability to use a variety of musical styles was his most important musical inspiration.

Early Works. Montgomery's influence is seen in Dixon's compositions for the Big Three Trio. "Signifying Monkey" is a mixture of folk ballad and jive music, while "My Love Will Never Die" is in a melodramatic style. Other musical styles Dixon used for compositions for his early groups include country and western, novelty, Tin Pan Alley pop, slow blues, and fast boogie-woogie.

Compositions for Chess Artists. When composing, Dixon did not always follow the simple twelve-bar blues pattern. "Hoochie Coochie Man" is in sixteen-bar form, and "I Just Want to Make Love to You" is a mixture of the eight-bar form and aaba thirty-two-bar pop-song form.

Dixon had a characteristic way of constructing music and words, often using repetition of simple but memorable riffs consisting of two or three pitches as a support for vocal melodies. This musical device sounds similar to the structure of work songs that he would have heard as a youngster in the Mississippi Delta. He also had a characteristic way of writing lyrics—that is, listing or cataloging concepts or words that could be similar or opposite in meaning. This can be heard in his songs for Chess artists: "Hoochie Coochie Man," "I Just Want to Make Love to You," "I'm Ready," "Spoonful," "Twenty-nine Ways," "You Can't Judge a Book by Its Cover," and "Wang Dang Doodle."

Dixon had a remarkable ability to compose songs that effectively capitalized on the assigned artist's public image. His first experiment was "Third Degree" for Eddie Boyd in 1953. Then came the 1954 hit "Hoochie Coochie Man" for Waters, which linked the singer's machismo with a series of stop-time riffs. In "Back Door Man" for Wolf, Dixon added riffs in Wolf's distinctive style to a story about a man who meets secretly with other men's wives.

Dixon's work shows that his development of the performing personalities of Waters, Wolf, and Taylor was highly relevant to the tradition of the blues as a secular religion. In one analysis, blues performers are considered preachers of an alternative African American religion, one that philosophically opposed organized religious institutions. Dixon defined his blues as an expression of "the true facts of life," and he claimed his artistic goal was to express real-life wisdom through his music.

Musical Legacy

Dixon's songs were not only Chicago blues classics but also important in the repertoires of such rock artists as the Rolling Stones, Led Zeppelin, Cream, the Jeff Beck Group (with Rod Stewart), and the Doors. Dixon's work as a sideman, producer, and talent scout should not be underrated. Dixon played bass for many recording sessions of Chess artists, including Chuck Berry and Bo Diddley. As a producer, he (as well as the label owners) required Berry to revise his debut song, "Maybellene." As a talent scout, Dixon organized debut sessions for Albert King, Junior Wells, and Taylor. Dixon worked as an organizer of the American Folk Blues Festival in 1960 in Europe, which introduced blues to European audiences. In 1982 Dixon established the Blues Heaven Foundation to help musicians retrieve their copyrights, promote an ongoing blues tradition, and educate children. In 1994 his achievements were honored with his induction into the "early influence" category of the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame.

Mitsutoshi Inaba

Further Reading

Dixon, Willie. Willie Dixon: The Master Blues Composer. Milwaukee, Wis.: Hal Leonard, 1992. A collection of representative works. Along with transcriptions in guitar tablature, Dixon's explanation accompanies each song.

Dixon, Willie, with Don Snowden. I Am the Blues: The Willie Dixon Story. New York: Da Capo Press, 1989. Dixon's memories, including discussions of his childhood and youth, relationships with musicians and record-company owners, and stories behind his compositions.

See also: Berry, Chuck; Diddley, Bo; Howlin' Wolf; James, Etta; Morrison, Jim; Rush, Otis; Stewart, Rod; Terry, Sonny; Waters, Muddy; Williamson, Sonny Boy, I; Williamson, Sonny Boy, II.

Dr. Dre

American rapper

Dr. Dre was instrumental in the development of gangsta rap in the late 1980's and early 1990's, and he expanded his involvement in music by producing numerous successful rap albums.

Born: February 18, 1965; Los Angeles, California
Also known as: André Romelle Young (birth name)
Member of: World Class Wreckin' Cru; N. W. A.

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (as producer or coproducer): Eazy-Duz-It, 1988 (by Eazy-E); Doggystyle, 1993 (by Snoop Dogg); No Limit Top Dogg, 1999 (by Snoop Dogg); The Slim Shady LP, 1999 (by Eminem); The Last Meal, 2000 (by Snoop Dogg); The Marshall Mathers LP, 2000 (by Eminem); The Eminem Show, 2002 (by Eminem); Get Rich or Die Tryin', 2003 (by 50 Cent); Encore, 2004 (by Eminem); The Massacre, 2005 (by 50 Cent); Tha Blue Carpet Treatment, 2006 (by Snoop Dogg); Curtis, 2007 (by 50 Cent).

ALBUMS (solo): The Chronic, 1992; Dr. Dre Presents . . . the Aftermath, 1996 (with others); 2001, 1999.

ALBUMS (with N. W. A.): N. W. A. and the Posse, 1987; Straight Outta Compton, 1989; Efil4zaggin, 1991.

The Life

Dr. Dre (dray) began his music career in the mid-1980's as a deejay at the Los Angeles dance club Eve After Dark. There he met other deejays and rappers active in the Los Angeles area, and in 1984 he joined the electro-hop group World Class Wreckin' Cru. In 1986 Dr. Dre met the rapper Ice Cube, and they started collaborating on songs for Ruthless Records, a label run by local rapper Eazy-E. Dr. Dre ultimately left the World Class Wreckin' Cru to join a rap group on the Ruthless Record label, N. W. A. (Niggaz With Attitude). The group—which utilized explicit lyrics that depicted life on the streets and originally consisted of Dr. Dre, Ice Cube, Eazy-E, DJ Yella, and electro artist the Arabian Prince—was instrumental in the development of gangsta rap. Easy-E was the leader of the group, but it was Dr. Dre and DJ Yella who handled the production duties. In addition to his duties with N. W. A., Dr. Dre produced albums for other artists, including solo albums by rapper D.O.C. and rhythm-and-blues singer Michel'le.

In 1991 Dr. Dre left N. W. A. and Ruthless Records to found Death Row Records with former bodyguard Suge Knight. In 1992 Dr. Dre released his first single, the title track to the film Deep Cover (1992), on the label, and later that same year he released his first solo album, The Chronic. The album, which prominently featured protégé Snoop Doggy Dogg, was extremely successful, and it was followed by Doggystyle, Dogg's debut album produced by Dr. Dre, the following year. The Chronic and Doggystyle were the only two albums fully produced by Dr. Dre while he was at Death Row Records, though he did produce a number of songs for other Death Row artists and for film sound tracks. While at Death Row, Dr. Dre did not play a prominent role in the developing feud between Death Row and New York record label Bad Boy Entertainment, nor was he consulted about signing new artists such as M. C. Hammer and Tupac Shakur. These activities and tensions with Knight, along with concerns over the direction of the label, resulted in Dr. Dre leaving Death Row Records in 1996.

Dr. Dre. (Gary Hershorn/Reuters/Landov)

After leaving Death Row Records, Dr. Dre formed his record label, Aftermath Entertainment. Most of the albums initially issued by the label, including the compilation album Dr. Dre Presents . . . the Aftermath, did not reach commercial expectations. The label had its first big success with Eminem's album, The Slim Shady LP, in 1999. Dr. Dre was the executive producer, and it included three tracks produced by Dr. Dre, including "Guilty Conscience," with Dr. Dre as a rapper. That same year Dr. Dre issued his second solo album, 2001, and after its release he refocused on his activities as a producer.

The Music

More gifted as a producer than as a rapper, Dr. Dre has always been more active behind the scenes than in front of the microphone. Through his signature G-Funk (gangsta funk) beats, Dr. Dre shaped the sound of West Coast rap, and gangsta rap in particular. Derived from the funk music of George Clinton and the Parliament Funkadelic (P-Funk), G-Funk, utilized slowed-down P-Funk beats along with slow-rolling melodies, prominent bass lines, and heavy synthesizers. The smooth, multilayered G-Funk sound that became synonymous with West Coast rap contrasted with the more punctuated rhythms and sparser soundscape of East Coast rap, and it helped fuel the rivalry between the two coasts. The G-Funk sound was first hinted at on N. W. A.'s Efil4zaggin, but it came to fruition with the release of The Chronic. In addition, Dr. Dre generally utilized live musicians instead of samples to interpolate rhythms and melodies throughout his songs.

As a rapper, Dr. Dre's music presents the typical themes of gangsta rap that glorify criminal activities and extravagant lifestyles and support sexual promiscuity and the use of drugs and alcohol. Not a gifted lyricist, Dr. Dre frequently enlisted outside help for his songs.

Straight Outta Compton. N. W. A.'s second album, Straight Outta Compton, helped define the gangsta rap genre and established Los Angeles as a center for rap music. It was also the first gangsta rap album to find a large audience, even without any airplay on radio or television. Lyrically, Straight Outta Compton explicitly addresses violent criminal behavior and is musically sparser than later Dr. Dre-produced albums. The most controversial song on the album, "Fuck tha Police," is an indictment of the police's brutal treatment of young African American males, drawing attention to racial profiling in the inner city. The song centers on a mock courtroom skit with each of the rapping members of N. W. A. taking a verse. "Fuck tha Police" contributed to N. W. A.'s notoriety as the world's most dangerous group and resulted in a letter of warning being sent to their record label by the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

The Chronic. The Chronic helped establish the West Coast rap style, including Dr. Dre's signature G-Funk sound, and it challenged the control New York rappers had of the industry. The album also popularized the newly founded Death Row record label, and it increased the appeal of gangsta rap for mainstream suburban audiences. Lyrically, songs on The Chronic address inner-city crime, express misogynist themes, and direct insults at former N. W. A. bandmate Easy-E. In addition to Dr. Dre, The Chronic features a number of guest artists, including rapper Dogg, who appears on twelve of the album's sixteen tracks. Dogg also appears on all three of the album's singles, and he wrote much of the album's lyrics. The first, and most successful, of the album's singles was "Nuthin' but a 'G' Thang," which contains several references to Long Beach, Dogg's hometown, and Compton. The second single, "Fuk wit Dre Day," is one of the songs on The Chronic that attacks Easy-E, along with East Coast rapper Tim Dog and Luke Campbell of the rap group 2 Live Crew. "Let Me Ride," the final single, while the least successful commercially, won Dr. Dre the 1994 Grammy Award for Best Rap Solo Performance. After the release of The Chronic, Dr. Dre focused his attention on producing, and he did not release another full solo album for seven years.

2001. Commonly referred to as The Chronic 2 or The Chronic 2001, Dr. Dre released the album 2001 in 1999. It marks a return by Dr. Dre to some of the same subject matter addressed on his first album, The Chronic. Most of the songs on 2001 contain the stereotypical explicit lyrics and criminal themes of gangsta rap, but the album is still sonically innovative. Produced by Dr. Dre and fellow Aftermath producer Mel-Man, 2001 expands on the G-Funk sound of The Chronic by adding strings and other elements while still sounding leaner. Dr. Dre enlists the help of several guest artists to augment his own rapping, and they figure prominently in the singles released from the album. The first single, "Still D.R.E.," announces Dr. Dre's return as a solo artist, and it features guest artist Dogg and lyrics cowritten by Jay-Z. "Forgot About Dre," the next single, features Eminem and samples from "Vela, Together We Await the Storm," by the Human Abstracts. The song won several awards, including the 2001 Grammy Award for Best Rap Performance by a Duo or Group and the 2000 MTV Video Music Award for Best Rap Video. The final single, "The Next Episode," features rappers Snoop Dogg, Nate Dogg, and Kurupt, and it samples David McCallum's "The Edge." "The Next Episode" was later sampled by the hip-hop group City High for its successful 2001 single "What Would You Do."

Musical Legacy

Through his early work with N. W. A., Dr. Dre was instrumental in the creation of gangsta rap, the dominant genre of rap through the mid-1990's. As a producer at Death Row Records, his slow, synthesizer-based G-Funk beats became the sound of West Coast, and some East Coast, rap, and it helped rap become more than just party music. His sound was frequently emulated by other producers and used by Dr. Dre in the albums and songs that he produced for others. His influence continued to be felt throughout the 1990's and 2000's, as he produced and discovered new talent at both Death Row and Aftermath. Protégés Dogg, Eminem, and 50 Cent have all drawn upon Dr. Dre's credibility and resources in order to find their success in the music industry. Dr. Dre remains one of the most influential figures in hip-hop, helping to produce the next generation of rappers that now dominate the industry.

Throughout his career Dr. Dre has received a number of Grammy Awards. In addition to the ones he received for "Let Me Ride" and "Forgot About Dre," he, along with BLACKstreet and Queen Pen, received the 1998 Grammy Award for Best Rhythm and Blues Performance by a Duo or Group for "No Diggity," and, along with Eminem, he received the 2001 Grammy Award for Best Rap Album for Eminem's The Marshall Mathers LP.

Matthew Mihalka

Further Reading

Borgmeyer, John, and Holly Lang. Dr. Dre: A Biography. London: Greenwood Press, 2007. This biography focuses on the early portion of Dr. Dre's career with N. W. A. and as a solo artist on Death Row Records, though it also includes a short chapter on his activities since leaving Death Row Records.

Brown, Jake. Dr. Dre in the Studio: From Compton, Death Row, Snoop Dogg, Eminem, 50 Cent, the Game, and Mad Money, the Life, Times, and Aftermath of the Notorious Record Producer, Dr. Dre. New York: Colossus Books, 2006. This book is a chronological exploration of Dr. Dre's activities as a record producer. Includes numerous black-and-white photographs and a partial discography presented as a timeline.

Oliver, Richard, and Tim Leffel. Hip-Hop, Inc.: Success Strategies of the Rap Moguls. New York: Thunder's Mouth Press, 2006. A chapter in this book chronicles the history of gangsta rap, focusing primarily on the rise of Death Row Records and its eventual fall, when Dr. Dre left the label in 1996.

Quinn, Eithne. Nuthin' But a "G" Thang: The Culture and Commerce of Gangsta Rap. New York: Columbia University Press, 2005. This book focuses on the emergence of gangsta rap and describes Dr. Dre's involvement in its development.

Ro, Ronin. Dr. Dre: The Biography. New York: Thunder's Mouth Press, 2007. This book covers the life of Dr. Dre, with a significant amount of information about his career since leaving Death Row Records. Included is a discography and a filmography.

_____. Have Gun Will Travel: The Spectacular Rise and Violent Fall of Death Row Records. New York: Doubleday, 1998. This book recounts the history of Death Row Records, the label Dr. Dre cofounded. Includes several black-and-white photographs.

Wang, Oliver, ed. Classic Material: The Hip-Hop Album Guide. Toronto, Ont.: ECW Press, 2003. This book contains a section that analyzes Dr. Dre's The Chronic, and other sections investigate the Dr. Dre-produced albums Doggystyle by Snoop Doggy Dogg and The Slim Shady LP by Eminiem.

See also: Eminem; 50 Cent; Ice Cube; Jay-Z; Salt and Pepa; Shakur, Tupac; Snoop Dogg.

Charles Dodge

American classical composer

Dodge is best known for his work with synthesized voice sounds, with fractal geometry, and with combining computer music with live performers.

Born: June 5, 1942; Ames, Iowa
Also known as: Charles Malcolm Dodge (full name)

Principal works

ELECTRONIC WORKS: Cascando, 1978; Profile, 1990; Any Resemblance Is Purely Coincidental, 1994; Extensions, 1994; Speech Songs, 1994; Changes, 1998; Earth's Magnetic Field, 1998.

ORCHESTRAL WORK: Composition in Five Parts, 1982.

The Life

While pursuing a bachelor of arts degree in composition at the University of Iowa, Charles Malcolm Dodge attended Vermont's Bennington Composers Conference in 1963. There he met James Tenney, Edgard Varèse, and Vladimir Ussachevsky, which led to his interest in computer music. He finished his undergraduate studies in 1964, and then he earned at Columbia University a master of arts in 1966 and a doctorate of musical arts in 1970. Among his teachers were Richard Hervig, Otto Luening, and Chou Wen-chung. He also studied electronic music with Ussachevsky and computer music with Godfrey Winham at Princeton University from 1969 to 1970.

Between 1971 and 1977, Dodge worked at Bell Telephone Laboratories, and he taught in the music department at Columbia University from 1970 to 1980. Subsequently, he founded the Center for Computer Music at Brooklyn College of the City University of New York, and he taught at the City University Graduate Center. In the mid-1990's he became visiting professor at Dartmouth College in Hanover, New Hampshire.

The Music

Dodge's early instrumental works, such as Folia (1965), project different tempi simultaneously, showing the influence of composers such as Elliott Carter. Works from his graduate-school period exhibit serial principles of musical organization, a reflection of the dominant compositional philosophies at Columbia and Princeton at the time. The influence of Milton Babbitt, in particular his Ensembles for Synthesizer, can be seen in Dodge's twelve-tone work for computer Changes.

While Dodge was investigating at Bell Telephone Laboratories the feasibility of using computers to make vocal music, he traveled to Stockholm, where he encountered the music of text-sound composers, among them Lars-Gunnar Bodin and Bengt-Emil Johnson. Their works made an especially strong impression, leading Dodge to compose works featuring synthesized voice sounds. Dodge expanded the range of media utilized, including works for tape alone, for tape with musical instruments, for tape with voice, for radio plays, and for musical theater. In addition, Dodge incorporated algorithmic compositional techniques to further unify his musical material.

Earth's Magnetic Field. While an instructor at Princeton in 1969-1970, Dodge received a telephone call from the Goddard Institute for Space Studies. Geophysicists there had a way of recording the effects of the radiation of the sun on Earth's magnetic field, that resembled, in its notation, music (sometimes referred to as a Bartels musical diagram). For his computer-derived tape piece Earth's Magnetic Field, Dodge interpreted measurements from January 1 to March 4, 1961, to determine the pitch, duration, tempo, and register of the piece. Although the work makes extensive use of reverberation and location techniques to enhance the simple timbre created through subtractive synthesis, these were determined independently of the other musical elements.

Speech Songs. In 1972 Dodge began composing his first work for synthesized voice, Speech Songs, a group of four short songs based on texts by poet Mark Strand. They were realized at Bell Telephone Laboratories in late 1972 and early 1973. First, Dodge recorded himself reading the texts on tape, and then he entered the sound into the computer through an analog-to-digital converter. The computer analyzed the voice sound and resynthesized it, based on that analysis, allowing him to edit the analysis to produce altered vocal effects.

The four songs trace a change in speech synthesis techniques. The first three songs, "A Man Sitting in the Cafeteria," "He Destroyed Her Image," and "When I Am With You," were made with a formant tracking system and present monophonic settings in which the original voice recording is not drastically altered in the process of synthesis. The fourth song, "The Days Are Ahead," was realized with the recently invented linear predictive coding technique, and it presents a polyphonic setting of the text with extensive alteration of the pitch material.

Any Resemblance Is Purely Coincidental. Commissioned by the Arts Council of Great Britain in 1980, this work for piano and tape marks an interesting new direction in Dodge's use of processed voice sounds. According to the composer, the title of the work recalls the standard disclaimer from television crime dramas of the 1950's. The tape part is constructed from a digitized version of the 1907 recording of tenor Enrico Caruso singing "Vesti la giubba" from Ruggero Leoncavallo's opera I Pagliacci (1892). In the course of the work, the voice searches for an accompaniment, and it is heard at different times with electronic sounds, with copies of itself, with the live piano, and with combinations of them all. The work's initial efforts are humorous, with the piano set on center stage as if Caruso were somehow present; as the work progresses other emotions come into play.

Musical Legacy

Dodge's Speech Songs was one of the first pieces in a new genre: music compositions based on the computer analysis of recordings of a wide variety of material, including speech, song, and musical instruments. The work of Dodge, and others associated with speech synthesis, such as Paul Lansky, influenced such popular bands as the Electric Light Orchestra, Kraftwerk, and Styx.

Dodge's numerous honors include the Bearns Prize, Woodrow Wilson National Fellowship, and two Guggenheim Fellowships. He has received commissions from the Fromm Music Foundation, the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, Swedish National Radio, Groupe de Musique Experimentale de Bourges, the Los Angeles Philharmonic's New Music Group, and the American Guild of Organists.

Philip D. Nauman

Further Reading

Dodge, Charles. "In Celebration: The Composition and Its Realization in Synthetic Speech." In Composers and the Computer. Los Altos, Calif.: William Kaufmann, 1985. The composer's description of the methodology behind his composition In Celebration, including a copy of the poem and the score.

_____. "On Speech Songs." In Current Directions in Computer Music Research. Cambridge, Mass.: MIT Press, 1989. The composer revisits the musical and technological ideas that contributed to the genesis of his work Speech Songs.

_____. "Profile: A Musical Fractal." Computer Music Journal 12 (1988): 10-14. The composer's explanation of how fractal geometry played a central role in the method for choosing the elements and the structure of his composition Profile.

Dodge, Charles, and Thomas Jerse. Computer Music: Synthesis, Composition, and Performance. 2d ed. New York: Schirmer Books, 1997. A survey and explanation of the fundamental techniques of computer audio.

Thieberger, Ed M. "An Interview with Charles Dodge." Computer Music Journal 19 (1995): 11-24. Details Dodge's experiences at the University of Iowa, Bell Telephone Laboratories, IBM, Princeton University, and Columbia University in the late 1960's and early 1970's. Includes a significant section on Earth's Magnetic Field.

See also: Babbitt, Milton; Caruso, Enrico; Varèse, Edgard.

Arnold Dolmetsch

French classical pianist, violinist, viol player, lute player, and harpsichord player

Dolmetsch was a performer, instrument maker, and musicologist, and one of the first advocates of the early music revival. Performers who use period instruments are indebted to Dolmetsch's pioneering work in the restoration and reproduction of those artifacts.

Born: February 24, 1858; Le Mans, France
Died: February 28, 1940; Haslemere, Surrey, England
Also known as: Eugène Arnold Dolmetsch (full name)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Domenico Scarlatti: Pastorale from Sonata in D Minor No. 9, 1920 (harpsichord); G. F. Handel: The Harmonious Blacksmith, 1920 (harpsichord); J. S. Bach: Toccata in G Major, 1920 (harpsichord); Nowell's Galliard/Tower Hill, 1920 (lute); Rameau: Fugue "La Forqueray" from the 5ième Concert/Le Cupis, 1921 (violin); Thomas Tompkins: Pavan in F for Five Violins, 1921 (violin); Columbia History of Music by Eye and Ear: Vol. 1, Part 10; Weelkes, Fantasy for a Chest of Six Viols, 1929 (viol); Columbia History of Music by Eye and Ear: Vol. 1, Part 11; Dowland, Awake Sweet Love, 1929 (lute); Columbia History of Music by Eye and Ear: Vol. 1, Part 12; Bach, Prelude and Fugue in B Flat, 1933 (piano); Columbia History of Music by Eye and Ear: Vol. 2, Part 11; Bach, Prelude and Fugue in C, 1933 (piano).

WRITINGS OF INTEREST: The Interpretation of the Music of the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries Revealed by Contemporary Evidence, 1915.

The Life

Eugène Arnold Dolmetsch (DOHL-mehtch) was born in Le Mans, France, to a family of instrument-builders, and as a child he was trained first as a pianist, then as a violinist. He was a violin student at the Brussels Conservatory from 1881 to 1883 under Henri Vieuxtemps, and he later continued his studies at the newly founded Royal College of Music in London. He taught violin at Dulwich College from 1885 to 1889. Dolmetsch spent most of his life in England, though he worked as an instrument maker in Boston from 1905 to 1911 and in Paris from 1911 to 1914. After his stay in Paris, he returned to England. In 1917 he moved to Haslemere, Surrey, where, in 1920, he established an instrument workshop. In 1925 he and his family held the first Haslemere Festival, which lasted two weeks. Dolmetsch was married three times: to Marie Morel, then to Élodie Dolmetsch (his former sister-in-law), and finally to Mabel Johnston.

The Music

Dolmetsch's career involved three interrelated projects: restoration and reproduction of old instruments; scholarship concerning music from the Renaissance and Baroque eras; and the performance of that music using the instruments he helped to revive.

Instrument Making. Dolmetsch first became interested in historical instruments while living in Brussels, where he attempted his earliest restorations, first of an old square piano and then of a viola d'amore. He later acquired and restored such instruments as a lute, a harpsichord, a clavichord, a recorder, a viola da gamba, and a violone, teaching himself (as well as his family members and students) to play the instruments. By 1893 he moved from restoring antique instruments to building reproductions. His activities and success as an instrument-builder coincided with the Arts and Crafts movement in England, a reaction against the factory- and machine-oriented products of the Industrial Revolution. The Arts and Crafts Exhibition Society had mounted exhibitions in London beginning in 1888, and it was at that event in 1896 that Dolmetsch displayed his first handmade harpsichord. He continued his instrument-making while employed by Chickering and Sons, the piano firm based in Boston, where he ran his own department dedicated to the reproduction of early instruments, and later by the Parisian firm of Gaveau, maker of pianos.

Scholarship. By the time Dolmetsch began his studies in London, the field of musicology had entered its nascent stages; indeed, Dolmetsch's mentor at the Royal College, Sir George Grove, was among the most ambitious and prominent scholars of music, publishing the first edition of his dictionary of music in 1879. Early in his career Dolmetsch produced editions of trio sonatas by George Frideric Handel and Arcangelo Corelli, in which he realized the figured bass. In 1904 he published a series of articles in the art journal The Connoisseur: two on the lute and one on viols. Though not without inaccuracies, these articles were based on the author's own research into and experience with early instruments, and they demonstrated a knowledge of historical treatises on the instruments and questions of performance. Dolmetsch's most substantial scholarly publication, The Interpretation of the Music of the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries Revealed by Contemporary Evidence, appeared in 1915, and it was reprinted twice later in the century. The volume was among the first to offer evidence from primary sources regarding performance practices of the Baroque era. The book treats the topic of ornamentation at great length, and it also contains sections on tempo, rhythmic alteration, figured bass, fingering, and historical instruments. Though Dolmetsch's study is allied to the scholarly work of the period, its conclusion disdains impractical musicology, so wholly disconnected from performance, while simultaneously stating the author's views on the necessity of reviving older performance traditions.

Performance. While a student in London, Dolmetsch began to explore the musical holdings of the British Museum and other libraries, where he discovered long-forgotten manuscripts and prints of Renaissance and Baroque sheet music. He frequently performed these works at gatherings in his home, and, starting in 1890, in public concerts; in these concerts he and his fellow performers used the period instruments he had restored or built. However, his most important performances were at the Haslemere Festival, where he, his family members, and his students presented concerts each evening; the daytime was taken up with displays and demonstrations of historical instruments. Because of the novelty of Dolmetsch's undertakings, his performances displayed problems, especially imperfection of the instruments and playing techniques. Indeed, for Dolmetsch imperfect performances were no sign of musical weakness; most of the music he played was intended to be played by amateurs in private circles, and these were precisely the circumstances he tried to reproduce.

Musical Legacy

Dolmetsch's impact has been felt more keenly since his death than it was during his life. Most performers and critics of his day exhibited little sympathy for his work in the fields of historical instruments and music. Dolmetsch was partly responsible for his rift with the musical mainstream, since he seems to have taken a somewhat accusatory stance toward the performers of his day. Nevertheless, after the first festivals at Haslemere, and especially in the 1930's, musicians and the musical public were increasingly accepting of Dolmetsch's ideas. In 1933 the composer Percy Grainger published an article commending Dolmetsch for his steady adherence to the British musical tradition, and an obituary in the Musical Times praised him as a "creative genius."

The Haslemere Festival and the workshop there continued under the guidance of Dolmetsch's descendants and the Dolmetsch Foundation, established in 1929. In the late 1930's Dolmetsch was honored by both the British government and the French government; the former granted him a civil list pension in 1937, and the latter made him Chevalier de la Légion d'Honneur in 1939.

Rebecca Cypess

Further Reading

Campbell, Margaret. "Arnold Dolmetsch." In The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, edited by S. Sadie and J. Tyrrell. London: Macmillan, 2001. A concise and readable summary of Dolmetsch's life and work.

_____. Dolmetsch: The Man and His Work. Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1975. An extensive biography of Dolmetsch, from the perspective of an approving author.

Dolmetsch, Arnold. The Interpretation of the Music of the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries Revealed by Contemporary Evidence. London: Novello, 1969. Dolmetsch's most important contribution to musical scholarship. Though many of his conclusions have been modified or corrected by later scholars, the work was pioneering in its attempt to understand the performance conventions of the Baroque era.

Grainger, Percy. "Arnold Dolmetsch: Musical Confucius." Musical Quarterly 19 (1933): 187-98. This important twentieth century composer praises Dolmetsch for his advocacy of the British musical tradition.

Haskell, Harry. The Early Music Revival: A History. Mineola, N.Y.: Dover, 1996. An entertaining evaluation of the early music movement, with an informative chapter on Dolmetsch.

See also: Grainger, Percy Aldridge.

Eric Dolphy

American jazz composer, flutist, clarinetist, and saxophonist

A jazz reedist, Dolphy was a major figure in the free jazz and Third Stream musical movements of the 1960's.

Born: June 20, 1928; Los Angeles, California
Died: June 29, 1964; Berlin, Germany
Also known as: Eric Allan Dolphy (full name)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Hot and Cool Latin, 1959; Truth, 1959; Wherever I Go, 1959; Candid Dolphy, 1960; Dash One, 1960; Erich Dolphy, 1960; Far Cry, 1960 (with Booker Little); Fire Waltz, 1960; Here and There, 1960; Looking Ahead, 1960; Other Aspects, 1960; Out There, 1960; Outward Bound, 1960 (with the Eric Dolphy Quintet); Status, 1960; Latin Jazz Quintet, 1961; Quartet 1961, 1961; The Quest, 1961 (with others); Softly, as in a Morning Sunrise, 1961; Vintage Dolphy, 1962; Conversations, 1963; Iron Man, 1963; Last Date, 1964; Naima, 1964; Out to Lunch, 1964; Unrealized Tapes, 1964.

The Life

Eric Allan Dolphy (DOHL-fee) was born in Los Angeles, California, to Sadie and Eric Dolphy, Sr., who were of West Indian descent. He took up clarinet while in elementary school, and he eventually started playing alto saxophone at local dances. Dolphy practiced avidly, starting in the hours before school and playing late into the night. He studied music at Los Angeles City College, and after serving two years in the Army, he resumed his studies at the U.S. Naval School of Music. He returned to Los Angeles in 1953, and he began his performing career in earnest, meeting jazz luminaries such as Max Roach and Ornette Coleman, with whom he would later perform and record. Dolphy's first major break came as a member of the drummer Chico Hamilton's band. The film Jazz on a Summer's Day (1960) captured the group's performance at the 1958 Newport Jazz Festival, which was Dolphy's first broad exposure. Shortly thereafter, he moved to New York City, where he recorded and performed with Coleman, Charles Mingus, John Coltrane, Gunther Schuller, and Oliver Nelson. After his initial successes in the early 1960's, his increasingly experimental music began to lose face, and in 1964 he decided to settle in Europe where he found audiences less averse to his challenging music. He died in a Berlin hospital of diabetes-related heart failure.

The Music

Dolphy made major contributions to the emergent fields of free jazz and Third Stream music. His training in the swing and bebop traditions is reflected in all of his work, but his ability to move back and forth between tonally grounded harmonies and highly dissonant, nearly atonal frameworks distinguished his improvisational voice. Broadly speaking, his compositional approach begins with a stylistically idiomatic jazz melody, or "head," which sets the parameters for the harmonies and rhythms of his solos. This avant-garde approach to jazz composition and performance set Dolphy on a course that often overlapped with the European art music tradition, as evident in his performance of Edgard Varèse's Density 21.5 (1936) for flute at the 1962 Ojai Music Festival and his collaborations with Gunther Schuller's Third Stream projects, most notably the album Jazz Abstractions (1960).

Early Works. Dolphy's first year in New York resulted in an unprecedented outpouring of creative activity from the artist. He was a notable sideman on a number of important recordings, including Charles Mingus Presents Charles Mingus (1960), which features Dolphy's technique of "conversational" improvisation. On the recording, Mingus and Dolphy use their instruments to emulate the inquiring inflections, stuttered pacing, and expressive intonations of human speech—in effect, holding a wordless yet still meaningful conversation. Another important early effort as a sideman came with Dolphy's participation in Coleman's groundbreaking 1960 album Free Jazz: A Collective Improvisation, a recording that ostensibly coined the name for a whole genre. In this, Dolphy played the counterpart to the saxophonist Coleman in the double quartet comprising two saxophonists, two trumpeters, two bassists, and two drummers. Exhibiting his abilities in the mainstream jazz tradition, Dolphy also appeared on Nelson's Blues and the Abstract Truth (1961), widely considered that artist's best effort and a classic jazz album.

Out There. In addition to his considerable early body of creative work as a sideman, Dolphy recorded three albums as a bandleader in 1960: Outward Bound, Out There, and Far Cry! Of these, Out There remains one of his finest. His performances on the album establish his ability to work both in and outside the jazz tradition, hence the term "out" in the titles, with which various record labels sought to promote his music. The album, with Ron Carter on cello, George Duvivier on bass, and Roy Haynes on drums, featured Dolphy on clarinet, bass clarinet, and flute as well as on saxophone. On the title track, Dolphy on alto sax plays a frenetic bop-inspired head doubled by Carter on cello. The piece then moves into improvised solos that maintain traditional stylistic phrasing, although wandering in and out of tonal coherence. Dolphy's alto saxophone solo on the track displays his technical mastery of the instrument, winding through three-octave scale figures in split seconds and creating spirals of sound that are so artistically attractive that their outright dissonance and their lack of clear tonality become secondary considerations. The recording of Mingus's "Eclipse" on the album is representative of Dolphy's interest in Third Stream music. The vocal piece is arranged for clarinet and cello moving through a highly chromatic two-voice melody. Eschewing the rhythmic pulse of much free jazz, Dolphy's performance on this track moves at a halting rubato pace indicative of its avant-garde classical inspirations.

Out to Lunch. Out to Lunch is widely considered Dolphy's masterwork. A number of tracks from the album have achieved the status of standards, forming part of an established musical repertory among free jazz musicians. Dolphy's piece "Gazzellioni," named after an Italian classical flutist, is one such tune—a bop-inspired composition that Dolphy performs on flute. "Hat and Beard" is another musical portrait of sorts—here a tribute to Thelonious Monk. Unlike "Gazzellioni," the piece directly emulates the compositions and improvisatory style of the jazz pianist, albeit in an abstract fashion. The piece features a bass ostinato joined by sporadic and angular interjections on trumpet, alto saxophone (and bass clarinet), and vibraphone, which eventually all join the ostinato. Dolphy's bass clarinet solo on the track is noteworthy for both its growling, squealing, and wailing timbres and its multiphonics—a technique of reed playing that produces two pitches simultaneously. Dolphy's work on the bass clarinet here and elsewhere established the instrument commonly relegated to a supporting role as a viable jazz solo instrument.

Musical Legacy

Dolphy's major historical contributions stem from his foundational involvement in the free jazz and the Third Stream movements. Though many musicians around New York's improvised music scene in the early 1960's performed in both jazz and classical settings, it was the work of Dolphy and a few others that established a space for this music between artistic genres and at the edges of popular taste. His interest in avant-garde classical music inspired Dolphy to perform on nontraditional jazz instruments, such as the bass clarinet, oboe, and flute. His experiments with alternative instrumentations and with crossing stylistic boundaries resulted in the many nontraditional instruments commonly found in jazz settings and the expansion of improvised music beyond the label of jazz.

J. Griffith Rollefson

Further Reading

Horricks, Raymond. The Importance of Being Eric Dolphy. Tunbridge Wells, England: DJ Costello, 1988. This is a loving tribute to the artist, with a few transcriptions and analyses of some performances.

Simosko, Vladimir, and Barry Tepperman. Eric Dolphy: A Musical Biography and Discography. Cambridge, Mass.: Da Capo, 1996. This excellent overview of Dolphy's life and work places him in context with other innovative jazz artists, including Coltrane, Mingus, and Coleman, and it describes the unique voice of his music, which could mimic speech.

See also: Coleman, Ornette; Coltrane, John; Kirk, Rahsaan Roland; Lewis, John; Monk, Thelonious; Powell, Bud; Roach, Max; Varèse, Edgard.

Plácido Domingo

Spanish-Mexican classical and opera singer

A great lyrical tenor, Domingo is a superb actor on the operatic stage. He is noted for his versatility, not only in the variety of roles he mastered but also in his activities as a director, an arts administrator, and a popularizer of classical music.

Born: January 21, 1941; Madrid, Spain
Also known as: José Plácido Domingo Embil (full name)
Member of: The Three Tenors

Principal works

OPERATIC ROLES: Borsa in Giuseppe Verdi's Rigoletto, 1959; Danilo Danilowitsch in Franz Lehár's The Merry Widow, 1960; Alfredo in Giuseppe Verdi's La Traviata, 1961; Arturo in Gaetano Donizetti's Lucia di Lammermoor, 1961; Turiddu in Pietro Mascagni's Cavalleria rusticana, 1965; Pinkerton in Giacomo Puccini's Madama Butterfly, 1965; Hoffman in Jacques Offenbach's Tales of Hoffman, 1965; Don Rodrigo in Alberto Ginastera's Don Rodrigo, 1966; Canio in Ruggero Leoncavallo's Pagliacci, 1966; Maurice de Saxe in Francesco Cilea's Adriana Lecouvreur, 1968; Lohengrin in Richard Wagner's Lohengrin, 1968; Ernani in Giuseppe Verdi's Ernani, 1969; Don Alvaro in Giuseppe Verdi's La forza del destino, 1969; Mario Cavaradossi in Giacomo Puccini's Tosca, 1971; Vasco da Gama in Giacomo Meyerbeer's L'Africaine, 1972; Paolo in Ricardo Zandonai's Francesca da Rimini, 1973; Arrigo in Giuseppe Verdi's Les Vêpres siciliennes, 1974; Don Carlo in Giuseppe Verdi's Don Carlo, 1975; Otello in Giuseppe Verdi's Otello, 1975; Aeneas in Hector Berlioz's Les Troyens, 1983; Parsifal in Richard Wagner's Parsifal, 1991; Siegmund in Richard Wagner's Die Walküre, 1992; Idomeneo in Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's Idomeneo, 1994; Adorno in Giuseppe Verdi's Simon Boccanegra, 1996; Hermann in Peter Ilich Tchaikovsky's The Queen of Spades, 1999; Rasputin in Deborah Drattell's Nicholas and Alexandra, 2003; Oreste in Christopher Gluck's Iphigénie en Tauride, 2007.

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): Mefistofele, 1974; Christmas with Plácido Domingo: Vienna Symphony Orchestra, 1981; Always in My Heart (Songs of Ernesto Lecuona), 1984; Domingo at the Philharmonic, 1989; Goya: A Life in Song, 1989; Great Love Scenes, 1990; The Domingo Songbook, 1992; Plácido Domingo Sings Caruso, 1992; The Great Plácido Domingo, 1995; The Young Domingo, 1999; Essential Plácido Domingo, 2004; Vienna: City of My Dreams, 2004; Moments of Passion, 2006.

ALBUMS (with the Three Tenors): Carreras, Domingo, Pavarotti: The Three Tenors in Concert, 1990; The Three Tenors, 1997; The Three Tenors Christmas, 2000; Romantic Arias, 2002; Romantic Tenors, 2002.

The Life

Plácido Domingo (PLA-sih-doh doh-MIHN-goh) was born José Plácido Domingo Embil in Madrid, Spain, on January 21, 1941. A sister, Mari Pepa, was born the following year. Their parents were professional performers in the Spanish musical-comedy genre called the zarzuela. In 1950 the parents decided to relocate the family to Mexico City, where they eventually formed their own zarzuela company. Domingo often appeared in their productions, thus developing the acting skill and the stage presence that would be much admired when he became an opera star. He also continued with the piano lessons he had begun as a child in Madrid.

When Domingo was fourteen, his piano teacher died, and his parents enrolled him in the National Conservatory of Music. At that time, he had two great passions: piano and soccer. A talented goalie, he could have become a professional soccer player. However, he also loved piano. At the conservatory, his range of interests broadened. He liked literature and mathematics; he enjoyed composition and observing conducting classes; and he was fascinated by opera.

Domingo was also interested in girls. At sixteen, he left home to live with another piano student, and they were secretly married. The following year, they had a son, José (Pepe), but soon thereafter they separated and divorced. Because he now had a child to support, Domingo left the conservatory to earn his living as a singer.

While he was at the conservatory, Domingo had met Marta Ornelas, a student taking voice lessons. After a year of courtship, which included his serenading Marta at the apartment building where her family lived and which culminated in her parents giving consent, Domingo and Marta were married on June 15, 1961. By December, 1962, they were living in Tel Aviv, Israel, where for the next two and a half years they sang major roles with the Israel National Opera Company. In 1965 they moved to the United States. A son, Plácido (Placi), was born on October 21, 1965, and another son, Alvaro Maurizio, was born on October 11, 1968. After the birth of the children, Marta abandoned her operatic career. However, she remained her husband's closest friend and his most trusted adviser.

Domingo soon became one of the most highly regarded tenors in the world and one of the busiest. He traveled all over the world, sometimes with Marta and the children, sometimes without them. During the summer he scheduled a vacation, at the family home in Barcelona or at their villa in Acapulco, Mexico. Though he was an international star, Domingo never forgot his roots. After the devastating earthquake in 1985, Domingo flew to Mexico City and joined rescuers working in the rubble. He later gave a series of concerts to benefit the victims. Domingo also retained his love of soccer. In June, 1972, before a performance of Cavalleria rusticana and I Pagliacci in Hamburg, Germany, he joined the stage crew in a soccer game, he hurt his back, and he had to sing the two operas without moving on stage. It was their shared love of the sport that prompted Domingo and two other famous tenors, Luciano Pavarotti and José Carreras, to plan a joint performance at the 1990 World Cup soccer championship in Rome, Italy, thus starting the tradition of the Three Tenors concerts.

The Music

Though Domingo sang baritone roles in his father's productions and in musical comedies, at his audition for Mexico's National Opera in 1959 he was told that he was a tenor. He was accepted by the company, and he made his operatic debut by singing in its production of Giuseppe Verdi's Rigoletto. After returning from Tel Aviv, Domingo joined the New York City Opera, and in 1968 he made his debut with the Metropolitan Opera. Appearances at major European opera houses followed, and he was soon considered one of the world's greatest operatic tenors. However, Domingo also ventured into other areas. He recorded duets with the popular music stars John Denver and Jennifer Rush. He promoted his Hispanic heritage, and he won a Grammy Award for Best Latin Pop Performance for "Siempre en mi corazón," from the album Always in My Heart. He was the star of filmed versions of the operas Otello, La Traviata, and Carmen. In the early 1970's, he began conducting orchestral performances and operas. In 1996 he became creative director of the Washington National Opera in the District of Columbia, and in 2000 he began serving as artistic director of the Los Angeles Opera. Meanwhile, his voice showed no signs of aging and his energy no signs of flagging.

Plácido Domingo. (Keith Bedford/Reuters/Landov)

Tosca. Giacomo Puccini's Tosca (1900) takes place in Rome in June, 1800. Cesare Angelotti, a former consul, has escaped from prison and fled from the villainous Baron Scarpia, the Roman police chief. The painter Mario Cavaradossi aids Angelotti. Scarpia tricks Cavaradossi's mistress, Floria Tosca, into revealing where Angelotti is hiding. After obtaining what she believes to be a safe-conduct from Scarpia that will enable the lovers to escape, Tosca kills Scarpia. However, Scarpia has betrayed her again. Cavaradossi is executed, and Tosca leaps to her death.

Domingo first sang in Tosca in August, 1961, when he was cast in the minor role of Spoletta in a production in Mexico's National Opera. On September 30, when Tosca was again performed in Mexico City, Domingo played Cavaradossi. The role became a permanent part of Domingo's repertoire. By the time he appeared in Tosca in New York's Central Park on June 16, 1981, opening the Metropolitan Opera's summer season, Domingo had played Cavaradossi some 150 times. These outdoor productions in Central Park were presented in concert style. The singers wore evening dress and stood on a raised platform. Most of the crowd of some two hundred thousand could not see them but merely listened to the performance, projected by loudspeakers. Nevertheless, the crowd roared its approval after Domingo's showcase arias. More typical in format were the three performances of Tosca in late May, 1983, during the Opera Festival at the Liceo in Barcelona, Spain. The audience there was as enthusiastic as the New Yorkers had been. Domingo's aria "E lucevan le stelle" in act 3 produced such extended applause that the conductor had to have it repeated.

Otello. Based on William Shakespeare's play Othello (1604), Verdi's Otello (1887) involves the machinations of Jago, an ensign, as he works to destroy the Moorish general, Otello, along with his bride Desdemona, and his second-in-command Cassio, by persuading Otello that his wife and Cassio are having an affair. Jago succeeds, and Otello kills Desdemona. After Jago is exposed, Otello stabs himself.

In his memoir My First Forty Years (1983), Domingo calls September 28, 1975, one of the major milestones in his life. That was the night he first performed the title role in Otello. Though he had been warned that the role would ruin his voice, Domingo found that its challenges helped him to improve his technique. His dramatic interpretation of the role changed markedly in December, 1976, when he played the part at La Scala in Milan, with Franco Zeffirelli as director. Domingo notes how changes in staging suggested by Zeffirelli made Otello's credulity more believable. He also explains that while earlier he had thought of Otello as a Moor, he now saw him as a black man and an outsider among the white Venetians. It is significant that Domingo's most difficult role, that of Otello, is the one for which he is best known.

Tales of Hoffmann. When he died in 1880, Jacques Offenbach left his comic opera Tales of Hoffmann unfinished. As a result, each director makes a number of decisions about the text, even the order in which the three tales are presented. In the prologue, the poet Hoffmann talks about his three loves, and in each of the three acts that follows, one of the romances is portrayed. One of his loves, Olympia, proves to be a mechanical doll; another, Antonia, is so frail that Hoffmann cannot save her from death; the third, the courtesan Giuletta, takes Hoffmann's shadow from him and then sails away with another man. In an epilogue, Hoffmann is told that his present love, Stella, combines the qualities of all the others, and she, too, abandons him for another, leaving Hoffmann alone with his Muse.

In My First Forty Years, Domingo explains that the role of Hoffmann is very difficult for a tenor because he must sing so many extended passages in a high register. Though he first sang in the opera in 1965, as his vocal technique developed and as he came to understand the character he played, he found himself much more at ease in the role. Between 1980 and 1982, when four opera houses observed the centenary of Offenbach's death and of the first performance of Tales of Hoffmann, Domingo sang the title role in thirty-nine productions. He continued to enjoy performing in the opera, both because he felt he had mastered a difficult role and because he found the approaches of the various directors so interesting.

Musical Legacy

Domingo, a superb tenor, triumphed in roles ranging from comic opera to dark tragedy. He appeared in opera houses throughout the world, and he made more than one hundred recordings. He ventured into other kinds of entertainment as well, recording Latin popular music and duets with popular artists and acting in three filmed versions of operas. The first Three Tenors performance, featuring Domingo, Pavarotti, and Carreras, reached some eight hundred million people on television, thus introducing classical music to many who had never been exposed to it. The album sold more copies than any other classical album in recording history.

Part of Domingo's legacy includes his founding a vocal competition for young singers, as well as his work as a director and as an arts administrator. He won numerous awards, including France's Légion d'Honneur and the 2000 Kennedy Center Honors.

Rosemary M. Canfield Reisman

Further Reading

Domingo, Plácido. My First Forty Years. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1983. Covers his personal life and professional works in detail. Of particular interest are the author's comments about opera houses, audiences, and conductors. Includes a list of performances, discography, photographs, and index.

Franchi, Cristina, ed. Plácido Domingo and the Royal Opera. London: Oberon Books, 2006. Focuses on Domingo's relationship with the Royal Opera House and its company. Includes several photographs, some provided by the Domingo family.

Lewis, Marcia. The Private Lives of the Three Tenors: Behind the Scenes with Plácido Domingo, Luciano Pavarotti, and José Carreras. New York: Birch Lane Press, 1996. The author pays special attention to the three musicians' connections with pop culture and Hollywood and to rumors of extramarital relationships. Includes source notes, bibliography, and index.

Matheopoulos, Helena. Plácido Domingo: My Operatic Roles. Fort Worth, Tex.: Baskerville, 2003. This important work, which might be considered the second volume of Domingo's autobiography, is the result of a collaboration between the famous tenor and a journalist who knows opera well. Much of the volume consists of Domingo's account of his experiences, which Matheopoulos supplements with factual material. Includes glossary, three appendixes, an index of names, and numerous illustrations.

Schnauber, Cornelius. Plácido Domingo. Translated by Susan H. Ray. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1997. Though this volume is presented as a biographical study of Domingo during the 1980's and early 1990's, it deals primarily with the singer's vocal technique and his acting skills. Includes illustrations, glossary, discography, bibliography, and index.

Snowman, Daniel. The World of Plácido Domingo. London: Bodley Head, 1985. A well-researched study by a BBC producer who is a longtime friend of Domingo. Snowman provides the backdrops for Domingo's performances by describing various locations and providing character sketches of friends and colleagues. Includes chronology and index.

See also: Aznavour, Charles; Denver, John; Pavarotti, Luciano; Piaf, Édith; Puccini, Giacomo; Ross, Diana; Santana, Carlos; Warwick, Dionne.

Fats Domino

American rock and rhythm-and-blues singer, songwriter, and pianist

A pioneer of rock and roll, Domino is noted for his energetic piano playing and his smoky voice with its New Orleans accent.

Born: February 26, 1928; New Orleans, Louisiana
Also known as: Antoine Domino, Jr. (full name)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Carry on Rockin', 1955; Fats Domino Rock and Rollin', 1956; Rock and Rollin' with Fats Domino, 1956; This Is Fats Domino, 1957; Here Stands Fats Domino, 1958; The Fabulous Mr. D., 1958; This Is Fats, 1958; Let's Play Fats Domino, 1959; A Lot of Dominos, 1960; Fats Domino, 1960; I Miss You So, 1961; Let the Four Winds Blow, 1961; Twistin' the Stomp, 1962; What a Party, 1962; Here Comes Fats, 1963; Here He Comes Again, 1963; Just Domino, 1963; Let's Dance with Domino, 1963; Fantastic Fats, 1964; Fats Domino '65, 1965; Trouble in Mind, 1965; Getaway with Fats Domino, 1966; Southland U. S. A., 1966; Fats Domino Swings, 1967; Stompin', 1967; Fats Is Back, 1968; Ain't That a Shame, 1970; Fats, 1970; Cookin' with Fats, 1971; Big Rock Sounds, 1974; Fats Domino 1980, 1980; Jambalaya, 1984; Easy Riding, 1988; Christmas Gumbo, 1993; Happy Days of Rock 'n' Roll, 1995; The Fats Man, 1995.

SINGLES: "The Fat Man," 1949; "Every Night About This Time," 1950; "Rockin' Chair," 1951; "Goin' Home," 1952; "Going to the River," 1953; "Please Don't Leave Me," 1953; "Something's Wrong," 1953; "You Done Me Wrong," 1954; "Ain't That a Shame," 1955; "Don't You Know," 1955.

The Life

Antoine Domino, Jr., was born in New Orleans on February 26, 1928, the last of eight children of Antoine and Donatile Gros Domino. His father was an amateur violinist, and his uncle played with several New Orleans jazz bands. Domino's brother-in-law, Harrison Verrett, who performed in New Orleans clubs, taught the five-year-old Domino to play piano. By the time he was ten, Domino played blues and ragtime at roadhouses and honky-tonks. Domino could not be deterred from a musical career, even after severely injuring his fingers while working in a bed-spring factory.

Domino married Rosemary Hall on August 6, 1947, and they had eight children. While performing at the Hideaway Club, Domino was signed for Imperial Records by Dave Bartholomew, a bandleader and producer. Domino's first hit was "The Fat Man," a title referring to the 250-pound singer's nickname, Fats. It reached number twenty-six on the rhythm-and-blues charts, and later it earned Domino the first of his twenty-three gold records, a total surpassed at the time by only Bing Crosby and Elvis Presley.

Domino formed his own band in 1951, and a string of rhythm-and-blues hits, written alone or in collaboration with Bartholomew, followed: "Rockin' Chair," "Goin' Home," "Going to the River," "Please Don't Leave Me," "You Done Me Wrong," and "Don't You Know." Billboard chose Domino as favorite rhythm-and-blues artist in 1955 and 1956. He has been widely acknowledged as one of the first rhythm-and-blues performers to become popular with both black and white audiences.

The success of such songs as "Ain't That a Shame" in 1955 led to his being considered a pioneer of rock and roll, along with Bill Haley and the Comets, Bo Diddley, Chuck Berry, Little Richard, Jerry Lee Lewis, and Presley. Domino was more visible than most black rockers, singing in such films as Shake, Rattle, and Rock! (1956), The Girl Can't Help It (1956), Jamboree (1957), and The Big Beat (1958), which takes its title from a Domino song.

When Domino's sales declined during the 1960's, his contract with Imperial Records was not renewed. He began drifting from label to label, with his music seeming old-fashioned in the era of the Beatles, Otis Redding, and Jimi Hendrix. With help from Bartholomew, Domino unsuccessfully tried to launch his own label, Broadmoor.

Fats Domino. (AP/Wide World Photos)

In 2005 Domino made international news because of Hurricane Katrina. While others fled New Orleans, Domino stayed at the insistence of his wife Rosemary, a semi-invalid. Domino survived Katrina, but he lost most of his memorabilia and the home in the working-class neighborhood where he had lived all his life. He eventually moved to a gated community across the Mississippi River in Harvey, Louisiana.

The Music

Domino's voice is soothing and friendly, in contrast to the louder, more aggressive voices of many of his contemporaries.

"The Fat Man." Like much of Domino's early music, "The Fat Man" is a blend of blues, ragtime, and boogie-woogie. Domino learned eight-bar riffs as a young man by listening to Clarence "Frogman" Henry, Professor Longhair, and Huey Smith perform in clubs, and his music rarely strayed from this New Orleans style. His heavy beat on the piano works in counterpoint to his high, nasal, slightly raspy voice. His emphasis on the beat helped make his music popular during an era when rock and roll was essentially dance music. His relaxed yet energetic piano style caused everyone listening to keep the beat.

"Ain't That a Shame." In 1955 Domino's "Ain't That a Shame" became his first crossover hit, earning the tenth spot on the pop charts. A subsequent version by Pat Boone, as "Ain't That a Shame," reached number one. To make certain songs more palatable to young white record buyers in the 1950's, it was common for white singers such as Boone, Presley, and Ricky Nelson, whose first single was Domino's "I'm Walkin'," to have hit versions of songs originally recorded by black singers.

More Hits. Domino had more Top 40 hits during the 1950's than all other rock performers except Presley. In addition to "Ain't It a Shame," his other Top 10 pop hits were "I'm in Love Again," "Blueberry Hill," "Blue Monday," "I'm Walkin'," "Valley of Tears," "Whole Lotta Lovin'," "I Want to Walk You Home," "Be My Guest," and "Walking to New Orleans," the last in 1960. While many of his contemporaries, such as Berry and Lewis, favored raw, suggestive lyrics, Domino's style was always mellower and more nonchalant. His simple, repetitive, easy-to-remember lyrics were inspired by his everyday experiences and chance remarks he overheard.

"Blueberry Hill." In 1956 Domino took the 1940 pop standard "Blueberry Hill" (previously recorded by Sammy Kaye, Gene Autry, Glenn Miller, Louis Armstrong, and many others), added his gliding, syncopated rhythms, and remade it into a rock classic. It remains the song with which he is most identified. He also adapted other Tin Pan Alley songs, such as "My Blue Heaven," "When My Dreamboat Comes Home," and "Red Sails in the Sunset," his final Top 40 hit in 1963, to rock rhythms, his driving piano accompanied by wailing saxophones, making the songs his own.

"Lady Madonna." Domino's last single to reach the pop charts was his 1968 rendition of the Beatles' "Lady Madonna." Ironically, Paul McCartney wrote the song as a tribute to Domino's smoothly flowing sound. In Christmas Gumbo, he brought his bouncy rhythms to "Silent Night," making the familiar holiday favorite sound brand new.

Musical Legacy

The debt the musical industry felt it owed Domino became clear after the Hurricane Katrina disaster. Dr. John, Ben Harper, Norah Jones, B. B. King, Lenny Kravitz, Los Lobos, Paul McCartney, Willie Nelson, Tom Petty, Robert Plant, Bonnie Raitt, Lucinda Williams, Neil Young, and others perform his songs on Goin' Home: A Tribute to Fats Domino to raise money for the Tipitina's Foundation, a nonprofit musicians-aid organization in New Orleans. The rendition of "My Girl Josephine" by Taj Mahal and the New Orleans Social Club demonstrates how Domino and the New Orleans sound are inseparable.

Domino was one of the first ten inductees into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 1986, and he was honored with a Lifetime Achievement Award at the Grammy Awards show the following year. In 1995 he received a Rhythm and Blues Foundation Pioneer Award and in 1998 the National Medal of Arts. By 2007 he had sold 110 million records, second only to Presley among rockers.

Michael Adams

Further Reading

Berry, Jason. "Fats Domino." New Orleans Magazine 42 (October, 2007): 80-83. Details the effects of Hurricane Katrina on Domino's life and the creation of the tribute album.

Coleman, Rick. Blue Monday: Fats Domino and the Lost Dawn of Rock 'n' Roll. Cambridge, Mass.: Da Capo Press, 2006. This is a thoroughly researched biography. Includes photographs.

Lichtenstein, Grace, and Laura Dankner. Musical Gumbo: The Music of New Orleans. New York: Norton, 1993. This resource places Domino's music in cultural context.

Miller, James. Flowers in the Dustbin: The Rise of Rock and Roll, 1947-1977. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1999. Looks at the contribution of "Ain't That a Shame" to rock history.

See also: Berry, Chuck; Crosby, Bing; Diddley, Bo; Hendrix, Jimi; Lewis, Jerry Lee; Little Richard; Nelson, Ricky; Presley, Elvis; Professor Longhair; Redding, Otis.

Thomas A. Dorsey

American gospel songwriter and pianist

Dorsey transformed the character, performance, and distribution of gospel music, bringing it out of the realm of church choirs and into the popular music arena.

Born: July 1, 1899; Villa Rica, Georgia
Died: January 23, 1993; Chicago, Illinois
Also known as: Thomas Andrew Dorsey (full name); Barrel House Tome; the Reverend Thomas A. Dorsey; Georgia Tom Member of: Famous Hokum Boys

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Precious Lord: The Great Gospel Songs of Thomas A. Dorsey, 1973; Thomas Andrew Dorsey, 1990.

SINGLES: "It's Tight Like That," 1928 (with Tampa Red Whittaker); "How About You," 1932; "If You See My Savior," 1932; "Peace in the Valley," 1939 (recorded by Mahalia Jackson);

"Take My Hand, Precious Lord," 1967 (recorded by Jackson; written in 1932).

The Life

Thomas Andrew Dorsey was the son of Thomas Madison Dorsey, an itinerant minister and sharecropper, and Etta Plant Spencer, a church organist and piano teacher. His early musical experience was piano lessons from his mother and the shape-note hymns and spirituals of the church. The Dorsey family moved to Atlanta in 1908, and Dorsey began working in the Eighty-One Theater, selling concessions and doing other odd jobs. There he was exposed to the music of Ma Rainey and Bessie Smith, and he was captivated by the blues. He began learning to play the blues from several pianists in the city, including Ed Butler, James Henningway, and Eddie Heywood. By age twelve he was known around Atlanta for playing house parties under the name Barrel House Tom.

In 1916 Dorsey moved with his family to Chicago, Illinois, where he studied music formally at the Chicago School of Composition and Arranging. He began working as an agent for Paramount Records, writing songs for a Chicago publishing house, and playing in clubs under the name Georgia Tom. While Dorsey made a name for himself as a jazz and blues performer, sacred music was still important to him. After hearing W. M. Nix sing at the 1921 National Baptist Convention, Dorsey began writing sacred songs. His first sacred composition, "If I Don't Get There," was published in the second edition of Gospel Pearls (1921), alongside the works of Ira Sankey, Homer Rodeheaver, Isaac Watts, Fanny Crosby, and Charles Wesley. In 1922 he became the director of music for the New Hope Baptist Church in Chicago, where he began to incorporate his blues-playing techniques with sacred music in earnest.

Financial issues forced Dorsey to continue playing in clubs. In 1923 Dorsey became the pianist for Will Walker's Whispering Syncopators, where he worked alongside Lionel Hampton and met W. C. Handy. Meanwhile, his compositions were attracting the attention of other performers, including Joe "King" Oliver, whose Creole Jazz Band recorded Dorsey's "Riverside Blues." These successes caught the attention of Rainey, who chose Dorsey to organize and lead her Wild Cats Jazz Band. In 1928 Dorsey had his biggest blues hit, with Wild Cats Jazz Band guitarist Tampa Red Whittaker. It was called "It's Tight Like That," and the two would record several times together as the Famous Hokum Boys.

Dorsey was at the height of his blues career when personal tragedy caused him to change direction. In 1932 his wife, Nettie Harper, died in childbirth, and his son died the next day. In the wake of this loss, Dorsey renounced the blues and turned his attention to religious music full time. His sacred music had already garnered him some level of fame after Willie Mae Ford Smith performed his "If You See My Savior" at the 1930 National Baptist Convention. In 1932 Dorsey organized a performance of the three church choirs with which he was involved, and that led to the development of the National Convention of Gospel Choirs and Choruses (with Smith). Dorsey was elected president of the organization, over his objections, and he held the title until he stepped down in 1983. He also founded the first independent publishing house for black gospel music, the Dorsey House of Music, in Chicago.

In the late 1930's and early 1940's, Dorsey turned his focus away from gospel choirs and toward individual singers, including Mahalia Jackson, Roberta Walker, Clara Ward, and Della Reese. Dorsey's work with these singers transformed gospel music into a popular musical genre, with many of the solo gospel singers performing in clubs beside Billie Holiday and Ella Fitzgerald as well as in churches. He toured with these artists, playing piano and selling the sheet music for the songs they sang, a Dorsey innovation. Before Dorsey, gospel-music composers published their songs in songbooks or song collections by a variety of composers, such as Gospel Pearls. Dorsey published his songs individually as sheet music, like the blues and Tin Pan Alley songs.

Dorsey continued composing and working with gospel choirs and singers throughout the rest of his life. In 1979 he was elected to the Nashville Songwriters International Hall of Fame, becoming the first African American to receive that honor. Three years later he became the first African American elected to the Gospel Music Association's Living Hall of Fame. In 1981 his home state honored Dorsey by enshrining him in the Georgia Music

Hall of Fame. In August, 1982, the Thomas A. Dorsey Archives were opened at Fisk University in Nashville, Tennessee, where his papers reside next to those of W. C. Handy and George Gershwin. Dorsey died in 1993 in Chicago of complications from Alzheimer's disease. He is buried in the Oak Woods Cemetery in Chicago.

The Music

"It's Tight Like That." Dorsey's first hit was "It's Tight Like That," a duet with guitarist Tampa Red Whittaker. Whittaker approached Dorsey with the lyrics, and he composed the music. The song is an example of hokum, which combines urban sophistication with rural, lowbrow humor by using euphemisms and sexual innuendo to produce a bawdy song that could work in proper society. The simple musical accompaniment provides a bouncy, lighthearted rhythmic backing to the lyrics. Whittaker is the guitarist and primary vocalist, while Dorsey plays piano and sings harmony on the chorus. Since its release in 1928, "It's Tight Like That" has sold more than seven million copies.

"If You See My Savior." Dorsey's first gospel hit was "If You See My Savior," which he wrote in 1926 after the death of a friend. Its first major performance was at the National Baptist Convention, after which Dorsey sold four thousand copies of the sheet music. The song's lyrics tie in with the tradition of spirituals, particularly in their use of the "crossing Jordan" allusion, in this case to reference dying and going to heaven. The lyrics are written from the perspective of someone sending a message to Jesus through a dying friend that the singer is on his way.

"Take My Hand, Precious Lord." Dorsey wrote his best-known song, "Take My Hand, Precious Lord" in August, 1932, after the death of his wife, Nettie, and his newborn son. After the tragedy, which occurred while Dorsey was in St. Louis playing at a revival, he felt wronged by God. He said he did not want to write gospel songs any longer. A friend arranged for Dorsey to be left alone in a room with a piano, and while he was playing around on the keys, the tune and lyrics came to him. The song is linked to the blues in the same way that the spirituals were linked to the slaves: It is a song crying out for God's help through the hardships of life. The melody was adapted from the hymn "Maitland," composed in 1844 by George N. Allen, although it is often attributed to Dorsey. (The same tune was used for Thomas Shepherd's "Must Jesus Bear the Cross Alone.") The first recording of "Take My Hand, Precious Lord" was made by Emory Johnson in 1938, and since then it has been recorded by numerous performers from diverse backgrounds, including Elvis Presley, Mahalia Jackson, Lawrence Welk, Pat Boone, Nina Simone, Chaka Kahn, Little Richard, and Faith Hill. The lyrics have appeared in forty different languages. In 2001 it was listed as one of the top 365 songs of the twentieth century by the Recording Industry Association of America, and it was inducted into the Christian Music Hall of Fame in 2007. The song was also a favorite of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.

"Peace in the Valley." In 1939 Dorsey wrote "Peace in the Valley" for his protégé Jackson. It is a song of hope and longing, akin to many spirituals and other gospel songs with the same theme. Unlike other songs in this tradition, which speak of heaven as a place of rest from the toils and labors of life, "Peace in the Valley" focuses on the glory of heaven. Dorsey describes "the valley" as a place free from sorrow, sadness, and trouble, where the flowers are always in bloom and the sun always shines. "Peace in the Valley" has been recorded by numerous other artists, including Hill, Johnny Cash, Loretta Lynn, and Red Foley. Foley's 1951 recording, with the Sunshine Boys, was the first gospel recording to sell one million copies, and in 2006 it was selected by the Library of Congress to be one of the entries in the National Recording Registry, which preserves recordings deemed to be important for historical, cultural, or aesthetical reasons.

Musical Legacy

Dorsey transformed the performance, dissemination, and the character of gospel music. He transformed the gospel blues of the street evangelists into the music of the church, writing and arranging songs for a choral setting and for solo singers. He published his compositions in sheet-music format rather than in songbooks, which allowed for greater distribution and caused them to be treated like popular songs rather than church songs. He was the first African American elected to the Nashville Songwriters Hall of Fame as well as the Gospel Music Association's Living Hall of Fame. His songs have been recorded by numerous artists, including Jackson, Clara Ward, Aretha Franklin, Elvis Presley, Tennessee Ernie Ford, and Johnny Cash. In addition, they have been praised by U.S. Presidents, civil rights leaders, and music historians.

Eric S. Strother

Further Reading

Boyer, Horace Clarence. How Sweet the Sound: The Golden Age of Gospel. Washington, D.C.: Elliott and Clark, 1995. A well-researched history of gospel music, defining it as an American art form. It describes the lives of some of the most prominent artists of the genre, including Dorsey. Illustrated with photographs.

Harris, Michael W. The Rise of Gospel Blues: The Music of Thomas Andrew Dorsey in the Urban Church. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992. This resource focuses on Dorsey, who wrote two thousand blues songs before he turned to writing the hybrid sacred and profane songs that worked in both the church and the nightclub. His work forms the foundation for gospel repertoire.

See also: Cleveland, James; Fitzgerald, Ella; Hampton, Lionel; Handy, W. C.; Holiday, Billie; Jackson, Mahalia; Presley, Elvis; Rainey, Ma; Simone, Nina; Smith, Bessie.

Lamont Dozier

American rhythm-and-blues singer-songwriter

During the 1960's, the songwriting and production team of Brian Holland, Dozier, and Eddie Holland (better known as Holland-Dozier-Holland, or H-D-H) produced some of the most memorable "Motown sound" hits in the history of popular music.

Born: June 16, 1941; Detroit, Michigan
Also known as: Lamont Anthony
Member of: The Romeos; the Voice Masters

Principal works

SONGS (with Eddie and Brian Holland): "Can I Get a Witness," 1963 (performed by Marvin Gaye); "Heat Wave," 1963 (performed by Martha and the Vandellas); "Mickey's Monkey," 1963 (performed by the Miracles); "Baby I Need Your Loving," 1964 (performed by the Four Tops); "Baby Love," 1964 (performed by the Supremes); "Come See About Me," 1964 (performed by the Supremes); "How Sweet It Is (to Be Loved by You)," 1964 (performed by Gaye); "Where Did Our Love Go?," 1964 (performed by the Supremes); "Back in My Arms Again," 1965 (performed by the Supremes); "I Can't Help Myself (Sugar Pie, Honey Bunch)," 1965 (performed by the Four Tops); "(It's the) Same Old Song," 1965 (performed by the Four Tops); "Nowhere to Run," 1965 (performed by Martha and the Vandellas); "Stop! In the Name of Love," 1965 (performed by the Supremes); "Take Me in Your Arms (Rock Me a Little While)," 1965 (performed by Kim Weston); "Little Darling (I Need You)," 1966 (performed by Gaye); "Reach out I'll Be There," 1966 (performed by the Four Tops); "This Old Heart of Mine (Is Weak for You)," 1966 (performed by the Isley Brothers); "You Can't Hurry Love," 1966 (performed by the Supremes); "You Keep Me Hangin' On," 1966 (performed by the Supremes); "Bernadette," 1967 (performed by the Four Tops); "The Happening," 1967 (performed by the Supremes); "Jimmy Mack," 1967 (performed by Martha and the Vandellas); "Love Is Here and Now You're Gone," 1967 (performed by the Supremes); "Reflections," 1967 (performed by Diana Ross and the Supremes); "Give Me Just a Little More Time," 1970 (performed by Chairmen of the Board).

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo, as songwriter and performer): Out Here on My Own, 1974; Black Bach, 1975; Love and Beauty, 1975; Right There, 1976; Peddlin' Music on the Side, 1977; Bittersweet, 1979; Lamont, 1981; Working on You, 1981; Bigger than Life, 1983; Inside Seduction, 1991; Reflections Of, 2004.

SINGLES (solo, as songwriter and performer): "Let's Talk It Over," 1960 (as Lamont Anthony); "Benny the Skinny Man," 1961 (as Anthony); "Just to Be Loved," 1961 (as Anthony); "Dearest One," 1962; "Jamie," 1962; "Two Hearts," 1988 (written with Phil Collins; performed by Collins).

SINGLES (with the Voice Masters): "Hope and Pray," 1959; "Needed," 1959; "Oops, I'm Sorry," 1959; "Everytime," 1960; "Free," 1960; "In Love in Vain," 1960; "Orphan Boy," 1960.

The Life

Lamont Dozier (lah-MONT DOH-zyur) was born on June 16, 1941, in Detroit, Michigan. At a young age, he learned to appreciate both gospel and classical music. Dozier sang in a Baptist church choir. Out of this experience, he learned to appreciate the impact that music could have on people. His aunt played classical music on the family piano, and Dozier was taken by the beauty of the melodies. In addition, he loved to listen to his father's record collection. By the time Dozier was ten years old, he had begun to collect his own records. He liked to listen to such popular singers as Johnny Mathis and Frankie Lymon. He began composing his own songs and envisioned himself becoming a recording star. By the late 1950's, Dozier had become a member of the Romeos. They released the singles "Gone, Gone, Get Away" and "Moments to Remember You By" in 1957. With the breakup of the Romeos, he joined the Voice Masters and left Northwestern High School before graduation. This group was short lived and Dozier decided to record as Lamont Anthony in 1961. Dozier married Barbara Ullman, with whom he had three children.

The Music

In 1959, a youthful Berry Gordy, Jr., established Motown Record Corporation in Detroit, Michigan. Dozier had first met Gordy in the late 1950's. Recording as Lamont Anthony, he released a couple of singles on the label Anna Records in 1961. Anna Records had been named after one of Gordy's sisters, Anna Gordy, who was a part owner in the company. In the following year, Dozier recorded under his own name for Mel-o-dy, which was a subsidiary of Motown Records. Eddie and Brian Holland had had a working relationship with Berry Gordy since the late 1950's. Dozier's 1962 single "Dearest One" for Mel-o-dy brought the Holland brothers and Dozier together for the first time. While "Dearest One" was not a hit single, the three eventually decided that it was in their best interests to form a partnership and to concentrate their efforts on writing songs for other performers. Brian focused on writing the music, while Eddie worked on the lyrics and Dozier contributed to both the music and the lyrics. The trio would come to be known as Holland-Dozier-Holland (H-D-H).

Holland-Dozier-Holland helped to shape the Motown sound. While the Memphis soul sound was hard-edged and choppy, the Motown sound was full and much smoother. It had a straightforward and danceable rhythm that became known as the "Motown backbeat." The tempo for the Motown sound ranges from 80 beats per minute (bpm) to 100 bpm, and the time signature is 4/4. Within this 4/4 time, the snare drum is hit on beats 2 and 4.

Gordy demanded the highest of technical standards, and he was able to count on Holland-Dozier-Holland to deliver the very best. The trio's songs came to be known as the "Sound of Young America." These up-tempo tunes combined elements of gospel, rhythm and blues, and pop. Brian focused on the structure of the song and Dozier worked on the melody. Eddie's catchy lyrics were taken from real-life experiences. Once the key and chords were determined, someone on the Motown staff would transcribe the piece, since none of the three songwriters could write music. After the composition was finished, Eddie would concentrate on getting the lead vocal right, Brian would take control of the sound board and work on the keyboard and guitar parts of the song, and Dozier turned his attention to the rhythm section and the background vocals. They had a wonderful working relationship that allowed for each of their creative and technical strengths to be used to best advantage.

Early Hits. H-D-H began having success in 1963 working for Gordy's Motown Records. During the year, they wrote such memorable songs as "Come and Get These Memories," "Heat Wave," and "Quicksand" for Martha and the Vandellas; "Locking up My Heart" for the Marvelettes; "Mickey's Monkey" for the Miracles; and "Can I Get a Witness" for Marvin Gaye. All of these singles charted on the pop charts, with "Heat Wave" rising to number four and "Quicksand" rising to number eight. Martha and the Vandellas would have four more hit singles between 1963 and 1967. The single "Nowhere to Run" would rise to number eight on the pop singles chart in 1965, while "I'm Ready for Love" would rise to number nine in 1966 and "Jimmy Mack" would rise to number ten in 1967. During this same period, the H-D-H team would write the number six hit in 1964 "How Sweet It Is to Be Loved by You" for Gaye and the number twelve hit in 1965 "This Old Heart of Mine" for the Isley Brothers. The up-tempo hit songs that they were writing for the Motown stable of artists established H-D-H as one of the premier songwriting teams in America.

The Supremes and the Four Tops. While H-D-H continued to write quality songs for other groups, the team produced an amazing string of hits for the Supremes and the Four Tops. The first single they wrote for the Supremes, "When the Lovelight Starts Shining Through His Eyes," only went to number twenty-three on the pop singles chart, but the songs to come would make music history. The group would have three number-one hits in 1964: "Where Did Our Love Go," "Baby Love," and "Come See About Me." In the next three years, the Supremes would have seven number-one hits, including the extraordinary songs "Stop! In the Name of Love," "Back in My Arms Again," "You Can't Hurry Love," "You Keep Me Hanging On," and "The Happening." With the help of Holland-Dozier-Holland, Diana Ross and the Supremes became superstars.

The team also was writing memorable hits for the Four Tops during these years, including "Baby I Need Your Loving," "It's the Same Old Song," "Reach Out and I'll Be There," "Standing in the Shadows of Love," and "Bernadette."

Solo Career. By 1968, Holland-Dozier-Holland were not happy with the royalty arrangement that they had with Motown. They left Motown and started Hot Wax and Invictus Records. Starting in 1974, Dozier would release several solo albums, including Out Here on My Own, Peddlin' Music on the Side, Bigger than Life, and Reflections Of. He also has worked with other artists, including Phil Collins on the 1988 hit single "Two Hearts," which won a 1989 Grammy Award for Best Song Written Specifically for a Motion Picture or Television for both Dozier and Collins.

Musical Legacy

During the 1960's, the Motown songwriting and production team of Holland-Dozier-Holland created hit single after hit single for such illustrious recording artists as the Supremes, the Four Tops, the Marvelettes, the Miracles, Martha and the Vandellas, and Marvin Gaye. Their songs epitomized what came to be known as the Motown sound. From 1963 to 1967, they wrote more than twenty Top 10 hits, and twelve of these songs went to number one on the pop singles chart. They also wrote twelve other songs that made it to the Top 10 on the rhythm-and-blues singles charts. Their songs appealed to a vast listening audience because of the team's ability to combine the best elements of pop, soul, country, and rhythm and blues.

In 1988, Lamont Dozier, Brian Holland, and Eddie Holland were inducted into the Songwriters Hall of Fame. They were inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 1990.

Jeffry Jensen

Further Reading

Bianco, David. Heat Wave: The Motown Fact Book. Ann Arbor, Mich.: Pieran Press, 1988. A wonderful overview of Motown Records, including a portrait of Holland-Dozier-Holland.

Egan, Sean. The Guys Who Wrote 'Em: Songwriting Geniuses of Rock and Pop. London: Askill, 2004. Includes a fine chapter on Holland-Dozier-Holland.

George, Nelson. Where Did Our Love Go? The Rise and Fall of the Motown Sound. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1985. Takes a hard look at the rise and fall of Motown Records.

Posner, Gerald. Motown: Music, Money, Sex, and Power. New York: Random House, 2002. While the music put Motown on top, money, sex, and power tore at its very foundation.

Smith, Suzanne E. Dancing in the Street: Motown and the Cultural Politics of Detroit. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1999. Reveals the crucial role Motown played in the socially charged African American community.

Waller, Don. The Motown Story. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1985. Gives the reader an inside look at how Motown produced such extraordinarily popular music.

See also: Cooke, Sam; Costello, Elvis; Fogerty, John; Gabriel, Peter; Gaye, Marvin; Holland, Eddie and Brian; Jackson, Janet; Jackson, Michael; Jamerson, James; Latifah, Queen; Odetta; Pickett, Wilson; Plant, Robert; Robinson, Smokey; Ross, Diana; Seger, Bob; Taylor, James; Van Halen, Eddie; Webb, Jimmy; Wilson, Jackie; Wonder, Stevie.

Jacqueline du Pré

English classical cellist

Du Pré's heartfelt cello performances and recordings charmed audiences and influenced other cellists. Suffering from multiple sclerosis, du Pré impressed the world with her courage, and she heightened public awareness of the autoimmune disease that cut short her career and her life.

Born: January 26, 1945; Oxford, England
Died: October 19, 1987; London, England
Also known as: Jacqueline Mary du Pré (full name)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: A Jacqueline du Pré Recital, 1962; Elgar: Concerto in E Minor, Op. 85; Sea Pictures, Op. 37, 1965; Delius: Concerto for Cello and Orchestra, 1966; Beethoven: Sonata No. 3 in A Major, Op. 69; Sonata No. 5 in D Major, Op. 102, No. 2, 1967; Haydn: Concerto in D Major, Op. 101, 1969; Brahms: Sonatas for Cello and Piano, 1968; Schumann: Concerto in A Minor, Op. 129, 1970; Dvořák: Cello Concerto in B Minor, Op. 104; Silent Woods: Adagio for Cello and Orchestra, Op. 68, 1971; Impressions, 1988.

The Life

Jacqueline Mary du Pré (zhahk-LEEN doo-PRAY) was the second child born to Derek and Iris du Pré. At age four, she asked to play the cello, and she began private study with Alison Dalrymple. In 1955 du Pré began studying with William Pleeth, and while under his tutelage, she was awarded the Suggia Gift, a scholarship for young cellists. Although du Pré was extremely gifted, she did not like school, and her parents frequently allowed her to miss classes in order to practice.

In 1960 du Pré won the prestigious Queen's Prize, and she participated in master classes with Pablo Casals. She made her professional debut at Wigmore Hall in 1961, and in 1962 she made her orchestral debut, playing Edward Elgar's Cello Concerto with the BBC Symphony Orchestra. In that same year she began recording with EMI Records. During these early years of her career, besides playing solo and chamber-music recitals, du Pré studied for brief periods with Paul Tortelier and Mstislav Rostropovich.

Du Pré met pianist and conductor Daniel Barenboim in 1966, and the two musicians were married in Israel in 1967. For the next few years, they performed around the world and recorded together. In 1971 du Pré began to experience bewildering physical symptoms, including numbness and extreme fatigue, that forced her to curtail her performance schedule. Finally, in 1973, she was diagnosed with multiple sclerosis. Du Pré's condition rapidly deteriorated, and by 1975 she was bound to a wheelchair, remaining musically active by giving lessons and master classes. Tragically, at just forty-two years old, du Pré lost her battle with multiple sclerosis on October 19, 1987.

The Music

Despite the brevity of her playing career, du Pré performed and recorded the majority of the standard cello repertoire along with select contemporary works. In addition to Elgar's work, du Pré frequently performed the cello concerti of Johannes Brahms, Robert Schumann, Antonìn Dvořák, Franz Joseph Haydn, and Camille Saint-Saëns. She recorded all of these concerti (among others) for EMI Records.

Du Pré also enjoyed playing chamber music. In 1964 she formed a successful duo with pianist Stephen Bishop; critics especially admired the duo's interpretation of the Beethoven cello sonatas. Once she met Barenboim, however, du Pré preferred to play chamber music with him. For nearly five years, Barenboim and du Pré regularly performed together, often as a duo, but also as a trio with violinist Pinchas Zukerman.

Elgar's Cello Concerto in E Minor, Op. 85. Over the course of her career, du Pré performed Elgar's

Cello Concerto more than any other. She first became acquainted with the concerto in her lessons with Pleeth when she was thirteen years old. The teenage cellist was so taken with the work, she purportedly memorized the first movement and half of the second movement in just two days. When du Pré performed this concerto in her orchestral debut concert, critics and audience members alike were stunned by her mature interpretation. Elgar composed his Cello Concerto at the end of World War I. Perhaps not surprisingly, the concerto evokes a sense of poignant tragedy, which du Pré, despite her tender age, was able to vividly capture in her playing.

Du Pré first recorded this concerto with Sir John Barbirolli and the London Symphony Orchestra in 1965. This legendary recording offers a spectacular demonstration of her daring and uninhibited style. Du Pré rerecorded the concerto with Barenboim and the Philadelphia Orchestra in 1971. This later recording, spliced from two live performances in Philadelphia, reveals even further self-indulgence on du Pré's part, especially in terms of rubato. Yet this extraordinary sense of freedom is grounded by solid technique, a combination that made du Pré's performances of the concerto awe-inspiring.

Jacqueline du Pré. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

Schumann's Cello Concerto in A Minor, Op. 129. Du Pré was also admired for her interpretation of the Schumann Cello Concerto. She first performed this concerto with the BBC Symphony Orchestra in 1962. Composed after Schumann had begun to suffer from mental illness, this concerto is, like Elgar's, a rather somber work. In her 1968 recording with Barenboim and the New Philharmonia Orchestra, du Pré's playing is more disciplined and structured than was typical of her live performances of the work. Nonetheless, the performance is full of emotional intensity.

Brahms's Sonatas for Cello and Piano. In her chamber-music recitals with Bishop and Barenboim, du Pré frequently performed the two Brahms cello sonatas. She and Barenboim recorded both sonatas in 1968, and this recording offers a glimpse into the couple's passionate musical relationship. In the first sonata, which Brahms composed in 1866 and which shows the clear influence of Ludwig van Beethoven, du Pré and Barenboim are flexible with their tempi, yet they are always perfectly synchronized. The duo aptly expresses both the somber and heroic sides of the E minor sonata. The second sonata, in F major and composed in 1886, has a more tempestuous character and is more technically demanding, but both players are up to the challenge. Du Pré and Barenboim create a convincing and expressive dialogue between their instruments, perfect for such intimate chamber pieces.

Musical Legacy

Du Pré's inspiring performances and recordings of the Elgar concerto are largely responsible for the integration of this piece into the mainstream cello repertoire. Her free and innovative technique (including her frequent slides and unconventional fingerings) also opened up new possibilities for different playing styles. Such world-renowned cellists as Steven Isserlis and Yo-Yo Ma have acknowledged her influence. While some critics found her rather physical approach to performance excessively mannered and distracting, none could deny her innate musical genius. In recognition of the honor and distinction she brought England through her music, du Pré was made an Officer of the Most Excellent Order of the British Empire (OBE) in 1976.

Jennifer L. Smull

Further Reading

Du Pré, Hilary, and Piers du Pré. A Genius in the Family: An Intimate Memoir of Jacqueline du Pré. London: Chatto & Windus, 1997. These memoirs, written by du Pré's siblings, were used as the basis for the 1998 film Hilary and Jackie.

Easton, Carol. Jacqueline du Pré: A Biography. Cambridge, Mass.: Da Capo Press, 2000. This biography emphasizes du Pré's private life more than her public musical life.

Keener, Andrew. "The Cello Concerto: Jacqueline du Pré's Recordings." In Elgar: An Anniversary Portrait. London: Continuum, 2007. In this chapter, Keener discusses du Pré's special relationship with Elgar's Cello Concerto, and he compares her eight extant recordings.

Wilson, Elizabeth. Jacqueline du Pré. London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1998. This thorough biography emphasizes du Pré's musical achievements. The author is a cellist and was personally acquainted with du Pré.

Wordsworth, William, ed. Jacqueline du Pré: Impressions. London: Grenada, 1983. Contains tributes to du Pré by friends and colleagues. Includes photographs and reviews of her performances.

See also: Barenboim, Daniel; Casals, Pablo; Elgar, Sir Edward; Ma, Yo-Yo; Rostropovich, Mstislav.

Bob Dylan

American folk and rock singer-songwriter

Dylan spearheaded the folk revival of the early 1960's and forged a new genre of music called folk-rock. His major talent as the most significant song-poet of the twentieth century lies in his extraordinary ability to synchronize profound poetry with simple yet infectious musical composition.

Born: May 24, 1941; Duluth, Minnesota

Also known as: Robert Allen Zimmerman (birth name); Blind Boy Grunt; Jack Frost; Elston Gunn; Sergei Petrov

Member of: The Traveling Wilburys

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Bob Dylan, 1962; The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan, 1963; Another Side of Bob Dylan, 1964; The Times They Are A-Changin', 1964; Bringing It All Back Home, 1965; Highway 61 Revisited, 1965; Blonde on Blonde, 1966; John Wesley Harding, 1967; Nashville Skyline, 1969; New Morning, 1970; Self Portrait, 1970; Dylan, 1973; Pat Garrett and Billy the Kid, 1973; Planet Waves, 1974; The Basement Tapes, 1975 (with the Band); Blood on the Tracks, 1975; Desire, 1976; Street Legal, 1978; Slow Train Coming, 1979; Saved, 1980; Shot of Love, 1981; Infidels, 1983; Empire Burlesque, 1985; Knocked out Loaded, 1986; Hearts of Fire, 1987; Down in the Groove, 1988; Emotionally Yours, 1988; The Traveling Wilburys, Vol. 1, 1988; Oh Mercy, 1989; The Traveling Wilburys, Vol. 3, 1990; Under the Red Sky, 1990; Good as I Been to You, 1992; World Gone Wrong, 1993; Bob Dylan and Johnny Cash, 1994; Time out of Mind, 1997; Love and Theft, 2001; Masked and Anonymous, 2003; Modern Times, 2006; Tell Tale Signs: Rare and Unreleased, 1989-2006, 2008; Together Through Life, 2009.

The Life

Robert Allen Zimmerman was born to Abram and Beatrice Zimmerman, descendants, respectively, of Russian- and Lithuanian-Jewish immigrants. He changed his name legally to Bob Dylan (DIH-luhn) in 1962, but he adopted the name as early as 1959. Dylan began to play piano around the age of ten, though according to his uncle Lewis Stone he was not a particularly gifted musician as a child. In fact, his family considered his younger brother David the more musically precocious. Dylan was notably perturbed by his family's misgivings; as a result, he gave up his cousin Harriet Rutstein's piano lessons and taught himself music.

As a young teen growing up in 1950's America, Dylan was keenly interested in rock-and-roll music and Hollywood films. He had a natural affinity for Elvis Presley, Buddy Holly, and James Dean; Dylan, like Elvis, Holly, and Dean, was a rebel at heart. His individuality is a trait no less significant to his success as an artist than is his talent for music and his gift with words. At Hibbing High, Dylan joined a number of rock-and-roll bands, including the Golden Chords and Elston Gunn and the Rock Boppers. With the Boppers he became for the first time a band's front man. Dylan was not much of a singer or instrumentalist at this time. He was just beginning to learn his trade and, like many other teenagers at the time, emulated the fashions and trends of his rock-and-roll heroes.

Dylan's discovery of the world of folk music did not occur until he graduated from high school and moved to "Dinkytown," a small beatnik community in the downtown core of Minneapolis. He briefly attended the University of Minnesota, where he enrolled in the liberal arts program as a music major. Dylan was never too interested in institutionalized education; while he was supposed to be attending classes, he spent most of his daytime hours sleeping and his nighttime hours playing music and fraternizing with musicians and fellow poets. Dylan was by no means uneducated, however; he was at this time and throughout his life a voracious reader and a keen self-learner. By early adulthood he already had a solid grounding in the Bible and had read much canonical literature.

Bob Dylan. (AP/Wide World Photos)

In Dinkytown Dylan was introduced to the music and writings of Woody Guthrie and to Harry Smith's six-album "folk-Bible," The Anthology of American Folk Music (1952). Dylan's previous preference for rock and roll was soon displaced by an obsessive passion for folk music. For the next few years he learned primarily Guthrie songs and imitated his mentor's vocal stylings and performance techniques. When Dylan had heard that Guthrie was bedridden in a New Jersey hospital, he hitchhiked to New York to meet his hero and to live out the life of the hobo-songster that he had read about in Guthrie's 1943 autobiography Bound for Glory.

Dylan arrived in New York in January, 1961, and over the course of two years his life changed dramatically. He went from a Guthrie imitator, playing songs from a modest repertoire of folk standards, to a legitimate folk star, having signed a major record deal with Columbia Records and having written some of his most famous and anthemic songs, such as "Blowin' in the Wind" and "The Times They Are A-Changin'."

In 1961, to the surprise of many in the folk community, John Hammond, Sr., the highly touted record executive for Columbia Records, signed Dylan to a five-year album contract. Dylan's first album, self-titled Bob Dylan, was relatively unsuccessful, selling only five thousand copies in its debut year. The letdown of the album precipitated scathing commentary from the press—for a short spell Dylan was blacklisted as "Hammond's Folly."

Dylan's second album, The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan, stocked with Dylan originals, quickly changed people's minds about the songwriter's ability and Hammond's vision. Songs like "Blowin' in the Wind," "Girl from the North Country," and "Don't Think Twice" seized the media's attention and soon drew the eye of Albert B. Grossman, a shrewd businessman from Chicago who would eventually become Dylan's most important promoter and manager. Grossman would turn the young twenty-year-old folksinger into an American icon and a multimillionaire.

Dylan's performances at the Newport Folk Festival in 1963 and 1965 catapulted him into the public mainstream and became the breakout performances of his career. At Newport he emerged as the artist who many believed captured in song the zeitgeist of the 1960's. Newport ignited a chain of important events and honors for Dylan. One month after the festival, on August 28, 1963, Dylan performed at the March on Washington, where Martin Luther King, Jr., gave his "I Have a Dream" speech. Shortly thereafter, the Emergency Civil Liberties Committee presented Dylan with its prestigious Tom Payne Award for outstanding social activism.

Dylan's return to Newport in 1965 accrued as much media attention for the rising star as had his appearance in 1963, though for different reasons. Until this point, Dylan had epitomized for many traditionalists the authentic folksinger. So far he had maintained an unamplified acoustic sound and had become for many folk gurus the Left's most important political spokesperson, but this changed at Newport in 1965. To the chagrin of many in attendance, Dylan performed on the Newport stage with a blues band and played an electrified version of "Maggie's Farm." Together, the amplified sound and the song's nonconformist lyrics struck the likes of folk icon Pete Seeger and others as a direct affront to folk music and to folk politics.

Dylan was at his most creative and productive during the mid-1960's. From 1965 to 1966, he recorded his famous "rock cycle": Bringing It All Back Home, Highway 61 Revisited, and Blonde on Blonde. His mysterious motorcycle accident on July 29, 1966, closed a decisive chapter in his life and ended a two-and-a-half-year stint of almost continuous touring. Speaking only in terms of his career, the accident proved timely; although it may well have cut short Dylan's creative output, it nipped in the bud a life-threatening touring schedule and concomitant drug addiction. Prior to the accident Dylan had been excessively taking pills and hallucinogens in order to uphold the contractual expectations of his indefatigable and money-hungry manager. The accident allowed the exhausted songwriter to recalibrate his decentered life and to reconnect with his newly acquired family. Less than a year before, on November 22, 1965, Dylan had married Sara Lownds and had taken on the role of stepfather to her daughter Maria. In the near future, Dylan and Lownds would have four children together: Jesse, Anna, Samuel, and Jakob.

After the accident, Dylan remained close to his home in Woodstock, New York, and out of the public limelight. Domestic life for the next few years changed Dylan considerably and deeply affected his songwriting. The calm, meditative sounds of his 1967 album John Wesley Harding reflect a time in Dylan's life when he was relatively happy and at ease with his surroundings. For a short time, then, between the late 1960's and the early 1970's, Dylan regained his equilibrium. Still, temptation lingered and his relationship with Lownds soon deteriorated. For much of his life, Dylan was drawn to women like he was drawn to perform, and the combination of these appetites ultimately destroyed his marriage and pulled him back onto the stage.

The years between 1975 and 1978 held their ups and downs for Dylan, yet more downs than ups. His Rolling Thunder Revue tour (1975-1976) outstripped any of the musician's expectations and produced some the most revolutionary live performances in music history. Like a traveling circus in a Shakespearean play, the Rolling Thunder Revue was a peripatetic band of likeminded musicians and poets that performed in costume and played for small stages across the United States. Unlike the Revue tour, which was a generally positive experience for Dylan, his world tour of 1978 was an exercise in commercialism and hedonism. The 1978 tour, which grossed an estimated twenty million dollars and had Dylan performing for more than two million people across Japan, Europe, and the United States, witnessed Dylan toying with promiscuity and sacrificing his musical integrity for fame and fortune.

Dylan converted to Christianity in 1978 and released in succession his "born-again" albums: Slow Train Coming, Saved, and Shot of Love. To say the least, Dylan's conversion shocked his community of family, friends, and fans, though his move to Christianity was not entirely unforeseeable. While some still consider his "religious" music of the late 1970's and early 1980's a radical departure from his earlier work, Dylan had been moving in a spiritual direction as least since John Wesley Harding, if not before. At any rate, his Christian albums significantly altered people's perceptions of his music and would negatively affect his future record sales and even his reputation.

Dylan reached the nadir of his career in the 1980's. Musically speaking, the climate did not bode well for Dylan. Rock music was the fashion, with its predominant focus on technical virtuosity, synthesized reproduction, and a kind of headbanger mentality—all things un-Dylan. Emotionally, Dylan was being torn apart by custody and settlement battles. As late as 1987, he was still entangled in a legal case with Grossman's estate, an affair that had begun as far back as 1970, when Dylan's contract with Grossman first expired. Also, Dylan was in anguish over the legal fallout from a divorce from his second wife, Carolyn Dennis, with whom he had fathered a child. It was during this period that Dylan had serious bouts of depression and alcohol abuse and contemplated early retirement.

In the early 1990's, Dylan began to reroot himself. His albums Time out of Mind, Love and Theft, and Modern Times constitute the fruition of everything that the now elder statesman had gathered and digested about traditional roots music. Dylan had managed to emerge as the last of America's late, great bluesmen; he now symbolized a walking, talking reservoir of American history whose sorrow-filled lyrics corresponded with his sorrow-filled life.

The early years of the twenty-first century were accompanied by a loss of distinction for Dylan. He faced the hardships of growing old with the passing of many friends and the death of his beloved mother on January 25, 2000. Nevertheless, these years also brought recognition on a new scale: a Nobel Prize nomination, a Kennedy Center medal, Sweden's prestigious Polar Music Prize, multiple Grammy Awards, and honorary induction into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame.

The Music

Early Music. Dylan began his career as a traditional folksinger, playing for small clubs and cafés in and around the city of New York. Dylan's first album, Bob Dylan, showcases his clever knack for songwriting with two originals, "Talkin' New York Blues" and "Song to Woody" (Guthrie), and demonstrates his consummate understanding of and appreciation for the blues and folk traditions. While this debut was by no means a full exposition of Dylan's creativity—most of the songs are country-blues standards—the album does reveal the musical foundations upon which Dylan's music rests.

"Blowin' in the Wind." "Blowin' in the Wind" tops the list of classics on Dylan's second album The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan. Within only two years of its release on May 27, 1963, the song had been covered and recorded by at least eighty different musical acts. By 2002, an estimated 375 recordings of the song had been recorded worldwide, including renditions by Elvis Presley, Neil Young, and Sam Cooke.

"Like a Rolling Stone." Finally recorded on June 16, 1965, after fifteen takes and released four days later on Highway 61 Revisited, "Like a Rolling Stone" is Dylan's "Mona Lisa." This masterpiece defies the disjunction of language and thought, and like other great works of art it attains a certain degree of attunement between words and feeling. "How does it feel?," the song's driving line and repeated rhetorical question, does not dissociate the statement—how does it feel?—from the feeling about which it asks, but the expression is caught up in the feeling. Dylan's best songs often come closest to accomplishing what poet T. S. Eliot describes as "the [artist's] task of trying to find the verbal equivalent for states of mind and feeling." "Like a Rolling Stone" is Dylan's greatest attempt at pinpointing this equivalency. Because of the song's unprecedented length of six minutes and five seconds, it was originally divided between two sides of a 45-rpm record and was, consequently, either shelved by radio stations or played only in part. Eventually the entire song was reissued on one side because of the demands of disgruntled radio listeners.

Later Music. For sheer musicality, Time out of Mind, Love and Theft, and Modern Times are as layered and as complete as anything Dylan ever produced. To listen to Love and Theft, for example, is to rediscover the history of America through music, as many of the album's songs enact both instrumentally and lyrically the different times, places, and people of America's past. Each song on that album plays like a mini-musical short story and can be as imaginatively engaging as an audio-play. These last three albums are now being compared to Dylan's almighty rock-trilogy of the mid-1960's and have reclaimed Dylan's eminence in the twenty-first century world of popular music.

Musical Legacy

Dylan's influence in the evolution of popular music is unprecedented and reaches into a multitude of genres and subgenres. Beginning in the early 1960's, he had his creative finger on nearly every offshoot of American music, from folk to country to blues to rock and roll to early forms of rap.

Dylan's folk music of the early 1960's nuanced and revitalized traditional music with sophisticated poetry and political subject matter. His mid-1960's folk-rock trilogy intellectualized the visceral sounds of rock and roll with raplike rhyme schemes and surrealistic imagery, reminiscent of the imagery of poets William Blake and Arthur Rimbaud. Dylan's folk-country albums of the late 1970's and early 1980's helped resuscitate country and gospel in a time when they were considered dying musical forms. With Nashville Skyline, for example, a bona fide country album, Dylan put the "hip" back into "twang" and paved the way for new collaborations between folk, rock, and country. With his Christian rock albums of the same period, Dylan instigated a radical shift in Christian music. Although he was certainly not the first to move gospel music from the church to the street, he was one of the first to incorporate rock into gospel and to present popular music as a suitable medium for the expounding of faith and religious sentiment.

Jason Salter

Further Reading

Dylan, Bob. Chronicles. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2004. Dylan's autobiography provides a critical backdrop to the man behind the music and the touchstones of inspiration that contributed to the creation of his art.

Gray, Michael. The Bob Dylan Encyclopedia. New York: Continuum, 2006. This massive (736-page), A-Z compilation of facts about Dylan—from "All Along the Watch Tower" to Zigman Zimmerman—covers all things Dylan. Illustrations, bibliography, index.

Ricks, Christopher. Dylan's Visions of Sin. New York: Penguin, 2004. Ricks's challenging read offers a close look at Dylan as a poet. The book is designed for scholars and academics with a strong knowledge base in canonical literature.

Shelton, Robert. No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan. New York: Da Capo Press, 1986. No Direction Home is an indispensable biography of Dylan written from the perspective of a New York journalist who was actually close friends with the songwriter during the heyday of the 1960's.

Sounes, Howard. Down the Highway: The Life of Bob Dylan. New York: Grove Press, 2001. Without being sinister or sycophantic, Sounes's biography is a biting yet realistic account of the all-too-human sides of Bob Dylan.

See also: Babyface; Baez, Joan; Blow, Kurtis; Brel, Jacques; Burke, Solomon; Butterfield, Paul; Cash, Johnny; Cliff, Jimmy; Collins, Judy; Costello, Elvis; Crosby, David; Denny, Sandy; Earle, Steve; Fuller, Blind Boy; Garfunkel, Art; Guthrie, Arlo; Guthrie, Woody; Harris, Emmylou; Harrison, George; Hendrix, Jimi; Jagger, Sir Mick; Jansch, Bert; Jefferson, Blind Lemon; Kristofferson, Kris; Lomax, Alan; McGuinn, Roger; Martin, Sir George; Matthews, Dave; Mayfield, Curtis; Memphis Minnie; Morrison, Van; Nelson, Ricky; Neville, Aaron; Odetta; Oldfield, Mike; Orbison, Roy; Patton, Charley; Paxton, Tom; Petty, Tom; Prine, John; Raitt, Bonnie; Reed, Jimmy; Robertson, Robbie; Robinson, Smokey; Rush, Tom; Scruggs, Earl; Seeger, Pete; Smith, Patti; Springsteen, Bruce; Staples, Pops; Sting; Tweedy, Jeff; Van Ronk, Dave; Van Zandt, Townes; Vincent, Gene; Waits, Tom; Waters, Roger; Watson, Doc; Webb, Jimmy.

E

Steve Earle

American country singer, songwriter, and guitarist

Earle was an early member of the "alt-country" movement based in Austin, Texas, which opposed the rigidity of the Nashville country-music industry. His experimentation with a variety of musical styles and with left-wing politics brought diversity to country music.

Born: January 17, 1955; Fort Monroe, Virginia
Also known as: Stephen Fain Earle (full name)
Member of: Steve Earle and the Dukes

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): Pink and Black, 1982; Guitar Town, 1986; Early Tracks, 1987; Copperhead Road, 1988; The Hard Way, 1990; Train a Comin', 1995; I Feel Alright, 1996; El Corazón, 1997; The Mountain, 1999; Transcendental Blues, 2000; Jerusalem, 2002; The Revolution Starts . . . Now, 2004; Washington Square Serenade, 2007.

ALBUMS (with Steve Earle and the Dukes): Exit Zero, 1987; The Hard Way, 1990.

The Life

Stephen Fain Earle was born to Barbara Thomas and Jack Earle in Fort Monroe, Virginia. His father, an air traffic controller, was stationed in various parts of the United States, and most of Earle's childhood was spent in Schertz, Texas, north of San Antonio. Earle dropped out of school in the eighth grade to join his uncle, Nick Fain, in Houston. While there, he met outlaw country singer Townes Van Zandt, who inspired him to move to Nashville, Tennessee, to work in the country-music industry.

Earle arrived in Nashville in 1975. He worked as a backup singer and songwriter for the Sunbury Dunbar division of RCA, meeting other up-and-coming performers, such as Guy Clark and Emmylou Harris. Earle had his first major songwriting success in 1981 with "When You Fall in Love" (recorded by Johnny Lee). In 1986 his album, Guitar Town, was released to critical success and gold-record sales. Exit Zero followed in 1987, and 1990's Copperhead Road also generated successful singles.

Earle's longtime heroin addiction led to multiple arrests throughout the 1980's and 1990's, and in 1994 he was sentenced to eighteen months in prison for drug possession. After regaining his sobriety in prison, Earle was paroled later that year. His comeback album, Train a-Comin', was released on an independent label, marking Earle's reemergence in the "alt-country" movement.

After he left prison, Earle turned to protest music. He became an anticapital-punishment activist, and he contributed to the sound track of the antideath-penalty film Dead Man Walking (1995). The invasion of Iraq in 2003 reawakened Earle's Vietnam-era antiwar sentiments, as heard on Jerusalem and The Revolution Starts . . . Now. Earle's political views led to controversy among usually conservative country-music fans. From 2004 until 2007, Earle hosted a program on the liberal talk-radio network Air America. Earle has been married seven times (twice to the same woman), and he settled in New York City with his wife, Alison Moorer, whom he married in 2005.

The Music

Earle's musical output can be divided into two parts: his preprison work (from Guitar Town through The Hard Way) and his post-1994 albums. Although his prison term lasted slightly over a year, the experience changed and informed his songwriting. Earle's pre-1991 output reflects rockabilly and rock styles, while later albums utilize a variety of musical traditions. Earle's first major success came with Guitar Town, and subsequent albums were critically successful, if not easily categorized into standard genres. Earle's drug abuse and legal troubles forced a recording hiatus until 1994, when Train a-Comin' was released. Earle's post-1994 output is notable for its political content and its debt to protest music singers, such as Bob Dylan and Bruce Springsteen.

Guitar Town. Earle's first major success as a performer, Guitar Town showcases his songwriting abilities. The album's ten tracks are a fusion of country, folk, and rock-and-roll influences. Widely credited with reviving a dormant Texas-based rockabilly sound, Guitar Town was ranked 489 on Rolling Stone's 500 Greatest Albums of All Time in 2003.

Copperhead Road. This album veered toward a harder sound, reminiscent of 1970's Southern rock. While singles from Guitar Town received airplay on both rock and country radio, Copperhead Road was marketed primarily to rock audiences. The title track, "Copperhead Road," became Earle's best-known song in mainstream popular music.

Jerusalem. This was the first of Earle's explicitly political albums, a meditation on the attacks of September 11, 2001, and the U.S. government's response to them. "John Walker's Blues," a song written from the point of view of American Taliban fighter John Walker Lindh, caused an uproar in conservative circles for seeming to humanize Lindh and condone his actions.

The Revolution Starts . . . Now. Earle's Grammy Award-winning album of protest music was one of the first full albums about the Iraq War by a major artist. It is notable for its radical eclecticism, with musical gestures from rock, folk, reggae, and spoken-word. Explicitly topical in nature, the album was a centerpiece in the 2004 Rock Against Bush movement attached to John Kerry's presidential campaign.

Musical Legacy

Earle's career as both a songwriter and a performer has been extremely important for Texas-based "alt-country" music. The respect he earned from both the Nashville and the Austin music establishments has paved the way for crossover influence between the two, and his left-wing political views have brought political diversity into country music. Earle's work has been nominated for thirteen Grammy Awards, and The Revolution Starts . . . Now and Washington Square Serenade were named Best Contemporary Folk/Americana Album in 2005 and 2008, respectively.

Earle's most important musical works, however, remain the albums Guitar Town and Copperhead Road. The former revitalized country music's take on the rockabilly sound (undergoing a revival in popular music in the 1980's), while the latter brought Southern rock-influenced country music to mainstream attention. His recent works of protest music will also be remembered as a consistent dissenting voice to country music's conservative politics of the late 1990's and early 2000's.

Marcus Desmond Harmon

Further Reading

Blackstock, Peter. "Steve Earle: Can't Keep a Good Man Down." No Depression 1, no. 3 (Spring, 1996): 33-37. A profile of the singer in the wake of his 1994 imprisonment and release.

Earle, Steve. "The Politics of Retribution." In It's a Free Country: Personal Freedom in America After September 11, edited by Danny Goldberg, Victor Goldberg, and Robert Greenwald. New York: RDV/Akashic Books, 2000. This well-known essay by the singer discusses his views of the September 11 attacks and their effect on his musical and political development.

Lewis, George H. "Transcendental Blues." Popular Music and Society 26 (October, 2003). Review of Earle's 2000 album Transcendental Blues, which includes discussion of Earle's musical styles and influences.

McGee, David, and Steve Earle. Steve Earle: Fearless Heart: Outlaw Poet. San Francisco: Backbeat Books, 2005. An authorized biography of Earle, produced with the singer's cooperation. Includes extensive bibliography.

St. John, Lauren. Hardcore Troubadour: The Life and Near-Death of Steve Earle. New York: HarperCollins, 2002. An extensive biography of Earle from his birth in 1955 through 2002.

See also: Dylan, Bob; Harris, Emmylou; Springsteen, Bruce; Van Zandt, Townes; Williams, Lucinda.

Fred Ebb

American musical-theater lyricist

Ebb collaborated with composer John Kander to write some of the most controversial and memorable musical-theater pieces of the twentieth century, including Cabaret and Chicago. Ebb's lyrics are some of the most sardonic, wittiest, sharpest, and creative phrases in the Broadway canon, instrumental in developing character as well as moving the plot forward.

Born: April 8, 1933; New York, New York
Died: September 11, 2004; New York, New York

Principal works

MUSICAL THEATER (lyrics; music by John Kander): Flora, the Red Menace, 1965 (libretto by George Abbott and Robert Russell; based on Lester Atwell's novel Love Is Just Around the Corner); Cabaret, 1966 (libretto by Joe Masteroff; based on John van Druten's play I Am a Camera); The Happy Time, 1968 (libretto by N. Richard Nash); Zorba, 1968 (libretto by Joseph Stein; based on Nikos Kazantzakis's novel Zorba the Greek); Seventy, Girls, Seventy, 1971 (libretto by David Thompson and Norman L. Martin; based on Peter Coke's play Breath of Spring); Chicago, 1975 (libretto by Ebb and Bob Fosse; based on Maurine Dallas Watkins's play); The Act, 1978 (libretto by George Furth); Woman of the Year, 1981 (libretto by Peter Stone); The Rink, 1984 (libretto by Terrence McNally); And the World Goes 'Round, 1991 (libretto by Thompson); Kiss of the Spider Woman, 1993 (libretto by McNally); Steel Pier, 1997 (libretto by Thompson); All About Us, 1999 (libretto by Stein; based on Thornton Wilder's play The Skin of Our Teeth); The Visit, 2001 (libretto by McNally; based on Friedrich Dürrenmatt's play); Curtains, 2006 (libretto by Rupert Holmes).

SONGS (lyrics): "Heartbroken," 1953 (music by Phil Springer); "I Never Loved Him Anyhow," 1956 (music by Springer); "My Coloring Book," 1962 (music by John Kander); "Say Liza (Liza with a 'Z')," 1972 (music by Kander); "New York, New York," 1977 (music by Kander).

The Life

Born of Jewish parents, Fred Ebb grew up in a house without music. He worked in his family's dry-goods business until he graduated as valedictorian from high school. Although his mother hoped he would pursue a more stable path, Ebb had fallen in love with theater after seeing an Al Jolson show and decided to become a writer. He worked in a variety of odd jobs while in school but managed to earn his bachelor of arts from New York University and a master's degree from Columbia University in English literature. He lived in New York City, decorating his apartment with Expressionist and other avant-garde artwork. Shortly before his death, Ebb was awarded two honorary doctorate of fine arts degrees, from Boston University and St. John's University. Ebb never married. His work monopolized his life until he died of a heart attack in September, 2004. The lights on Broadway were dimmed in his honor.

The Music

Ebb began work as a songwriter with Paul Klein and Phil Springer (whom he credits as his mentor) in the 1950's. Although he enjoyed modest success with a few hits recorded by Judy Garland and Eartha Kitt, it was not until his music producer and friend Tommy Valando introduced him to composer and pianist John Kander that his legacy as one of the great Broadway lyricists became a certainty. Once they met, Kander and Ebb began writing together almost immediately. Their early work impressed director-producer Harold Prince enough to hire them to write the songs for his Broadway musical Flora, the Red Menace. The show closed after only eighty-seven performances but netted the star, Liza Minnelli, a Tony Award and catapulted Kander, Ebb, and Prince to national theatrical prominence. Prince immediately hired them to begin work on his next major project, Cabaret.

Cabaret. Adapted from a 1951 play by John van Druten, I Am a Camera, which was based on short stories from the 1930's by Christopher Isherwood, Cabaret tells the story of an English nightclub singer, Sally Bowles, living in pre-Nazi Germany, who falls in love with an American writer, becomes pregnant, and has an abortion. Book writer Joe Masteroff revised the play to focus on the anti-Semitic sentiments of the time and added the devil-ishly delicious emcee. Bowles's love story is developed before the backdrop of the Kit Kat Club and political turmoil, which is explored through the characters of the German landlady, Fraulein Schneider, and her Jewish boyfriend, Herr Schultz. When Cabaret opened on Broadway in 1966, it became a huge success, enjoying a run of 1,166 performances and winning the Drama Critics' Circle Award for Best Musical and eight Tony Awards, including Best Composer and Lyricist and Best Musical. Cabaret helped establish the new form of "concept musical," one that has a nonrealistic, episodic plotline with a mixture of scenes and songs. Jay Presson Allen's book for the 1972 film adaptation made a few changes, and the film won eight Academy Awards. A Broadway revival ran for six years.

Chicago. Kander and Ebb's next big hit, Chicago, enjoyed 923 performances. The plot revolves around a starstruck murderess, Roxie Hart, who kills her lover to get publicity, and a slimy attorney who manipulates the public's heartstrings to get her acquitted. The musical is based on a play by Maurine Watkins, Chicago (1926), which was inspired by an event she covered as a reporter. Bob Fosse adapted the play, calling it Chicago: A Musical Vaudeville. True to its name, the musical features scenes and songs announced as in a vaudeville show, and it contains rhythm numbers, a ventriloquist, strippers, a female impersonator, musical soliloquies, soft-shoe dance numbers, and comic duets. Beneath the glitz, however, is a serious satire on the way media attention makes celebrities of criminals. Ebb cowrote the book with Fosse. When it was revived in 1996, Chicago received an even greater reception and became one of the longest-running revivals in Broadway history. The film version in 2002 was nominated for thirteen Academy Awards, winning six, including Best Picture.

Fred Ebb (standing) with John Kander. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Later Work. In 1993 Kiss of the Spider Woman, based on Manuel Puig's novel about two criminals in a Latin American prison, had 907 performances and won seven Tony Awards, including Best Musical. Of the Kander and Ebb shows that followed, many received high critical praise, especially Steel Pier (1997), which was nominated for eleven Tony Awards, winning for Best Original Score, even though it closed after only two months. Curtains (2006), nominated for eight Tonys, was in development when Ebb died. Kander worked with others to finish it and made plans to complete three other unfinished Ebb works: The Visit, All About Us, and The Minstrel Show.

Unlike many musical collaborators, Kander and Ebb worked together in the same room. They always wrote the opening number first to give them a sense of style for the show. Besides collaborating on Broadway musicals, they wrote songs for television and film. "New York, New York," from New York, New York (1977), became New York's official anthem. Although Ebb and Kander sometimes worked independently, nothing equaled the success they had together in their musical-theater efforts.

Musical Legacy

Ebb was the recipient of four Tony Awards (twelve nominations), one Grammy Award, and four Emmy Awards as well as the prestigious Kennedy Center Lifetime Achievement Award, Dramatists Guild of America Lifetime Achievement Award, and the Laurence Olivier Award. With Kander, he was inducted into the Songwriters Hall of Fame and the New York Theater Hall of Fame and won numerous other special awards.

Ebb gave Broadway some of the greatest lyrics ever written, and through his forty-two-year collaboration with Kander, he helped develop a new style of musical theater that raised the standards for excellence in the genre. Their impact on musical-theater writers and performers of today and tomorrow is immeasurable.

Jill Stapleton-Bergeron

Further Reading

Kander, John, Greg Lawrence, and Fred Ebb. Colored Lights: Forty Years of Words and Music, Show Biz, Collaboration, and All That Jazz. New York: Faber & Faber, 2004. Firsthand accounts by Kander and Ebb about their lives, collaboration, and musical-theater experiences.

Kasha, Al, and Joel Hirschhorn. Notes on Broadway: Conversations with the Great Songwriters. Chicago: Contemporary Books, 1985. Contains a chapter for each major Broadway songwriter, including Ebb.

Lewis, David H. Broadway Musicals: A Hundred Year History. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2002. Overview of the important musicals that shaped the development of the genre, including a solid section on the work of Kander and Ebb.

Mordden, Ethan. The Happiest Corpse I've Ever Seen: The Last Twenty-five Years of the Broadway Musical. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004. Evolution of the Broadway musical from 1979 to 2004.

Suskin, Steven. More Opening Nights on Broadway: A Critical Quotebook of the Musical Theatre 1965 Through 1981. New York: Schirmer Books, 1997. A valuable collection of opening-night reviews for Broadway musicals from 1965 to 1981 that encompasses Kander and Ebb's Broadway offerings from Flora, the Red Menace to Woman of the Year.

See also: Fields, Dorothy; Hart, Lorenz; Kander, John; Rodgers, Richard; Sondheim, Stephen.

Duane Eddy

American rock songwriter and guitarist

During the 1950's, Eddy established himself as one of the most influential guitarists in the history of rock music. His guitar sound became known as "twang." This unique sound was created through the use of tremolo and reverb on the guitar. Through the efforts of Eddy, the guitar became the most important instrument in rock music.

Born: April 26, 1938; Corning, New York
Also known as: Mr. Twang

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Especially for You, 1959; Have Twangy Guitar—Will Travel, 1959; The Twang's the Thang, 1960; $1,000,000 Worth of Twang, 1960; Songs of Our Heritage, 1960; Girls! Girls! Girls!, 1961; Twangy Guitar—Silky Strings, 1962; Twistin' and Twangin', 1962; Twistin' with Duane Eddy, 1962; Duane Eddy in Person, 1963; Twang a Country Song, 1963; Twangin' up a Storm, 1963; Surfin', 1963; Lonely Guitar, 1964; Water Skiing, 1964; Duane a-Go-Go, 1965; Duane Does Dylan, 1965; Twangin' the Golden Hits, 1965; Twangsville, 1965; The Biggest Twang of Them All, 1966; The Roaring Twangies, 1967; Duane Eddy, 1979; Star Power, 2002.

The Life

Duane Eddy was born on April 26, 1938, in Corning, New York. At the age of five, he was given his first guitar and his father taught him some basic chords. He loved to listen to the cowboy singers Gene Autry and Roy Rogers on the radio. The family moved to Phoenix, Arizona, when he was a teenager. At the age of sixteen, he decided to quit school and began playing his guitar at local clubs. A local disc jockey, Lee Hazlewood, met the young Eddy in 1957 and was impressed by his guitar work. Although Hazlewood worked as a disc jockey, he became Eddy's record producer and songwriting partner. This partnership would become extraordinarily successful.

In 1958, Eddy signed a recording contract with Jamie Records after the company had reviewed a demo tape of the song "Movin' 'n' Groovin'." Through the support of Hazlewood, Eddy was inspired to create a sound that blended rock, country, jazz, and soul music. In 1962, Eddy married singer-songwriter Jessi Colter (born Miriam Johnson). The marriage lasted until 1968. Colter would marry legendary country singer Waylon Jennings in 1969.

During the 1960's, Eddy began an acting career. He appeared in such films as A Thunder of Drums (1961), The Wild Westerners (1962), Kona Coast (1968), and The Savage Seven (1968). He also appeared in a 1961 episode of the television series Have Gun, Will Travel, which starred Richard Boone.

Duane Eddy. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

The Music

With the help of Hazlewood, Eddy created the "twang" sound that would make him famous. The sound was produced on his Chet Atkins-model Gretsch 6120 hollow-body guitar by picking on the low strings and manipulating the guitar's tremolo and reverb. In 1958, Eddy released his first hit single, "Rebel Rouser." The single went to number six on the Billboard pop singles chart, making it one of the most popular rock instrumental hits of the decade. He would have two more hits in 1958 with "Ramrod" and "Cannonball."

Eddy recorded these hits with his backing band the Rebels. The Rebels included Steve Douglas on saxophone, Larry Knechtel on piano, and Al Casey on guitar. These musicians would become some of the most respected session musicians in the history of popular music. From 1958 to 1963, Eddy was the premier instrumentalist in popular music. During this period, he released more than twenty singles that would make the pop singles charts.

Have "Twangy" Guitar—Will Travel. Recorded in 1958 and released on January 9, 1959, this debut album was very successful for Eddy. It would remain on the Billboard pop albums charts for eighty-two weeks and rise as high as number five. The album included most of Eddy's early hits, including "Rebel Rouser," "Ramrod," "Cannonball," "Movin' 'n' Groovin'," and "Three-30-Blues." In 1999, the album was reissued on compact disc (CD) and included some extra B-side songs from 1958. His second album, Especially for You, was released in 1959 and would reach number twenty-four on the pop albums charts.

That year was very productive for Eddy. In addition to the albums, he released such successful singles as "Yep!," "Forty Miles of Bad Road," "The Lonely One," and "Some Kind-a Earthquake." The single "Forty Miles of Bad Road" would rise to number nine on the Billboard pop singles chart, making it the second single for Eddy to reach the Top 10.

Twangy Guitar—Silky Strings. This 1962 album emphasized a more romantic tone. The lushness found on this album was a welcome change in approach for Eddy. The album went to number seventy-two on the pop albums charts and included such songs as Henry Mancini's "Moon River," Dimitri Tiomkin's "High Noon," and Elvis Presley's "Love Me Tender." The combination of twangy guitar and strings made this album a bona fide success. In 1962 Eddy also released the albums Twistin' and Twangin' and Twistin' with Duane Eddy.

Hit Singles. At the same time that he was releasing albums during the early 1960's, Eddy was releasing memorable hit singles. In 1960, he released such important singles as "Because They're Young," "Bonnie Came Back," "Shazam!" and "Peter Gunn." "Because They're Young" went to number four on the pop singles chart and was the title song of the film of the same name. The theme song "Peter Gunn" had been written by Mancini for the television program of the same name. Eddy's single would go to number twenty-seven on the same charts. In the busy album year of 1962, Eddy found the energy to release the singles "Dance with the Guitar Man," "Deep in the Heart of Texas," and "The Ballad of Paladin." Although all three of these singles did well, it was "Dance with the Guitar Man" that reached number twelve on the pop singles chart. In 1963, Eddy released "Boss Guitar." This single would climb to number twenty-eight and became his last major hit.

Eddy continued to tour, do session work, and occasionally record a new album. He was in demand in England and Europe. In 1986, he teamed with the Art of Noise in order to do a new version of his 1960 hit "Peter Gunn." This new version became a huge hit around the world and garnered for Eddy a Grammy Award for Best Rock Instrumental. Rhino Records released an extraordinary two-CD anthology Twang Thang: Anthology in 1993, which reintroduced Eddy to a generation of young listeners who had not been exposed to his music.

Musical Legacy

Before Eddy, guitarists were not considered stars or centers of attention. Rock stars of the 1950's were not loved because of what they played on guitar. Even such important guitarists as Bo Diddley and Chuck Berry were stars in the public's eye more for their singing, songwriting, and onstage style than for their guitar playing. Eddy completely changed this attitude. Idolized for his guitar work alone, he made the guitar the focal point of the popular music band and helped launch the birth of the "guitar god" in rock music.

During the late 1950's and the early 1960's, Eddy had fifteen Top 40 singles. Over his career, he sold more than a hundred million records and became one of the most successful instrumentalists in the history of rock music. In addition to paving the way for future guitar heroes like Eric Clapton, Jimi Hendrix, and Jimmy Page, Eddy inspired such rock luminaries as George Harrison of the Beatles, John Fogerty of Creedence Clearwater Revival, and Bruce Springsteen. In 1994, Eddy was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame.

Jeffry Jensen

Further Reading

Escott, Colin, ed. All Roots Lead to Rock: Legends of Early Rock 'n' Roll. New York: Schirmer Books, 1999. Includes a penetrating portrait of Eddy by Rob Finnis entitled "Boy and His Guitar: Twangin' from Phoenix to Los Angeles, Duane Eddy."

Kienzle, Richard. Great Guitarists. New York: Facts On File, 1985. Along with such guitar gods as Elmore James, Robert Johnson, Les Paul, Jeff Beck, Jimi Hendrix, Eric Clapton, and Jimmy Page, Eddy is discussed as one of the most influential guitarists in the history of rock music.

Sumrall, Harry. Pioneers of Rock and Roll: One Hundred Artists Who Changed the Face of Rock. New York: Billboard Books, 1994. Eddy is credited as the first guitar hero of rock music.

See also: Jennings, Waylon; Presley, Elvis; Scruggs, Earl.

Danny Elfman

American singer, songwriter, and film-score composer

A rock musician for two decades, Elfman became one of the most sought-after composers of film scores in Hollywood.

Born: May 29, 1953; Amarillo, Texas
Member of: Oingo Boingo

Principal works

FILM SCORES: Forbidden Zone, 1980; Pee-wee's Big Adventure, 1985; Back to School, 1986; Wisdom, 1986; Summer School, 1987; Beetlejuice, 1988; Big Top Pee-wee, 1988; Hot to Trot, 1988; Midnight Run, 1988; Scrooged, 1988; Batman, 1989; Darkman, 1990; Dick Tracy, 1990; Edward Scissorhands, 1990; Nightbreed, 1990; Pure Luck, 1990 (with Jonathan Sheffer); Article Ninety-Nine, 1992; Batman Returns, 1992; Army of Darkness, 1993; Sommersby, 1993; Tim Burton's Nightmare Before Christmas, 1993; Black Beauty, 1994; Shrunken Heads, 1994; Dead Presidents, 1995; Dolores Claiborne, 1995; To Die For, 1995; Freeway, 1996; The Frighteners, 1996; Mars Attacks!, 1996; Mission: Impossible, 1996; Flubber, 1997; Good Will Hunting, 1997; Men in Black, 1997; A Civil Action, 1998; Psycho, 1998; A Simple Plan, 1998; Anywhere but Here, 1999; Instinct, 1999; Sleepy Hollow, 1999; Proof of Life, 2000; Planet of the Apes, 2001; Chicago, 2002 (with John Kander); Men in Black II, 2002; Spider-Man, 2002; Big Fish, 2003; The Hulk, 2003; Spider-Man 2, 2004; Charlie and the Chocolate Factory, 2005; The Corpse Bride, 2005; Serenada Schizophrana, 2005; Charlotte's Web, 2006; Nacho Libre, 2006.

TELEVISION THEMES: Pee-wee's Playhouse, 1986; Sledge Hammer!, 1986; The Simpsons, 1989; Beetlejuice, 1989; The Flash, 1990 (with Shirley Walker); Tales from the Crypt, 1990 (main theme); Batman, 1992; Desperate Housewives, 2004.

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (with Oingo Boingo): Oingo Boingo, 1980; Only a Lad, 1981; Nothing to Fear, 1982; Good for Your Soul, 1984; So-Lo, 1984; Dead Man's Party, 1986; Boi-ngo, 1987; Boingo Alive, 1988; Dark at the End of the Tunnel, 1990.

The Life

Danny Elfman was born in Texas in 1953, though the family moved to Los Angeles in his childhood. His father Milton was a teacher, and his mother Blossom wrote children's books and television scripts. The Elfmans' children followed the family's artistic bent, Danny playing the violin and his older brother Richard turning to cinematography. When Richard moved to France, Danny dropped out of high school and followed him, acting in a theater troupe and supporting himself as a street musician. When the brothers returned to the United States in 1972, Richard formed a musical-theater group billed as the Mystic Knights of Oingo Boingo. The interests of the other musicians soon turned the group into a rock band, and as Oingo Boingo they became a force in pop music from 1976 until disbanding in 1995. Danny wrote and Oingo Boingo performed the music for Richard's 1980 film Forbidden Zone, but Danny did not consider himself a film scorer until director Tim Burton asked him to score Pee-wee's Big Adventure in 1985. For the next several decades, Danny scored two or three films a year. In 2007 he was awarded an honorary doctorate from the North Carolina School of the Arts.

The Music

As a new wave rock songwriter, Danny Elfman found his success to be largely a cult phenomenon. He did chart twice on the Billboard Hot 100 with "Weird Science" (1985) and "Just Another Day" (1986). By that time, however, he had already been identified as a film composer. This second career should not have come as a surprise, since even as a youth Elfman had been conscious of film music as an influence on his own style, particularly the work of Bernard Herrmann and Franz Waxman.

Pee-wee's Big Adventure. Elfman's first orchestral film score was Burton's first feature film, based on comedian Paul Reubens's character Pee-wee Herman. To match the character's frenetic adolescent energy, Elfman wrote a manic, staccato main theme, reminiscent of Aram Khachaturian's Saber Dance (though influenced, according to Elfman, by Nino Rota's scores for motion-picture director Federico Fellini and The Godfather films). Although an accomplished violinist, Elfman had never attempted a full orchestration, having worked only in the rock idiom. With the help of Oingo Boingo's arranger Steve Bartek, however, Elfman soon gained confidence and came to appreciate the fuller range of a symphonic orchestra.

Batman. For his sixth film score, and his third for Burton, Elfman wanted to capture in musical style the retro Art Deco style of the film's sets, as well as the romantic flavor of the first Batman comic books. To do so he imitated the lush, neo-Romantic film scores of Erich Wolfgang Korngold, particularly the adventure themes for Erroll Flynn vehicles Captain Blood (1935) and The Adventures of Robin Hood (1938). The fourth bar of the title music introduces a five-note "bat theme" that continues throughout the film, identified with the title character. Alternating with this theme is Elfman's experiment with whole-tone music, which in film scores is traditionally associated with dream sequences—appropriate for a fantasy film.

Edward Scissorhands. Elfman has said that this score, his fourth for Burton and seventh overall, was his favorite. It is easy to see why. Like many of his predecessors in film music, Elfman imitates Richard Wagner in interweaving a musical theme, or leitmotif, for each major character or setting. There is a delicate music-box chime for the flashback scenes of the title character's creation by his inventor; an awed chorus of female voices singing cascades of random vowels in the style of Carl Orff whenever Edward's love interest, Kim, appears; and a frenetic, jerky pastiche of ostinatos (short, repeated musical phrases reminiscent of The Simpsons, which Elfman had composed the previous year) during the suburban scenes. Elfman even combined motifs: When Edward carves an ice sculpture of Kim, the chimes of the inventor motif merge with the chorus of the Kim motif. This score was nominated for both an Emmy and a Saturn award (the latter given for science fiction, fantasy, or horror films). It debuted as a ballet in London in November, 2005.

Serenada Schizophrana. Elfman's symphonic debut in 2005 at Carnegie Hall in New York was a twenty-minute piece in six movements for full orchestra and female chorus. The enthusiastic reviews put to rest the suspicion that Elfman was nothing more than a pop musician dependent on the army of orchestrators and copyists provided by film studios or on a music sequencer (composition software).

Musical Legacy

Elfman's reputation was troubled in the 1990's by accusations, particularly in a series of letters in Keyboard magazine, that he was a "hummer" who hummed his melodies into a tape recorder and turned them over to others to transcribe into musical notation. This myth is handily refuted by a glance at archival scores in Elfman's handwriting in studio files. Although Elfman did not have conservatory training in composition, working out his early scores with Bartek provided him a thorough, if informal, education in scoring and orchestration from studio professionals. The concern that Elfman's self-taught status would tempt would-be composers to avoid music theory and composition classes is no longer given much credence, since many composers are now in conservatories precisely because of Elfman's example. Three of Elfman's film scores have been nominated for Oscars; his score for Burton's Batman won a Grammy Award for best sound track; his theme song for The Simpsons was nominated for an Emmy in 1989; and his theme for Desperate Housewives won an Emmy in 2004.

Danny Elfman. (AP/Wide World Photos)

John R. Holmes

Further Reading

Breese, Keith T. Clowns of Death: A History of Oingo Boingo. Philadelphia: Xlibris, 2001. An account of Elfman's music before he became a film composer.

Donnelly, K. J. "Batman, Batman Returns, and Post-Classical Film Music." In Contemporary Holly- wood Cinema, edited by Steve Neale and Murray Smith. London: Routledge, 1998. A study of Elfman's scores for two Burton films.

Halfyard, Janet K. Danny Elfman's Batman: A Film Score Guide. Lanham, Md.: Scarecrow Press, 2004. A thorough study of the music with liberal reproductions of cues and musical passages from the score.

McMahan, Alison. The Films of Tim Burton. New York: Continuum, 2005. A comprehensive study of Burton's films that contains an analysis of Elfman's scores.

Russell, Mark, and James Young. Film Music. Boston: Focal Press, 2000. This lavishly illustrated book of interviews with thirteen twentieth century film composers includes a section on Elfman and reproduces the first two pages of the orchestral score for Batman and the first three for Edward Scissorhands.

See also: Herrmann, Bernard; Kander, John; Korngold, Erich Wolfgang; Orff, Carl; Rota, Nino; Waxman, Franz.

Sir Edward Elgar

English classical composer

A composer in all genres, Elgar brought the English musical renaissance to its peak, earning new respect for the English symphony. His first march from Pomp and Circumstance is widely recognized, often played at school graduations.

Born: June 2, 1857; Broadheath, England
Died: February 23, 1934; Worcester, England
Also known as: Edward William Elgar (full name)

Principal works

CHAMBER WORKS: Piano Quintet in A Minor, 1919; Sonata in E Minor, 1919 (for violin); String Quartet in E Minor, 1919.

OPERAS (music): The Crown of India, 1912 (libretto by Henry Hamilton); The Starlight Express, 1915 (libretto by Violet Pearn, based on Algernon Blackwood's novel A Prisoner in Fairyland); The Fringes of the Fleet, 1917 (based on the novella by Rudyard Kipling); The Pageant of Empire, 1924 (libretto by Alfred Noyes); The Spanish Lady, 1994 (libretto by Barry Johnson, based on Ben Johnson's The Devil Is an Ass).

ORCHESTRAL WORKS: The Black Knight, 1893; The Banner of St. George, 1897; Imperial March, 1897; Caractacus, 1898; Enigma, 1899; The Dream of Gerontius, 1900 (oratorio; libretto by Elgar; based on a poem by Cardinal John Henry Newman); Cockaigne (In London Town), 1901; Pomp and Circumstance, 1901; Enfants d'un rêve, 1902 (Dream Children); In the South (Alassio), 1904; The Wand of Youth, 1907; Symphony No. 1 in A-flat Major, 1908; Elegy, 1909; Violin Concerto in B Minor, 1910; Symphony No. 2 in E-flat Major, 1911; Falstaff, 1913; Sospiri, 1914; Cello Concerto in E Minor, 1919; Nursery Suite, 1931; The Spanish Lady, 1986.

PIANO WORKS: Sonata in G Major, 1895; Concert Allegro, 1901.

The Life

Edward William Elgar (EHL-gahr) was born to William, a piano tuner, and Ann Elgar, the well-read daughter of a Herefordshire farmer. Elgar was the only one of their seven children born in the family's Broadheath cottage, just outside the busy city of Worcester, which perhaps explains Elgar's musical connection to the English countryside.

In 1872, still only fourteen, Elgar left school. His dreams of studying composition in Leipzig were never realized; he had no way to finance such a project. Elgar's lack of a higher education and his lower-class background combined to cause a nagging self-doubt that plagued his career.

Elgar met Caroline Alice Roberts in 1886, when she came to Elgar for piano accompaniment lessons. On May 8, 1889, they were married. Her death in 1920 is often cited as one of the many reasons that Elgar stopped composing in the last fifteen years of his life.

Even though he was already famous by 1904, the year was notable for Elgar. In March there was a three-day festival of his music in Covent Garden, the first of its sort mounted for a living composer. Later that month, he was invited to join the Athenaeum, an exclusive gentlemen's club that usually conferred membership based on wealth or descent. In June, King Edward VII bestowed knighthood on Elgar in the Birthday Honors list. In November, Elgar was invited to become the Peyton Professor of Music at Birmingham University, a newly created chair that he was the first to hold.

Sir Edward Elgar. (Library of Congress)

World War I had a deep impact on Elgar. As a figurehead of English composition who had taken inspiration from Germanic composers, he found his loyalties torn. Like many in England, Elgar was initially confident about the prospect of battle and victory, but he did not foresee the full extent of the devastation that the war would cause. Elgar lived until 1934, but the Cello Concerto in E Minor, which premiered in 1919, was his last major work.

The Music

Elgar composed in a number of genres, and broad characteristics can be identified across his oeuvre. His musical language was always Romantic and largely Austro-Germanic inspired; he particularly admired the composer Richard Strauss. In spite of Elgar's continental inspiration, his music is often described as quintessentially English, with his adroitness for tapping the musical tastes of the British public, around which he crafted the ideas that he adopted from others. In many ways, Elgar took the stylistic traits of the older school of English composers (Charles Hubert Hastings Parry, Charles Villiers Stanford, and more) and raised them to a more sophisticated level. The British public demanded choral-orchestral works and symphonies, and Elgar responded.

The Dream of Gerontius. Elgar's oratorio The Dream of Gerontius secured his fame. It belongs to the corpus of English choral-orchestral compositions written at the turn of the twentieth century, especially for the amateur choral societies that were the lifeblood of English music at the time. The compositional mastery that Elgar exhibits in The Dream of Gerontius, however, distinguishes it from others. Elgar selected for the libretto a poem by Cardinal John Henry Newman, the title of which is shared by the oratorio. It is deeply Roman Catholic in nature. The work centers on the death of a man who is reborn in the afterlife. It is largely through-composed, with only two parts. It is often associated with Richard Wagner's opera Parsifal. Among the shared characteristics of The Dream of Gerontius and Parsifal are chromatic harmonies and an extensive network of leitmotifs.

The Dream of Gerontius premiered at the Birmingham Festival in 1900. Hans Johann Richter, with whom Elgar would forge a lasting friendship, conducted the performance, although it was a disastrous rendition. Richter saw the score for the first time just ten days before the performance, and the work had to be accommodated in a crowded program. In spite of the premiere's poor quality, The Dream of Gerontius received great acclaim, with music critics recognizing that Elgar had produced a masterpiece.

Pomp and Circumstance. No work better exemplifies Elgar's ability to satisfy popular tastes than the first of his Pomp and Circumstance marches, written in 1901. Beginning with an invigorating march and culminating in the famous nobilmente melody, this work exerted wide appeal. In 1902 Arthur Christopher Benson set the big tune of the march to poetry ("Land of Hope and Glory"). While not lacking in artistic construction, this march is part of a body of English art from the turn of the twentieth century that celebrated and glorified imperialism.

Elgar eventually turned his back on this nationalist style of composition, and his feelings toward the imperial past were seemingly given voice in the laments of the Cello Concerto.

Symphony No. 1 in A-flat Major. Throughout his career, even when his output consisted almost entirely of choral-orchestral works, Elgar believed the symphony to be the most distinguished form of composition. He realized that the musical achievements possible in the choral-orchestral medium were finite, and he finally turned to composing a symphony.

Elgar dedicated the work to Richter, who conducted its first performance on December 3, 1908. The symphony is in four movements, and it is without a program. Like many of Elgar's works, the piece is characterized by its adventurous harmonic language and concertic treatment of the thematic material. Elgar uses classical forms as templates, but he often diverges from structural norms exemplified in, for example, the symphonies of Johannes Brahms.

Cello Concerto in E Minor. This was Elgar's last major original composition, and it can be considered the closest he came to writing a requiem. It is a nostalgic and introspective lament, expressing the many sorrows that Elgar had experienced by his sixties. The work premiered on October 27, 1919, in the inaugural concert of the London Symphony Orchestra's first season after the World War I. Elgar was the conductor, and Felix Salmond was the soloist.

The concerto is famous for its opening: four solo fortissimo cello chords so wide that they must be spread, followed by the haunting violin melody with a 9/8 lilt. The declamatory chords return as a ghostly pizzicato at the second movement's opening. The third movement is, like the first, defined by a poignant melody. During the fourth movement's coda, the opening cello chords return, as if the work has gone full circle.

Musical Legacy

Although, unlike his colleagues Parry and Stanford, Elgar never taught composition at a music college, the impact of his works on the next generation of musicians was substantial. He contributed to every major genre, and he left indelible marks on the forms of symphony and oratorio. His contribution to the symphony brought the English musical renaissance to its peak, and the English symphony was finally accorded respect at home, in Europe, and in America, on a par with the repertoire of the Viennese tradition. Elgar opened the way for composers such as Ralph Vaughan-Williams and Benjamin Britten to become established on the international stage. Composers such as Anthony Payne and Robert Walker have reconstructed a number of pieces from Elgar's sketches. Elgar's first march from Pomp and Circumstance is played every year at the last night of the BBC Proms, a series of summertime concerts, in London, and its famous nobilmente melody is played frequently at graduation ceremonies.

Luke Berryman

Further Reading

Elgar, Edward, and Jerrold Northrop Moore. Letters of a Lifetime. Oxford, England: Oxford University Press, 1990. Selected by Moore, this collection of Elgar's letters covers the breadth of his career and provides valuable insight into the composer's state of mind and his personal relationships.

Grimley, Daniel M., and Julian Rushton, eds. The Cambridge Companion to Elgar. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press, 2004. This collection of essays by leading Elgar scholars covers a diverse range of topics based on Elgar's life and works.

Harper-Scott, J. P. E. Edward Elgar, Modernist. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press, 2006. This analytical inquiry into Elgar's output paints a portrait of him as a modernist composer. Much of his music, argues Harper-Scott, is a pessimistic commentary on the nature of human existence.

Kennedy, Michael. The Life of Elgar. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press, 2004. A compact biography of Elgar, in which a number of Elgar's letters are cited. Kennedy neatly aligns key events in Elgar's life with his compositions.

Moore, Jerrold Northrop. Edward Elgar: A Creative Life. Oxford, England: Oxford University Press, 1984. An indispensable, extremely detailed biography of Elgar, with a wealth of firsthand material from letters, diaries, memoirs, and so on. Includes photographs and copies of scores.

Riley, Matthew. Edward Elgar and the Nostalgic Imagination. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press, 2007. A careful examination of nostalgic sentiment in Elgar's music. Includes excerpts from scores.

See also: Britten, Benjamin; Casals, Pablo; du Pré, Jacqueline; Hogwood, Christopher; Kreisler, Fritz; Menuhin, Sir Yehudi; Perlman, Itzhak; Previn, Sir André; Strauss, Richard; Vaughan Williams, Ralph; Walton, Sir William.

Duke Ellington

American jazz pianist and composer

Ellington's inexhaustible explorations of timbre, texture, and musical color in his compositions and arrangements gave jazz music an enduring refinement and elegance.

Born: April 29, 1899; Washington, D.C.
Died: May 24, 1974; New York, New York
Also known as: Edward Kennedy Ellington (full name)
Member of: Jungle Band; the Harlem Footwarmers

Principal works

FILM SCORES: Anatomy of a Murder, 1959; Paris Blues, 1961; Assault on a Queen, 1966; Change of Mind, 1969.

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): Daybreak Express, 1947; Masterpieces by Ellington, 1950; Hi-Fi Ellington Uptown, 1951; Duke Ellington Plays the Blues, 1953; The Duke Plays Ellington, 1953; Ellington '55, 1953; Ellington Showcase, 1953; Ellington Uptown, 1953; Premiered by Ellington, 1953; Dance to the Duke!, 1954; Duke Ellington Plays, 1954; The Duke and His Men, 1955; Duke's Mixture, 1955; Al Hibbler with the Duke, 1956 (with Al Hibbler); A Drum Is a Woman, 1956; Historically Speaking: The Duke, 1956; Ella Fitzgerald/The Duke Ellington Songbook, 1957; Indigos, 1957; Such Sweet Thunder, 1957; Black, Brown, and Beige, 1958; Blues in Orbit, 1958; Blues Summit, 1958; Cosmic Scene: Duke Ellington's Spacemen, 1958; Side by Side, 1958 (with Johnny Hodges); The Ellington Suites, 1959; Jazz Party, 1959; Piano in the Background, 1960; Three Suites, 1960; First Time! The Count Meets the Duke, 1961 (with Count Basie); Piano in the Foreground, 1961; Afro-Bossa, 1962; All American, 1962; Duke Ellington and John Coltrane, 1962; Duke Ellington Meets Coleman Hawkins, 1962 (with Coleman Hawkins); Featuring Paul Gonsalves, 1962 (with Paul Gonsalves); Midnight in Paris, 1962; Money Jungle, 1962 (with Charles Mingus and Max Roach); Will Big Bands Ever Come Back?, 1962; Duke Ellington's Jazz Violin Session, 1963; The Symphonic Ellington, 1963; Duke Ellington Plays Mary Poppins, 1964; Ellington '65, 1964; Hits of the Sixties: This Time by Ellington, 1964; Jumpin' Punkins, 1965; Duke Ellington, 1966; Orchestral Works, 1966 (with Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra); The Pianist, 1966; Sacred Music, 1966; Soul Call, 1966; . . . and His Mother Called Him Bill, 1967; The Intimacy of the Blues, 1967 (with various backing bands); Johnny Come Lately, 1967; North of the Border in Canada, 1967; The Popular Duke Ellington, 1967; Latin American Suite, 1968; Second Sacred Concert, 1968; The Intimate Ellington, 1969; Pretty Woman, 1969; Up in Duke's Workshop, 1969; New Orleans Suite, 1970; The Afro-Eurasian Eclipse, 1971; Togo Brava, 1971; Collages, 1973; Third Sacred Concert, 1973.

SINGLES (solo): "Limehouse Blues," 1931; "Mood Indigo," 1931; "It Don't Mean a Thing (If It Ain't Got That Swing)," 1932; "Sophisticated Lady," 1932; "Cotton," 1935; "Love Is Like a Cigarette," 1935; "Saddest Tale," 1935; "Caravan," 1937; "Lambeth Walk," 1938; "I Got It Bad (And That Ain't Good)," 1941; "Take the 'A' Train," 1941.

SINGLES (with Harlem Footwarmers): "Diga Diga Doo," 1928; "Doin' the New Lowdown," 1928.

SINGLES (with Jungle Band): "Creole Rhapsody," 1931; "Rockin' in Rhythm," 1931.

The Life

Edward Kennedy Ellington was born in Washington, D.C., to a middle-class African American family. Though modest in income, the family members presented a sense of pride in the way they dressed and behaved. By the age of eight, Ellington had earned his nickname Duke because of the impeccable and distinguished manner in which his mother dressed him. Ellington's parents shielded him from most of the racial problems of the time, teaching him to overlook "unpleasantness." This developed a sense of self-esteem in Ellington that helped him throughout his life, and it contributed to his elegant and polished appearance.

Ellington began piano lessons at an early age, and he began composing in 1913 with the piece "Soda Fountain Rag," named after his job as a soda jerk at the Poodle Dog Café. While hanging out at a local pool hall, Ellington heard several ragtime piano players, and he was influenced particularly by Oliver "Doc" Perry.

Offered an art scholarship to the Pratt Institute in 1916, Ellington declined because he had already been successful as a working musician. In 1918 he married Edna Thompson, and he also formed his first band, the Washingtonians. His son Mercer was born a year later.

Duke Ellington. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Ellington moved to New York City in 1923 (after a previously failed attempt in 1922) on the advice of Fats Waller. With the addition of trumpeter Bubber Miley and baritone saxophonist Harry Carney, Ellington's band landed a long-running gig at Harlem's famous Cotton Club in 1927. Alto saxophonist Johnny Hodges joined in 1928, and by 1932 the band had increased to fourteen members. They began touring the United States in 1931, and in 1933 they toured Europe. This was just the beginning of extensive touring for Ellington, who was now an international attraction.

Ellington fell naturally into the role of bandleader. He had a good sense of business, and he had a great rapport with audiences. His talent for arranging and composing for the band also solidified his leading role. Ellington continued to add significant personnel to his orchestra, including tenor saxophonist Ben Webster, bassist Jimmy Blanton, and trombonist Juan Tizol. In 1938 Ellington formed one of his most significant musical relationships when Billy Strayhorn joined the band as a fellow composer, arranger, and second pianist.

Throughout the 1940's and 1950's, Ellington continued to tour, despite the band's struggle to survive as new jazz styles were emerging. Ellington remained true to his own work, and he carefully avoided commercialization. He explored longer compositions, and he even composed for the film Anatomy of a Murder in 1959. Toward the end of his career he turned his attention toward liturgical music, and he considered his sacred concerts to be his most important works.

Ellington was diagnosed with lung cancer in 1972. Shortly afterward, in 1973, he published his memoir, Music Is My Mistress. He died at age seventy-five in New York, and his son, Mercer Ellington, took over the direction of the band.

The Music

While Ellington certainly showed mastery of the piano, many would say that his true instrument was his orchestra. Ellington's compositional genius lay in his ability to explore the different timbres possible in a larger group, while also tapping into the strengths of his band members. He welcomed their input, and he considered any limitations a problem to solve. For Ellington, it was the challenge that made the musical results special.

Ellington's refined outward appearance reflected his inner perfectionist attitude. In his process of composition, he constantly revised his work, not being satisfied until every note fit flawlessly. He composed tirelessly, often staying at the piano until the tour manager made him get on the bus. His favorite songs were always the next ones being written. As his music and compositional style progressed, he employed an extended harmonic vocabulary that subsequently guided many jazz artists in their harmonic thinking.

Early Works. Ellington's early works presage the five pervasive styles around which his repertoire is built. The "jungle" style features raucous and growling sounds in the brass instruments, especially in the trumpet playing of Miley. Songs such as "East St. Louis Toodle-loo" were staples during the band's stint at the Cotton Club, where the exotic floor shows reflected the primitive feel of Ellington's music. "Mood" pieces were another style of Ellington's works. Early versions of the popular "Mood Indigo" feature a reduced instrumentation and Bigard on clarinet. Soft and lyrical ballads such as "Solitude" and "Prelude to a Kiss" often featured Hodges on saxophone.

Ellington's "concerto" style included pieces written specifically for individuals. Some examples of this style are "Clarinet Lament," written for Bigard in 1936, and "Concerto for Cootie," written for trumpeter Cootie Williams in 1939. The "standard" was a style of song written for dancing, similar to the popular songs written for other large bands of the time. However, Ellington's songs had a certain sound that no one else could duplicate. With all the styles, Ellington often worked with his band and the soloists in rehearsal to achieve the sound effects he desired. Many times these could not be notated, and therefore other bands were unable to copy the style.

A fifth style of music emerged as Ellington began to explore more abstract music. "Creole Rhapsody," written in 1931, was the first piece of music Ellington wrote that was not for dancing or social entertainment. It was solely for listening.

"Reminiscing in Tempo." This work was written in 1935 after the death of Ellington's mother, and it is one of his first attempts to raise jazz music to the status of art. At the time, this work was a departure from his popular compositions, reflecting his more experimental side. The piece comprised a theme with thirteen variations, and it employed strong melodic and harmonic material. Longer than any of his previous compositions, the work lasted thirteen minutes (four sides of a record).

"Caravan." Created in collaboration with trombonist Tizol, the song was so popular that it was often the second song on the band's set list. Many consider this to be the first jazz song with Latin influences in rhythm, although it also includes Middle Eastern influences in melody and harmony. Numerous jazz artists over the years have had great success covering the tune, including Billy Eckstine, who sold more than a million copies of his 1949 version of the song.

Black, Brown, and Beige. This extended work, subtitled A Tone Parallel to the History of the American Negro, was written in 1943, and it was performed at Ellington's Carnegie Hall debut. Fifty minutes in length, this was intended to represent the musical evolution of the African American race. Scored for jazz band and voice, the three-part work was essential in establishing the validity of large-scale works in the jazz repertoire. Although Ellington was disappointed in the critical response it received, and he never performed the entire work in public again, he did go on to create other jazz suites in this style. "Harlem," "Far-East Suite," and "New Orleans Suite" were all works that explored the same type of thematic and harmonic development.

The Sacred Concerts. Ellington was a spiritual man, and he claimed to have read the Bible four times (three times after his mother's death). However, it was not until much later in his life that he explored this side of himself musically. Beginning in 1965 he gave three different sacred concerts in churches and cathedrals around the world: in San Francisco, in London, and in New York City. Combining the elements of jazz, classical, choral, blues, gospel, and dance, these concerts require a large number of performers. Because of this complexity, they have not been performed regularly since Ellington's death in 1974. Highlights from these concerts include his musical version of the Twenty-third Psalm and a reprise of "Come Sunday" from his suite Black, Brown, and Beige. Especially poignant is his musical composition based on the spoken rhythms of the Lord's Prayer.

Musical Legacy

Ellington earned nineteen honorary doctorates from institutions such as Yale and the New England Conservatory, eleven Grammy Awards, a Pulitzer Prize nomination, a Presidential Medal of Freedom, and a Legion of Honor from France. More than a thousand works are attributed to Ellington, either wholly his own composition or collaborations. His music has been a powerful influence on generations of jazz musicians, and his songs and melodies remain part of the standard jazz repertoire.

Staci A. Spring

Further Reading

Ellington, Edward K. Music Is My Mistress. New York: Doubleday, 1973. An autobiography tells Ellington's story and pays tribute to the important people in his life. Includes photographs.

Ellington, Mercer K. Duke Ellington in Person: An Intimate Memoir. New York: Da Capo Press, 1979. Ellington's son's memoir gives a detailed look at his complex relationship with his father, as they interacted in a personal and a professional capacity.

Hasse, John Edward. Beyond Category: The Life and Genius of Duke Ellington. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1993. Written by the curator of American music at the Smithsonian Institution, this biography uses thousands of previously unavailable pages from the Ellington archives to give a complete and in-depth view of Ellington's life and compositional process. Includes references to musical manuscripts, scrapbooks, letters, and business papers.

Lambert, Eddie. Duke Ellington: A Listener's Guide. Lanham, Md.: Scarecrow Press, 1999. Offers critical commentary on recordings from 1924 to 1974. Includes a bibliography, an extensive discography, and a list of band members and their dates of membership.

Lawrence, A. H. Duke Ellington and His World: A Biography. New York: Routledge, 2001. The author examines the sociopolitical culture surrounding Ellington's career, and he provides interviews with several band members, friends, and family. Includes illustrations.

Tucker, Mark, ed. The Duke Ellington Reader. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993. An anthology of writings about the life and music of Ellington. Includes profiles of Ellington and band members, interviews with Ellington, musical analysis, remembrances by prominent authors in the jazz world, and some of Ellington's own writings.

See also: Armstrong, Louis; Basie, Count; Bechet, Sidney; Blades, Rubén; Burton, Gary; Coltrane, John; Crosby, Bing; Fitzgerald, Ella; Gillespie, Dizzy; Goodman, Benny; Grusin, Dave; Hampton, Lionel; Hawkins, Coleman; Horne, Lena; King, B. B.; Makeba, Miriam; Mingus, Charles; Monk, Thelonious; Otis, Johnny; Peterson, Oscar; Roach, Max; Shorter, Wayne; Strayhorn, Billy; Tatum, Art; Tormé, Mel; Tyner, McCoy; Vaughan, Sarah; Waller, Fats; Webster, Ben; Whiteman, Paul; Williams, Mary Lou; Wonder, Stevie.

Cass Elliot

American rock singer and songwriter

Renowned for her powerful, clear contralto voice and dynamic stage presence, Elliot achieved popularity as a member of the 1960's group the Mamas and the Papas. She was the only member of the group to have a successful solo career.

Born: September 19, 1941; Baltimore, Maryland
Died: July 29, 1974; London, England
Also known as: Ellen Naomi Cohen (birth name); Mama Cass
Member of: Triumvirate; the Big Three; the Mugwumps; the Mamas and the Papas

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): Dream a Little Dream of Me, 1968; Bubble Gum, Lemonade, and Something for Mama, 1969; Make Your Own Kind of Music, 1969; Cass

Elliot, 1971; Road Is No Place for a Lady, 1972; Don't Call Me Mama Anymore, 1973.

ALBUMS (with the Big Three): The Big Three, 1963.

ALBUMS (with the Mamas and the Papas): If You Can Believe Your Eyes and Ears, 1966; The Mamas and the Papas, 1966; Deliver, 1967; The Papas and the Mamas, 1968; People Like Us, 1971; Elliot, Phillips, Gilliam, Doherty, 1988.

ALBUMS (with the Mugwumps): The Mugwumps, 1967.

SINGLES (with the Mamas and the Papas): "California Dreamin'," 1965.

The Life

"Mama Cass" Elliot was born Ellen Naomi Cohen to Philip Cohen and Beth Levine, who were in the restaurant business. Both parents were musical: Her father loved opera, and her mother played the piano. As a child, Elliot listened to singers; her favorites were Ella Fitzgerald, Judy Garland, and Blossom Dearie. She took piano lessons in grade school, and later, her enthusiasm growing for folk music, she switched to the guitar. At Forest Park High School in Baltimore, she sang in the choir, and she acted in school plays. By age seventeen she had adopted the name Cassandra Elliot. Nicknamed Cass by her father, for the prophetess Cassandra of Greek mythology, she added Elliot in honor of a friend who had been killed in an automobile accident.

During the summer between her junior and senior years in high school, she filled in for a cast member at the Owings Mills Playhouse, playing the role of the French maid in Sandy Wilson's musical The Boy Friend (1954). This was her theatrical debut, and after her success, high school was less interesting. Elliot dropped out and took a part-time job at the Jewish Times, but she still yearned for a singing career.

Although her parents wanted her to finish high school and enroll at Goucher College to become a teacher, Elliot chose to start her performing career by moving to New York City, where she made the rounds of auditions, singing "Glitter and Be Gay" from Leonard Bernstein's Candide (1956). Although she came close to getting the part of Miss Marmelstein in Harold Rome's I Can Get It for You Wholesale (1962), the part went to another unknown: Barbra Streisand. After completing a tour with Meredith Willson's The Music Man (1957), Elliot decided to enroll in college to get a foundation in drama. She went to American University in Washington, D.C., but she spent a lot of time at the university's theater, anxious to return to performing. When a fellow student who appreciated her voice asked her to relocate to Chicago to join a singing group, she jumped at the chance. She started her professional singing career in Chicago with the folk-singing group the Triumvirate. When the group relocated to Omaha, Nebraska, Jim Hendricks replaced one of the male singers. Elliot married Hendricks in 1963, so he could avoid being drafted for the Army. They divorced in 1969. When that group broke up, Elliot joined another group with Hendricks, Zalman Yanovsky, and Denny Doherty, billed as Cass Elliot and the Big Three. In 1964, after a drummer was added to the group, the name was changed to the Mugwumps. The group lasted about a year. In 1965 Elliot joined the Mamas and the Papas and became a star. She gave birth to a daughter, Owen Vanessa Elliot, in April, 1967.

Although Elliot enjoyed success as a group member, she wanted a solo career. When the Mamas and Papas disbanded in 1968, Elliot gained acclaim as a soloist. She recorded six albums, and she sang in nightclubs. She appeared on a number of television variety shows, and she had two primetime television specials of her own in 1969 and 1973. She married Baron Donald von Weidenman in 1971, but the marriage was annulled shortly thereafter. In 1974, following a successful two-week run at the London Palladium, she died of a heart attack.

The Music

The Mamas and the Papas. In 1965 Elliot joined friends in the Virgin Islands, and there she met John Phillips, who was forming a group with his wife Michelle and Doherty. Initially, Phillips rejected Elliot because her vocal range was too low to complement the harmonies he was developing. However, as the story goes, Elliot was felled by a steel pipe at a construction site, she suffered a concussion, and after that she found she could sing the higher notes. Phillips immediately hired her. After working months to perfect a distinctive sound, the group moved to Los Angeles, where it was discovered by producer Lou Adler, who had formed the Dunhill Records label.

The music generated by the Mamas and the Papas was a mix of folk and rock, characterized by intricate harmonies. What supported the sound was Elliot's strong contralto, which she had to keep under control, so she did not overwhelm the light soprano of Michelle Phillips. In 1965 Dunhill Records released the group's first record, the single "California Dreamin'." It climbed to number four on the charts, and it sold more than a million copies. A second hit, "Monday, Monday," sold 160,000 copies the first day, and it won a Grammy Award in March, 1967, in the Best Group Performance category. Critics noted that the Mamas and the Papas were the right group for the time, with their flower-child appeal and innocence.

Although constantly fighting a battle with her weight, Elliot, with her wisecracking sense of humor, was a crowd pleaser. Her fans were enthralled by her rich voice, and they enjoyed her unpretentious manner.

Solo Career. When the Mamas and Papas broke up in 1968, Elliot started her solo career in earnest. In 1969 her signature song, "Dream a Little Dream of Me," launched her career, becoming her biggest hit. Other best-selling singles included "It's Getting Better," "Make Your Own Kind of Music," and "New World Coming."

Musical Legacy

Elliot's voice, with its warmth and power, contributed significantly to the success of the Mamas and the Papas. In 1998 Elliot, as a member of the Mamas and the Papas, was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame. With the Mamas and Papas and as a solo act, Elliot was known as the queen of pop music. She was generous with her friends, and she hosted many aspiring artists in her home. Elliot introduced Graham Nash to David Crosby and Stephen Stills, who later formed the group Crosby, Stills, and Nash. Elliot demonstrated that a large woman could be a commercial success, with her fans focusing on her voice. A 1996 British film, Beautiful Thing, featured many of Elliot's songs. In the second-season opener of the television show Lost, Elliot's song "Make Your Own Kind of Music" introduced another generation to her distinctive voice.

Marcia B. Dinneen

Further Reading

Haag, John. "Elliot, Cass." In Women in World History, edited by Anne Commire. Waterford, Conn.: Yorkin, 2002. Includes biographical material and an overview of Elliot's career.

Kloman, William. "Sing Along with Mama Cass." Esquire (June, 1969): 102-104. Good background on Elliot's childhood and her Las Vegas solo debut.

Phillips, John, with Jim Jerome. Papa John, an Autobiography. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1986. Includes information on Elliot's involvement with the Mama and the Papas.

Phillips, Michelle. "California Dreamin'": The True Story of the Mamas and the Papas. New York: Warner, 1986. Dedicated to Mama Cass, the book includes background information about the group and about Elliot.

See also: David, Hal; Fitzgerald, Ella; Garland, Judy; Stills, Stephen; Streisand, Barbra; Willson, Meredith.

Missy Elliott

American rap singer and songwriter

In her redefinition of rap and hip-hop, Elliott created a musical collage of near and nonsense rhyme, street language, comic profanity, offbeat rhythms, unique instrumentation, sound effects, and vocalizations. Elliott raised the profile of women in rap, first as a lyric writer and a producer and later as the owner of a record label and a singer.

Born: July 1, 1971; Portsmouth, Virginia
Also known as: Melissa Arnette Elliott (full name); Missy "Misdemeanor" Elliott
Member of: Sista

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): Supa Dupa Fly, 1997; Da Real World, 1999; Miss E . . . So Addictive, 2001; Under Construction, 2002; This Is Not a Test!, 2003; The Cookbook, 2005.

ALBUMS (with Sista): 4 All the Sistas Around da World, 1994.

The Life

Born to Ronnie and Pat Elliott in 1971, in Portsmouth, Virginia, Melissa Arnette Elliott was a church choir member who repeatedly told her mother that she would someday be a star, often singing to an audience of her dolls. She began writing songs, singing them to her family and even to passing cars from atop overturned trash cans. She created her own musical breakthrough in 1991, taking the members of her first group, Sista, to a Portsmouth hotel where Devante Swing of Jodeci was staying. Swing was impressed by the performance of Elliott's original songs. He signed the group, which cut an album in 1995 for Elektra Records; however, the work was never released.

Undaunted, Elliott formed her own production team, working with MC Timothy Z. "Timbaland" Moseley, now a producer, and she began penning tunes for Jodeci and others. After some success writing and producing, she launched a string of platinum albums and lost seventy pounds between 2001 and 2002. She is known for her humility and for her kindness to fans, signing autographs for those who recognize her on the streets. Elliott went public about her father's physical abuse of her mother, leading her to donate her time to the organization Break the Cycle, helping youth to end domestic violence.

Missy Elliott. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The Music

Elliott and Moseley produced four hits from Aaliyah's One in a Million (1996), and at age twenty-two Elliott had her own label (The Gold Mind, Inc.) with Elektra Records. Thus began the dual careers of one of the most influential female performers in hip-hop and rap music. As producer, Elliott worked with such artists as Mary J. Blige, Whitney Houston, Mariah Carey, and Janet Jackson. Her albums are known for staccato dance rhythms, sound effects (cartoons), comic profanity, raw sexuality, blunt treatment of violence, inclusion of spoken-word interludes, and underlying lyrical sarcasm. Rolling Stone compared an Elliott album with a Beatles album in conception and reception, each redefining the singer and the genre itself.

Early Works. As Missy "Misdemeanor" Elliott, she released Supa Dupa Fly in 1997, and it went platinum. Her first hit, "The Rain," was an adaptation of an Ann Peebles hit. The album was praised as forging a new direction in hip-hop, eschewing gangsta imagery for rhythm and blues, and for it Elliott received her first Grammy Award nomination. The more streetwise and angry Da Real World was musically experimental and futuristic, and it featured collaborations with Aaliyah, Beyoncé, Lil' Kim, and Big Boi. The rhythm-and-blues hits "All N My Grill" and "Hot Boyz," as well as "She's a Bitch" and "Beat Biters," exemplified the beat-rhyme partnership she would perfect with Timbaland. "Hot Boyz" spent eighteen consecutive weeks at the top of the Billboard rap charts and six weeks at number one on the rhythm-and-blues/hip-hop chart. In June, 1999, Elliott was named by Ebony magazine as one of the Ten at the Top of Hip-Hop.

Missy E . . . So Addictive. This 2001 platinum album garnered Elliott recognition with mainstream listeners, and it is noted for its Top 10 hits "One Minute Man" and "Get Ur Freak On," frenetic club favorites "Scream aka Itchin" and "4 My People," as well as for collaborations with Jay-Z, Ludacris, Redman, Method Man, and Eve. The singles enjoyed heavy rotation on radio stations and MTV. "Get Ur Freak On" was a genre-defying experiment, and for it Elliott won her first Grammy Award and a Soul Train Award.

Under Construction. Dropping "Misdemeanor" from her name for Under Construction, Elliott became with this album the best-selling female hip-hop artist. Collaborating with Ludacris, Jay-Z, Beyoncé, and TLC, she showcased old school hip-hop, tinged with rhythm and blues, bookended by spoken-word interludes and sound bites. The Grammy Award-winning "Work It" featured a staccato dance beat juxtaposed with a variable sine wave, comic sound effects, and lines rapped forward and backward. It stayed at the top of the Billboard rhythm-and-blues/hip-hop chart for five weeks, and it won a Soul Train Award. "Gossip Folks" featured the sound of real background gossip, and "Back in the Day" was a straightforward rhythm-and-blues tribute.

This Is Not a Test! Showing Elliott at the apex of experimentation, This Is Not a Test! spawned the single "Pass That Dutch," and it featured R. Kelly, Nelly, and Jay-Z. It contained a love ballad for a vibrator ("Toyz"), a send-up of classic 1980's rap ("Let It Bump"), and sound effects such as car alarms, whistles, horses, and heavy breathing.

The Cookbook. The Cookbook marked a change, as Elliott began using producers other than Timbaland. The single "Lose Control" peaked at number three on the Billboard Hot 100. The video garnered six MTV nominations, winning two. Elliott was also nominated for three Grammy Awards, two for "Lose Control" (with one win) and one for The Cookbook. In 2006 she was nominated for Best International Female Artist at the BRIT Awards, the British music industry award.

Musical Legacy

Elliott has been successful as a producer, songwriter, rapper, singer, and video presence. Her phenomenal achievements include releasing critically acclaimed albums; winning Grammy, BET, Soul Train, MTV, and American Music Awards; achieving two Billboard dance and rhythm-and-blues/hip-hop chart number ones; performing on the Lilith Fair tour; changing the look of rap and hip-hop videos; and composing a song for the film Stick It (2006). Along with Timbaland, she popularized a new hip-hop sound, featuring variable syncopated musical phrasing, accentuated by snare and high hat drums rather than bass. This beat is typically juxtaposed with sound effects and comic vocalizations.

Anthony J. Fonseca

Further Reading

Diehl, Matt. "Missy Elliott." Interview 35, no. 8 (2005): 152. An interview with Elliott discusses her experience with early rejection.

Emerson, Rana A. "'Where My Girls At?' Negotiating Black Womanhood in Music Videos." Gender and Society 16, no. 1 (February, 2002): 115-135. The article analyzes women in rap and hip-hop videos, including Elliott's "Beep Me 911" and "Sock It to Me."

Hirshey, Gerri. We Gotta Get Out of This Place: The True, Tough Story of Women in Rock. New York: Grove Press, 2001. Contains an extended biographical discussion of Elliott, including little-known information, in the "Riot Grrls" chapter.

Kimpel, Dan. How They Made It: True Stories of How Music's Biggest Stars Went from Start to Stardom. Milwaukee, Wis.: Hal Leonard, 2006. A chapter on Elliott offers biographical information and brief quotes.

Rohm, Andy, Fareena Sultan, and David T. A. Wesley. Brand in the Hand: Mobile Marketing at Adidas. London: Richard Ivey School of Business Case Collection, 2005. Briefly chronicles Adidas's marketing strategy for Elliott's Respect M.E. sportswear line.

Vibe Magazine. Hip-Hop Divas. New York: Three Rivers Press, 2001. Vibe staffer Karen Renee Good focuses on Elliott's life and musical contributions.

See also: Blige, Mary J.; Carey, Mariah; Grant, Amy; Jay-Z.

Eminem

American rap singer and songwriter

A controversial rap artist, Eminem is noted for his high-energy, witty, and offensive lyrics. As a white musician performing in a genre dominated by black artists, Eminem is often compared to Elvis Presley.

Born: October 17, 1972; St. Joseph, Missouri
Also known as: Marshall Bruce Mathers (birth name); M&M; Slim Shady Member of: D12

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): Infinite, 1996; The Slim Shady EP, 1997; The Slim Shady LP, 1999; The Marshall Mathers LP, 2000; The Eminem Show, 2002; Encore, 2004; Eminem Presents: The Re-Up, 2006; So U Wanna Freestyle?, 2008.
ALBUMS (with D12): Devil's Night, 2001; D12 World, 2004.

The Life

Marshall Mathers, who later took the name Eminem (ehm-ih-NEHM), had an unstable childhood, moving repeatedly between Missouri and Michigan. His father left the family shortly after he was born, and his mother, Deborah "Debbie" Mathers, raised him. Eminem had a close relationship with his uncle, Ronald "Ronnie" Polkinghorn, who was only a few months older. One of Eminem's tattoos and the military identification tags he wears commemorate Polkinghorn's 1991 suicide.

At school Eminem was the victim of bullying, and one beating left him in a coma for five days. After repeating ninth grade three times, he dropped out of high school, and he held various unfulfilling jobs until his music career became profitable. He maintained a turbulent relationship with Kimberly "Kim" Scott, and they had a daughter, Hailie Jade, in 1995. Many of Eminem's lyrics refer to the people closest to him: Debbie, Kim, Hailie, and Ronnie.

Eminem spent his teenage years around Detroit, where he began performing hip-hop music with Bassmint Productions, Soul Intent, Royce da 5'9", and D12. D12, also known as the Dirty Dozen or Detroit 12, comprised six Detroit rappers, with two distinct rap personalities. In this context, Eminem rapped as M&M, for Marshall Mathers (which became Eminem), and Slim Shady. Both names stuck. Eminem's earliest musical success came in improvisational-rap competitions, called battles, in Detroit, and later Eminem finished second in the 1997 Rap Olympics MC Battle in Los Angeles. Around that time a promotional tape of his performance reached Dr. Dre.

Dr. Dre signed Eminem to his Aftermath record label, and in 1999 he produced Eminem's first studio album, The Slim Shady LP. The album was an international success. That year Eminem married Kim; they were married for two years before divorcing in 2001, remarrying in 2006, and redivorcing later that year.

Eminem's subsequent albums were successful, making him one of rap's best-selling artists. His performance as the lead character in the 2002 film 8 Mile earned some critical acclaim and an Academy Award for Best Song. During his career he served two years of probation, stemming from assault charges, and his mother and his ex-wife, among others, have sued him.

The Music

Eminem developed his signature dense rhyming patterns, frequent use of homonyms, and intricate rhythms through improvised rap battles. An improvisational sound and self-deprecating lyrics were characteristic of his work. While still young he performed on various albums, including the solo Infinite, although these are generally omitted from discussions of his music. His musical reputation rests primarily on the four studio albums he had completed by 2004.

Eminem's music has been the source of considerable controversy, earning him accusations of misogyny and homophobia as well as rallying cries of artistic freedom. Various works of his have been banned on the radio, MTV, and the Black Entertainment Television (BET), and he appeared before a congressional hearing on violence in the media.

The Slim Shady LP. Produced by Dr. Dre in 1999 and dedicated to Eminem's daughter Hailie, The Slim Shady LP was Eminem's first studio album and winner of the Grammy Award for Best Rap Album.

Rappers as role models and the struggles of drug users and poor people are among the main themes of the album. While many of the songs depict scenes that seem real and even autobiographical, one of the last tracks on the album, "I'm Shady," explains that not all of Eminem's lyrics are to be taken literally.

"My Name Is" is the hit single from The Slim Shady LP, and this introduced Eminem to a wider audience. "Rock Bottom" is set against a hymnlike musical background, but it is about the willingness to commit crimes when there is no hope of a better life. Eminem attempted suicide around the time he recorded this track. The cover art of The Slim Shady LP depicts the haunting fantasy that Eminem describes in "'97 Bonnie & Clyde": a man and his young daughter disposing of her mother's body. Distant, minor melodies and the use of a harp create a mysterious, ethereal background while the sounds of waves and of Eminem's daughter, Hailie, add realism. Tori Amos released a cover of this piece in 2001.

The Marshall Mathers LP. In 2000 Eminem released his second studio album, The Marshall Mathers LP, which debuted at number one on the Billboard charts and earned Eminem his second consecutive Grammy for Best Rap Album. Eminem raps in a more aggressive and angry style on this album. The topic of rappers as role models reemerges, along with songs about Eminem's rise to fame. Eminem dedicated the album to daughter Hailie, Polkinghorn, and Cornell Pitts, better known as Bugz, a former D12 rap associate.

The first single released from The Marshall Mathers LP, "The Real Slim Shady," is a catchy, memorable tune that emphasizes the rapper's name. "Stan" is one of Eminem's most critically acclaimed raps: The music samples Dido's "Thank You," combined with thunder, rain, and the sound of writing on paper, the story unfolding in the form of three letters from an unstable fan named Stan. At the end of the third verse, Stan performs reckless actions described in "My Name Is," and he ultimately kills himself and his pregnant girlfriend in a scenario similar to the one described in "'97 Bonnie & Clyde." The last verse is Eminem's concerned response that comes too late.

"Lose Yourself." In 2002 Eminem starred in the motion picture 8 Mile, which at the time had the largest opening weekend for an R-rated motion picture. Eminem played a white Detroit rapper, Jimmy "B-Rabbit" Smith, although the plot is not strictly autobiographical. The song "Lose Yourself," which is about Smith's struggle to become a successful musician, is heard as a work in progress throughout the film, and by the end Smith finishes it. This was Eminem's first number-one Billboard single, holding that position longer than any other song by a rap artist. It was also the first rap song to win an Academy Award for Best Original Song.

The Eminem Show. The Eminem Show earned the artist his third Grammy Award for Best Rap Album; he was the first person to win the award three times. The album has a more mature sound, with less distortion and more layering, and some of the lyrics (especially in "White America" and "Square Dance") are more political than in previous albums. However, there is still a personal side: "Hailie's Song" is about Eminem's daughter, and "My Dad's Gone Crazy" features her singing throughout the track. "Cleanin' Out My Closet" is mostly about Eminem's mother, but it also contains references to Eminem's father and uncle.

"Without Me," a high-energy hit, could be likened to "My Name Is" and "The Real Slim Shady" from previous albums. "Without Me" contains one of the best examples of Eminem's lyrical virtuosity. After a rapid-fire succession of rhymes woven into a complex pattern, he concludes the second verse with the sound being sent with five different meanings. Rappers as role models is a central theme in "When the Music Stops" and "Sing for the Moment." The latter rap samples "Dream On" by Aerosmith, and it features Steven Tyler and Joe Perry. Here Eminem offers a coherent defense against the accusations that his music is dangerous for children, and, further, he argues that his music could be beneficial to them and that those who censor his lyrics could be harming children by limiting their artistic outlets.

Encore. Dr. Dre served as executive producer for Encore, which Eminem released in 2004. Critics attacked Encore for being more heavy-handed and less clever than his previous albums. Nevertheless, "Mockingbird" is perhaps Eminem's most personal and touching rap. While previous albums included a catchy single from the perspective of Slim Shady, Encore contains "My First Single," a blatant mockery of that formula. Like The Eminem Show, Encore features some political content. "Mosh," for instance, is a harsh, detailed criticism of the George W. Bush presidency, and it encourages political activism. The video was released shortly before the 2004 U.S. presidential election as a way to recruit young voters. "Like Toy Soldiers" is a call for an end to violence among rappers. The music is characterized by its persistent, militant snare drum and its sample of "Toy Soldiers" performed by Martika. The music video concludes with images of rappers who had been killed recently: Tupac Shakur, the Notorious B.I.G., Big L, and Bugz, formerly of D12. The video also includes images of the fictional killing of Proof, a member of D12 and the best man in Eminem's second wedding. In 2006 Proof would, in fact, be shot and killed in a Detroit nightclub.

Musical Legacy

Eminem was the first rap artist to win an Academy Award for best song, and he won several Grammy Awards. He is known for his sometimes witty, sometimes tragic lyrics, which feature dense and intricate rhyming patterns. Eminem expanded the traditional topics of rap music to include personal, psychological, and political content rather than the more typical focus on drugs, violence, and women. He responded to critics who accused him of homophobia by performing live with Elton John on "Stan" on numerous occasions. In addition to his musical legacy, Eminem challenged censorship in America and violence among rappers. He was one of the factors in a cultural shift that has turned away from judging rappers by their skin color or violent reputation, paving the way for white rappers such as Paul Wall and Bubba Sparxxx as well as black rappers with nontraditional backgrounds such as Kanye West. Often praised and often attacked, Eminem has been one of the most significant figures in rap music.

Joseph R. Matson

Further Reading

Als, Hilton, and Darryl A. Turner, eds. White Noise: The Eminem Collection. New York: Thunder's Mouth Press, 2003. An excellent collection of essays on Eminem, covering a wide range of topics.

Bozza, Anthony. Whatever You Say I Am: The Life and Times of Eminem. New York: Three Rivers Press, 2003. A detailed biography by an author who has done numerous interviews with and written several articles about Eminem. Includes photographs and a lengthy bibliography.

Doggett, Peter. Eminem: The Complete Guide to His Music. London: Omnibus, 2005. A valuable reference tool that includes brief but thorough descriptions of all the music written or cowritten by Eminem until 2005. Includes photographs and index.

Friskics-Warren, Bill. "License to Ill: The Stooges, the Sex Pistols, PiL, and Eminem." In I'll Take You There: Pop Music and the Urge for Transcendence. New York: Continuum, 2005. A provocative analysis emphasizes the philosophical undertones of Eminem's lyrics.

Green, Jared, ed. "Case Study in Controversy: Eminem and Gay Bashing." In Rap and Hip-Hop: Examining Pop Culture. San Diego: Greenhaven Press, 2003. Articles present contrasting opinions on Eminem's controversial lyrics, not limited to homophobia.

Hasted, Nick. The Dark Story of Eminem. London: Omnibus, 2003. A thorough biography of Eminem contains photographs and discography.

Kitwana, Bakari. "Fear of a Culture Bandit." In Why White Kids Love Hip-Hop: Wankstas, Wiggers, Wannabes, and the New Reality of Race in America. New York: Basic Civitas Books: 2005. An analysis of the racial issues surrounding Eminem and his music.

Tsiopos-Wills, Katherine V. "Eminem." In Icons of Hip-Hop: An Encyclopedia of the Movement, Music, and Culture, edited by Mickey Hess. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2007. A practical guide to understanding Eminem and the culture of hip-hop. Includes bibliography and discography.

See also: D. M. C.; Dr. Dre; 50 Cent; Hammer, M. C.; Jay-Z; John, Sir Elton; Shakur, Tupac; Simmons, Joseph "Run."

Brian Eno

English rock singer, songwriter, and keyboard player

Eno achieved early fame playing synthesizers with the pioneering British glam rock band, Roxy Music. He went on to define the ambient music genre, and he brought his distinctive sound to the production of hit albums for other artists, such as U2, the Talking Heads, and Devo.

Born: May 15, 1948; Woodbridge, Suffolk, England
Also known as: Brian Peter George St. John le Baptiste de la Salle Eno (full name)
Member of: Roxy Music; Fripp and Eno; Portsmouth Sinfonia; Cluster; Harmonia 76; 801

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): Here Come the Warm Jets, 1974; Taking Tiger Mountain (By Strategy), 1974; Another Green World, 1975; Discreet Music, 1975; Before and After Science, 1977; After the Heat, 1978 (with Dieter Moebius and Hans-Joachim Roedelius); Ambient 1: Music for Airports, 1978; Music for Films, 1978; Empty Landscapes, 1981; My Life in the Bush of Ghosts, 1981 (with David Byrne); Ambient 4: On Land, 1982; Apollo: Atmospheres and Soundtracks, 1983; Music for Films, Vol. 2, 1983 (with Daniel Lanois); Thursday Afternoon, 1985; Music for Films, Vol. 3, 1988; Wrong Way Up, 1990 (with John Cale); Nerve Net, 1992; The Shutov Assembly, 1992; Neroli, 1993; Robert Sheckley's In a Land of Clear Colours, 1993 (with Peter Sinfield); Headcandy, 1994; Spinner, 1995 (with Jah Wobble); Generative Music 1, 1996; The Drop, 1997; Extracts from Music for White Cube, 1997; Lightness: Music for the Marble Palace, 1998; I Dormienti, 1999; Kite Stories, 1999; Music for Civic Recovery Center, 2000; Music for Onmyo-Ji, 2000 (with D. J. Jan Peter Schwalm); Drawn from Life, 2001 (with Schwalm); January 07003: Bell Studies for the Clock of the Long Now, 2003; Another Day on Earth, 2005; The Pearl, 2005 (with Harold Budd); Everything That Happens Will Happen Today, 2008 (with Byrne).

ALBUMS (with Cluster): Cluster and Eno, 1977.

ALBUMS (with Fripp and Eno): No Pussyfooting, 1973; Evening Star, 1975; The Equatorial Stars, 2005; Beyond Even (1992-2006), 2007.

ALBUMS (with Harmonia 76): Tracks and Traces, 1997.

ALBUMS (with Portsmouth Sinfonia): Plays the Popular Classics, 1974; Hallelujah, 1976.

ALBUMS (with Roxy Music): Roxy Music, 1972; For Your Pleasure, 1973.

The Life

Born in England in 1948, Brian Peter George St. John le Baptiste de la Salle Eno (EE-noh) grew up near a U.S. Air Force base. The sounds of early rock-and-roll and rhythm-and-blues music, with the tight harmonies and nonsense words of doo-wop, coming from Armed Forces Radio provided early inspiration to Eno. He attended the Winchester School of Art at the University of Southampton, where he encountered the music of contemporary composers, including minimalists such as John Cage, Steve Reich, and La Monte Young. He studied avant-garde subjects such as conceptual painting and sound sculpture. In 1967 Eno married Sarah Grenville, and their daughter, Hannah, was born later that year. Eno graduated from college in 1969.

After finishing school, he moved to London, where he cofounded Roxy Music. At first his role was offstage, mixing the band members' instruments and voices through synthesizers and other electronic devices, occasionally creating loops for live playback on tape recorders. He later joined his bandmates on the stage, where his outrageous make-up and drag costumes helped define the band's aesthetic. After Roxy Music's second album, For Your Pleasure, came out in 1973, Eno left the band, citing creative differences with the lead singer, Bryan Ferry, and general boredom with the rock-and-roll lifestyle.

Eno immediately embarked on a number of projects, beginning with a collaboration with King Crimson cofounder Robert Fripp. A series of health problems changed Eno's course, starting with a collapsed lung that forced him to abandon a British tour as front man of a band called the Winkies. A year later, in 1975, Eno was in a car accident, and his injuries left him bedridden. His immobility allowed time for contemplation of the environmental sounds around him, and in this situation Eno's concept of ambient music was born.

In addition to recording ambient music's seminal early albums, Eno was collaborating with musicians such as David Bowie, John Cale, and David Byrne. In 1988, after the demise of his first marriage, Eno married his manager, Anthea Norman-Taylor, with whom he had two daughters, Irial and Darla. Solo albums and collaborations continued, and at the same time Eno found success as an installation artist and a video artist. In 1975 Eno published, in conjunction with artist Peter Schmidt, Oblique Strategies, a deck of cards that offers solutions for overcoming creative block. In 1996 Eno founded the Long Now Foundation, which encourages public consideration of the long-term future of society and culture.

The Music

As a teenager, Eno made his first recording: the sound of a pen tapping a tin lampshade. He slowed it down and played it back, and in this way the foundation for his experimental, electronic, and ambient music was laid. For Eno, the tape recorder became an instrument. He was inspired by twentieth century minimalist composers' reliance on chance, and he used tape-delay feedback systems, synthesizers, and computer-generated compositions. Though his earliest solo albums were oriented toward the pop sound, in the 1970's Eno created and coined ambient music, that is, music played at a low volume, that alters the experience of the surrounding environment. Eno brought his distinctive, eclectic, and sought-after sound to the production of hit albums by Paul Simon, U2, and Coldplay.

Roxy Music. Roxy Music's eponymous first album was released in 1972. The band's music was an amalgamation of postmodernist, art-school, and glam rock. The album contained a variety of cultural references, including to Humphrey Bogart, to the Beatles, and to Richard Wagner's Ride of the Valkyries (1870). It was recorded in one week's time, before the band signed a contract with Island Records. Eno sang back-up vocals, and he played the synthesizer, creating weird, atonal noise using tape recorders. With this debut album Roxy Music joined the ranks of the significantly influential avant-garde bands of the era, such as the Velvet Underground and Captain Beefheart, paving the way for subsequent groups that relied on electronics to define their sound, such as the Cars and Devo. When Eno departed Roxy Music after its second album, the remaining band members pursued a raucous, less-cutting-edge sound, becoming known for the polished music of their hit 1982 album, Avalon.

Another Green World. Eno released this solo album in 1975, following two other successful solo albums: Taking Tiger Mountain (By Strategy) and Here Come the Warm Jets. Another Green World was a bridge between the experimental pop that came before it and the ambient music that followed. Nine of the fourteen songs were instrumental, and those that were not contained strange, unconventional lyrics. Though many found the album less accessible than Eno's prior work, critics and fans praised it. Fripp played guitar, and Eno mixed and distorted that sound with keyboards and complex rhythms.

Brian Eno. (Tobias Schwarz/Reuters/Landov)

Genesis member and future solo artist Phil Collins played drums on three tracks, and Velvet Underground cofounder Cale played viola. The textures of the sounds on Another Green World create a haunting, lovely album that is widely considered to be one of Eno's masterpieces.

My Life in the Bush of Ghosts. Eno's long-term collaboration with the Talking Heads, a new wave band made up of art students inspired by Roxy Music, began with their second album, 1978's More Songs About Buildings and Food. Eno produced two more albums for the Talking Heads, most notably Remain in Light in 1982. Later, however, his relationship with the band soured, although he remained friends with Talking Heads front man Byrne. In 1981 Byrne and Eno released My Life in the Bush of Ghosts, an album comprising recordings of radio broadcasts and other found recordings, sounds made with random objects such as frying pans and cardboard boxes, and complex African and South American rhythms that would later be termed world music beats. Solidly within Eno's oeuvre, the album was an early indication of the direction in which Byrne's solo career would proceed.

Apollo: Atmospheres and Soundtracks. This 1983 album is one of Eno's best-known ambient recordings. His younger brother, Roger Eno, and the producer, musician, and composer Daniel Lanois collaborated on the writing, production, and music. It was originally composed to accompany a filmed collage of footage from the U.S. Apollo space program called For All Mankind. However, the film was not released until 1990, when National Geographic issued one nonnarrative version with Eno's music and the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA) released another version, replacing the sound track with interviews and commentary. The music evokes both the Western frontier and the final frontier of space. Lanois's performance adds a flavor of country music to the recording, and the combination of acoustic and electronic sounds has a complex, mesmerizing quality. A seminal album of the genre, it may be considered a primer on ambient music.

Nerve Net. In 1992 Eno returned to a more rock-inflected sound with this album. Several guests, including Tom Petty and the Heartbreakers' drummer Benmont Tench, guitarist Robert Quine, and Led Zeppelin multi-instrumentalist John Paul Jones, contributed to the tracks. "My Squelchy Life," a song Eno had recorded earlier for a more pop-oriented album he never released, made it onto Nerve Net. The album received mixed reviews, but it was notable for foreshadowing the wave of techno rock that soon became popular.

Musical Legacy

A founder of ambient music and a pioneering electronic musician, Eno has recorded a large number of albums since the early 1970's, ranging from solo pop efforts, to ambient recordings, to collaborations with some of the most influential and respected artists in rock. His production work, or what his management company calls sound landscaping, is recognizable on the recordings of musicians as diverse as Jane Siberry and U2. Eno's creative drive led him to a variety of endeavors. He composed the six-second set of notes that accompanied the start-up of Microsoft's Windows 95 operating system. In the mid-1990's he collaborated with software engineers to create a computer program that would compose music; his software album Generative Music 1 was a product of it. His video artwork and installations have been displayed around the world, and his theories about creativity and the artistic process have reverberated not only with musicians but also with visual artists and writers.

Lacy Schutz

Further Reading

Bracewell, Michael. Re-make Re-model: Becoming Roxy Music. New York: Da Capo Press, 2008. Written with the cooperation of all the members of Roxy Music, this book examines the evolution of the band and the culture in which the band existed.

Dayal, Geeta. Brian Eno's Another Green World. London: Continuum, 2007. This slender volume is one of a series in which authors take an in-depth look at a particular album.

Eno, Brian. A Year with Swollen Appendices: The Diary of Brian Eno. London: Faber and Faber, 1996. This diary, written by Eno during 1995, traces his music and ideas, with a few details on his personal life.

Eno, Brian, Russell Mills, and Rick Poyner. More Dark than Shark. London: Faber and Faber, 1986. This book contains Eno's lyrics accompanied by Mills's visual interpretations, and the essays by Poyner examine the artistic process.

Prendergast, Mark, and Brian Eno. The Ambient Century: From Mahler to Trance, the Evolution of Sound in the Electronic Age. New York: Bloomsbury USA, 2001. This history of sound and electronic music from classical music through rock and roll includes a foreword by Eno.

Stump, Paul. Unknown Pleasures: A Cultural Biography of Roxy Music. New York: Thunder's Mouth Press, 1999. A music journalist examines the history of Roxy Music in the context of 1970's music and culture.

Tamm, Eric. Brian Eno: His Music and the Vertical Color of Sound. New York: Da Capo Press, 1995. A scholarly look at Eno, his music, and his influence.

Toop, David. Ocean of Sound: Aether Talk, Ambient Sound, and Imaginary Worlds. London: Serpent's Tail, 1995. This book offers a history of ambient music, from Javanese gamelan to Eno's creations.

See also: Bono; Bowie, David; Byrne, David; Cage, John; Collins, Phil; Gabriel, Peter; Petty, Tom; Reich, Steve; Satie, Erik; Simon, Paul.

Enya

Irish New Age and Celtic singer and songwriter

Enya's musical style seamlessly blends the emotional lyricism of New Age music with classical and Celtic folk forms.

Born: May 17, 1961; Gweedore, Donegal, Ireland
Also known as: Eithne Patricia Ní Bhraonáin (birth name); Eithne Brennan Member of: Clannad

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): The Celts, 1987; Enya, 1987; Watermark, 1988; Shepherd Moons, 1991; The Frog Prince, 1995; The Memory of Trees, 1995; A Day Without Rain, 2000; Amarantine, 2005; Sounds of the Season with Enya, 2006.

ALBUMS (with Clannad): Fuaim, 1982; Pretty Maid, 1982.

The Life

Eithne Patricia Ní Bhraonáin, known as Enya (EHN-yah), was born into a large musical family in County Donegal, Ireland. Her grandparents and father performed in Irish folk music bands, and her mother was a music teacher at an Irish-speaking school. After studying piano and classical music, Enya began her career in the early 1980's as a keyboardist and background vocalist in her family's popular Irish band, Clannad. Leaving the group after only two years to pursue a solo career, Enya participated in several minor projects before being commissioned to score a 1986 BBC documentary, The Celts.

Though the sound track for The Celts was released in 1987, Enya did not gain major attention until the release of Watermark in 1988. After that, her career and international reputation climbed, primarily through the release of several Grammy Award-winning solo albums and through the use of her music in television shows and films. In 1996 Enya moved into Manderley Castle in County Dublin, Ireland.

The Music

Enya's music is often categorized as New Age for its emotionally lyrical and ethereal quality. However, it also exhibits the characteristics of classical music and of traditional Celtic folk tunes, specifically the Irish sean nós (old style). Equally important is her signature method of combining multiple layers of recorded instruments (primarily keyboards) with those of her voice (both as soloist and as choir), a process that results in richly colored, lavish orchestrations and dense vocal textures. As a consequence of this process, live performances of her music are virtually impossible. This, coupled with her private nature, explains why Enya rarely appears in public as a performer.

Although considered a solo artist, Enya owes much of her success to longtime friends Nicky Ryan (producer) and his wife Roma Ryan (lyricist), the three having worked closely on nearly all aspects of Enya's career since her departure from Clannad. In particular, Roma Ryan's highly poetic and sometimes elusive lyrics—in such languages as English, Gaelic, Latin, Welsh, French, and Spanish, as well as those created by J. R. R. Tolkien and Ryan herself—play a significant role in Enya's music.

Early Works. Though written as the sound track to the BBC documentary The Celts, the self-titled Enya is generally regarded as the artist's first solo album. It includes such popular tracks as "The Celts," "I Want Tomorrow," and "Boadicea." The release of her second album, Watermark, brought Enya international fame. Featuring such hits as "Storms in Africa" and "Orinoco Flow," Watermark established the artist's successful formula of including both instrumental and vocal numbers on every album.

Enya. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Shepherd Moons. In addition to placing at the top of European and American music charts, Shepherd Moons won the Grammy Award for Best New Age Album. The influence of traditional Irish music is more prominent on Shepherd Moons than on Watermark, particularly on such tracks as "Ebudae" and "Smaointe. . . ." Notable are the songs "Caribbean Blue" and "Book of Days" and Enya's arrangements of the traditional hymn tune "How Can I Keep From Singing?" and the aria "Marble Halls" from the nineteenth century operetta The Bohemian Girl (1843) by Michael Balfe and Alfred Bunn. Shepherd Moons has guest musicians, including Steve Sidwell on cornet and Liam O'Flynn on uilleann pipes (Irish bagpipes).

The Memory of Trees and A Day Without Rain. Garnering Grammy Awards for Best New Age Album, these albums contained little new in terms of musical vocabulary, but they were immensely successful commercially. Both albums feature entirely original music, with The Memory of Trees including such popular tracks as "Anywhere Is," "Hope Has a Place," "Once You Had Gold," and "On My Way Home." The individual offerings on A Day Without Rain are overall not as noteworthy, the entire album instead creating a singular mood, with the exception of the hits "Wild Child" and "Only Time." The latter song became especially popular following the attacks in New York City and Washington, D.C., on September 11, 2001.

Amarantine. Amarantine, which won a Grammy Award for Best New Age Album in 2007, is derived from the Greek word amarantos, referring to a flower that never fades. Enya charts no new musical territory, this album being slightly more sedate than her previous releases. Notable, however, is the use of Japanese lyrics in the song "Sumiregusa (Wild Violet)" and lyrics in Loxian—a language invented by Roma Ryan—in such tracks as the upbeat "The River Sings." Amarantine is Enya's first album not to include any lyrics in her native Gaelic. All of the remaining songs are in English, including the title track and "It's in the Rain," and the album features the moody instrumental "Drifting."

Musical Legacy

Enya is often considered a popular Celtic musician, although her composing and singing style is closer to New Age music. Working slowly, she meticulously crafts each of her compositions to be immediately appealing and emotionally satisfying, even after repeated hearings. She has garnered numerous honors, not only for her solo albums but also for such projects as her Academy Award-nominated song "May It Be," written for director Peter Jackson's motion picture The Lord of the Rings: The Fellowship of the Ring (2001). Though rarely appearing in public as a performer, and despite her somewhat static development as a composer, Enya has attracted a large, loyal fan base, and she has built an outstanding international reputation.

Frederick Key Smith

Further Reading

Duffy, Tom. "Ireland's Enya Strikes a Universal Chord." Billboard (July 23, 1994): 11-12. The article discusses the success of Enya's album Shepherd Moons.

Forbes, Michelle. "Enya at Ease." World of Hibernia 6, no. 3 (2000): 74. This interview with Enya, which takes place in her castle, covers her career and her music.

Ritchie, Fiona. The NPR Curious Listener's Guide to Celtic Music. New York: Berkley, 2004. This guide provides a general overview of the artist's musical career.

Wallis, Geoff, and Sue Wilson. The Rough Guide to Irish Music. London: Rough Guides, 2001. A brief biography and other references to Enya.

White, Timothy. "Enya: 'Memory,' Myth and Melody (Music to My Ears)." Billboard (November 25, 1995): 5. Though focused on her album The Memory of Trees, the article provides insight into the connection between Enya's music and her Celtic heritage.

See also: Kitarō; Vangelis; Yanni.

Melissa Etheridge

American rock and country singer, songwriter, and guitarist

Etheridge is a rock singer-songwriter known for her raspy renditions of songs with soul-baring, passionate lyrics.

Born: May 29, 1961; Leavenworth, Kansas
Also known as: Melissa Lou Etheridge (full name); Missy Etheridge

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Melissa Etheridge, 1988; Brave and Crazy, 1989; Never Enough, 1992; Yes I Am, 1993; Your Little Secret, 1995; Breakdown, 1999; Skin, 2001; Lucky, 2004; The Awakening, 2007; Greatest Hits: The Road Less Traveled, 2007.

The Life

Melissa Lou Etheridge (ETH-rihj) was born to schoolteacher John Etheridge and his wife Elizabeth in Leavenworth, Kansas, in 1961. She describes her family as supportive but not warm or loving. As a teenager, she performed with various cover bands in Kansas, often in bars, chaperoned by her father. After high school she enrolled at Berklee College of Music in Boston, but she soon returned home to earn enough money to move to Los Angeles. She headed to Southern California in 1982, and over the next several years she developed a following by playing at women's bars. Longtime manager Bill Leopold discovered Etheridge at Vermie's bar in Pasadena, and after Island Records owner Chris Blackwell heard her sing at Que Sera in Long Beach, Etheridge signed a contract with the label.

Etheridge publicly came out as a lesbian at the Triangle Ball following President Bill Clinton's inauguration in 1993. Her public announcement brought her relationship with longtime partner Julie Cypher to the forefront. The pair met in 1988, when Cypher was the assistant director for Etheridge's first music video and still married to actor Lou Diamond Phillips. Cypher and Etheridge split in 2000, but they had two children (daughter Bailey, born in 1997, and son Beckett, born in 1998), fathered by singer David Crosby through artificial insemination. In 2001 Etheridge became romantically involved with actress Tammy Lynn Michaels, who gave birth to twins in 2006 (son Miller Steven and daughter Johnnie Rose), fathered by an anonymous sperm donor through artificial insemination. In October, 2004, Etheridge was diagnosed with breast cancer, which she successfully battled with chemotherapy, and she began performing again in 2005.

The Music

Etheridge's personal life is tied inextricably to her music, which has often—but not always—worked to her benefit. From an early age she used music as an emotional outlet from her stifled family life, retreating to the basement to write songs. As Etheridge says in her autobiography, "a string of nonmonogamous relationships" led to a "bunch of really good songs." Etheridge's first five albums—

Melissa Etheridge, Brave and Crazy, Never Enough, Yes I Am, and Your Little Secret—went platinum or multiplatinum. Her later albums—Breakdown, Skin, and Lucky—never reached that success. She came back, however, to win the Academy Award for Best Original Song in 2007 for the rock anthem "I Need to Wake Up," written for Al Gore's documentary about global warming, An Inconvenient Truth (2006). The Oscar-winning song is included on a 2007 rerelease of Etheridge's 2005 album Greatest Hits: The Road Less Traveled. Later, The Awakening, recorded after her recovery from breast cancer, showed Etheridge at a creative peak, exploring life from a new, hard-won perspective. Although The Awakening is a more relaxed, mature effort than her earlier work, she delivers it with her trademark passion, conviction, and humor.

Melissa Etheridge. Etheridge's self-titled debut album featured the singles "Like the Way I Do," "Similar Features," and the Grammy Award-nominated hit "Bring Me Some Water." The last song centers on an infectious, bluesy guitar riff, with Etheridge singing that she is "burning alive" with jealousy. Although the Grammy Award went to Tina Turner, Etheridge's live performance at the awards show led to a huge increase in her visibility and her record sales, and her follow-up album, Brave and Crazy, was also well received.

Never Enough. The cover photograph for Etheridge's 1992 album Never Enough featured the singer topless with her back to the camera, receiving almost as much attention as the music. The album incorporated some dance music, and in general it was more tightly produced than its somewhat raw predecessors. The techno sound of "2001" and the mellow pop of "Dance Without Sleeping" offer glimpses of these new sounds, and Etheridge won her first Grammy Award for "Ain't It Heavy," an empowering, guitar-driven rock anthem more true to her roots.

Yes I Am. Although the title track to Etheridge's wildly popular 1993 album is not specifically about her sexuality, the bold statement became synonymous with her coming out as a lesbian earlier that year. The album featured songs that became huge hits: "If I Wanted To," "I'm the Only One," and "Come to My Window," the last of which earned a Grammy Award and catapulted her into superstardom. "Come to My Window" is a haunting rock ballad about a woman desperately trying to reach her lover. Although Etheridge's autobiography indicates that the song relates to a difficult time in her relationship with Cypher, the universal theme mirrors many listeners' experiences. Etheridge's follow-up album, Your Little Secret, was also a hit, but Yes I Am stood as a definitive statement.

Musical Legacy

While rarely described as musically innovative, Etheridge made music that exemplifies her rock-and-roll roots, and she remained committed to it in the face of divergent popular trends. Her willingness to bare her soul and share her personal journey makes her compelling to her fans. In addition to her music, Etheridge supports many causes—human rights and environmental issues in particular—making her an important role model.

Gretchen Rowe Clements

Further Reading

Dunn, Jancee. "Melissa Etheridge Takes the Long Hard Road from the Heartland to Hollywood." Rolling Stone 709 (1995): 38-45. This article describes Etheridge's rise to stardom, with details on her music and her personal life.

_____. "Melissa's Secret." Rolling Stone 833 (2002): 40-45. This attention-getting article reveals singer Crosby to be the father of Etheridge and Cypher's child, and it explores the relationships involved.

Etheridge, Melissa, with Laura Morton. The Truth Is . . .: My Life in Love and Music. New York: Random House, 2001. This is Etheridge's refreshingly candid and modest account of the events that shaped her life and her music. Includes numerous family and personal photographs.

Luck, Joyce. Melissa Etheridge: Our Little Secret. Toronto, Ont.: ECW Press, 1997. This unauthorized but carefully researched biography chronicles Etheridge's rise to stardom. Includes bibliography and discography.

Udovitch, Mim. "How Do You Mend a Broken Heart?" Rolling Stone 872 (2001): 62-64. This interview discusses Etheridge's autobiography, her personal life, her latest album, and the music industry.

See also: Crosby, David; Lang, K. D.

Bill Evans

American jazz pianist and composer

A major contributor to the development of modern jazz, Evans is noted for his harmonic inventions in the context of jazz piano. He recorded more than fifty albums as a leader and received five Grammy Awards.

Born: August 16, 1929; Plainfield, New Jersey
Died: September 15, 1980; New York, New York
Also known as: William John Evans (full name)
Member of: The Bill Evans Trio

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: New Jazz Conceptions, 1956; Everybody Digs Bill Evans, 1958; Kind of Blue, 1959 (with Miles Davis and others); On Green Dolphin Street, 1959; Portrait in Jazz, 1959 (with the Bill Evans Trio); Explorations, 1961; Sunday at the Village Vanguard, 1961; The Village Vanguard Sessions, 1961; Waltz for Debby, 1961; Empathy, 1962; How My Heart Sings!, 1962; Interplay, 1962; Loose Blues, 1962; Moon Beams, 1962; At Shelly's Manne-Hole, 1963 (with the Bill Evans Trio); Conversations with Myself, 1963; The Solo Sessions, Vol. 1, 1963; The Solo Sessions, Vol. 2, 1963; Time Remembered, 1963; Undercurrent, 1963 (with Jim Hall); Trio '64, 1964; Bill Evans Trio with Symphony Orchestra, 1965; Trio '65, 1965; Bill Evans at Town Hall, 1966; Intermodulation, 1966 (with Hall); A Simple Matter of Conviction, 1966; California, Here I Come, 1967; Further Conversations with Myself, 1967; Alone, 1968; What's New, 1969; From Left to Right, 1970; Quiet Now, 1970; The Bill Evans Album, 1971; Living Time, 1972; Serenity, 1972; Eloquence, 1973; My Foolish Heart, 1973; Blue in Green, 1974; But Beautiful, 1974; Intuition, 1974; Re: Person I Knew, 1974; Since We Met, 1974; Symbiosis, 1974; Alone (Again), 1975; The Tony Bennett/Bill Evans Album, 1975; Quintessence, 1976; Cross-Currents, 1977; I Will Say Goodbye, 1977; You Must Believe in Spring, 1977; Affinity, 1978; New Conversations, 1978; We Will Meet Again, 1979; Turn Out the Stars: Final Village Vanguard Recordings, 1980; Alternative Man, 1987; The Last Waltz, 2000.

The Life

William John Evans was born to Harry and Mary Evans in the middle-class suburban setting of Plainfield, New Jersey. His musical interests began at the age of three while listening to his older brother Harry's piano lessons. Before he reached the age of seven, Evans had started lessons of his own, later recalling, "From the age of six to thirteen, I acquired the ability to sight-read and to play classical music."

By the time he attended North Plainfield High School, Evans had established an unrivaled thirst for the contemporary Western European repertoire, namely the works of Darius Milhaud, Claude Debussy, and Maurice Ravel. Around the same time, Evans was introduced to the big band recordings of Tommy Dorsey and Harry James. The freedom to improvise, as found in the jazz idiom, excited Evans; consequently, he turned his attention to performing in the technically complex piano style of boogie-woogie. His sight-reading skills led to his first professional performing opportunities. He began playing at weddings and dances while still in high school.

In September, 1946, Evans accepted a scholarship to Southeastern Louisiana University at Hammond, located fifty miles from the birthplace of jazz, New Orleans. In 1950 Evans graduated with bachelor's degrees in piano performance and music education and moved to New York City to pursue a performance career. One of his earliest experiences was with a trio led by guitarist Mundell Lowe, who subsequently brought Evans's playing to the attention of Orrin Keepnews of Riverside Records.

New Jazz Conceptions, Evans's first recording under his own name, was made on September 27, 1956. He was accompanied by Teddy Kotick on bass and Paul Motian on drums; this trio format of piano, bass, and drums would be one in which Evans would musically thrive. His later trios, especially with bassist Scott LaFaro and Motian, would ultimately transcend the prescribed role of merely keeping time to establish polyphonic, contrapuntal textures.

In April, 1958, Evans joined the sextet led by trumpeter Miles Davis. This experience provided great exposure for the young pianist and consequently augmented his professional viability. The following year, while still with Davis, Evans participated in the seminal recording of Davis's Kind of Blue, one of the best selling jazz albums of all time. Exhausted from the Davis association, Evans left the band to launch his career as a leader.

Evans found in LaFaro and Motian musical companions who subscribed to his conception of a three-way musical dialogue. In 1959 they began their exploration in earnest. Sadly, this kinship would be torn by the accidental death of LaFaro in July, 1961 (just days after their groundbreaking live recording at the Village Vanguard).

The remainder of the 1960's consisted of triumphs and struggles for Evans. He managed to reform his trio with a new bassist, continued to record and compose original compositions, won the critics' poll in Down Beat magazine for pianist of the year, toured the world, and sank into heroin addiction.

Bill Evans. (AP/Wide World Photos)

In the 1970's Evans secured a recording contract with Columbia Records and, later, Fantasy Records. He continued to tour and seemed to be in something of a musical revival, invigorated by his musical companionship with such artists as bassist Marc Johnson and drummer Joe La Barbera, along with his newest addiction, cocaine. In 1980 his health rapidly declined, and in September Evans passed away, his death hastened by an unattended bleeding ulcer and acute liver disease.

The Music

Perhaps one of Evans's greatest contributions to the tradition of jazz was his unique approach to the conventional trio of piano, bass, and drums: He encouraged his accompanists to maintain a musical dialogue rather than simply propel the rhythm. Understanding Evans's trios leads to a true appreciation of his musical contribution.

Portrait in Jazz. Evans's first trio consisted of himself, bassist LaFaro, and drummer Motian. In their first recording, Portrait in Jazz, Evans approached the piano in an uncharacteristically percussive fashion with florid melodic lines, complex harmonies, and a tense, swinging rhythm; LaFaro and Motian offset Evans's intensity with a combined pensiveness. This was most evident in the album's first track, "Come Rain or Come Shine." The record also featured two original compositions by Evans, "Blue in Green" (often wrongly attributed to Miles Davis) and "Peri's Scope," named after Evans's girlfriend Peri Cousins.

Sunday at the Village Vanguard. On June 25, 1961, the trio performed at the famed Village Vanguard and the material would be subsequently released as the album, Sunday at the Village Vanguard. This recording illustrated the trio's maturity and the increased freedom given to LaFaro. The performance, which opened with his composition "Gloria's Step," displayed the bassist's vast creativity and command of his instrument as he juxtaposed melodic lines with Evans. The intense interplay continued throughout the set and perhaps reached its apex on the George Gershwin tune "My Man's Gone Now." An additional album of material from the Vanguard performance would be released as Waltz for Debby.

After the death of LaFaro, Evans faced the challenge of replicating the spontaneous collaboration with a new trio. Although he would find a competent instrumentalist in bassist Chuck Israels, a true sense of cohesion was not secured until the connection with bassist Eddie Gomez. This association would last from 1966 through 1977.

Conversations with Myself. Among the most innovative of Evans's career, this album found the pianist employing the technical advances of multitrack recording. The repertory was typical Evans fare, including the jazz standard "Stella by Starlight" and the Thelonious Monk composition "'Round Midnight." The unconventional treatment of each tune was the ingenuity: Evans overdubbed himself three times, each take separated to a different channel—left, right, and center. This gave the pianist the opportunity to have a conversation with himself. His efforts were rewarded with a 1963 Grammy Award.

The Bill Evans Album. During the spring of 1971, Evans's second recording date under the Columbia Records label spawned The Bill Evans Album. Music mogul Clive Davis insisted that his jazz artists incorporate electric instruments into their playing, an attempt to make jazz more accessible and commercially viable. Although Evans would go on to suggest that the electric pianos, such as the Fender Rhodes, could never capture the nuance of an acoustic piano, the effort was not fruitless. The album went on to win two Grammy Awards and allowed Evans to experiment with the new timbres of the instrument. Additionally, Evans had the opportunity to augment his trio setting with string and woodwind sections.

The Tony Bennett/Bill Evans Album. It was a rare occasion when Evans broke from the comfortable environment of the trio. During the summer of 1975, he joined vocalist Tony Bennett for their first duet recording. This album illustrates the pianist's tremendous versatility in artistically supporting the vocalist while remaining true to his creative vision. The set consisted of the likely ballads "My Foolish Heart" and "But Beautiful," along with the midtempo tune "When in Rome." Evans's "Waltz for Debby," traditionally an instrumental, was performed by Bennett with lyrics by Gene Lees.

Turn Out the Stars. Evans's last appearances at the Village Vanguard in June, 1980, and his penultimate recording date resulted in Turn Out the Stars: Final Village Vanguard Recordings, with Evans accompanied by the members of his final trio, Johnson and La Barbera. This unrivaled cohesive unit articulated a barrage of moods and textures and was the most uniquely collaborative since the trio of Evans, LaFaro, and Motian. On the album, Evans exudes a youthfully powerful approach on uptempo tunes and his characteristically introspective playing on ballads such as "Polka Dots and Moonbeams."

The Last Waltz. Evans's final recordings were made from August 31 through September 7, 1980, just days before his death. Todd Barkan, the owner of Keystone Korner (the San Francisco jazz club that hosted Evans's last appearance), recorded on tape the weeklong engagement. Each set was a well-balanced collection of jazz standards and original Evans tunes. On many of the songs, there exists a sense of urgency—perhaps because of the pianist's comprehension of his physical deterioration. His left-hand passages are more florid and rhythmically complex than his earlier approach, yet he maintains a three-way dialogue with Johnson and La Barbera. The trio, acting as a single entity, displays great contrast during the slower jazz waltz "Gary's Theme."

Musical Legacy

Evans was one of the most influential jazz musicians of the post-bebop era. His exceptionally refined touch, advanced harmonic conception, and insistence on the equally expressive roles of his accompanists left an indelible mark on subsequent generations. Pianists such as Chick Corea, Herbie Hancock, Keith Jarrett, Fred Hersch, and Brad Mehldau exhibit the influence of Evans in their playing. Like many jazz artists before him, Evans succumbed to a horrific struggle with drug addiction—cutting short his life and robbing the public of brilliance yet to come.

Michael Conklin

Further Reading

Larson, Thomas. Fragmentation: The Piano Trio in History and Tradition of Jazz. Dubuque, Iowa: Kendall/Hunt, 2005. Larson's text on the history of jazz is a concise, well-organized, and well-researched effort. Includes photographs and listening examples.

Lees, Gene. Meet Me at Jim and Andy's. New York: Oxford University Press, 1988. An insightful look at the life and personality of Evans, as told by a close friend and collaborator.

Pettinger, Peter. Bill Evans: How My Heart Sings. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1998. Perhaps the most well-organized document on Evans's life, with a wonderfully diachronic approach to the development and ultimate demise of the jazz icon. Photographs, discography, and musical examples.

Porter, Lewis, and Michael Ullman."Bill Evans and Modern Jazz Piano." In Jazz, from Its Origins to the Present. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 1993. Porter, a leader in jazz scholarship and a jazz pianist, devotes a chapter to Evans and subsequent generations of modern jazz piano. Photographs, musical examples, and thorough musical analysis.

Reilly, Jack. The Harmony of Bill Evans. Milwaukee, Wis.: Hal Leonard, 1993. An in-depth analysis of Evans's piano style and compositional techniques by a jazz pianist.

Shadwick, Keith. Bill Evans: Everything Happens to Me—A Musical Biography. San Francisco: Backbeat Books, 2002. A detailed examination of one of jazz's great innovative forces. The book traces the musical life of Evans from his first trio in the 1950's to his tragic death in 1980. Photographs and selected discography.

See also: Bennett, Tony; Corea, Chick; Davis, Miles; Debussy, Claude; Getz, Stan; Hancock, Herbie; Jarrett, Keith; Legrand, Michel; Ligeti, György; McPartland, Marian; Powell, Bud; Ravel, Maurice.

Don and Phil Everly

American rock and country singers, songwriters, and guitarists

With their two-part harmony singing style and their open G-string guitar tuning, the Everly Brothers introduced Appalachian music, rockabilly, and blues into rock music.

Don Everly

Born: February 1, 1937; Brownie, Kentucky
Also known as: Isaac Donald Everly (full name)

Phil Everly

Born: January 19, 1939; Chicago, Illinois
Also known as: Phillip Everly (full name)
Members of: The Everly Brothers

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (as the Everly Brothers): The Everly Brothers, 1958; The Real Everly Brothers, 1958; Songs Our Daddy Taught Us, 1958; The Fabulous Style of the Everly Brothers, 1960; It's Everly Time, 1960; Rockin' with the Everly Brothers, 1960; Both Sides of an Evening, 1961; A Date with the Everly Brothers, 1961; Souvenir Sampler, 1961; Christmas with the Everly Brothers, 1962; Folk Songs of the Everly Brothers, 1962; Instant Party!, 1962; The Everly Brothers Sing Great Country Hits, 1963; Gone, Gone, Gone, 1964; Beat and Soul, 1965; Price of Love, 1965; Rock 'n' Soul, 1965; In Our Image, 1966; Two Yanks in England, 1966; The Everly Brothers Sing, 1967; The Hit Sound of the Everly Brothers, 1967; Roots, 1968; Chained to a Memory, 1970; Stories We Could Tell, 1972; Don't Worry Baby, 1973; Pass the Chicken and Listen, 1973; Everlys, 1975; The New Album: Previously Unreleased Songs from the Early Sixties, 1977; EB '84, 1984; All They Had to Do Was Dream, 1985; Home Again, 1985; Born Yesterday, 1986; Some Hearts, 1989; Thirty-one Unforgettable Memories, 1997; Christmas with the Everly Brothers and the Boys Town Choir, 2005; Give Me a Future, 2005; Too Good to Be True, 2005.

ALBUMS (Don, solo): Don Everly, 1970; Sunset Towers, 1974; Brother Juke Box, 1977.

ALBUMS (Phil, solo): Star Spangled Springer, 1973; Phil's Diner, 1974; Mystic Line, 1975; Living Alone, 1979; Phil Everly, 1983; Louise, 1987; A Portrait of Phil Everly, 1994.

The Lives

Isaac Donald and Phillip Everly (EH-vur-lee) were born into an accomplished and established musical family. Don, the older brother, was born in Kentucky on February 1, 1937; Phil was born in Chicago on January 19, 1939. Ike Everly, their father, and his brothers, Charles and Leonard, were singers and musicians who moved from the coal-mining community of Muhlenberg, Kentucky, to Chicago in order to make a living as a country-blues group. Although they were successful, Ike decided he did not want to raise his sons in Chicago, and so in 1944 he moved his family to rural Iowa.

In Iowa, Ike hosted a live radio show that featured Little Donnie, age eight, and Baby Boy Phil, age six, singing and playing guitar. Many famous musicians played on the show, and the boys sang and performed with them live. They became the special favorites of Chet Atkins, already a major figure of the Nashville music community. He was instrumental in getting them established in Nashville, and he arranged their Grand Ole Opry debut in 1954.

In 1954 Don got his first break as a songwriter, with "Thou Shalt Not Steal," recorded by Kitty Wells. In 1955 Don and Phil signed their first recording contract, but they had little success until 1957, when they signed with Cadence Records. Again, Atkins proved indispensable to their career, by insisting that Cadence allow the brothers to record a demo, despite the failure of their first album. From 1957 until 1961, the Everly Brothers could be heard on pop, country, and rock-and-roll radio stations, turning out multiple million-selling hits for Cadence Records.

In 1961 the brothers split from their longtime manager, Wesley Rose, and Cadence Records, and this started a decade-long slump during which their five-year history of producing Top 20 hits ended. They joined the U.S. Marines for a year, and when they were discharged in 1962, they found their music no longer relevant because of the rising influence of the folk revival and the coming British Invasion, when rock-and-roll and pop performers from England, among them the Beatles, gained popularity in the United States.

In 1966 the Everlys went to England, where they had always enjoyed success, and they recorded an album featuring the Hollies as back-up, with Jimmy Page and John Paul Jones, soon to form Led Zeppelin, appearing as studio musicians.

The Everlys' last album of new material appeared in 1973. During the tour to promote this album, long-simmering tensions boiled over, and during a concert Phil smashed his guitar and stormed off the stage, leaving Don to finish solo. Because of Don's drug addiction and alcoholism, and their unresolved feud, they stopped performing together until 1983. The Reunion Concert at the Royal Albert Hall, a great success, was made into an HBO film special. In 1984 they were back on the charts, singing a song written by Paul McCartney.

The Everlys perform occasionally, and Don continues to write music. They try to appear at the annual Muhlenberg Agricultural Fair. Phil started the Everly Music Company, designing and producing quality guitar and banjo strings. They appear as guests on many country and rock albums, notably singing back up for Paul Simon's Graceland (1986). In 2005 they had a successful tour in England.

The Music

The Everlys grew up singing gospel, country, and Appalachian folk music along with their father and his brothers. The Everly Brothers became famous for their beautiful harmonies, with Don singing lead and Phil taking high harmony. Don began writing music, selling songs as a teenager to famous Nashville singers such as Patsy Cline, but the brothers got their big break with "Bye Bye Love," written by Felice and Boudleaux Bryant. They continued to record the Bryants' songs as well as write their own. For five years they dominated the charts. In the mid-1960's, as they were losing favor in America because of the British Invasion, they continued to chart in England, and they produced some of their most sophisticated work, such as "Gone, Gone, Gone" and "The Price of Love." Their songs are characterized by perfect harmonies, country roots-inspired guitar playing, and intricate chord patterns, all of which helped bridge the gap between country and pop and led the way for rock and roll.

"Bye Bye Love." This was the Everly Brothers' first hit. The song, written by the Bryants, was turned down by thirty singers before the Everlys decided to record it. Atkins worked a deal with Cadence Records owner Archie Bleyer, who allowed the brothers to record "Bye Bye Love" as an audition demo. An expert at open G-string tuning, Don composed a six-second guitar introduction, and the song became a legend. It became the signature format for the Everly Brothers: guitar introduction by Don; two-part harmonies, with Phil taking the high parts; and solos in the middle taken by Don. "Bye Bye Love" was their first million seller.

Don (right) and Phil Everly. (AP/Wide World Photos)

"Wake Up, Little Susie." This follow-up to "Bye Bye Love," also by the Bryants, was the Everly Brothers' second million seller. The harmonies combined close-third intervals with country-inspired fifths and sixths, making the song more musically sophisticated than "Bye Bye Love." It was a hit on several charts, and its focus on teenage problems made it an undeniable success with young listeners. Although banned in Boston for suggestive lyrics, the song was a number-one hit in America and overseas.

Songs Our Daddy Taught Us. This album, rereleased many times since 1958, featured the Everlys singing traditional country and Appalachian music, playing a stand-up bass and an acoustic guitar. It was a departure from the teen-angst pop songs that had made them famous and a return to their roots. Rolling Stone awarded it four out of five stars for its faithful interpretation of important roots music.

"Let It Be Me." This was the Everlys' first non-Nashville recording. Don had heard the melody of this French song played by Atkins, and the brothers recorded this version with English lyrics in 1960. This was one of the first pop songs to use a string section, and it was the final record produced before their break with Rose-Acuff music. "Let It Be Me" proved to be one of their most enduring hits.

"Cathy's Clown." The split from Rose-Acuff music meant that the Everlys could no longer record songs by the Bryants, who had written almost all of their hits. "Cathy's Clown," written by Don with help from Phil, was the first single produced while under contract with Warner Bros. It included a sixth level of harmony, Phil's new addition to the Everly Brothers' style. It was the biggest single of their career.

All They Had to Do Was Dream. All the tracks on this album are alternate versions of songs recorded between 1957 and 1960 for Cadence Records. This is an interesting album because it comprised all the songs that became big hits for the Everlys, but with different arrangements.

Later Music. The Everlys have recorded almost thirty albums, none of which was a big seller in America despite receiving good reviews and containing both originals and covers. Rock 'n' Soul and Gone, Gone, Gone were both popular in England. Two Yanks in England and In Our Image also did very well in England, and they featured British musicians such as the Hollies and Page. These were not nostalgic or old fashioned; they were sophisticated and imbued with rock sensibilities. Nevertheless, they did not promote the duo's image back in the United States. Pass the Chicken and Listen was the last album of new material for a decade. After their feud and reunion, the Everlys produced three albums containing new material: EB '84, Born Yesterday, and Some Hearts. Too Good to Be True and Give Me a Future contain previously unreleased songs from their early career in the 1950's and 1960's.

Musical Legacy

The Everlys' primary contribution to rock and roll is their country-music style harmony singing. Rock singers coming after the Everlys owe them a debt of gratitude. John Lennon and Paul McCartney once billed themselves as the Foreverly Brothers. Listed at number thirty-three in Rolling Stone's Top Immortals of All Time, the Everlys were called the greatest rock duo of all time. Their singing has influenced and has been openly acknowledged as influential by Paul Simon and Art Garfunkel, Dave Edmonds, Gram Parsons, Linda Ronstadt, and others. This influence can be heard in many American groups, such as the Flying Burrito Brothers, the Byrds, Buffalo Springfield, Poco, and the Eagles, as well as in British groups such as the Hollies, Nick Lowe, the Buckinghams, and the Bee Gees.

Equally important is Don's impact on rock guitar playing. The introduction to "Bye Bye Love," played using open G-string tuning, changed the way rock and roll sounded. Although played on an acoustic guitar, the large-bodied Gibson created a powerful sound and became the foundation for rock power chords. Keith Richards of the Rolling Stones credits Don Everly with creating the rock guitar sound, and Richards, as do most rock guitarists, uses the same tuning for many of his songs.

As testament to their lasting influence on rock and roll, the Everly Brothers received a Lifetime Achievement Award from the Recording Academy, and they were inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame; the Country Music Hall of Fame; the Nashville Songwriters Hall of Fame; the Iowa Rock 'n' Roll Music Association's Hall of Fame; and the Vocal Group Hall of Fame.

Leslie Neilan

Further Reading

Hosum, John. Legends: The Everly Brothers, the History of the Everly Brothers on Record, an Illustrated Discography. Seattle, Wash.: Foreverly Music, 1985. This provides stories about the Cadence Records years, but very little about any of their other recording history.

Karpp, Phyllis. Ike's Boys: The Story of the Everly Brothers. Ann Arbor, Mich.: Popular Culture Ink, 1990. This book provides a history of the Everly family and the brothers' early years.

Kosser, Michael. How Nashville Became Music City, U.S.A.: Fifty Years of Music Row. Milwaukee, Wis.: Hal Leonard, 2006. This book contains a chapter devoted to the collaboration between the Everly Brothers and the Bryants.

Rachlis, Kit. "The Everly Brothers." In The Rolling Stone Illustrated History of Rock and Roll, edited by Anthony DeCurtis and James Henke. New York: Random House, 1992. This rock-and-roll history has a chapter devoted to the Everly Brothers and their influence on pop music.

White, Roger. The Everly Brothers: Walk Right Back. 2d ed. London: Plexus, 1998. This is a revised version of a 1984 book, providing updated information on the Everly Brothers. It includes interviews, photographs, and commentary on their lives and music.

See also: Atkins, Chet; Garfunkel, Art; Lennon, John; McCartney, Sir Paul; Page, Jimmy; Richards, Keith; Simon, Paul; Travis, Merle.

F

Sammy Fain

American singer, songwriter, lyricist, and film-score composer

In a polished Tin Pan Alley style, Fain wrote sentimental, funny, and whimsical songs that enchanted listeners and influenced composers and songwriters for the stage and the screen.

Born: June 17, 1902; New York, New York
Died: December 6, 1989; Los Angeles, California
Also known as: Samuel Feinberg (birth name)

Principal works

FILM SCORES: Roadhouse Nights, 1930; Young Man of Manhattan, 1930; Moonlight and Pretzels, 1933; The Road Is Open Again, 1933; Harold Teen, 1934; Goin' to Town, 1935; Tarnished Angel, 1938; Hellzapoppin', 1941; Three Sailors and a Girl, 1953; April Love, 1957; A Certain Smile, 1958; Calamity Jane, 1963; Half a House, 1979; Halloween Treat, 1982.

MUSICAL THEATER (music and lyrics unless listed otherwise): Everybody's Welcome, 1931 (lyrics by Irving Kahal; libretto by Lambert Carroll); Hellzapoppin, 1938 (with Charles Tobias; libretto by Chic Johnson and John Olsen); George White's Scandals, 1939 (lyrics by Jack Yellen; libretto by Matt Brooks, Eddie Davis, and George White); Boys and Girls Together, 1940 (lyrics by Yellen and Kahal; libretto by Ed Wynn and Pat C. Flick); Sons o' Fun, 1941 (with Yellen; libretto by Johnson, Olsen, and Hal Block); Toplitzky of Notre Dame, 1946 (lyrics and libretto by George Marion, Jr.); Flahooley, 1951 (lyrics by E. Y. Harburg; libretto by Harburg and Fred Saidy); Ankles Aweigh, 1955 (lyrics by Dan Shapiro; libretto by Guy Bolton and Davis); Catch a Star, 1955 (with Philip Charig; lyrics by Paul Francis Webster and Ray Golden; libretto by Danny Simon and Neil Simon); Christine, 1960 (lyrics by Webster; libretto by Pearl S. Buck and Charles K. Peck, Jr.; based on the novel My Indian Family by Hilda Wernher); Around the World in Eighty Days, 1962 (lyrics by Harold Adamson); Something More!, 1964 (lyrics by Marilyn Bergman and Alan Bergman; libretto by Nate Monaster; based on the novel Portofino P T.A. by Gerald Green).

Principal recordings

SINGLES: "Nobody Knows What a Red Head Mama Can Do," 1924; "Let a Smile Be Your Umbrella," 1927; "You Brought Me a New Kind of Love," 1930; "When I Take My Sugar to Tea," 1931; "By a Waterfall," 1933; "That Old Feeling," 1937; "I Can Dream, Can't I?," 1938; "I'll Be Seeing You," 1938; "I'm Late," 1951; "Second Star to the Right," 1953; "Secret Love," 1953; "Love Is a Many Splendored Thing," 1955; "April Love," 1957; "Black Hills of Dakota," 1958; "The Deadwood Stage," 1958; "Mardi Gras," 1958; "A Very Precious Love," 1958; "Once Upon a Dream," 1959; "Tender Is the Night," 1961; "Strange Are the Ways of Love," 1972; "A World That Never Was," 1976; "Someone's Waiting for You," 1977.

The Life

Samuel Feinberg, who took the professional name Sammy Fain (fayn), grew up in the Catskill Mountains of New York surrounded by music: His father was a cantor, and his brother was a violinist. His cousins Willie and Eugene Howard became a famous musical-comedy team, working in vaudeville. Fain believed this musical environment contributed to his writing style, which he described as a process of "writing with a tear." Fain taught himself to play piano and to write music. By the time he went to high school, he had written two songs, "When the Boys Come Marching Home" and "Bound for the Bronx." These songs did not catch the attention of the Tin Pan Alley publishers, but by the time Fain finished high school, he was working in the stockroom at an esteemed New York publishing company, Shapiro-Bernstein. When the boss,

Louis Bernstein, heard Fain play piano, he immediately moved Fain to work in the music department. Fain's job was to present new songs to the artists and the vaudeville musicians. During this time Fain meet Artie Dunn, with whom he formed a singing duo that became popular in vaudeville and on radio.

In 1925 Fain left the duo to devote himself completely to composing. Two years later he started a partnership with lyricist Irving Kahal, which lasted for seventeen years, until Kahal's death. After the success Fain and Kahal had with the song "By a Waterfall" (for the 1933 film Footlight Parade), Warner Bros. immediately signed them to a contract, and they continued writing for Hollywood motion pictures until 1938. When the film studios stopped making musical extravaganzas, Fain went back to New York City, and from 1938 through 1941 he wrote six Broadway musicals. Two major hits—"I'll Be Seeing You" and "I Can Dream Can't I?"—were featured in Right This Way (1938). The musical was unsuccessful, but "I'll Be Seeing You" became a theme for a film with the same title in 1943. At the invitation of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, Fain went back to Hollywood, and from that point on his music was featured in films released by almost every motion-picture studio.

Fain was elected to the Songwriters Hall of Fame in 1972. In 1989 he was honored by the American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers (ASCAP) on its seventy-fifth anniversary; he had been a member since 1926. Fain died of a heart attack in Los Angeles at the end of 1989.

The Music

Fain's first hit was a tune called "Nobody Knows What a Red Head Mama Can Do," with lyrics by Irving Mills and Al Dubin. Once Fain started working with Kahal, they almost immediately had a hit with a song "Let a Smile Be Your Umbrella." Introduced by Maurice Chevalier in The Big Pond (1930), a romantic comedy by Paramount Pictures, Fain's next big hit was "You Brought Me a New Kind of Love." While he worked in Hollywood, Fain wrote "That Old Feeling" (for the film Vogues of 1938). The song was written in collaboration with Lew Brown, and it was nominated for an Academy Award for Best Song.

For "Secret Love" (from the film Calamity Jane, 1953), Fain received a second nomination for Best Song, and this time he and Paul Francis Webster took home the Oscar. They received another Academy Award for "Love Is a Many Splendored Thing." "April Love" was nominated in 1957, and in 1958 there were nominations for "A Very Precious Love" (from the film Marjorie Morningstar) and the title song from A Certain Smile. The nominations continued for "Tender Is the Night," "Strange Are the Ways of Love," "A World That Never Was," and "Someone's Waiting for You." Between these films Fain wrote another show with lyricist Harold Adamson, Around the World in Eighty Days, which debuted in St. Louis in 1962, and it was performed at Jones Beach in 1964 during the World's Fair.

Hellzapoppin'. Hellzapoppin' was a show by Fain and lyricist Charlie Tobias, a Broadway vaudeville extravaganza that ran for 1,404 performances. Despite the negative reviews from critics, it was the longest-running show at that time.

"Let a Smile Be Your Umbrella." This typical Tin Pan Alley song—joyful, with an uplifting text—is composed of a simple melody accompanied by the main harmonies, tonic, subdominant, and dominant. The melody is built from a broken arpeggio, and the verse is divided in two eight-measure phrases. The form of the chorus is a (sixteen bars), b (eight bars), a′ (eight bars). The a section opens on a tonic harmony, and the melody revolves around the tonic chord, ending the phrase on a dominant. The next eight measures are a sequence and lead into the middle section, b, which is based on dominant chords (D7 and G7) and presents a rhythmic variation of the a section. The last section, a′, repeats the first eight measures with a small melodic variation at the end.

Sammy Fain. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

"I'll Be Seeing You." This song was introduced in the show Right This Way (1938), which closed after fourteen performances. In the second measure of the verse there is a harmonic shift from E-flat major (the key of the piece) to E major, which provides instability. In the refrain melody (abac; each section has eight measures) the third and fourth measures are repeated and the downbeat of the phrase switches. Fain used syncopation and dotted rhythms throughout the song, giving it a complex texture. During World War II this song became a nostalgic favorite, and it remains one of the most emotionally moving songs ever written.

Musical Legacy

Jule Styne described Fain as one of the great popular songwriters, one who helped Tin Pan Alley flourish at its highest level. Fain's music shows a development from a simple tune to a picturesque song complex enough to be labeled a short character piece. Every song provides different contours and shapes in the melody and in the advanced harmonies. Through this writing style, which went beyond the simplicity of Tin Pan Alley, Fain influenced the generations of songwriters and film composers that followed.

Daniela Candillari

Further Reading

Furia, Philip, and Michael Lasser. America's Songs. The Stories Behind the Songs of Broadway, Hollywood, and Tin Pan Alley. New York: Routledge, 2006. Chronologically ordered and spanning the years 1910 to 1977, this book presents the songs and their stories, covering Fain's major hits.

Green, Stanley. Broadway Musicals, Show by Show. Milwaukee, Wis.: Hal Leonard, 1985. Fain's works are represented in this book, which gives a short performance history. The musicals are set chronologically, from 1866 to 1985.

Hischak, Thomas S. The Tin Pan Alley Song Encyclopedia. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2002. The author discusses important songs from the pre-Civil War years to the end of the 1950's, covering major songwriters (among them Fain), performers, musical styles, and time periods.

Jasen, David A. Tin Pan Alley. An Encyclopedia of the Golden Age of American Song. New York: Routledge, 2003. The author discusses the history of Tin Pan Alley, and he includes short biographies of the main composers of the style and their biggest successes, with an entry on Fain.

See also: Bergman, Alan; Cahn, Sammy; Chevalier, Maurice; Styne, Jule.

Morton Feldman

American classical composer

Part of the New York School, a circle of composers associated with John Cage, Feldman was a pioneer in indeterminism and graphic notation. His music is known for its static quality and soft dynamics.

Born: January 12, 1926; New York, New York
Died: September 3, 1987; Buffalo, New York

Principal works

CHAMBER WORKS: The Straits of Magellan, 1961; The King of Denmark, 1964; The Viola in My Life, 1970; Madame Press Died Last Week at Ninety, 1971; The Viola in My Life 4, 1971; For Frank O'Hara, 1973; Routine Investigations, 1976; Ixion, 1977; Why Patterns?, 1978; String Quartet, 1980; String Quartet 2, 1983; For Philip Guston, 1984.

CHORAL WORKS: Rothko Chapel, 1972.

ORCHESTRAL WORKS: Intersection, 1953; Atlantis, 1960.

PIANO WORKS: Extensions 3, 1952; Extensions 4, 1954; Vertical Thoughts, 1963; Vertical Thoughts 4, 1964; Triadic Memories, 1981; Palais de Mari, 1986.

The Life

Morton Feldman was born in 1926 in New York City. At the age of twelve, he began piano lessons with Vera Maurina Press, a student of Ferruccio Busoni. While in high school, Feldman studied composition with Wallingford Riegger, and later he became a student of Stefan Wolpe.

Meeting the composer John Cage in 1950 was a turning point for Feldman. Cage had little direct influence on Feldman's music, but his openness to new ideas gave Feldman the confidence to pursue an iconoclastic path. Cage also introduced Feldman to other musicians and artists. Meeting a group of Abstract Expressionist artists that included Jackson Pollock, Mark Rothko, and Philip Guston was especially important to Feldman. He was fascinated by their art and by their ways of working. While many composers were occupied with such compositional systems as serialism, Feldman, like the painters he had met, relied on intuition; he worked deliberately, letting the music come to him sound by sound.

Feldman worked in his family's clothing business until he was forty-four. In 1974 he accepted the Edgard Varèse professorship at the State University of New York at Buffalo, becoming a dynamic and unorthodox teacher. He developed an interest in Turkish rugs, which influenced and inspired his later music, just as painting had earlier. Feldman died of pancreatic cancer in 1987.

The Music

Although Feldman's music evolved throughout his career, the unique aspects of his compositional style remained remarkably consistent. His music is abstract with little sense of a narrative or dramatic structure. Extended melodies are rare; his thought was predominantly harmonic. He favored dissonant chords, but the bite of the dissonances is moderated by his use of extremely soft dynamics. His music tends to move slowly and deliberately, dwelling on the sensuality of pure sound.

The King of Denmark. The King of Denmark for a solo percussionist uses graphic notation. The score consists of three rows of boxes, specifying high, middle-range, and low sounds, and each column is a unit of time. Numbers in the boxes specify how many sounds are to be played, but the precise patterns are left to the performer's discretion. All sounds are to be extremely soft and equal in volume. To this end, the instruments (drums, cymbals, bell gongs, vibraphone) are played only with the fingers. This is exceedingly delicate music, as barely audible sounds emerge from silence and then return.

Rothko Chapel. The Rothko Chapel in Houston, Texas, is a nonsectarian chapel designed by Rothko. Fourteen Rothko paintings surround the octagonal space. When Rothko committed suicide in 1970, Feldman was commissioned to write a piece in his memory. This is one of Feldman's most well-known and emotionally expressive works.

Rothko Chapel is scored for viola, percussion, celesta, vocal soloists, and chorus. At one point, the chorus softly sustains slowly changing chords for three full minutes. Time seems to stand still, perhaps reflecting the sense of immobility represented in Rothko's large canvases. Near the end, Feldman uncharacteristically uses an expressive tonal melody. The melody, which he had written when he was fifteen, is reminiscent of music he heard in synagogue.

Why Patterns? Scored for the unusual combination of flute, glockenspiel, and piano, Why Patterns? reflects Feldman's interest in handmade Turkish rugs. He was fascinated by the intricate woven patterns and the subtle changes of color in the dyed yarn. Why Patterns? is a musical analogue to the patterns of the rugs. The individual parts are notated with exactitude, but they do not coordinate precisely, so that the instruments seem to proceed independently of one another. A quiet and slowly unfolding piece, it creates a calm, mesmerizing atmosphere as disparate melodic patterns undergo subtle variation as they are woven together.

Palais de Mari. Some of Feldman's late works are exceedingly long. (String Quartet 2 lasts more than five hours.) Palais de Mari, one of Feldman's final works, is similar in concept to the lengthy works, but it is compressed into a shorter span of time. The piano work lasts about twenty minutes. Palais de Mari is soft and slow moving, with pauses of varying lengths. The sustaining pedal is kept down nearly throughout, causing the notes of one gesture to blur into the next (reminiscent of the way Rothko's rectangles bleed into the background color rather than have a sharp edge). Feldman dwells on the opening four-note motive throughout. Other ideas displace it temporarily, but the undulating motive continually returns, varied and presented in different contexts. This is intimate music addressed to the inner self.

Musical Legacy

In an age when compositional experimentalism often resulted in chaotic and unstructured music, Feldman pursued his singular vision with great effort and discipline, drawing as much inspiration from visual artists as from other musicians. Although stunningly original, Feldman's music challenges his audience to learn to listen in new ways. Most works have a dramatic structure, with one event leading to another; Feldman's music, in contrast, is fragmentary and static. For some, it is simply boring; others find that the slow, quiet music encourages them to listen more closely and with greater awareness of the pure sensuousness of the sounds. For these listeners, Feldman's music possesses unique and extraordinary beauty.

Brian G. Campbell

Further Reading

DeLio, Thomas, ed. The Music of Morton Feldman. New York: Excelsior, 1996. This collection of essays includes a discussion of Feldman's aesthetic, musical analyses, and three essays by Feldman. The music analyses require an understanding of music theory, but the other essays are approachable by the general reader.

Feldman, Morton. Give My Regards to Eighth Street: Collected Writings of Morton Feldman. Edited by B. H. Friedman. Cambridge, Mass.: Exact Change, 2000. Feldman writes about his music, his artistic ideas, his career, and many of the musicians and artists he knew.

_____. Morton Feldman Says: Selected Interviews and Lectures, 1964-1987. Edited by Chris Villars. London: Hyphen Press, 2006. Interviews and lectures, most of which have been previously published in various journals, are brought together under a single cover. Includes examples of pages from Feldman's scores and a chronological outline of his life.

Gann, Kyle. "Painter Envy: Morton Feldman Ascends His Pedestal as Softly as Possible." The Village Voice (July, 23, 1996). A short but substantive summary of and a subjective evaluation of Feldman's work.

Johnson, Steven, ed. The New York Schools of Music and Visual Arts. London: Taylor & Francis, 2001. A superb collection of essays about the interactions among the musicians of the New York School (Cage, Feldman, Earle Brown, and Christian Wolff) and their counterparts in the visual arts, the Abstract Expressionists (Pollock, Rothko, Willem de Kooning, Robert Motherwell, and more). Several essays focus on Feldman in particular.

See also: Busoni, Ferruccio; Cage, John; Lucier, Alvin; Schaeffer, Pierre; Seeger, Ruth Crawford; Takemitsu, Tōru; Varèse, Edgard.

Freddy Fender

American Latin and rock singer, songwriter, and guitarist

Combining elements of 1950's rock, Tejano, Louisiana swamp pop, and country music in his exuberant style, Fender paved the way for Latin American performers in country and popular music.

Born: June 4, 1937; San Benito, Texas
Died: October 14, 2006; Corpus Christi, Texas
Also known as: Baldemar Garza Huerta (birth name); El Bebop Kid; Eddie Con Los Shades
Member of: The Texas Tornados; Los Super Seven

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): Before the Next Teardrop Falls, 1974; Are You Ready for Freddy?, 1975; Before the Next Teardrop Falls, 1975 (alternate tracks); Since I Met You Baby, 1975; If You're Ever in Texas, 1976; Rock 'n' Country, 1976; If You Don't Love Me, 1977; Swamp Gold, 1978; Christmas Time in the Valley, 1991; Los Super Seven, 1998 (with Los Super Seven); Canto, 2001 (with Los Super Seven); New Orleans Sessions, 2001; La musica de Baldemar Huerta, 2002; Back to Back, 2003 (with Johnny Rodriguez); Eddie con los Shades: Rock 'n Roll, 2003 (with the Shades); Interpreta el rock, 2003; Heard It on the X, 2005 (with Los Super Seven).

ALBUMS (with the Texas Tornados): Texas Tornados, 1990; Zone of Our Own, 1991; Hangin' on by a Thread, 1992; Four Aces, 1996.

Freddy Fender. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The Life

Freddy Fender was born Baldemar Garza Huerta to migrant workers Serapio and Margarita Huerta in 1937. At ten, he entered and won a radio contest. At sixteen, he joined the U.S. Marines. By 1957, using the names El Bebop Kid and Eddie Con Los Shades, he had recorded Spanish versions of rock hits for distribution in the United States, Mexico, and South America. He married Evangelina "Vangie" Muniz in 1957, and they had four children. In 1959, after he signed a contract with Imperial Records, he became Freddy Fender (in honor of his guitar). Arrested in 1960 in Louisiana for possession of marijuana, he served three years in the Angola prison system, and he was released by Louisiana Governor Jimmie Davis. While in Louisiana, Fender worked with swamp pop musicians, resulting in the Gulf Coast influence heard on his early hits. In 1969 he returned to Texas, working as a mechanic and attending junior-college classes. He had a string of country and pop hits in the 1970's, and he tried acting in the 1980's. After a decade of battling substance abuse, Fender joined the groups Texas Tornados and Los Super Seven. Surviving both a kidney and liver transplant, he succumbed to lung cancer on October 14, 2006, in Corpus Christi, and he was buried in his hometown.

The Music

Introduced to various musical influences as a child migrant worker among Latinos and African Americans (conjunto, Tejano, and blues) and later as an adult living in Texas and Louisiana (country, Cajun, zydeco, swamp pop), Fender was a bilingual crossover musician, with an appeal to Latino as well as to gringo audiences. His fingerpicking guitar style was accentuated by his distinctive voice: a gentle tenor with a signature tremolo that could switch keys with ease.

El Bebop Kid. As El Bebop Kid, Fender was the first American to reach number one in Mexico and South America, with Spanish versions of Elvis Presley's "Don't Be Cruel" and Harry Belafonte's "Jamaica Farewell." These and other Spanish remakes led to "Wasted Days and Wasted Nights" and "Holy One," two singles in English. After prison, Fender worked in New Orleans, where he was introduced to swamp pop musicians Joe Barry and Rod Bernard, as well as two of the Neville brothers, Art and Aaron. Fender returned to Texas, and, at fellow musician Doug Sahm's suggestion, he visited Huey Meaux, owner of Crazy Cajun records, in Houston. Meaux persuaded the singer to release a remake of Charley Pride's "Before the Next Teardrop Falls" in 1974.

"Before the Next Teardrop Falls." A number-one country song that went as well to number one on the pop charts in 1975, the title song from Fender's 1974 album won the Single of the Year Award, given by the Country Music Association (CMA); the song achieved gold certification. Fender won CMA's Vocalist of the Year, and the album won Album of the Year. The album contained standards such as "Roses Are Red," "Please Don't Tell Me How the Story Ends," and Fender's second Billboard hot country number one, a revamping of "Wasted Days and Wasted Nights," which crossed over to become a Billboard Top 10 rock hit.

Are You Ready for Freddy? Are You Ready for Freddy? was a collection of Cajun dance tunes, childhood favorites ("How Much Is That Doggy in the Window?"), and a number-one country hit, a bilingual remake of "Secret Love." The song also became Fender's third consecutive release to make it on the Billboard rock chart, peaking at number twenty.

Since I Met You Baby and Rock 'n' Country. Since I Met You Baby and Rock 'n' Country contained Fender's next three country hit remakes: "You'll Lose a Good Thing" (his fourth number one), "Vaya Con Dios," and "Since I Met You Baby." Fender met with only marginal success after the release of Rock 'n' Country, never again reaching the top spot on the Billboard hot country chart. His life and music took a downward spiral as he struggled with drugs and alcohol.

Texas Tornados and Los Super Seven. In 1989 Fender joined the first Tejano Grammy Award-winning supergroup, working with Sahm, Flaco Jimenez, and Augie Myers. Texas Tornados was a band that fused conjunto (Mexican polka), Tejano, rhythm and blues, and country. Its music was well received in the United States, Australia, and the Netherlands, and the first album, Texas Tornados, did well on the Billboard charts, reaching number twenty-one in rock and number twenty-nine in Latin. The group released three studio albums and two live albums, and Zone of Our Own was a huge critical success.

Fender later helped create a second Grammy Award-winning group, Los Super Seven. This group included Fender, Jiminez, Joe Ely, Rick Trevino, Ruben Ramos, Joel José Guzman, and Los Lobos' David Hidalgo and Cesar Rosas.

La musica de Baldemar Huerta. This represents Fender's return to his roots. He paid homage to the songs he heard while growing up in the Rio Grande Valley—boleros from the 1940's and 1950's—and he sings bolero versions of "Secret Love" and "Before the Next Teardrop Falls." In a Texas Monthly interview in 2001, Fender called this recording a hybrid, which he termed mariachi country. The album earned Fender his last Grammy Award.

Musical Legacy

Fender performed for three presidents of the United States, and he was given a star on the Hollywood Walk of Fame. He reached the top spot on the Billboard country and pop charts, and he had nine Top 10 country hits. He was the first rock singer to receive airplay in both Mexico and Latin America. Along with his Grammy Awards and his CMA Awards, Fender received a Golden Eagle Award, given by an organization of Chicano entertainers. His success helped set the stage for Los Lobos, David Garza, and El Vez.

Anthony J. Fonseca

Further Reading

Cocoran, Michael. All Over the Map: True Heroes of Texas Music. Austin: University of Texas Press, 2005. The chapter on Sahm chronicles Fender's meeting with Meaux.

Fender, Freddy. "A Few Words with Freddy Fender." Texas Monthly (December, 2001): 56. Transcription of an interview with Fender concerning La musica de Baldemar Huerta.

Marez, Curtis. "Brown: The Politics of Working-Class Chicano Style." Social Text 48 (Autumn, 1996): 109-132. This article discusses Fender's music in the film Rush (1991), and it describes his musical and personal assimilation—as an impoverished Chicano moving into an Anglo culture.

San Miguel, Guadalupe, Jr. Tejano Proud: Tex-Mex Music in the Twentieth Century. College Station: Texas A&M University Press, 2002. Provides context for Fender within the Tejano tradition.

Stambler, Irwin, and Grelun Landon. Country Music: The Encyclopedia. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1997. Includes a detailed entry on Fender's life and work.

See also: Belafonte, Harry; Neville, Aaron; Presley, Elvis; Pride, Charley; Valens, Ritchie.

Arthur Fiedler

American classical conductor

Known as "Mr. Pops," Fiedler is distinguished for bringing classical and light classical music to the general public. He accomplished this as the conductor of the Boston Pops orchestra for nearly fifty years, founder of the open-air Esplanade concerts in Boston, and performer on recordings and television programs.

Born: December 17, 1894; Boston, Massachusetts
Died: July 10, 1979; Brookline, Massachusetts
Member of: Boston Sinfonietta

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Tchaikovsky: The Nutcracker, 1956; Pops Christmas Party, 1959; Christmas Festival, 1970; Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Plays the Beatles, 1971; Arthur Fiedler with the Boston Pops: Fiedler's Favorite Overtures, 1971; Fiedler's Favorite Marches, 1971; Opera's Greatest Hits: Arthur Fiedler Conducts Boston Pops, 1971; I Got Rhythm: Fiedler Conducts Gershwin, 1979; Saturday Night Fiedler, 1979.

The Life

Arthur Fiedler (FEED-lur) was born to Emanuel and Johanna Fiedler, Austrian immigrants. Emanuel was a violinist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO), and Fiedler followed in his father's footsteps. After studying at the Royal Academy of Music in Berlin, Fiedler became a second violinist with the BSO in 1915.

Fiedler also had an interest in conducting. He started conducting on a regular basis in 1921, and in 1924 he formed his own group, which he called the Boston Sinfonietta. Its success led to his founding of the outdoor Esplanade concerts, free concerts held next to the Charles River, that have remained popular for decades. In 1930 Fiedler became conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra (called simply the Pops), a position that he held until his death in 1979. During his tenure, the Pops became internationally famous, and his approach became the model for pops orchestras around the globe. He also conducted the San Francisco Pops from 1951 to 1978.

Considered to be quite the ladies' man, Fiedler did not get married until the age of forty-six, marrying Ellen Bottomley, who was twenty years younger. Fiedler did not appear to participate much in family life, and he was often distant with his closest friends. However, he could be quite demonstrative, and his effusive character on the podium helped make him a well-known figure in the United States. Fiedler was passionate about fires and firefighting, and he often conducted to raise money for charities. Fiedler, in failing health for several years, died at the age of eighty-four.

The Music

As well as conductor, Fiedler was the music director for the Boston Pops Orchestra, meaning that he chose the program for each concert. In contrast to his predecessor, Alfredo Casella, Fiedler selected music he believed would be popular with the general public. This included classical works, such as Maurice Ravel's Boléro (1928); light classical fare, such as Johann Strauss's waltzes; and arrangements of musical-theater and popular tunes, such as selections from Oklahoma! (1943) by Richard Rodgers and Oscar Hammerstein II.

"The Stars and Stripes Forever." "The Stars and Stripes Forever," written by John Philip Sousa in 1897, has been a favorite for the Pops since the beginning of Fiedler's reign. Fiedler usually used the work to close a concert, although he would occasionally open the concert with it or present it as an encore. It may be seen as exemplifying the patriotic flavor that the Boston Pops holds in the public eye. It also acts as a showcase for the flutes and the brass section: The work opens with a virtuosic melody on piccolo accompanied by the entire flute section; the second part allows the brass to shine, with the main melody in the trumpets and a countermelody in the trombones. In a concert performance, the featured groups usually stand, adding to the enthusiastic atmosphere and leading to a rousing finale.

Sleigh Ride. Fiedler helped Leroy Anderson come into prominence as an arranger and composer of light classical music. After Anderson arranged some Harvard songs for a Pops concert, Fiedler encouraged him to arrange and compose other works for the Pops. One of these works was "Sleigh Ride" (1948). Its sprightly melody and its clever sound effects, used to imitate sounds heard on a sleigh ride (such as the trumpet imitating a horse neigh), contribute to its popularity not only with Boston Pops audiences but also with audiences around the world. In addition, it exemplifies the types of works that appeared on holiday Pops concert programs.

Arthur Fiedler. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

"Jalousie." "Jalousie" (1925), by Danish composer Jacob Gade, is one of the Boston Pops' greatest hits, among the most popular orchestral recordings of all time. According to Robin Moore, Fiedler discovered the sheet music in a music store in 1935, found it interesting, arranged it for orchestra, and started performing it that year. It seemed to be popular with audiences, so Fiedler convinced RCA to record it. The recording became the first orchestral recording to sell more than a million copies. The work is a lush, romantic tango. It features a solo violin at the beginning, and its tango rhythms and use of tambourine give it an exotic flavor.

Musical Legacy

Through his concerts around the globe, his television specials, and his recordings, Fiedler brought classical music to millions of people who might not otherwise have heard it. Under his direction, the Boston Pops Orchestra became the standard for pops orchestras, and he conducted it for fifty years. Fiedler started the extremely popular outdoor Esplanade concerts, which became a model for other outdoor concerts, particularly Fourth of July celebrations. In fact, Fiedler and the Pops set a record for concert attendance at the July 4, 1976, Esplanade concert: approximately four hundred thousand people attended. The television show Evening at Pops started with Fiedler, and it combined the Boston Pops with popular guest artists such as Roberta Flack. Fiedler helped to launch the careers of composers and arrangers, such as Anderson and Richard Hayman.

Elizabeth Scoggin

Further Reading

Dickson, Harry Ellis. Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops: An Irreverent Memoir. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1981. Written by the assistant conductor of the Boston Pops, this offers an objective look at Fiedler. Includes illustrations.

Fiedler, Johanna. Arthur Fiedler: Papa, the Pops, and Me. New York: Doubleday, 1994. Fiedler's daughter's account takes a sometimes dark view of her father's life. Includes notes and selected discography.

Holland, James. Mr. Pops. Barre, Mass.: Barre, 1972. A photographic essay with a brief biography is suitable for young readers.

Moore, Robin. Fiedler: The Colorful Mr. Pops, the Man, and His Music. Boston: Little, Brown, 1968. Well-written and complimentary account of Fiedler's life. Includes illustrations and extensive discography.

Wilson, Carol Green. Arthur Fiedler: Music for the Millions, the Story of the Conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra. New York: Evans, 1968. Written by a friend of the family, this book is an affectionate biography. Includes illustrations.

See also: Anderson, Leroy; Gershwin, George; Hammerstein, Oscar, II; Ravel, Maurice; Rodgers, Richard; Sousa, John Philip; Williams, John.

Dorothy Fields

American popular music and musical-theater composer, lyricist, and librettist

In a career that spanned the 1920's to the 1960's, Fields wrote intelligent and witty lyrics for the Broadway stage and for films.

Born: July 15, 1905; Allenhurst, New Jersey
Died: May 28, 1974; New York, New York

Principal works

MUSICAL THEATER (lyrics and libretto unless listed otherwise): Blackbirds of 1928, 1928 (music by Jimmy McHugh); Hello, Daddy, 1928 (libretto by Herbert Fields; music by McHugh); Ziegfeld Midnight Frolic, 1929 (music by McHugh); The International Review, 1930 (libretto by Nat N. Dorfman and Lew Leslie; music with McHugh); The Vanderbilt Revue, 1930 (libretto by Lew M. Fields with others; lyrics and music with others); Shoot the Works, 1931 (libretto by Heywood Broun with others; lyrics with others; music by Michael H. Cleary with others); Singin' the Blues, 1931 (libretto by John McGowan; lyrics with Harold Adamson; music by McHugh and Burton Lane); Stars in Your Eyes, 1939 (libretto by J. P. McEvoy; music by Arthur Schwartz); Let's Face It!, 1941 (libretto with Herbert Fields; lyrics and music by Cole Porter); Something for the Boys, 1943 (libretto with Herbert Fields; lyrics and music by Porter); Mexican Hayride, 1944 (libretto with Herbert Fields; lyrics and music by Porter); Up in Central Park, 1945 (libretto with Herbert Fields; music by Sigmund Romberg); Annie Get Your Gun, 1946 (libretto with Herbert Fields; lyrics and music by Irving Berlin); Arms and the Girl, 1950 (libretto with Herbert Fields and Rouben Mamoulian; music by Morton Gould); A Tree Grows in Brooklyn, 1951 (libretto by Betty Smith and George Abbott; music by Schwartz); By the Beautiful Sea, 1954 (libretto with Herbert Fields; music by Schwartz); Redhead, 1959 (libretto with others; music by Albert Hague); Annie Get Your Gun, 1966 (libretto with Herbert Fields; lyrics and music by Berlin); Sweet Charity, 1966 (libretto by Neil Simon; music by Cy Coleman); Seesaw, 1973 (libretto by Michael Bennett; music by Coleman); Shirley MacLaine, 1976 (libretto by Fred Ebb; music by Coleman); Sugar Babies, 1979 (libretto by Ralph G. Allen and Harry Rigby; lyrics with Al Dubin; music by McHugh).

The Life

Dorothy Fields was born as the youngest of the four children of vaudeville star Lew Fields and his wife Rose. After high school, Fields wanted to go into show business, but her father did not allow it. Without the endorsement of her father or his influential theatrical organization, she had to prove that she could write lyrics and succeed on her own. Despite these obstacles, she teamed with songwriter Jimmy McHugh on such hits as "I Can't Give You Anything But Love, Baby" from 1928. She and McHugh became a successful team, and over the next seven years they produced other enduring standards, including "On the Sunny Side of the Street" and "I'm in the Mood for Love."

In 1925 Fields married surgeon J. J. Werner; they divorced in 1932. In 1938 she married Eli Lahm, with whom she had a son and a daughter. For the next thirty-five years, Fields was one of the most productive lyricists in the songwriting world. She died of a heart attack in the spring of 1974.

The Music

Fields in Hollywood. In the 1930's, Fields worked in Hollywood, most notably with composer Jerome Kern. The pair reached their artistic peak in the film Swing Time from 1936. A vehicle for Fred Astaire and Ginger Rogers, the film featured such hits as "Pick Yourself Up," "A Fine Romance," and "Bojangles of Harlem." They also wrote for this film "The Way You Look Tonight," which won the Academy Award for Best Song in 1936. When Astaire sang the song to Rogers, it was clear that the combination of Kern's compelling melody and Fields's elegant rhymes was magical. Kern and Fields collaborated for another four years without ever again attaining the artistic heights of Swing Time.

Fields on Broadway. Fields worked with her brother Herbert writing the libretto for several Broadway shows. Their most successful and important collaboration was on Annie Get Your Gun (1946), based on the life of sharpshooter Annie Oakley. While talking with a World War II Marine, Fields got the idea for a musical about Oakley with Ethel Merman in the lead. The music was written by Irving Berlin, who drew on the Fieldses' dialogue for much of his inspiration. The musical, Annie Get Your Gun, produced by Richard Rodgers and Oscar Hammerstein, was a great hit, and it represented one of Fields's high points as a contributor to the evolution of the art form of the Broadway musical.

Dorothy Fields and Arthur Schwartz. (Library of Congress)

Fields returned to lyric writing for A Tree Grows in Brooklyn, based on the Betty Smith novel and popular film. The show, for which Arthur Schwartz furnished the music, featured one of her best lyrics. Though the show closed after 270 performances, the songs such as "I'll Buy You a Star" and "Make the Man Love Me" have endured as standards.

Collaborating with Coleman. Fields continued to write musicals during the 1950's and 1960's. She won a Tony Award for her work on Redhead, starring Gwen Verdon, in 1959. She and songwriter Cy Coleman had an even greater success in 1964 with Sweet Charity and the hit "Big Spender." Finally, she and Coleman wrote a musical version of the William Gibson play Two for the Seesaw (1958), called Seesaw, which opened in 1973. Her talent showed no signs of flagging as she kept turning out hits into the 1970's and as audiences responded to her work with the same enthusiasm they had shown three decades earlier.

Musical Legacy

Although her work was never judged on the basis of her gender, Fields was one of the most important females in the coterie of songwriters and lyricists who worked during the Golden Age of American popular song between 1925 and 1955. She was a superb writer of romantic and poignant lyrics, who brought out the best in her partners, Kern, McHugh, Romberg, and Coleman. Several decades after it first appeared, "The Way You Look Tonight" endures as a rare example of the exceptional fusion between words and music that makes a love song a standard. Fields had a wide-ranging talent that enabled her to move from the ribaldry of the 1920's to the more cynical expressions of the 1960's with equal deftness. Her contributions to the literature of the musical theater are also impressive. Annie Get Your Gun is frequently revived as an artful blend of the plot that Fields and her brother conceived and the music of Berlin. With the wit and the sophistication of her lyrics, Fields made a memorable contribution to musical theater and film.

Lewis L. Gould

Further Reading

Furia, Philip. Poets of Tin Pan Alley: A History of America's Great Lyricists. New York: Oxford University Press, 1990. This source includes an incisive analysis of Fields and her work.

Sheed, Wilfred. The House That George Built with a Little Help from Irving, Cole, and a Crew of About Fifty. New York: Random House, 2007. A deft survey of popular songs that places Fields in the context of other songwriters of the period in which she enjoyed her greatest hits.

Wilk, Max. They're Playing Our Song: The Truth Behind the Words and Music of Three Generations. New York: Moyer and Bell, 1991. This collection contains an informative interview with Fields that sheds light on her working habits.

Winer, Deborah Grace. On the Sunny Side of the Street: The Life and Lyrics of Dorothy Fields. New York: Schirmer Books, 1997. An anecdotal biography of Fields.

See also: Arlen, Harold; Berlin, Irving; Coleman, Cy; Ebb, Fred; Hammerstein, Oscar, II; Kern, Jerome; Merman, Ethel; Porter, Cole; Rodgers, Richard; Romberg, Sigmund.

---

50 Cent

American rapper

With his explicit lyrics and driving beats, 50 Cent made a major contribution to the development of gangsta rap.

Born: July 6, 1975; Queens, New York
Also known as: Curtis James Jackson III (birth name)
Member of: G-Unit

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): Power of the Dollar, 2000; Guess Who's Back?, 2001; Get Rich or Die Tryin', 2003; The Massacre, 2005; Before I Self-Destruct, 2007; Curtis, 2007; Superstar, 2008.

ALBUMS (with G-Unit): Beg for Mercy, 2003; G-Unit Radio, Pt. 10: 2050 Before the Massacre, 2007; Sight of Blood, 2007.

The Life

Curtis James Jackson III was born on July 6, 1975, in South Jamaica, Queens, a suburb of New York City. After his mother, Sabrina, was murdered, Jackson went to live with his grandparents. At age twelve, he began selling crack cocaine, and in 1994 he was arrested twice on drug charges.

In 1996 Jackson began to focus on a music career, working with Jam Master Jay of Run-D.M.C. He chose the stage name 50 Cent (FIHF-tee sehnt), the name of a 1980's Brooklyn robber. In 1997 he left Jam Master Jay to sign a contract with Columbia Records. In the same year his son, Marquise Jackson, was born to his girlfriend, Shanequa Tompkins. A well-publicized dispute between Ja Rule and 50 Cent started in 1999, which resulted in an altercation at the Hit Factory, a recording studio, in 2000.

On May 24, 2000, 50 Cent was shot nine times in front of his home in Queens. After he recovered, he was dropped from Columbia Records, and his album was canceled. He moved to Canada to work with Sha Money XL. At the time, 50 Cent made mixtapes that were later rereleased on the album, Guess Who's Back? (2001). On New Year's Eve in New York City, he was arrested and cited for possession of two loaded firearms. In 2002 50 Cent was signed to Eminem's label, Interscope Records, which released Get Rich or Die Tryin' in 2003 to huge success.

After the debut of his first album, 50 Cent started his own label, G-Unit Records. He appeared in an episode of the animated television series The Simpsons and in the motion pictures Get Rich or Die Tryin' (2005), loosely based on his life, and Home of the Brave (2006).

The Music

Excelling in the pop genre of gangsta rap, 50 Cent derives many of his lyrics from his life as a drug dealer in the inner city. His frequent use of rap beefs (feuds) with fellow rap artists brings him attention in the media and in the musical world. Underlying his graphic lyrics are dark, driving grooves and dance beats. Because of the 2000 shooting, which affected his jaw, he has developed a mumbling quality in his singing.

"How to Rob." This single came from 50 Cent's unreleased and incomplete album, Power of the Dollar, and it is an example of 50 Cent's use of beefs against other rap artists. In the song 50 Cent explicitly details how he would rob rappers such as Jay-Z and Will Smith of their jewelry. The single evoked numerous responses from the artists mentioned. However, it was the response 50 Cent wanted, as the reaction brought him much-needed attention in the rap community.

Get Rich or Die Tryin'. 50 Cent's debut album was released to huge critical and market success. Throughout the album, 50 Cent bases his lyrics on his experience in selling drugs, on such tracks as "What Up Gangsta" and "High All the Time." He recounts his near-fatal shooting, accentuated by musical samples of gunshots, in "Patiently Waiting" (featuring Eminem) and "Many Men (Wish Death)." "In da Club" is an appealing single for the dance club that samples heavy dance beats with forceful string punctuations.

The Massacre. The 2005 follow-up album continues in the genre of gangsta rap. Choosing a mellow tone on some of the songs, 50 Cent samples instrumental melodies that soften the accompanying drumbeat. Additionally, he creates more singles for the dance floor, such as "Disco Inferno" and "Outta Control." He returns to the theme of gangsta violence and drug use in the single "Gunz Come Out." Perhaps the most inventive single is "A Baltimore Love Thing," in which the narrator directs his statements toward a female heroine addict, whom he loves, and tries to persuade her to stop using. There are also collaborative singles with vocalists Jamie Foxx ("Build You Up"), Olivia ("So Amazing" and "Candy Shop"), and Eminem ("GATman and Robin").

Curtis. In Curtis, 50 Cent returns to a hard sound, and he reemphasizes his gangsta background, especially on the opening track, "My Gun Go Off." A soft sound emerges, however, in his collaboration with Robin Thicke on "Follow My Lead," which samples sensual, lyrical piano melodies and harmonies. There are also collaborative singles on this album, with Justin Timberlake ("Ayo Technology"), P'Diddy and Jay-Z ("I Get Money"), and Mary J. Blige ("All of Me"). Though Curtis was a commercial success, critics found the album to be unoriginal and the lyrics to be at times incoherent and silly.

50 Cent. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Musical Legacy

In the genre of gangsta rap, 50 Cent is a huge commercial and critical success. Through his record label G-Unit, 50 Cent helps young rap artists, such as Young Back, Lloyd Banks, and Tony Yayo. With the release of Get Rich or Die Tryin', 50 Cent was nominated for a Grammy Award for Best New Artist, and he won ASCAP Songwriter of the Year and Album of the Year from Billboard. The Massacre was nominated for a Grammy Award in the Best Rap Album category. Throughout his career he has won and has been nominated for various awards, including the World Music Awards, Rhythm and Soul Music Award, Black Entertainment Television (BET) Awards, Music of Black Origins (MOBO) Awards, Source Awards, and MTV Music Video Awards.

Eric Olds Schneeman

Further Reading

Brown, Ethan. Queens Reigns Supreme: Fat Cat, 50 Cent, and the Rise of the Hip-Hop Hustler. New York: Anchor Books, 2005. Brown provides a cultural and historical account of the gangs and drug lords of Queens and the impact they would have on 50 Cent and other rap artists. Includes bibliography.

Brown, Jake. 50 Cent: No Holds Barred. Phoenix: Colossus Books, 2005. A brief biography of 50 Cent, mainly derived from interviews the artist has given to magazines. Includes discography.

Callahan-Bever, Noah, and 50 Cent. 50 × 50: 50 Cent in His Own Words. New York: Pocket Books, 2007. Updated autobiography includes pictures, handwritten lyrics, other memorabilia, and a compact disc of unreleased material. Includes illustrations.

Ex, Kris, and 50 Cent. From Pieces to Weight: Once upon a Time in Southside Queens. New York: MTV

Books and Pocket Books, 2005. In this book, 50 Cent recounts his journey from drug dealer to rap artist.

See also: Blige, Mary J.; D. M. C.; Dr. Dre; Eminem; Jay-Z; Simmons, Joseph "Run"; Snoop Dogg.

Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau

German classical and opera singer

Fischer-Dieskau is a consummate interpreter of classical song, opera, and oratorio, and his recordings spread his fame worldwide. He is noted for his virtuosic interpretations of lieder and of Franz Schubert's vocal works.

Born: May 28, 1925; Berlin, Germany

Principal works

OPERATIC ROLES: Marquis of Posa in Giuseppe Verdi's Don Carlos, 1948; Wolfram in Richard Wagner's Tannhäuser, 1949; John the Baptist in Richard Strauss's Salome, 1952; Don Giovanni in Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's Don Giovanni, 1953; Busoni in Charles Gounod's Faust, 1955; Amfortas in Wagner's Parsifal, 1955; Count Almaviva in Mozart's Le nozze di Figaro, 1956; Renato in Verdi's Un ballo in maschera, 1957; Falstaff in Verdi's Henry V, 1959; Mathis in Paul Hindemith's Mathis der Maler, 1959; Wozzeck in Alban Berg's Wozzeck, 1960; Yevgeny Onyegin in Peter Ilich Tchaikovsky's Eugene Onegin, 1961; Barak in Strauss's Die Frau ohne Schatten, 1963; Macbeth in Verdi's Macbeth, 1963; Don Alfonso in Mozart's Così fan tutte, 1972; King Lear in Aribert Reimann's Lear, 1978.

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Schubert: Die Winterreise, 1952; The Magic Flute—Die Zauberflöte, 1956; Arabella, 1957; Capriccio, 1958; Wagner: Die Fliegende Holländer, 1960; Brahms: Ein Deutsches Requiem, 1961; Schubert: Die Schöne Müllerin, 1961; Lohengrin: Romantic Opera in Three Acts, 1962; Britten: War Requiem, 1963; Don Carlos, 1965; Tosca Highlights, 1967; Elektra, 1961; Wozzeck, 1962; Doktor Faust, 1969; Handel: Giulio Cesare in Egitto, 1969; Salome, 1971; Palestrina, 1972; Il Matrimonio Segreto, 1975; Béatrice et Bénédict Opéra-comique en Due Actes, 1982; Hänsel und Gretel, 1985; Jessonda, 1991.

The Life

Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau (DEE-trihk FEE-shur DEE-skow) was born into a middle-class family in Berlin. His parents, both educators, shared with their son a love of literature and music. Fischer-Dieskau's paternal ancestors were mostly Protestant clergymen, and one of his maternal ancestors is memorialized in a Berlin monument depicting Frederick the Great and General Baron von Dieskau, an artillery expert and inventor of a light cannon depicted on the monument, known as Dieskaus.

Fischer-Dieskau began to sing at an early age, starting formal voice instruction at age sixteen. Upon completion of high school in 1943, he made his first solo appearances in Berlin. Later that year, he was drafted into the German army, and in 1945 he was captured by Allied forces and sent to a prisoner-of-war camp in Italy. While in prison, he presented informal lieder concerts to his fellow German prisoners.

After World War II ended, he returned to Berlin to resume his vocal studies and to begin his singing career. His artistic reputation grew, and he was in great demand in the United States and England. Fischer-Dieskau is one of the few singers who excels at concert performance and at opera singing. He is also a prolific recording artist, who has produced an enormous repertoire of works, ranging from obscure Renaissance pieces to operatic roles to contemporary songs. Throughout his career, he has collaborated with an impressive list of accompanists, conductors, and orchestras.

The Music

Fischer-Dieskau's remarkable professional success may be attributed to his debut at an early age, the reconstruction and subsequent economic boom of West Germany following World War II, and the advent and worldwide distribution of the long-play recording.

Lieder. Fischer-Dieskau began to collaborate with the English pianist Gerald Moore in 1951. For the next two decades, the pair made numerous recital appearances in Europe, Japan, and North America. By 1970 Fischer-Dieskau had recorded with Moore every Franz Schubert song appropriate for male voice, along with most of the songs of Robert Schumann, Ludwig van Beethoven, Johannes Brahms, Hugo Wolf, Franz Liszt, Felix Mendelssohn, and Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart. These recordings in the new long-playing format were sold all over the world, and they introduced the genre of lieder to generations of music lovers and musicians. So impressive were his renditions that Fischer-Dieskau became internationally known as a foremost interpreter of lieder.

Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau. (AP/Wide World Photos)

His 1952 recording of Schubert's Die Winterreise (1827), with Moore at the piano, continues to be the standard against which all other versions are judged. It rates highly with the recording of Schubert's Die Schöne Müllerin (1824) as one of the finest recordings of the genre. "Der Neugierige" (The Curious Boy), song number six from Die Schöne Müllerin, provides a splendid example of the tremendous range in pitch, dynamics, and tone color Fischer-Dieskau gave this repertoire. His interpretive approach was to start with the poem and analyze Schubert's setting, phrase by phrase, word by word, and note by note.

Oratorio. Fischer-Dieskau's long career as an oratorio soloist began with Ein deutsches Requiem (1868) of Brahms. His first performance of this work, which was also his professional debut at the age of twenty-one, was as a last-minute substitute for an ailing colleague in 1947. He performed the work dozens of times throughout his career, and he recorded it several times, under such conductors as Rudolf Kempe and Herbert von Karajan. However, the most popular of those recordings continues to be the one from 1961, which includes Elisabeth Schwartzkopf, soprano, and the New Philharmonia Chorus and Orchestra, conducted by Otto Klemperer.

Ein deutsches Requiem is a masterful expression of the gift of life triumphing over death. In the two solo sections for baritone, Fischer-Dieskau is able to use a variety of vocal color and shading to express the contrite spirit of the third movement. Then, in the sixth-movement solo, his voluminous power creates a contrasting prophetic sense, giving the listener a tremendous emotional impact. A work that has occupied him for his entire career, Ein deutsches Requiem was the singer's choice to end his career as an oratorio soloist, in a 1992 performance in Tokyo, Japan.

The British composer Benjamin Britten requested that Fischer-Dieskau sing the premiere performance of War Requiem (1962), given in Coventry, England, in 1962. This premiere was part of a series of consecration ceremonies for the rebuilt Coventry Cathedral, which had been destroyed in a German air raid in 1940. Fischer-Dieskau continued to sing performances of the War Requiem throughout his career as an oratorio soloist. Soon after the premiere, he recorded it with soprano Galina Vishnievskay, tenor Peter Pears, the Melos Ensemble of London, and the London Symphony Orchestra, with the composer conducting. As is often the case with Fischer-Dieskau's recordings, this effort remains unparalleled in intensity and expression.

The oratorio is an attempt at international reconciliation, with soloists coming from Germany (Fischer-Dieskau), the Soviet Union (Vishnievskay), and England (Pears), all memorializing the great loss of life in World War I and World War II. Although Fischer-Dieskau was not a pacifist (as was Britten), he was not attracted to the social and political goals of the Third Reich, and he resisted his conscription into the German army. Tall and lanky, ill-suited for a combat role, he finally joined as required, and he was quickly captured by Allied forces.

Fischer-Dieskau's war experience certainly colored his singing of this piece, although a more personal experience is at the heart of his relationship with the War Requiem. One of the main baritone solos draws its text from Wilfred Owen's sonnet On Seeing a Piece of Our Artillery Brought into Action. The segment is set in a highly dramatic musical style, including a fusillade of kettle drums announcing the deployment of the artillery. For Fischer-Dieskau, who grew up in Berlin, admiring the monument that included his ancestor, this combination of words and music must have been shattering. As reported by Michael Steinberg in his book Choral Masterworks, tenor Pears recalled that he "could hardly get his colleague (Fischer-Dieskau) to stand and leave the choir stalls at the end of the Coventry performance."

Fischer-Dieskau's ability to take the universality of the war experience, to add his own personal experience, and to sing in English (for him a foreign language) is indicative of the singer's singular power of artistic achievement.

Opera. Fischer-Dieskau's legacy includes more than one hundred operatic roles, spanning the entire history of the genre. His voice, possibly best classified as a lyric bass-baritone, is not well suited for the majority of dramatic baritone or bass roles. However, his overall musicianship did ensure him great success in some roles, notably those created by Mozart, Giuseppe Verdi, and Richard Wagner.

Favoring the smaller opera houses of his native Germany, Fischer-Dieskau seldom performed operas outside of Europe, and he never appeared at the Metropolitan Opera in New York. He did frequently appear at the major opera houses of Europe, such as the Vienna State Opera, the Munich Opera, and London's Covent Garden, as well as in the Deutsche Oper Berlin, and at many important festivals, such as the ones at Beyreuth and at Salzburg. These smaller houses allowed Fischer-Dieskau to use his voice in the way he was accustomed, with a wide palette of colors, dynamics, and inflections.

Among the roles that Fischer-Dieskau sang on stage and in the recording studio were a number of title roles: Mozart's Don Giovanni, Verdi's Falstaff, Alban Berg's Wozzeck, Handel's Giulio Cesare, and Wagner's Flying Dutchman. The breadth of his repertoire spans the history of opera.

About half of the opera roles in Fischer-Dieskau's repertoire were never performed on stage but were recorded only. An examination of his discography makes it clear that Fischer-Dieskau made a consistent effort to support contemporary composers, premiering new works such as Heinz Werner Henze's Elegie für junge Liebende (1961), Gottfried von Einem's Danton's Tod (1943), and Aribert Reimann's Lear (1978), which was composed for him.

Musical Legacy

For his pursuit of artistic excellence, Fischer-Dieskau has been awarded honorary degrees from the universities of Oxford, Yale, Heidelberg, and the Sorbonne. He has won multiple Grammy Awards and the Deutsche Schallplatten Preis (the German Recording Prize). He has won the Grand Prix du Disque almost every year between 1955 and the end of his career. He is a member of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, of the Royal Academy of Music in London, of the Accademia Santa Cecilia in Rome, and of other international music organizations. In 2000 Deutsche Grammaphon issued a commemorative box set of twenty-one compact discs devoted to the entirety of Fischer-Dieskau's singing career. With a discography of more than one thousand recordings, covering the works of more than two hundred composers, Fischer-Dieskau has created an impressive permanent legacy of performances.

Richard Allen Roe

Further Reading

Fischer-Dieskau, Dietrich. Reverberations: The Memoirs of Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau. Translated by Ruth Hein. Portland, Oreg.: Froom, 1990. This personal account of the events of Fischer-Dieskau's life and distinguished career contains many anecdotes. Well written, it is for the general audience and cultivated musicians alike.

_____. Schubert's Songs: A Biographical Study.

Translated by Kenneth S. Whitton. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1978. As in-depth study of Schubert, using the composer's songs as the primary source for assertions on Schubert's personal life and outlook. Written more for cultivated musicians than for general readers, it is rich in detail and presents Fischer-Dieskau's subjective experience of preparation and performance of Schubert's music.

Ivry, Benjamin. "A Voice of the Century Past." New England Review 27, no. 1 (2006). An excellent, if not enthusiastic, appraisal of Fischer-Dieskau's singing career.

Moore, Gerald. "Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau." In Am I Too Loud? London: Hammish Hamilton, 1961. A testimonial to the relationship between singer and accompanist. Moore, with whom Fischer-Dieskau made the complete Schubert lieder for male voice recordings, presents a singular insight into the artist.

Neunzig, Hans A. Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau: A Biography. Translated and annotated by Kenneth S. Whitton. Portland, Oreg.: Amadeus Press, 1998. A thorough biography of Fischer-Dieskau, with rare photographs and examples of the singer's painting and other artwork.

Steinberg, Michael. "Benjamin Britten: War Requiem." In Choral Masterworks: A Listener's Guide. New York: Oxford University Press, 2005. This chapter on Britten's oratorio contains accounts of Fischer-Dieskau's contribution to the premiere.

See also: Barenboim, Daniel; Britten, Benjamin; Karajan, Herbert von; Klemperer, Otto; Stern, Isaac.

Ella Fitzgerald

American jazz singer

Fitzgerald began her career as a jazz singer but became known all over the world by her first name alone as a popular singer. Her greatest ambition and realized achievement was to entertain audiences by singing songs as she felt them.

Born: April 25, 1917; Newport News, Virginia
Died: June 15, 1996; Beverly Hills, California

Also known as: Ella Jane Fitzgerald (full name); First Lady of Song

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Lullabies of Birdland, 1945; Miss Ella Fitzgerald and Mr. Nelson Riddle Invite You to Listen and Relax, 1949; Ella, Lena, and Billie, 1950 (with Lena Horne and Billie Holiday); Ella Sings Gershwin, 1950; Souvenir Album, 1950; Sweet and Hot, 1953; Songs in a Mellow Mood, 1954; Pete Kelly's Blues, 1955 (with Peggy Lee); Ella Fitzgerald Sings the Cole Porter Song Book, 1956; Ella Fitzgerald Sings the Rodgers and Hart Song Book, 1956; Ella and Louis, 1956 (with Louis Armstrong); Ella and Louis Again, 1957 (with Armstrong); Ella Fitzgerald Sings the Duke Ellington Song Book, 1957; Like Someone in Love, 1957; One O'Clock Jump, 1957 (with Joe Williams and the Count Basie Orchestra); Porgy and Bess, 1957 (with Armstrong); Ella Fitzgerald Sings the Irving Berlin Song Book, 1958; Ella Swings Lightly, 1958; Ella Fitzgerald Sings Sweet Songs for Swingers, 1959; Ella Fitzgerald Sings the George and Ira Gershwin Song Book, 1959; Get Happy!, 1959; Hello Love, 1959; Ella Fitzgerald Sings Songs from "Let No Man Write My Epitaph," 1960; Ella Fitzgerald Sings the Harold Arlen Song Book, Vol. 1, 1960; Ella Fitzgerald Sings the Harold Arlen Song Book, Vol. 2, 1960; Ella Fitzgerald Wishes You a Swinging Christmas, 1960; Clap Hands, Here Comes Charlie!, 1961; Ella Swings Brightly with Nelson, 1961 (with Nelson Riddle); Ella Swings Gently with Nelson, 1962 (with Riddle); Rhythm Is My Business, 1962; Ella and Basie!, 1963 (with Count Basie's New Testament Band); Ella Fitzgerald Sings the Jerome Kern Song Book, 1963; These Are the Blues, 1963; Ella Fitzgerald Sings the Johnny Mercer Song Book, 1964; Hello, Dolly!, 1964; Ella at Duke's Place, 1965 (with the Duke Ellington Orchestra); Whisper Not, 1966 (with Marty Paich and his Orchestra); Brighten the Corner, 1967; Ella Fitzgerald's Christmas, 1967; Misty Blue, 1968; Things Ain't What They Used to Be (And You Better Believe It), 1970; Ella Loves Cole, 1972; Take Love Easy, 1973 (with Joe Pass); Fine and Mellow, 1974; Ella and Oscar, 1975 (with Oscar Peterson); Fitzgerald and Pass . . . Again, 1976 (with Pass); Dream Dancing, 1978; Lady Time, 1978; A Classy Pair (Ella Fitzgerald Sings, Count Basie Plays), 1979 (with the Count Basie Orchestra); Ella Abraça Jobim, 1980 (Ella Fitzgerald Sings the Antonio Carlos Jobim Song Book); The Best Is Yet to Come, 1982; Let's Call the Whole Thing Off, 1983; Nice Work if You Can Get It, 1983; Speak Love, 1983; Easy Living, 1986; All That Jazz, 1989; Back on the Block, 1989 (with others); Ella Fitzgerald: First Lady of Song, 1993.

The Life

Although many sources have Ella Jane Fitzgerald born in 1918, the true date is April 25, 1917. In 1920 her unmarried mother, known as Tempie Fitzgerald, moved from Virginia to Yonkers, New York, with a new partner. In 1932 Tempie died, and Ella was taken from her stepfather by Tempie's sister Virginia, who lived in the Harlem section of New York.

The next few years were difficult ones. Ella, formerly a good student, dropped out of school and began to live on the streets of Harlem. She was ambitious, however, and in November, 1934, she entered a talent competition at the Apollo Theater, won first prize, and attracted the attention of Chick Webb, the director of a prominent Harlem jazz band. An immediate sensation as a vocalist with the band, she performed with it until 1939, when Webb died, and she, already labeled "the First Lady of Swing," was chosen to front the band.

In 1941 she married Benny Kornegay, who unknown to her had a criminal record, and the marriage was annulled the following year. Later Fitzgerald denied marrying or even knowing him. In 1942, with many musicians departing for military duty in World War II and orchestras hampered by a ban on recording by the American Federation of Musicians, her orchestra failed. She then began to perform with a singing and instrumental ensemble called the Three Keys. The next few years she toured with the better known group the Ink Spots and then with the orchestra of Dizzy Gillespie, one of the leading exponents of the newly popular version of jazz known as bebop.

Musical tours and hundreds of recordings made her an international favorite. Her association with promoter Norman Granz, who became her personal manager in 1953, made her the star of his recording company, Verve, for which she made her highly successful Song Books of the most eminent popular composers of the twentieth century. Nevertheless, she continued to perform in the jazz idiom.

Her personal life remained largely unfulfilled. Fitzgerald married musician Ray Brown in 1947 and, unable to have a child, she and Brown adopted Ray Brown, Jr. The marriage ended in divorce in 1953. In the 1940's she began to support orphaned and disadvantaged children and later made extensive donations of money and service to organizations combating child abuse.

She performed until she was in her seventies, when the breakdown of her health—she suffered from weak eyesight and diabetes—gradually forced her into retirement. In 1993 both her legs were amputated below the knee. She died at her home in Beverly Hills, California, on June 15, 1996.

The Music

Untrained, unsophisticated, and overweight, Fitzgerald did not look like anyone's idea of a band singer, but eighteen-year-old Fitzgerald possessed from the start of her career a keen sense of rhythm and a warm voice. Early in her career she tried to emulate Connee Boswell, a white singer from New Orleans. An immediate sensation with Webb's orchestra, which she joined in 1935, Fitzgerald performed a variety of songs, her first hit being a novelty she helped adapt from a nursery rhyme, "A-Tisket, A-Tasket," in 1938. Always eager to please her audiences, she continued to sing this song for decades thereafter.

Fitzgerald readily made the transition from orchestra singer to soloist in concert halls and exclusive nightclubs and remained an internationally known singing star for decades. Under the management of Granz she recorded hundreds of songs by George Gershwin, Irving Berlin, Cole Porter, and other major songwriters. She also excited audiences with her inimitable scat singing. Only her deteriorating health in her later years slowed her down, and she continued to sing publicly even when she was no longer able to walk or to see very well. Not an egotistic or colorful interpreter of songs, she could, in her prime, range over nearly three octaves and demonstrate a manner of phrasing that revealed the full possibilities of a melody.

Early Career. One of the best drummers and bandleaders of his time, Webb was a hunchbacked victim of spinal tuberculosis with whom Fitzgerald began to develop her natural talent. In his orchestra she learned to do the scat singing that later would enliven her concerts. Although she performed many novelty songs, she displayed a fondness and sensitivity for ballads, some of which she was able to sing with other masters such as Teddy Wilson and Benny Goodman. Her three recorded sides with Goodman in 1936 violated what Decca Records claimed was her exclusive contract and brought on a legal battle. Often performers would adopt pseudonyms to evade this difficulty, but Fitzgerald's voice was already too well known for this kind of duplicity.

In 1939 Webb succumbed to his illness at the age of thirty, and Fitzgerald was chosen to head the band. Ella Fitzgerald and Her Famous Orchestra survived until 1942, when it collapsed from financial distress. A number of her songs of this period, including "The Starlight Hour," "Sugar Blues," and "Shake Down the Stars," all recorded in 1940, became minor hits. Fitzgerald spent several years singing with small groups, her association with the Ink Spots being the most successful.

Jazz at the Philharmonic. In 1944 jazz promoter Granz initiated a series of concerts at the Los Angeles Philharmonic Auditorium called Jazz at the Philharmonic. The event, often shortened to JATP, blossomed into an annual tour, and in 1948 Granz sought Fitzgerald as one of the stars of the production. Singing with Gillespie's band, Fitzgerald had developed her scat singing in a manner resembling Gillespie's trumpet style. Some of her most popular numbers were the ones she recorded with Gillespie in 1947: "Flying Home," "How High the Moon," and "Lady, Be Good!". Fitzgerald quickly emerged as the most popular performer in JATP productions.

Ella Fitzgerald. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Up to this time most of Fitzgerald's recordings were made for Decca, whose director of artists and repertoire was Milt Gabler. Granz suggested to Fitzgerald that her career had not been properly promoted at Decca, and he wished to become her manager. In fact, Gabler had not neglected her; he had, for instance, brought her and Louis Armstrong together several times. Fitzgerald was also a loyal person, and so it was not until 1953 that Granz would sign her to a contract. Probably the most stirring of Fitzgerald's JATP performances was the one given at the Chicago Civic Opera House in September, 1957, when she sang such ballads as "Bewitched, Bothered, and Bewildered" and "Moonlight in Vermont" and an extended version of "Stompin' at the Savoy," which Granz hailed on the record jacket as "the most incredible, brilliant jazz vocal performance ever put to wax."

The Song Books. In 1950 Gabler produced Ella Sings Gershwin, in the very early days of long-playing (LP) records, also issuing it at speeds of 78 and 45 rotations per minute (rpm). When Fitzgerald began to record for Granz's Verve Records, with LP now the standard format, he encouraged her to do a series of what became known as Song Books. She recorded two of them in 1956, Ella Fitzgerald Sings the Cole Porter Song Book and Ella Fitzgerald Sings the Rodgers and Hart Song Book. Of the others that followed, Ella Fitzgerald Sings the George and Ira Gershwin Song Book (1959), much more extensive than her earlier Gershwin recording, was ably arranged and conducted by Nelson Riddle. The Song Books, containing dozens of memorable songs, have remained among the most popular of all Fitzgerald recordings.

Ella in Rome: The Birthday Concert. Over the decades Fitzgerald gave concerts all over the world. Her tours were so wide ranging and intense that they wore out some of the musical groups with which she performed. A 1958 concert in Rome included much of her best Song Book material, her scat songs, and even her popular imitation of Armstrong's singing, which she did with great gusto, although with considerable strain on her vocal cords. None of the musicians who took part in this concert knew that Granz had recorded it, and somehow the recording vanished. Resurfacing in 1987, it appeared the following year to become the leading recording on the Billboard charts. In the opinion of many listeners, this album sums up Fitzgerald's artistry.

Musical Legacy

Fitzgerald was not a jazz singer in the manner of Billie Holiday, but in her work with such jazz musicians as Webb, Gillespie, and Armstrong, she absorbed what critics, despite their difficulty in adequately defining the jazz genre, recognize as its materials and forms. She wedded them to songs ranging from ballads to scat songs and carried these features through her career of more than fifty years. For many listeners her crowning achievements are the Song Books, which constitute an anthology of the best songs written by distinguished twentieth century songwriters.

Fitzgerald discouraged attempts to theorize about her singing, saying simply that she sang as she felt. She did not impose herself on her material but respected it and concentrated on rendering it superbly well. She left hundreds of performances, recorded in both studios and concert halls, that continue to delight audiences and are likely to do so in the foreseeable future.

She received many accolades, among them the Honors Medal of the Kennedy Center for Performing Arts in Washington, D.C.; the Pied Piper Award of the American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers; and honorary doctorates from Dartmouth College and Howard University. Singers from Carmen McRae to Diana Krall have acknowledged her influence, but her greatest contribution has been to the ears of millions of listeners throughout the world.

Robert P. Ellis

Further Reading

Colin, Sid. Ella: The Life and Times of Ella Fitzgerald. London: Elm Tree Books, 1987. Written in an engaging style, this short book summarizes her major achievements.

Crowther, Bruce, and Mike Pinfold. The Jazz Singers: From Ragtime to the New Wave. New York: Blandford Press, 1986. Authors consider Fitzgerald to be one of the best jazz singers and stress the importance of her live performances as distinct from studio recordings.

David, Norman. The Ella Fitzgerald Companion. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 2004. With its many musical transcriptions, this book exemplifies Fitzgerald's work in a way that will interest professional musicians, but it also can be profitably consulted by the general reader.

Giddins, Gary. "Joy." In Visions of Jazz: The First Century. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998. Chapter on Fitzgerald summarizes the author's reaction to her singing.

Nicholson, Stuart. Ella Fitzgerald: A Biography of the First Lady of Jazz. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1994. Accurate and well-researched Fitzgerald biography that corrects earlier accounts and offers insights from people who knew her well. Extensive, although incomplete, discography.

Vail, Ken, and Ron Fritts. Ella Fitzgerald: The Chick Webb Years and Beyond, 1935-1948. New York: Scarecrow Press, 2003. Authors' interest is Fitzgerald's early development as a singer.

See also: Armstrong, Louis; Basie, Count; Berlin, Irving; Cahn, Sammy; Dorsey, Thomas A.; Ellington, Duke; Elliot, Cass; Gershwin, George; Gershwin, Ira; Hart, Lorenz; Holiday, Billie; Jobim, Antônio Carlos; Jones, Hank; Jones, Quincy; Jordan, Louis; Lewis, John; Odetta; Peterson, Oscar; Porter, Cole; Previn, Sir André; Robinson, Smokey; Rodgers, Richard; Vaughan, Sarah; Washington, Dinah; Webb, Jimmy.

Kirsten Flagstad

Norwegian classical and opera singer

Possessing a rare combination of heroic vocal strength, faultless intonation, and superlative musicianship, Flagstad was among the finest Wagnerian sopranos of the twentieth century.

Born: July 12, 1895; Hamar, Norway
Died: December 7, 1962; Olso, Norway
Also known as: Kirsten Målfrid Flagstad (full name)

Principal works

OPERATIC ROLES: Nuri in Eugen d'Albert's Tiefland, 1913; Aida in Giuseppe Verdi's Aida, 1929; Floria Tosca in Giacomo Puccini's Tosca, 1929; Elsa in Richard Wagner's Lohengrin, 1932; Kundry in Wagner's Parsifal, 1932; Rodelinda in George Frideric Handel's Rodelinda, 1932; Elisabeth in Wagner's Tannhäuser, 1932; Isolde in Wagner's Tristan and Isolde, 1932; Gutrune in Wagner's Götterdämmerung, 1934; Brünnhilde in Wagner's Die Walküre, 1935; Sieglinde in Wagner's Die Walküre, 1935; Brünnhilde in Wagner's Götterdämmerung, 1935; Leonore in Ludwig van Beethoven's Fidelio, 1948; Alceste in Christopher Willibald Gluck's Alceste, 1951; Dido in Henry Purcell's Dido and Aeneas, 1951.

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Snow, 1929; Lieder (8), Op. 10: No. 8, Allerseelen, 1935; Songs (6), Op. 48: No. 6, Ein traum, 1936; Tristan und Isolde: Einsam Wachend . . . Habet Acht!, 1936; Die Walküre: Ho-jo-to-ho!, 1936; When I Have Sung My Songs, 1936; Songs (9), Op. 63: No. 5, Junge Lieder I: Mein Liebe Ist Grün, 1937; Die Walküre: Du Bist der Lenz, 1937; Haugtussa, Op. 67: No. 7, Evil Day, 1940; Tristan und Isolde: Wie Lachen Sie Mir: "Narrative and Curse," 1947; Tristan und Isolde: Mild und Leise "Liebestod," 1948; Four Last Songs, AV 150: No. 1, Frühling, 1950; Lieder (4), Op. 27: No. 2, Cäcilie, 1950; Dido and Aeneas, Z 626: Thy Hand, Belinda . . . When I Am Laid in Earth, 1951; Elektra, Op. 58: Orest! Est Rührt Sich Niemand, 1952; Die Schöne Magelone, Op. 33: No. 12, Muss Es Eine Trennung Geben, 1954; Paskemorgen Slukker Sorgen, 1956; Melodies (12), Op. 33: No. 2, Spring, 1957.

The Life

Kirsten Målfrid Flagstad (KER-stehn MAHL-freed FLAG-stahd) made her operatic debut at the age of eighteen, singing the role of Nuri in Eugen d'Albert's Tiefland (1913) at the National Theater in Oslo. In the nearly two decades that followed, she performed exclusively in Scandinavia, with contracts at the Opera Comique in Oslo (1919) and the Storm-Theater in Göteborg (1928). International fame would soon follow. In 1932 a triumphant run as Isolde in Oslo led to engagements at the Bayreuth Festspiele in Germany. After two successful summers at Bayreuth, Flagstad signed with the Metropolitan Opera in New York in 1935. Her American debuts as Sieglinde and Isolde, and shortly thereafter as Brünnhilde, earned her a worldwide reputation as a leading Wagnerian soprano.

World War II temporarily interrupted Flagstad's career, and she faced criticism, especially in the United States, for her decision to return to Nazi-controlled Norway. Following the war, she performed for several seasons at Covent Garden in London to great acclaim, and American audiences gradually re-embraced her. A high point in her career came in May, 1950, when she gave the premiere of Richard Strauss's Four Last Songs (1950). Flagstad retired from the operatic stage in 1953, and she later served as general manager of the Norwegian Opera in Oslo for two seasons (1958-1960) before succumbing to bone marrow disease on December 7, 1962.

The Music

Flagstad was virtually unknown outside of Scandinavia until her late thirties, and for the first two decades of her career, she performed mostly light roles. The late 1920's marked a turning point: She began singing heavy roles in the operas of Giuseppe Verdi, Giacomo Puccini, and Richard Wagner. Flagstad gained fame as a dramatic soprano, and her performance background in oratorios, operettas, Baroque opera, and even musical comedy is often overlooked. One of her most performed roles was that of Dido in the seventeenth century opera Dido and Aeneas (1689) by Henry Purcell, which she performed first in 1951. Her ability to draw upon both lighter and heavier vocal techniques, to sing with both delicate control and striking power, are hallmarks of a style that exerted wide influence on succeeding generations of sopranos.

Isolde. With her premiere of the role on June 29, 1932, in Oslo, Flagstad quickly established herself as a foremost interpreter of Wagner's Isolde in Tristan and Isolde (1865).

The most important recordings include a live performance conducted by Fritz Reiner in 1936 with Lauritz Melchior as Tristan and a 1952 studio recording conducted by Wilhelm Furtwängler with Ludwig Suthaus as Tristan. The pairing of Flagstad and Melchior was definitive. Already in her early forties, Flagstad ascended to Wagner's more demanding roles at a relatively late age, but her patience resulted in powerful performances. The Reiner recording offers a voluptuous and highly passionate sound that seizes upon the dichotomy of Isolde's isolation in act 1 and her tenderness and eroticism in act 2. The 1952 performance is the first complete recording of the opera. Flagstad's nuanced phrasing and perceptive characterization are perhaps at their finest in the act 3 finale, "Isolde's Transfiguration." Her profound understanding of the role is supported by the sensitive pacing of Furtwängler, one of the great interpreters of Wagner's music.

Brünnhilde. Having triumphed in the smaller role of Sieglinde, Flagstad tackled Wagner's great heroine, Brünnhilde. Her premiere at the Metropolitan Opera on February 15, 1935, was one in a string of critically acclaimed performances that cemented her status as a leading Wagnerian soprano. As she had with Tristan and Isolde, Flagstad enjoyed a long history of performing Brünnhilde with Furtwängler and Melchior, the latter often singing opposite her as Siegfried.

The only extant, complete recording with Flagstad as Brünnhilde is of a now-legendary live performance at Milan's La Scala in 1950. Notwithstanding the poor audio quality, Flagstad's singing is both powerful and dramatically convincing. Her performance in Götterdämmerung (1874), and in particular its concluding "Immolation Scene," is especially memorable and emblematic of her authoritative reading of Brünnhilde.

Four Last Songs. Less than four months before his death, Strauss asked Flagstad to give the premiere of what would be his final orchestral songs. The first performance was given on May 22, 1950—about eight months after the composer's death—at the Albert Hall in London, with Furtwängler conducting the Philharmonia Orchestra. The surviving recording is badly deteriorated, and it is uncertain whether it documents the May premiere or an earlier rehearsal. Flagstad's performance in "Frühling" suffers from the wide vocal range demanded by Strauss's score, displaying an uncharacteristic weakness in the lower register. The placid contours of "September" better suit her mature voice, for example, in her serene delivery of the line "Summer smiles, astonish and languid in the dying garden dream." However, the second and third verses of "Beim Schlafengehen" are particularly moving as Flagstad captures the sentiment of an impending, yet peaceful end of life as described in Hermann Hesse's poem. "Im Abendrot" stands out among the four songs, in part from Furtwängler's slow pacing, and despite the poor recording, the long melodic lines are sung expressively and with a remarkable naturalness that set the standard for later interpreters of Four Last Songs.

Kirsten Flagstad. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Musical Legacy

During the politically tense circumstances of the 1930's and 1940's, when Adolf Hitler was coming to power in Germany, Flagstad's popularity at the Metropolitan Opera was central to the sustained interest in the Wagnerian repertoire in the United States. The arc of her career, dominated by lighter roles until middle life, allowed her to sing professionally well into her fifties, an approach that is now widely endorsed by vocal coaches. Flagstad's influence on the brilliant careers of fellow Scandinavians Birgit Nilsson and Astrid Varnay, who followed in her footsteps, was significant.

Joseph E. Jones

Further Reading

Biancolli, Louis. The Flagstad Manuscript. New York: Putnam, 1952. These autobiographical documents were dictated by Flagstad in 1941 and 1950-1952, and included are commentaries on her political controversies. Includes a list of roles and a selection of newspaper reviews.

Hunt, John. Six Wagnerian Sopranos. London: John Hunt, 1994. Expansive discography of Flagstad and five of her contemporaries. A short biography is included.

McArthur, Edwin. Flagstad: A Personal Memoir. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1965. Reflections from Flagstad's accompanist, vocal coach, and longtime friend. Includes photographs, the author's testimony at a 1946 court case in Norway, and an appendix with premiere dates and numbers of performances for each role.

Rasponi, Lanfranco. The Last Prima Donnas. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1982. Contains a chapter dedicated to Flagstad based on a 1940 interview in New York. Includes insights into her favorite roles.

Vogt, Howard. Flagstad: Singer of the Century. London: Secker and Warburg, 1987. Offers especially strong coverage of Flagstad's formative years and a balanced account of her return to Nazi-controlled Norway during World War II.

See also: Melchior, Lauritz; Puccini, Giacomo; Strauss, Richard.

Lester Flatt

American country singer, songwriter, and guitarist

In partnership with Earl Scruggs and other popular musicians, Flatt defined the American bluegrass style of music. A regular performer at the Grand Ole Opry, he was one of the first bluegrass musicians to perform in Carnegie Hall.

Born: June 19, 1914; Overton County, Tennessee
Died: May 11, 1979; Nashville, Tennessee
Also known as: Lester Raymond Flatt (full name)
Member of: Flatt and Scruggs; Foggy Mountain Boys

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): Flatt on Victor, 1970; Flatt Out, 1970; Nashville Airplane, 1970; The One and Only Lester Flatt, 1970; Kentucky Ridge Runner, 1972; Foggy Mountain Breakdown, 1973; On the South Bound, 1973; Before You Go, 1974; Over the Hills to the Poorhouse, 1974; Flatt Gospel, 1975; Lester Raymond Flatt, 1975; Tennessee Jubilee, 1975; Heaven's Bluegrass Band, 1977; Lester Flatt, 1977; Foggy Mountain Banjo, 1978; Nashville Grass: Fantastic Pickin', 1978.

ALBUMS (with Scruggs): Foggy Mountain Jamboree, 1957; Country Music, 1958; Lester Flatt and Earl

Scruggs, 1959; Flatt and Scruggs with the Foggy Mountain Boys, 1960; Songs of Glory, 1960; Foggy Mountain Banjo, 1961; Songs of the Famous Carter Family, 1961; Folk Songs of Our Land, 1962; The Ballad of Jed Clampett, 1963; The Original Sound of Flatt and Scruggs, 1963; The Fabulous Sound of Flatt and Scruggs, 1964; Beverly Hillbillies, 1965; Town and Country, 1965; The Versatile Flatt and Scruggs, 1965; Stars of the Grand Ole Opry, 1966; When the Saints Go Marching In, 1966; Changin' Times, 1967; Hear the Whistles Blow, 1967; Sacred Songs, 1967; Strictly Instrumental, 1967; Nashville Airplane, 1968; The Original Foggy Mountain Breakdown, 1968; Original Theme from Bonnie and Clyde, 1968; Songs to Cherish, 1968; The Story of Bonnie and Clyde, 1968; Detroit City, 1969; Breaking Out, 1970; Final Fling, 1970; Flatt and Scruggs, 1970; Foggy Mountain Chimes, 1970; Country Boy, 1972; A Boy Named Sue, 1973; Blue Ridge Cabin Home, 1979; You Can Feel It in Your Soul, 1988; Father's Table Grace, 2002; Foggy Mountain Special, 2003.

The Life

Lester Raymond Flatt was one of nine children, and he grew up near Sparta, Tennesse. His father taught him to play musical instruments, and, by age seven, Flatt could play the guitar. By age ten, he was singing at school and in church.

While still a teen, he began working at a silk mill in North Carolina. When it shut down, he and his wife Gladys found work at another one, in Johnson City, Tennessee. Later, they moved to Roanoke, Virginia, where Flatt began performing on radio with Charlie Scott's Harmonizers.

Problems with rheumatoid arthritis led Flatt to give up mill work and pursue music. In 1940 he and his wife moved to Burlington, North Carolina, where Flatt worked with a variety of musical groups. He cut his first record with Charlie Monroe's Kentucky Partners at a radio station in Winston-Salem, and the copies sent to other radio stations gave them wider exposure. The increased popularity led to nightly tent performances before audiences of up to two thousand.

Flatt first played at the Grand Ole Opry with Bill Monroe and his Blue Grass Boys sometime in 1945, and he became a lead singer and rhythm guitarist. Earl Scruggs joined the group near the end of 1945. Unhappy with long periods on the road, Flatt and Scruggs quit the band early in 1948, and they formed a new band, the Foggy Mountain Boys. They performed together for the next twenty-one years, until they split in 1969. Scruggs had been pushing for a more contemporary sound, and Flatt wanted to stay with the traditional bluegrass they had helped create.

The Music

Flatt was not only a vocalist and instrumentalist but also a composer of dozens of popular bluegrass songs, such as "Cabin on the Hill," "Bouquet in Heaven," "I'll Never Shed Another Tear," "Come Back, Darling," and "We'll Meet Again, Sweetheart." It is his performances of pieces written by others that are remembered, both by bluegrass enthusiasts and by the general public.

Martha White. Martha White, a company that made flour, cornmeal, and mixes for cornbread, cakes, and muffins, was a longtime sponsor of the radio program and live show Grand Ole Opry. The company's advertising jingle, written by Pat Twitty in 1953, was introduced by Flatt and Scruggs on the Grand Ole Opry stage. It became a bluegrass standard, and much later it became a signature piece for Rhonda Vincent and the Rage.

"The Ballad of Jed Clampett." Flatt and Scruggs performed this theme song for the comedy television series The Beverly Hillbillies (1962-1971), which ran for 274 episodes. The story of a naive backwoods family striking oil and moving to California was reprised as a television movie in 1981 and a theatrical film in 1993, always with the theme made popular by Flatt and Scruggs. The song, written by Paul Henning, reached number forty-four on the music charts in 1962. The two musicians appeared periodically on the television show. They had another Billboard country Top 10 hit with "Pearl, Pearl, Pearl," which referred to a character featured in an episode of the series.

The theme song was adapted by "Weird Al" Yankovic for his 1989 record of "Money for Nothing/Beverly Hillbillies," which appeared in his film UHF. It was performed in a different arrangement by banjo artist Béla Fleck in concerts, and it was parodied on television's Saturday Night Live. It is likely the best-known vocal by Flatt and Scruggs outside of bluegrass circles.

"Foggy Mountain Breakdown." First recorded in 1949, this instrumental was written by Scruggs, and it is probably the most popular instrumental composition performed by Flatt and Scruggs. Many five-string banjo players consider it the fastest and most challenging piece they can perform. In 2004 it was among fifty recordings added to the National Recording Registry by the Library of Congress. It was used to dramatize car chases and other highlights in the 1967 film Bonnie and Clyde. Other motion pictures and television shows have used it in a similar manner.

Musical Legacy

Flatt is one of the reasons that bluegrass music remains popular. In conjunction with other artists, such as Scruggs and Monroe, he helped define the sound of bluegrass. Flatt brought his style of bluegrass to the Grand Ole Opry, with its national following, and, with Scruggs, he took it to such performance centers as Carnegie Hall. Bluegrass artists try to emulate his signature sound. In 2003 Country Music Television (CMT) ranked Flatt and Scruggs at number twenty-four among CMT's Forty Greatest Men of Country Music.

Paul Dellinger

Further Reading

Lambert, Jake. A Biography of Lester Flatt: The Good Things Outweigh the Bad. Hendersonville, Tenn.: Jay-Lyn, 1982. The book recounts Flatt's life, from his boyhood through the various bands and musicians with whom he worked, and describes his influence on the evolution of country music.

Smith, Richard D. Bluegrass: An Informal Guide. Chicago: Chicago Review Press, 1995. Focuses on many aspects of bluegrass in a comprehensible manner, with separate chapters on various musicians and bands, including one on Flatt and Scruggs.

Whitburn, Joel, ed. The Billboard Book of Top 40 Country Hits. North Hollywood, Calif.: Billboard Books, 2006. A complete guide to the Billboard Top Country Singles, with a history of all the Top 40 hits since 1942 and photographs of the recording artists.

Willis, Barry R., Dick Weissman, Art Menius, and Bob Cherry, eds. America's Music: Bluegrass—A History of Bluegrass Music in the Words of Its Pioneers. Franktown, Colo.: Pine Valley Music, 1997. More than six hundred pages of interviews with people in bluegrass music, including biographies, festivals, instruments, record companies, and speculation on the future of bluegrass.

See also: Fleck, Béla; Monroe, Bill; Ritchie, Jean; Scruggs, Earl; Stanley, Ralph; Watson, Doc.

Béla Fleck

American banjoist and composer

Fleck expanded the banjo's role in music, using a conventional instrument in an unconventional way, and his style borrows heavily from bluegrass, fusion, jazz, classical, and progressive rock influences.

Born: July 10, 1958; New York, New York
Member of: Tasty Licks; Spectrum; New Grass Revival; Strength in Numbers; the Flecktones; Aras

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): Crossing the Tracks, 1979; Fiddle Tunes for Banjo, 1981 (with Tony Trischka and Bill Keith); Natural Bridge, 1982; Double Time, 1984 (duets with others); Inroads, 1986; Drive, 1988; Solo Banjo Works, 1991 (with Trischka); Tales from the Acoustic Planet, 1995; Tabula Rasa, 1996; Uncommon Ritual, 1997 (with Mike Marshall and Edgar Meyer); The Bluegrass Sessions: Tales from the Acoustic Planet, Vol. 2, 1999; Perpetual Motion, 2001; Little Worlds, 2003.

ALBUMS (with Aras): Curandero, 1996.

ALBUMS (with the Dreadful Snakes): The Dreadful Snakes, 1983.

ALBUMS (with the Flecktones): Béla Fleck and the Flecktones, 1990; Flight of the Cosmic Hippo, 1991; UFO Tofu, 1992; Three Flew over the Cuckoo's Nest, 1993; Left of Cool, 1998; Outbound, 2000; The Hidden Land, 2006.

ALBUMS (with New Grass Revival): Deviation, 1984; On the Boulevard, 1984; New Grass Revival, 1986; Hold to a Dream, 1987; Friday Night in America, 1989.

ALBUMS (with Spectrum): Opening Roll, 1981; It's Too Hot for Words, 1982.
ALBUMS (with Strength in Numbers): The Telluride Sessions, 1989.
ALBUMS (with Tasty Licks): Tasty Licks, 1978; Anchored to the Shore, 1979.

The Life

Named after Hungarian composer Béla Bartók, Béla Fleck (BEH-lah flehk) began his interest in music by listening to the bluegrass duo Lester Flatt and Earl Scruggs perform the theme to the television situation comedy The Beverly Hillbillies. Fleck recalls that hearing Flatt and Scruggs "was like sparks going off in my head." Another early influence was the instrumental "Dueling Banjos" from the film Deliverance (1972).

Fleck started playing banjo at fifteen, and in 1973 his grandfather purchased him an instrument. Enthralled with music, Fleck enrolled in New York's High School of Music and Art. Because banjo lessons were not offered, he studied French horn and switched to chorus, though banjo remained his instrument of choice. Fleck studied with outside instructors Erik Darling, Marc Horowitz, and Tony Trischka, and he began experimenting with bebop (a form of jazz).

After graduating from high school, Fleck went to Boston. His band, the Tasty Licks, recorded two albums with Rounder Records: a self-titled album in 1978 and Anchored to the Shore the following year. In 1981—around the time Fleck moved to Kentucky—he joined Sam Bush, a Nashville-based mandolin player, in the band New Grass Revival. With this group, he found success as a musical innovator and a popular artist.

The Music

Early Works. When Fleck joined Bush in New Grass Revival, the band also featured John Cowen on bass and vocals and Pat Flynn on guitar. Their musical influences (mainly rock, country, and bluegrass) made them a nationwide hit, and Fleck benefited from the exposure he gained on New Grass Revival tours. Fleck stayed with the group for nine years, appearing in the albums Deviation, On the Boulevard, New Grass Revival, Hold to a Dream, and Friday Night in America.

Drive. Even while playing in New Grass Revival, Fleck continued recording the solo albums that he had been making since the beginning of his career, which included Crossing the Tracks, his first solo album, and Inroads. Drive featured a few guest performers, such as New Grass Revival bandmate Bush. The album earned Fleck a Grammy Award nomination for Best Bluegrass Album.

Béla Fleck and the Flecktones. Released in 1990, Fleck's first major project after the demise of New Grass Revival garnered attention from fans and from the music industry. The Flecktones formed when Fleck met harmonica player Howard Levy at the Winnipeg Folk Festival and bassist Victor Wooten. In 1988 public television offered Fleck his own show, and Fleck and Wooten set out to find a drummer to complete the band—which they did in Wooten's brother Roy, who was playing an instrument he had invented called the drumitar, a drum-guitar hybrid. Manipulating their music on Fleck's Apple Macintosh, the Flecktones signed a contract with Warner Bros., and soon after they won a Grammy Award for Best Pop Instrumental Performance for "The Sinister Minister." The group's next album, Flight of the Cosmic Hippo, also received Grammy Award nominations.

Outbound. Later albums, such as the wide-ranging Outbound, evolved beyond the simple, live style of the earlier albums. More sophisticated in production, later studio albums demonstrated Fleck's experimentation, not only with his virtuosic playing but also with classical instruments, such as those found in a symphony, and with whimsical instruments, such as steelpan drums and penny-whistles. The album also featured more than a dozen guest artists, including guitarist Adrian Belew and singers Jon Anderson and Shawn Colvin. The album picked up Best Contemporary Jazz Performance honors at the Grammy Awards that year. With Jeff Coffin eventually replacing Levy, Béla Fleck and the Flecktones has gained in popularity and has performed with such artists as the Dave Matthews Band, Sting, and the Grateful Dead.

Musical Legacy

Fleck revolutionized the sonic and playing possibilities of the banjo, much as Jimi Hendrix did with the guitar in the 1960's. His contributions as a composer and as a stylist revitalized the genres of fusion and bluegrass. Fleck's skill in playing different styles has been rewarded with eight Grammy Awards and twenty nominations. He was the first musician to be nominated for Grammy Awards in jazz, bluegrass, pop, country, spoken word, Christian, composition, and world music. His 2001 classical album, Perpetual Motion, in which he collaborates with bassist Edgar Meyer, won two Grammy Awards, including one for Best Classical Crossover.

Louis R. Carlozo, Judy Tsui, and LeeAnn Maton

Further Reading

Fleck, Béla. Béla Fleck and the Flecktones. Milwaukee, Wis.: Hal Leonard, 1998. This songbook compiled by Fleck includes twenty-five tunes, including "Blu-Bop" and "Flight of the Cosmic Hippo."

Graham, Jefferson. "Summer Tours Help Bands Pay Bills." USA Today, August 5, 2004. This article outlines Fleck's touring strategy, explaining how the multi-Grammy Award winner makes a living on the road, even without the benefit of a Top 10 hit, a gold record, or substantial radio airplay.

See also: Bartók, Béla; Flatt, Lester; Garcia, Jerry; Scruggs, Earl; Sting.

John Fogerty

American singer, songwriter, and guitarist

With his raw voice and bluesy guitar, Fogerty created the signature sound of the Creedence Clearwater Revival.

Born: May 28, 1945; Berkeley, California
Also known as: John Cameron Fogerty (full name)
Member of: Creedence Clearwater Revival

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): The Blue Ridge Rangers, 1973; John Fogerty, 1975; Hoodoo, 1976; Centerfield, 1985; Eye of the Zombie, 1986; Blue Moon Swamp, 1997; Deja Vu All over Again, 2004; Revival, 2007.

ALBUMS (with Creedence Clearwater Revival): Creedence Clearwater Revival, 1968; Bayou Country, 1969; Green River, 1969; Willy and the Poor Boys, 1969; Cosmo's Factory, 1970; Pendulum, 1970; Mardi Gras, 1972.

The Life

John Cameron Fogerty (FOH-gur-tee) was the third of five brothers born to Galen and Lucile Fogerty. Fogerty's parents divorced when he was a child, creating an emotional scar that appears in songs such as "Someday Never Comes" from Mardi Gras. On the other hand, positive memories of his childhood are recounted in the classic "Green River" (from the album of the same title), about the Fogerty family's outings to a campground run by the son of Wild Bill Cody. Fogerty attended high school in El Cerrito, a blue-collar suburb of San Francisco, and he formed a rock-and-roll cover band with Stu Cook (bass) and Doug Clifford (drums). Eventually they were joined by Fogerty's older brother Tom as lead singer, and the group called itself the Blue Velvets.

Fogerty married Martha Paiz in 1965, and they had three children before they divorced in the 1970's. He supported his family by playing music and by working for Berkeley's Fantasy Records, an independent jazz label. Saul Zaentz, a producer for the label, wanted to expand its offerings, and he signed a contract with Fogerty's band. After several singles failed to make it to the record charts, Fogerty was drafted into the Army. Ironically, the man who wrote the anti-Vietnam War anthem "Fortunate Son" (from Willy and the Poor Boys) avoided combat service in Vietnam by joining the Army Reserve from 1966 to 1967. After his discharge, Fogerty returned to his band and to Fantasy Records, which was now owned by Zaentz.

Dubbed Creedence Clearwater Revival, the band released its self-titled debut in 1968. Though the album was produced by Zaentz, Fogerty was clearly in charge of creating the band's distinctive sound. A cut from the album, a cover version of Dale Hawkins's "Suzie Q" (modified by a jam guitar solo and Gregorian-style chanting), became a Top 40 hit. In 1969 and 1970 Creedence Clearwater Revival entered a period of amazing artistic production amid an almost nonstop touring schedule. In 1969 the band released three Top 10 albums that featured multiple Top 10 singles: Bayou Country, featuring the classic "Proud Mary"; Green River, with its iconic title song as well as "Bad Moon on the Rise" and "Lodi"; and Willy and the Poor Boys, with "Down on the Corner," "Fortunate Son," and the Leadbelly cover "Midnight Special." In the following year the group continued its commercial and critical success with Cosmo's Factory, perhaps their finest album, and Pendulum.

John Fogerty. (AP/Wide World Photos)

However, the grueling touring schedule and competition within the band for control undermined its successes. Tom Fogerty, relegated to rhythm guitar player, quit the band in 1971, and bandmates Cook and Clifford demanded more input in the band's recording and finances. In turn, Fogerty demanded that the two remaining bandmates each write and produce a third of the material on their next album, Mardi Gras. In a vindictive mood, Fogerty refused to sing or play lead guitar on the other members' songs. The album included Fogerty's hit "Sweet Hitchhiker" and a cover of "Hello, Mary Lou," but Cook's and Clifford's songs were savaged by critics.

The band fell apart after the debacle of Mardi Gras. Moreover, Fogerty found himself at odds with Zaentz over the complex contracts and royalty arrangements with Fantasy Records. Zaentz's investment in Creedence Clearwater Revival had turned a respected jazz label into a media giant loaded with cash. David Geffen reportedly paid Zaentz one million dollars to buy Fogerty out of his contract, but the rock style of John Fogerty, released domestically on Geffen's Asylum label, failed to resonate with audiences attuned to dance music and soft rock.

Fogerty spent the next ten years away from the music industry. He returned with Centerfield, whose title song became an international hit as well as a mainstay at baseball games. It also included the hit "The Old Man Down the Road," which resulted in one of the most unusual legal cases in music history. Zaentz, who owned publishing rights to Fogerty's 1970 song "Run Through the Jungle," sued Fogerty for copyright infringement, claiming that the chord progression and riffs in the later song plagiarized the earlier song. Fogerty took the stand in his own defense, and with guitar in hand he played the two songs to show their differences. The jury found in Fogerty's favor, which seemed to establish a legal precedent that an artist could not plagiarize himself or herself. Zaentz also sued Fogerty for defamation over the song "Zanz Kant Dance" (a thinly veiled attack on Zaentz's alleged "robbery" of Fogerty's publishing royalties). Fogerty settled out of court, and the song was retitled "Vanz Kant Dance." Fogerty made further legal history by countersuing Fantasy Records for his attorneys' fees arising from the initial lawsuit; the Supreme Court found in Fogerty's favor in a 1994 decision.

The stress of lawsuits and an unsuccessful follow-up album forced Fogerty to retreat again from the music industry. Though he appeared in some live concerts, he refused to play any of his Creedence Clearwater Revival material since Zaentz owned the publishing rights. In Creedence Clearwater Revival's Rock and Roll Hall of Fame induction ceremony in 1993, Fogerty refused to play with ex-bandmates Cook and Clifford. In 1997 he released the Grammy Award-winning rock album Blue Moon Swamp, which featured a more upbeat Fogerty, coming to terms with his artistic life and legacy. He also started to play his Creedence

Clearwater Revival songs in concert again. In a final reversal of fortune, Fogerty rejoined the Fantasy label in 2007 with the release of the appropriately titled Revival. Fantasy, under new ownership, offered Fogerty a return of his lost publishing rights for his Creedence Clearwater Revival-era songs.

The Music

Fogerty combined a Louisiana "swamp" beat with well-crafted rock songs to create a string of hits and several outstanding album cuts. Creedence Clearwater Revival began as a somewhat typical San Francisco psychedelic guitar-rock band. Like the early Grateful Dead or Quicksilver Messenger Service, they reworked 1950's rock classics into extended jams built around a lead guitar improvisation (as in "Suzie Q").

The Creedence Sound. By 1969 Fogerty had redefined the direction of Creedence Clearwater Revival's music toward three-minute songs built upon simple but memorable guitar riffs and incisive, image-filled lyrics. Already the band's songwriter, singer, and lead guitarist, Fogerty became its producer. A master of a number of other instruments (harmonica, organ, and saxophone), he practically dictated the Creedence Clearwater Revival sound. Later, as a solo artist, he often played every instrument (including bass and drums) on his records. Centerfield, perhaps the best example, sounds remarkably close to the Creedence Clearwater Revival sound that he had developed decades earlier.

Guitarist. As a guitarist, Fogerty fuses the riff-based Chicago blues tradition exemplified by Freddy King and Hubert Sumlin with the Bakersfield country crisp guitar-picking of Don Rich (of Buck Owens's Buckaroos). Fogerty's post-1969 work would occasionally include extended jams, such as the masterfully orchestrated buildup of tension and release in Creedence Clearwater Revival's eleven-minute reworking of the Motown hit "I Heard It Through the Grapevine" (from Cosmo's Factory) as well as in "Ramble Tamble," the opening song from the same album, which begins as a country romp built around an intricate guitar riff, then transforms into a stately blues-rock guitar anthem similar to Eric Clapton and Duane Allman's work with Derek and the Dominos.

Fogerty's music is best known for deceptively simple blues and country guitar riffs. The classic introduction to "Green River" makes use of a common blues riff in the key of E, which Fogerty adapts with his own rhythmic pauses and accents. The song eschews the classic blues chord progression to incorporate country chord progression of E to C to A, before returning to the E root. Likewise, the power-chord riff of "Proud Mary" uses a relatively simple group of chords (C, A, G, F, and D) in a slightly syncopated beat that accents the chord changes.

Lyricist. While Fogerty is one of rock and roll's premier guitarists, he is also one of its finest lyricists. His blue-collar roots often color the subjects he tackles in song. For example, his famous antiwar song "Fortunate Son" stands apart from many of the antiwar rock songs of the period, which offered simplistic solutions to complex problems of war and peace. Fogerty's speaker in the song is not an antiwar protest marcher so much as an angry blue-collar realist who sees Vietnam as a rich man's war and a poor man's fight. This populist, realist message is also evident in the two-minute gem "Don't Look Now" (an album cut from Willy and the Poor Boys). The song's speaker notes that society relies on common laborers to plow fields and mine coal, and it allows them to live in poverty and starvation as long as it does not have to witness the toll those take.

Bayou Country. Another dominant mode in Fogerty's songwriting is his nostalgia for a lost Eden. Rich in music and culture, the Bayou country of Louisiana and Mississippi became Fogerty's personal dreamland. Although he never actually spent much time in the region until the 1980's, during one of his retirements from the music industry, Fogerty took possession of the place in song as early as "Born on the Bayou" (from Bayou Country), which refers to a hound dog, hoodoo, and a Cajun queen. Similarly, the hit single "Up Around the Bend" (from Cosmo's Factory) promotes a back-to-roots lifestyle that replaces the flashy superficiality of a neon culture with a simple, sustainable culture of wood.

Fogerty's connection to the mythic Bayou carries through to his solo work in classics such as "The Old Man Down the Road" (from Centerfield), whose title character has a valise made of rattlesnake hide and who acts as a conjurer or hoodoo-man.

Musical Legacy

Fogerty is a musical individualist. He is a songwriter who is capable of playing every instrument on his albums and of producing the final product. As such, he became a founding father of the Americana or roots music movement that flowered in the 1990's. It sought to celebrate individualism in America as well as its rich musical heritage of popular music genres, ranging from blues, folk, country, and soul. Fogerty may be remembered primarily for the landmark legal decisions regarding an artist's inability to plagiarize himself or herself and the awarding of attorneys' fees to defendants in nonfrivolous lawsuits.

Luke A. Powers

Further Reading

Bordowitz, Hank. Bad Moon Rising: The Unofficial History of Creedence Clearwater Revival. New York: Schirmer Books, 2001. Bordowitz chronicles the rise and fall of Creedence Clearwater Revival, emphazising Fogerty's hubris in the tragic demise of the band.

Henke, James. "John Fogerty." Rolling Stone (November 5-December 10, 1987): 146-148. In this interview, Fogerty discusses everything from Creedence Clearwater Revival's participation in the original Woodstock Festival to the political apathy of the President Ronald Reagan era.

Perone, James. Songs of the Vietnam Conflict. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 2001. This work places Fogerty's anti-Vietnam War songs in a music history context. It focuses primarily on three Creedence Clearwater Revival songs: "Fortunate Son," "Run Through the Jungle," and "Who'll Stop the Rain."

Werner, Craig, and Dave Marsh. Up Around the Bend: The Oral History of Creedence Clearwater Revival. New York: Harper Perennial, 1999. Werner weaves together new and old interviews to create a coherent chronicle of the band's highs and lows and Fogerty's special role within the group. The group members speak candidly about themselves and their conflicts. Fogerty also provides insight into his songwriting process and his influences (particularly that of blues players).

See also: Clapton, Eric; Eddy, Duane; Leadbelly; Nelson, Ricky.

Aretha Franklin

American rhythm-and-blues singer and songwriter

With her gospel-influenced voice and overpowering performances, Franklin stretched the boundaries of rhythm-and-blues and soul music, becoming known as the Queen of Soul.

Born: March 25, 1942; Memphis, Tennessee
Also known as: Aretha Louise Franklin (full name); Queen of Soul; Sister Ree

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: The Gospel Soul of Aretha Franklin, 1956; Aretha, 1961; The Electrifying Aretha Franklin, 1962; The Tender, the Moving, the Swinging Aretha Franklin, 1962; Laughing on the Outside, 1963; Songs of Faith, 1964; Unforgettable: A Tribute to Dinah Washington, 1964; Once in a Lifetime, 1965; Aretha Arrives, 1967; I Never Loved a Man the Way I Love You, 1967; Aretha Now, 1968; Lady Soul, 1968; I Say a Little Prayer, 1969; Soul '69, 1969; Don't Play That Song, 1970; Spirit in the Dark, 1970; This Girl's in Love with You, 1970; Aretha Live at Fillmore West, 1971; Young, Gifted, and Black, 1971; Amazing Grace, 1972 (with James Cleveland and the Southern California Community Choir); Hey Now Hey (The Other Side of the Sky), 1973; Let Me in Your Life, 1974; With Everything I Feel in Me, 1974; You, 1975; Sparkle, 1976; Most Beautiful Songs, 1977; Satisfaction, 1977; Sweet Passion, 1977; Almighty Fire, 1978; La Diva, 1979; Aretha, 1980; Aretha Sings the Blues, 1980; Love All the Hurt Away, 1981; Jump to It, 1982; Get It Right, 1983; Never Grow Old, 1984 (with Reverend C. L. Franklin); First Lady of Soul, 1985; Who's Zoomin' Who, 1985; Aretha, 1986; Soul Survivor, 1986; One Lord, One Faith, One Baptism, 1987; Through the Storm, 1989; What You See Is What You Sweat, 1991; What a Difference a Day Makes, 1997; A Rose Is Still a Rose, 1998; Nobody Like You, 1999; Touch My Soul Presents Aretha, 1999; Duets, 2001; So Damn Happy, 2003; Jazz Moods: 'Round Midnight, 2005.

The Life

Aretha (ah-REE-thah) Louise Franklin was born to the Reverend C. L. Franklin, a Baptist minister and gospel singer, and Barbara Siggers Franklin. When Franklin was six years old, her mother abandoned the family and died a few years later. Franklin and her family moved to Buffalo, New York, and then to Detroit, Michigan, where her father became the pastor of New Bethel Baptist Church, one of the largest churches in Detroit. At age eight, Franklin joined the choir, and at age twelve, she was singing solo. While attending her father's church, Franklin embraced the music around her and molded her style.

Franklin grew up on the east side of Detroit in a large house shaded by trees, but she was shy and isolated as a child. Franklin had several mother surrogates, such as Mahalia Jackson, Marion Williams, and Clara Ward, who were world-renowned gospel singers, and they had a great impact on her career. Franklin took piano lessons as early as age eight, but she was not disciplined enough to study the instrument. She disliked practicing beginner songs, wanting to play more sophisticated songs immediately.

Franklin's father was an emotional gospel singer who befriended popular gospel and soul singers, and his powerful sermons moved large congregations. Franklin had a close relationship with her father, and she had a great desire to please him. At age fourteen, she dropped out of school in order to travel with her father and other performers. Her father preached and sang gospel songs, and she joined him in song. By age fifteen Franklin had her first child, and by age seventeen she had her second child. Her children remained in Detroit while Franklin continued her music career and recorded demo tapes with her father's friends.

In 1961 Franklin married Ted White, who was eleven years her senior. He was involved in real estate, and later he became Franklin's manager. White and Franklin had an abusive marriage, and in 1969 they divorced. Franklin married two more times: to musician Ken Cunningham and to actor Glynn Turman. She bore two more children, one son with White and another son with Cunningham. On June 10, 1979, Franklin's father was shot during a robbery in his Detroit home. This left him in a comatose state for more than five years, until his death on July 7, 1984.

The Music

Franklin's style was largely influenced by her father's and Ward's gospel singing. At eighteen years of age, Franklin decided to focus her career on pop music by signing for the Columbia Records label in 1960. She then signed with Atlantic Records in 1966, and in 1980 she signed with the Arista Records label. Franklin brought her gospel-inspired singing to soul music, and her songs display her exceptional vocal power and nuances of black vocal traditions.

Early Works. Franklin was first recorded at the age of fourteen in a live session by the Checkers label in 1956. The album contains a set of gospel songs, including "Precious Lord." Her album Aretha contains twelve songs, and it features Franklin playing the piano. On this album her song "Today I Sing the Blues" reached number ten on the rhythm-and-blues charts. Other songs on this album include "Over the Rainbow" and "Rock-a-Bye Your Baby with a Dixie Melody." In the early 1970's Franklin released several albums geared thematically toward the Black Power social and political movement of the time, which promoted racial pride. This Girl's in Love with You, Spirit in the Dark, and Young, Gifted, and Black all feature Franklin playing the piano in a gospel style, while Aretha Live at Fillmore West showcases Franklin's ability to blend with a dominating rock sound. One of her most successful albums during this time period was Amazing Grace, which signaled a return to her roots, gospel music.

"Respect." Franklin premiered "Respect" in the spring of 1967, and she recorded it on her album I Never Loved a Man the Way I Love You. Her interpretation of the song was much different from that of its originator, Otis Redding. Franklin approached the song with a full-throated ascending shout of freedom. The song utilizes background singers that provide a response to Franklin's phrases. During the vamp section, Franklin employs lyric improvisation by developing the lyric in a way that meets her personal style. The song reached number one on the pop singles chart.

"Chain of Fools." "Chain of Fools" was first released as a single in 1967. Later, it appeared in several of Franklin's albums. The word chain is emphasized, through repetition and through stressing the syllables "a-ee," scooping from one note to the next. The overall song is in binary form with a verse and choral refrain, and there is an antiphonal texture during the repetitive chorus section. Franklin begins the verses in the upper range and drops her voice down the blues scale. During the a cappella section, hand-claps accompany Franklin and the background singers, reminiscent of early gospel male vocal quartets. During the vamp, the word chain continues to be emphasized, but Franklin adds lyric variation with her unpredictable soaring phrases. The song reached number one on the rhythm-and-blues charts and number two on the pop charts.

"Natural Woman." Franklin recorded "Natural Woman" in 1967. In the beginning of this song, the piano is played in a gospel style at a moderate tempo, and Franklin sings with exquisite expression. Although Franklin was only twenty-five at the time she recorded "Natural Woman," she sounds as if she were a much older woman who had overcome a lifetime of obstacles. The background singers create an antiphonal texture throughout the verses by harmonizing and scooping the syllables "ah-ew." During the chorus, the background singers join Franklin in creating a heterophonic texture, and she utilizes lyric variation during the vamp as the song comes to an end. "Natural Woman" reached number two on the pop charts and number eight on the Billboard Hot 100.

"I Never Loved a Man the Way I Love You." "I Never Loved a Man the Way I Love You" was one of Franklin's most popular songs, and it was the title of an album released in 1967. Franklin sings this song with liberty, using a scooping technique, and her soaring voice is similar to a cry of pain. Very little background singing is utilized in the song. At the end of the piece Franklin transitions directly into a lyric variation as she extends the text by embellishing the lyrics. The song reached number one on the rhythm-and-blues charts and number nine on the pop charts.

"Think." "Think" was released in 1968 on Aretha Now. The song is an anthem for women, encouraging them to demand the respect and the freedom they deserve. A fast-paced song, it begins with the piano being played in a gospel style and with the background singers creating an antiphonal texture. Between the verses, Franklin adds lyrical variation by filling in musical moments with material (such as an emotional, soaring wail) based on the lyrics. At the end of the song she employs lyric improvisation during the vamp, similar to many of her songs. "Think" reached number seven on the pop singles chart and number one on the black singles chart.

"Young, Gifted, and Black." "Young, Gifted, and Black" was released in 1971 on Franklin's album Young, Gifted, and Black, which won a Grammy Award for Best Female Vocal Performance. The song was originally recorded in 1969 by Nina Simone, a singer, songwriter, pianist, and civil rights activist, under the title "To Be Young, Gifted, and Black." The song celebrates and encourages young blacks during a time of blatant racism. Franklin sings with emotional power, beginning with a call-and-response pattern between Franklin and the piano. Shortly after the introduction, the background singers join her. This song reached number two on the rhythm-and-blues charts and number eleven on the pop charts.

Musical Legacy

At a young age, Franklin captivated the world with her soulful voice, and she remains a dominating figure. Her songs confront her personal life and the political movements of her time. She applied her gospel-inspired voice to soul music as well as to rock and roll. She has been honored with eighteen Grammy Awards, six gold albums, and fourteen gold singles. She was the first female artist to be inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 1987.

Monica T. Tripp

Further Reading

Awkward, Michael. Soul Covers: Rhythm and Blues Remakes and the Struggle for Artistic Identity (Aretha Franklin, Al Green, and Phoebe Snow). Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 2007. Close consideration of the lives of three leading contributors to soul music.

Bego, Mark. Aretha Franklin: The Queen of Soul. New York: Da Capo Press, 2001. A major biographical study of Franklin, covering her personal life and her career, with an examination of her most popular songs.

Boyer, Horace Clarence. The Golden Age of Gospel. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1995. Coverage of the early history of gospel music, with a focus on its leading exponents and performers, including Franklin.

Guralnick, Peter. Sweet Soul Music: Rhythm and Blues and the Southern Dream of Freedom. New York: Harper and Row, 1986. A discussion of the leading figures of soul music during the 1960's, including Franklin.

Werner, Craig. A Change Is Gonna Come: Music, Race, and the Soul of America. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2006. A narrative of the growth of soul music over a span of forty years, with mentions of Franklin and her contributions.

See also: Blige, Mary J.; Burke, Solomon; Cleveland, James; Combs, Sean; Dorsey, Thomas A.; Goffin, Gerry; Holiday, Billie; Jackson, Mahalia; Jones, Quincy; King, Carole; Mayfield, Curtis; Pickett, Wilson; Redding, Otis; Reed, Jimmy; Simone, Nina; Smith, Bessie; Ward, Clara; Warwick, Dionne; Washington, Dinah.

Lefty Frizzell

American country guitarist, singer, and songwriter

Frizzell, with his signature vocal style of pitch-bending with muddled word pronunciation, helped bring honky-tonk to maturity.

Born: March 31, 1928; Corsicana, Texas
Died: July 19, 1975; Nashville, Tennessee
Also known as: William Orville Frizzell (full name)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Songs of Jimmie Rodgers, 1952; Listen to Lefty, 1953; The One and Only Lefty Frizzell, 1959; Saginaw, Michigan, 1964; The Sad Side of Love, 1965; Great Sound, 1966; Lefty Frizzell's Country Favorites, 1966; Lefty Frizzell Puttin' On, 1967; Mom and Dad's Waltz, 1967; Signed Sealed and Delivered, 1968; Classic Style, 1975.

SINGLES: "I Love You a Thousand Ways," 1950; "If You've Got the Money (I've Got the Time)," 1950; "Always Late (With Your Kisses)," 1951; "Mom and Dad's Waltz," 1951; "I Love You Mostly," 1954; "Cigarettes and Coffee Blues," 1958; "She's Gone, Gone, Gone," 1965; "Lucky Arms," 1974.

The Life

William Orville "Lefty" Frizzell (frihz-ZEHL) said he was born and raised "in an oil field behind an oil well." His parents, Naamon and A. D., regularly moved the family to follow the changing flow of the oil industry. Frizzell earned his nickname for delivering a left hook to a bully in the schoolyard. Always close to family, Frizzell, as a child, enjoyed visiting his Uncle Lawrence, and there a neighboring farmer introduced him to guitar picking. Within his immediate family, Frizzell's mother enjoyed singing and his father moonlighted in a Western band. After Frizzell began collecting musical repertory from songs he heard on the radio, he was afforded an opportunity to perform on KPLT radio in Paris, Texas.

At this time, Frizzell met Alice Lee Harper; and the teenage couple married in March, 1945. Soon after, the couple moved from town to town and state to state to maintain a living. They eventually settled in New Mexico, where Frizzell performed on KGFL until 1947, when he was put in jail for statutory rape.

After his incarceration, Frizzell and his wife moved back to Texas, where he auditioned for Jim Beck, a liaison for Columbia Records. Beck took great interest in Frizzell's song "If You've Got the Money (I've Got the Time)." However, when Columbia Records executive Don Law heard the singer, he was impressed with Frizzell's distinctive voice. Frizzell signed a recording contract, and soon he had several number-one hits and a spike in popularity. Frizzell went on tour with Hank Williams, and he joined the Grand Ole Opry. By 1953, because of poor contracts, mismanagement, and a growing alcohol addiction, Frizzell found his career floundering. Nevertheless, he remained popular on tour, and he released his last number-one hit in 1964. When Law retired from Columbia Records in 1972, Frizzell was dropped from the label. The singer died of a stroke three years later.

The Music

Although initially he modeled his style on that of Jimmie Rodgers, Ernest Tubb, and Bob Wills, Frizzell eventually found his own voice. Called the "boy with a wave in his hair and a curl in his voice," his vowel-bending, syllable-extending vocal practice entranced countless listeners, making him one of the most mimicked country singers of all time. Frizzell favored ballads and romance-themed lyrics, which showcased his nasal, but warm, voice. Lyrically romantic or otherwise, his reflections on life's trials and tribulations, in his jagged, emotional tone, connected him with a working-class audience. At the same time, his up-tempo tunes were equally admired in the honky-tonk blood buckets (taverns) and on the stage of the Grand Ole Opry.

"If You've Got the Money (I've Got the Time)." Encouraged to perform something upbeat for his audition, Frizzell completed "If You've Got the Money (I've Got the Time)" in Beck's recording studio. Upon hearing his note-bending vocal strains, Law offered Frizzell a two-year contract. The singer's slurred pronunciation and muddied vowels in lines such as "dance, drink beer and wine" captivated the Columbia Records executive. The heavy, offbeat rhythm of Madge Suttee's honky-tonk piano drives throughout most of the song, and it is briefly featured halfway through the song. Her instrumental solo breaks up the repetitive form. Thematically, the lyrics play on the reversal of standard gender roles, and Frizzell makes use of edgy double-entendres.

"I Love You a Thousand Ways." At summer's end in 1950, Frizzell released "I Love You a Thousand Ways" and "If You've Got the Money (I've Got the Time)" on opposite sides of the same record. Both sides eventually hit number one on the charts. The lyrics for this love ballad were composed by Frizzell while he was imprisoned in New Mexico. He was fueled by an intense longing for his wife, and he demonstrated an apologetic sentiment through his words. Again going up and down elongated syllables, Frizzell reveals his heartfelt emotions throughout the song. His regular upward slide and extended tones on "you" in the first verse resemble a child's whining plea.

"Always Late (With Your Kisses)." After Curly Chalker's gently progressing steel guitar riff, Frizzell picks up the vocal line on "Ah-al-waay-yays lay-ee-yay-ate," rolling each syllable through an extensive gamut of tones and glissandos. This may be the primary example of his innovative vocal practice. While Chalker claims no such confrontation occurred, he and Frizzell reportedly had a minor physical dispute over the singer's inability to time accurately his entrance. In the song, the steel guitar, piano, and fiddle take turns reproducing the melodic material presented by Frizzell. Chalker's instrumental portion on steel guitar comes close to emulating Frizzell's vocal ornamentations, but it seems less complex without the added encumbrance of words.

Lefty Frizzell. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

"Mom and Dad's Waltz." This was the other side of the hit "Always Late (With Your Kisses)," and the origins of this sentimental ballad are in dispute. While Frizzell maintained he composed it when homesick in Dallas, his sister claimed it was initially penned for their mother, A.D., in Big Spring, Texas. Similar to "Always Late (With Your Kisses)," "Mom and Dad's Waltz" features an instrumental interlude midway through, where the fiddle, guitar, and piano take turns performing the verse and chorus melodic material. The lyrical material highlights Frizzell's dedication and reverence for his parents. Expectedly, the rhythmic meter is 3/4 time.

"Cigarettes and Coffee Blues." Featuring a danceable tempo, strong backbeat, shuffling snare rhythm, walking bass line, and boogie-woogiestyle piano, "Cigarettes and Coffee Blues" is, when compared to Frizzell's earlier songs, stylistically closer to rockabilly. This musical change may have been intentional at a time when rock and roll was taking serious command over popular music. Other stylistic changes included clearer word pronunciation and fewer syllabic extensions. However, analogous to Frizzell's earlier works, the lyrical theme is one of lost love. Published in 1958, the song reached number thirteen on the charts.

Musical Legacy

Frizzell's primary musical contribution was, as noted by Law, his voice. He mastered the nuances of the Texan accent and dialect, placing them in song. Instrumentally, his voice paralleled the microtonal ability of the steel guitar. The vowel-bending vocal technique developed by Frizzell focused listeners' attentions on key lyrics, and it brought emotional substance to each extended syllable. These contributions significantly shaped the genre of honky-tonk, influencing Merle Haggard, George Strait, George Jones, Willie Nelson, Randy Travis, and Roy Orbison. Frizzell was one of the few singers to have four songs simultaneously on the country Top 10. In addition, he was the first country act to perform at the Hollywood Bowl in 1955. Frizzell received a star on the Hollywood Walk of Fame, and he was inducted posthumously into the Country Music Hall of Fame in 1982.

Janine Tiffe

Further Reading

Cooper, Daniel. Lefty Frizzell: The Honky-Tonk Life of Country Music's Greatest Singer. New York: Little, Brown, 1995. In writing this biography, Cooper conducted detailed interviews with Frizzell's family members, who provided him with primary sources. Includes photographs, discography, and bibliography.

Jensen, Joli. The Nashville Sound: Authenticity, Commercialization, and Country Music. Nashville, Tenn.: Country Music Foundation Press and Vanderbilt University Press, 1998. This resource discusses topics such as authenticity and commercialization, within the context of Nashville's country music industry. It includes a center section of photographs.

Kingsbury, Paul, and Alan Axelrod, eds. Country: The Music and the Musicians. New York: Abbeville Press, 1988. Rich with photographs, this book provides topical and chronological information on country music, placing honky-tonk within a larger historical context. Includes selected discography and bibliography.

Tribe, Ivan. Country: A Regional Exploration. Westport, Conn: Greenwood Press, 2006. A chronological survey of eighty years of country-music history, including a chapter on honky-tonk and sixty pages of biographical sketches, including one on Frizzell.

See also: Haggard, Merle; Nelson, Willie; Orbison, Roy; Rodgers, Jimmie; Tubb, Ernest; Williams, Hank.

Blind Boy Fuller

American blues singer

Although his recording career lasted a mere six years, Fuller was one of the most recorded blues artists of his time. His eclectic repertoire included blues, ragtime, spirituals, and pop music. He was known for his finger-picking, bottleneck slide playing, and expressive vocal style.

Born: July 10, 1907; Wadesboro, North Carolina
Died: February 13, 1941; Durham, North Carolina
Also known as: Fulton Allen (birth name)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Blind Boy Fuller with Sonny Terry and Bull City Red, 1966; Truckin' My Blues Away, 1978; Blind Boy Fuller, 1935-1938: Shake That Shimmy, 1979; Blue and Worried Man, 1983 (with Sonny Terry); Blind Boy Fuller, 1935-1940, 1990; East Coast Piedmont Style, 1991; Harmonica and Guitar Blues, 1937-1945, 1996 (with Terry); Untrue Blues, 1998; Rag, Mama, Rag, 2000; Get Your Ya Yas Out, 2007.

SINGLES: "Ain't It a Crying Shame," 1935; "Good Feeling Blues," 1935; "Homesick and Lonesome Blues," 1935; "I'm a Rattlesnakin' Daddy," 1935 (with Gary Davis and George Washington); "Rag, Mama, Rag," 1935 (with Davis and Washington); "Cat Man Blues," 1936; "Bye Bye Baby Blues," 1937 (with Sonny Terry); "Weeping Willow," 1937; "Big House Bound," 1938 (with Terry); "Pistol Slapper Blues," 1938 (with Terry); "Stop Jivin' Me Mama," 1938; "I Want Some of Your Pie," 1939 (with Terry); "You've Got Something There," 1939 (with Terry and Washington); "Good Feeling Blues," 1940; "Harmonica Stomp," 1940 (with Terry); "Precious Lord," 1940; "Step It Up and Go," 1940.

The Life

Blind Boy Fuller was one of ten children born to Calvin and Mary Jane Allen in Wadesboro, North Carolina. Following the mother's death in the mid-1920's, the family moved to Rockingham, North Carolina, where Fuller met Cora Mae Martin. In 1926 he and Cora Mae married; he was nineteen, she was just fourteen. Also in 1926, Fuller began experiencing problems with his vision. He and his wife moved to Winston-Salem to look for work, and he labored in a coal yard for a short time. Completely blind by 1928, he became largely dependent on his young wife.

With little money and a lack of steady work, Fuller and Cora Mae moved around often, eventually settling in Durham, where they applied for blind assistance from the welfare department. Fuller earned extra money by singing and playing outside tobacco warehouses and for house parties.

In 1934 James Baxter Long, the manager of a local department store and a talent scout for the American Record Corporation (ARC), discovered Fuller performing on the street. Soon Fuller traveled with Long to New York to lay down his first recordings for ARC.

In 1940 Blind Boy Fuller underwent a kidney operation, after which his health continued to decline. He died in February, 1941, of blood poisoning caused by an infection. He was thirty-three.

The Music

Faced with blindness and an inability to work amid the Great Depression, Fuller found music the only viable means of earning money for himself and his wife. While much of the economy was suffering in the early 1930's, the tobacco industry in North Carolina was thriving, and the workers created a demand for recorded and live music.

Fuller largely learned his repertoire by listening to recordings, but he also met two influential musicians in his early days who would accompany him on his first record dates. Gary Davis, a singer and masterful guitar player from South Carolina, was a profound influence on Fuller's guitar technique. Bull City Red, a washboard player and singer, often served as Fuller's guide on the streets.

In July, 1935, Long took Fuller, Davis, and Red to New York for their first recording session. Fuller recorded mostly solo pieces, playing a steel-bodied National Guitar, but on a few sides he was accompanied by Davis on guitar and Red on washboard. The session produced up-tempo dance pieces such as "Rag, Mama, Rag," provocative numbers such as "I'm a Rattlesnakin' Daddy," and slow, mournful blues such as "Ain't It a Crying Shame?"

Fuller's initial recordings were well received, and over the next six and half years Fuller recorded often. Almost all of his recordings were for ARC, but one July, 1937, session for Decca angered Long. Although he did not have an exclusive agreement with Fuller, Long threatened to sue Decca, which withdrew the recordings. Subsequently, Long bullied Fuller into an exclusive lifetime contract.

In 1937 Saunders Terrell, a blind harmonica player better known as Sonny Terry, became a regular recording partner. He is featured on many of Fuller's late-1930's recordings, including "I Want Some of Your Pie," "Stop Jivin' Me Mama," "Pistol Slapper Blues," and "Good Feeling Blues."

Fuller produced some of his finest material in the last two years of his life. The following works recorded during that time demonstrate his broad repertoire of blues, ragtime, and spirituals.

"Step It Up and Go." Recorded in March, 1940, this up-tempo dance piece is an example of Fuller's fine ragtime playing and features Red on washboard. A good-time dance number, "Step It Up and Go" was a big country-blues hit and became a standard among the Piedmont blues artists. Brownie McGhee recorded the tune soon after Fuller's death, and it was later recorded by Bob Dylan, John Hammond, Leon Redbone, and many others.

"I Want Some of Your Pie." Throughout his career, Fuller recorded many blues that contained sexual innuendo. "I Want Some of Your Pie" is a typical example. A common form of blues in the 1920's and 1930, these often humorous songs were known as hokum or party blues. Other examples from Fuller are "I'm a Rattlesnakin' Daddy," "Truckin' My Blues Away," and "Get Your Yas Yas Out."

"Precious Lord." This spiritual features Terry on harmonica. Fuller increasingly recorded gospel numbers late in his career. "Precious Lord" was recorded in his last session, only a few months before his death. Other spirituals recorded were "No Stranger Now," "Jesus Is a Holy Man," and "Must Have Been My Jesus." Although not a deeply religious man, Fuller promised to join the church if he survived his 1941 illness.

"Night Rambling Woman." This slow and devastating song is a plea to an unfaithful woman. Fuller's emotive vocals and adept fingerpicking are reminiscent of Delta bluesman Robert Johnson's style. Perhaps because of his deteriorating health, Fuller's voice is sometimes strained. "Night Rambling Woman" was the last song Fuller ever recorded.

Musical Legacy

Immediately following Fuller's death, Long recorded McGhee and released the record under the pseudonym Blind Boy Fuller, No. 2. McGhee recorded "Death of Blind Boy Fuller" in addition to several of Fuller's biggest hits. Afterward, Terry and McGhee often played together, eventually moving to New York and joining the folk-music scene there.

Fuller's recordings were an important influence on subsequent Piedmont artists. Several of his songs—such as "Step It Up and Go," "Truckin' My Blues Away," and "Rag, Mama, Rag"—were often covered by young artists in the Piedmont region and later by blues revivalists. Although Fuller's music career was short, it was prolific, producing more than 130 sides in less than seven years. Today almost all of Fuller's recordings have been reissued on compact discs, a testament to his continued importance in the blues genre.

Cara Lemon

Blind Boy Fuller. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

Further Reading

Bastin, Bruce. "Blind Boy Fuller." In Red River Blues: The Blues Tradition in the Southeast. Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 1995. This chapter contains biographical information, as well as a detailed account of Fuller's relationship with Long and his recording sessions.

_____. "Truckin' My Blues Away: East Coast Piedmont Styles." In Nothing but the Blues, edited by Lawrence Cohn. New York: Abbeville Press, 1993. Places Fuller in the Piedmont blues tradition. Mostly biographical, it also provides insight into Fuller's influence on the blues genre.

Charters, Samuel B. "Hey, Mama, Hey, Pretty Girl." In The Country Blues. New York: Da Capo Press, 1959. This chapter focuses on Fuller's relationship with Terry.

Oliver, Paul. "Piccolo Rag." In Blues Off the Record: Thirty Years of Blues Commentary. New York: Da Capo Press, 1984. Analyzes the meaning behind several of Fuller's songs.

Pearson, Barry Lee. "Blind Boy Fuller." In All Music Guide to the Blues: The Definitive Guide to the Blues. 3d ed. San Francisco: Backbeat Books, 2003. This guide contains only a short biography but includes reviews of reissues of Fuller's work.

Whirty, Ryan. "Blues Legend Inspires Quest." News & Observer, Raleigh, North Carolina, January 22, 2006. New biographical data as well as analysis of Fuller's significance in the blues genre.

See also: Clapton, Eric; Dylan, Bob; Johnson, Robert; Terry, Sonny.

G

Peter Gabriel

English rock singer and songwriter

Initially famous as cofounder, lead singer, and lyricist for the progressive rock band Genesis, Gabriel later forged a reputation as a solo performer noted for his innovative audio and video compositions and for his entrepreneurial spirit. Gabriel is also recognized for his philanthropic efforts to uphold human rights and to promote talented artists from around the world.

Born: February 13, 1950; Woking, Surrey, England
Also known as: Peter Brian Gabriel (full name)
Member of: Genesis

Principal works

FILM SCORES: Birdy, 1985; The Last Temptation of Christ, 1988; Rabbit-Proof Fence, 2002.

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): Peter Gabriel I (Car), 1977; Peter Gabriel II (Scratch), 1978; Peter Gabriel III (Melt), 1980; Peter Gabriel IV (Security), 1982; So, 1986; Us, 1992; Ovo: Millennium Show, 2000; Up, 2002; Big Blue Ball, 2007 (with others).

ALBUMS (with Genesis): From Genesis to Revelation, 1969; Trespass, 1970; Nursery Cryme, 1971; Foxtrot, 1972; Selling England by the Pound, 1973; The Lamb Lies Down on Broadway, 1974.

The Life

Peter Brian Gabriel was born February 13, 1950, in Woking, Surrey, England. He was the son of Ralph, an electrical engineer and inventor, and Irene, a musician; his parents' vocations would have a powerful influence on Gabriel's career.

A sensitive, precocious child, Gabriel was raised in affluence on a farm in Surrey called Deep Pool. A victim of sexual abuse perpetrated by classmates at school, Gabriel composed his first song at age eleven, a ditty about a slug. He attended Charterhouse, a renowned exclusive boys' school founded in 1611 in Goldalming, Surrey. In the mid-1960's at Charterhouse Gabriel joined two bands comprising fellow Carthusians (classmates at Charterhouse)—Garden Wall and the Spoken Word—as singer, songwriter, flutist, and occasional drummer. By the end of the decade, the bands had metamorphosed into Genesis (featuring Gabriel as lead vocalist and lyricist, keyboardist Tony Banks, guitarist Steve Hackett, bassist Mike Rutherford, and drummer Phil Collins). Like Emerson, Lake, and Palmer, King Crimson, and Yes, Genesis became a leader in the new musical genre of progressive rock. With Gabriel as front man, Genesis released six critically acclaimed albums between 1969 and 1974, beginning with From Genesis to Revelation and ending with The Lamb Lies Down on Broadway.

Gabriel, who wed childhood sweetheart Jill Moore in 1971 and fathered two girls (Anna, born in 1974, and Melanie, born in 1976), experienced creative differences with the other members of Genesis and left the band in 1975 to go solo. He released his initial self-titled album in 1977, which yielded the first in a succession of hit singles. A number of these spawned the highly creative and award-winning music videos that Gabriel produced. In the mid-1980's, along with live, studio, and compilation albums, he began contributing to several movie sound tracks.

Long an advocate of protecting human rights and promoting world peace and a staunch supporter of global music, Gabriel in 1982 founded the World of Music, Arts, and Dance (WOMAD), an organization that has sponsored ethnically diverse music festivals in more than seventy countries. Since then, Gabriel has also founded Real World Studios, Real World Records, and Real World Multimedia, which are committed to recording and promoting musical artists from everywhere on the planet. Other causes to which Gabriel, a multimillionaire, has lent physical, intellectual, and financial support include Amnesty International, Greenpeace, the Secret World Live tour, the Millennium Dome in Greenwich, England, and Witness. The last of these organizations has provided activists in more than fifty countries with video cameras and computers to document human-rights abuses. Ever the entrepreneur willing to embrace new technology, in 2000 Gabriel cofounded On Demand Distribution, a European online music provider (later sold to a company in Seattle, Washington).

Gabriel and his first wife Jill divorced in 1987. After highly publicized romances with actress Rosanna Arquette and singer Sinead O'Connor during the 1990's, Gabriel wed again in 2002 to a much younger Meabh Flynn, an Irish sound engineer, by whom he had a son, Isaac.

The Music

The Genesis Years. Gabriel first burst onto the musical scene in the 1960's as lead singer-lyricist for the powerhouse progressive art rock band Genesis. Initially an acquired taste in a world where pop was king, Genesis built a fan base for its complicated, classically inspired conceptual compositions. Some fans appreciated the close harmonies, arcane lyrics, complex rhythms, creative orchestrations, and frequent tempo changes that set Genesis apart from its more rock-oriented peers. Much of the band's popularity, however, came from the theatricality of its presentations, led by Gabriel, who, to cope with stage fright, performed in outrageous homemade costumes, masks, and makeup. While the first Genesis album, From Genesis to Revelation, sold poorly, each succeeding release—Trespass, Nursery Cryme, Foxtrot, and Selling England by the Pound—did better than the one before. The final Genesis album on which Gabriel appeared, The Lamb Lies Down on Broadway, has been favorably compared with such progressive classics as Pink Floyd's Dark Side of the Moon (1973) and Yes's Tales from Topographic Oceans (1973).

Solo Start-up. After leaving Genesis, Gabriel released four consecutive albums between 1977 and 1982 that bore only his name as title, because he believed each was a fresh issue of a continuing publication, similar to a magazine. (To differentiate among individual albums, they are typically called Peter Gabriel I, II, III, and IV, while fans usually refer to them by the cover art as Car, Scratch, Melt, and Security.)

The debut album, generally well received, reached number seven in England and produced the hit single "Solsbury Hill," Gabriel's wistful reflection about leaving Genesis. The second solo album was an experimental departure from his previous work, a collection of pop ballads and rock tunes containing social commentary that, though it the contained the provocative tracks "On the Air" and "D.I.Y.," produced no major hits.

Peter Gabriel III (Melt). Gabriel's third album represented a major turning point in his musical career. Featuring one of the first uses of cymballess drum machines, Peter Gabriel III was praised for its clever if unsettling lyrics (always Gabriel's strength), its social consciousness, and its incorporation of world beat rhythms. It also produced a number of hits, including "Intruder," "Family Snapshot," "And Through the Wire," "Games Without Frontiers," "Not One of Us," and "Biko," the last one of the first musical acknowledgments of South African apartheid.

Peter Gabriel IV (Security). Gabriel's fourth self-titled solo album—grudgingly subtitled Security for the American market—continued the experimental and ethnically diverse themes established with his previous effort. An intriguing blend of modern rock and world beat, this album yielded several hits, including "The Rhythm of the Heat," "San Jacinto," "I Have the Touch," and the rollicking "Shock the Monkey," for which Gabriel produced an innovative music video.

Peter Gabriel Plays Live. A set comprising live performances of songs primarily from the third and fourth solo albums—recorded at different venues during a 1982 tour of the United States—Peter Gabriel Plays Live captures the fervid audience reception and demonstrates the synergy among a small group of musicians in re-creating onstage some of Gabriel's best-known early studio hits. Included among sixteen songs are stage renditions of "The Rhythm of the Heat," "Not One of Us," "D.I.Y.," "San Jacinto," "Solsbury Hill," "Shock the Monkey," and "Biko."

So. Following extensive tours, during which he continued the dramatic presentations reminiscent of his tenure with Genesis (collected on Peter Gabriel Plays Live), the singer-songwriter took time off to compose the sound track for the critically acclaimed film Birdy. Returning to the studio, Gabriel in 1986 released his most commercially successful album to date, So. Titled for the fifth note on the musical scale, the album was a huge commercial and critical success. It featured a stunning range of songs, from the evocative, image-laden "Red Rain" to the Motown-influenced "Sledgehammer." Other cuts included an inspirational duet with Kate Bush, "Don't Give Up"; a love ballad, "In Your Eyes"; the cynical "Big Time"; and the dark, moody "We Do What We're Told."

Us. Gabriel's return to the studio after a six-year hiatus, Us (certified platinum in the United States, England, and Canada) showcased the talents of a large number of musicians: Dozens of individuals—including Sinead O'Connor, Brian Eno, Peter Hammill, John Paul Jones, and little-known ethnic talents—contributed to the album. Us, which chronicled the breakup of his first marriage and subsequent romantic entanglements, reached number two on the charts, thanks to such video-backed hits as "Digging in the Dirt," and "Steam."

Later Work. With his increasing involvement in other aspects of a multifaceted career, Gabriel's studio releases grew fewer and farther between after the mid-1980's. The emphasis shifted to his various Real World enterprises, his dedication to the development and promotion of underappreciated musical talent from around the globe, and devotion to charitable causes. These efforts include extensive touring on behalf of both world beat musicians (as documented on Secret World Live, 1994) and personal appearances and extensive financial contributions. There has also been a growing demand for Gabriel's compositional skills in other venues. The singer-composer wrote the score for Martin Scorsese's controversial film The Last Temptation of Christ; Ovo: Millennium Show, the music and video for the Millennium Dome; and the score for the Australian film Rabbit-Proof Fence.

Despite his busy schedule, Gabriel manages on occasion to produce new and original additions to his catalog. Up, dealing with maturity and the growing awareness of mortality, yielded such tracks as "I Grieve," "More than This," and "Signal to Noise." Sometimes, Gabriel's music touches a particularly sensitive nerve: Following the collapse of New York's World Trade Center in the wake of the attacks on September 11, 2001, America's Clear Channel Communications network included the Gabriel-Afro Celt Sound System collaboration, "When You're Falling," among a list of 150 songs recommended for banning.

Musical Legacy

A leader in progressive rock since the mid-1960's, Gabriel, both with Genesis and later as a solo artist, has greatly influenced musical showmanship with his elaborate, dramatic live performances. His recorded music—incorporating complex rhythms and textures, motifs from diverse cultures, and subject matter that heightens awareness of important social issues while simultaneously appealing to pop audiences—has garnered both commercial and critical acknowledgment in the form of Grammy nominations and awards and platinum records. His groundbreaking music videos—the multi-Grammy-nominated "Sledgehammer," which earned nine MTV Video Music Awards, as well as "Digging in the Dirt" and "Steam," which were the first to win consecutive short-subject video Grammy Awards—have inspired a creative visual renaissance among other musicians.

As significant as his contributions to popular music are, Gabriel's determination to promote talented worldwide artists is likely to have a more lasting effect. By giving voice to ignored or underrepresented cultures and by drawing attention to their particular needs, Gabriel will be remembered not only for his music but also for his contributions to a more egalitarian and peaceful world.

Jack Ewing

Further Reading

Baehr, Peter R. Human Rights: Universality in Practice. Amsterdam, Netherlands: Palgrave Macmillan, 2002. A professor of human rights at the University of Utrecht, Baehr explores the political and legal issues of human rights with an emphasis on supporters such as Gabriel.

Benioff, Marc, and Carlyle Adler. The Business of Changing the World. New York: McGraw-Hill, 2006. An intriguing study of philanthropy, this book features profiles of twenty corporate leaders, including Gabriel.

Holm-Hudson, Kevin. Progressive Rock Reconsidered. London, England: Routledge, 2001. A professor of popular culture and music discusses the importance of the progressive rock genre through an examination of the music of Yes, Genesis, Pink Floyd, and Procol Harum.

Thompson, Dave. Turn It On Again: Peter Gabriel, Phil Collins, and Genesis. San Francisco: Backbeat Books, 2004. Relies heavily on interviews to document the complete history of Genesis, including band members' solo careers.

Welch, Chris. Genesis: The Complete Guide to Their Music. London, England: Omnibus Press, 2006. Genesis's complete oeuvre and a section on Gabriel's solo work.

_____. The Secret Life of Peter Gabriel. London, England: Omnibus Press, 1998. Biography of the singer-songwriter written by one of England's best-known rock writers.

See also: Collins, Phil; Eno, Brian; Harris, Emmylou; Khan, Nusrat Fateh Ali; Nascimento, Milton; Robertson, Robbie; Sting.

Sir James Galway

Irish classical flutist

Galway's performances and recordings serve as a bridge for his audiences, crossing freely between popular and classical music genres.

Born: December 8, 1939; Belfast, Northern Ireland

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: The Man with the Golden Flute, 1976; Annie's Song and Other Galway Favorites, 1978; Pachelbel Canon and Other Favorites, 1981; The Wayward Wind, 1982; Nocturne, 1983; James Galway Plays Mozart, 1984; Christmas Carol, 1986; Serenade, 1989; Over the Sea to Skye: The Celtic Connection, 1991 (with the Chieftains); The Wind Beneath My Wings, 1991; At the Movies, 1992; Bach: Flute Sonatas, 1995; Celtic Minstrel, 1996 (with the Chieftains); Legends, 1997 (with Phil Coulter); Music for My Friends, 1997; Meditations, 1998; Unbreak My Heart, 1999; Wings of Song, 2004; My Magic Flute, 2006.

The Life

James Galway (GAHL-way) was born in Belfast, Northern Ireland. He studied flute at the Royal College of Music under John Francis and at the Guildhall School of Music with Geoffrey Gilbert. Afterward, he went to the Paris Conservatory to become a student of Gaston Crunelle and Jean-Pierre Rampal; he also studied privately with Marcel Moyse.

Thereafter, Galway performed for fifteen years in flute sections of the Philharmonia Orchestra, the London Symphony, and the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra. In 1969 he became principal flute of the Berlin Philharmonic, which he left in 1975 to pursue a solo career.

Galway has performed worldwide as a soloist with renowned orchestras. He also gives master classes, he performs chamber and popular-music concerts, and he makes numerous television appearances. As a recording artist, Galway has sold more than thirty million albums for labels such as Deutsche Grammophon, Sony, and RCA. While Galway's recordings of the classical flute repertoire are definitive, he is also a successful crossover artist, recording pop and Celtic music in addition to film sound tracks. Galway plays Muramatsu and Nagahara flutes. Early in his career he played a solid-gold flute by Cooper, earning him the nickname "the man with the golden flute."

The Music

Galway's voluminous discography reveals a performer who freely crosses boundaries. While some of his albums contain exclusively classical repertoire or popular tunes arranged for flute, he is just as likely to include both on the same album. In addition to recording the standard flute repertoire, Galway commissions and records new works.

The Man with the Golden Flute. Galway's debut album in 1976, The Man with the Golden Flute, consisted of short works (or single movements excerpted from larger works) intended to showcase Galway's prowess as a solo flutist. Most were familiar to those with little acquaintance with classical music, including flute arrangements of technical showpieces for violin or piano. The album does contain works originally for or featuring the flute, mostly from the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.

Sir James Galway. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Annie's Song and Other Galway Favorites. In 1978 Galway released Annie's Song and Other Galway Favorites. Like his debut album, this release featured short works from a variety of composers. Some display Galway's technical ability with adaptations of works for other instruments, such as Marin Marais's "Le Basque," Fritz Kreisler's "Love's Joy," and a movement from Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's Piano Sonata. These and the title work on this album, a charming adaptation of "Annie's Song" by John Denver, are complemented by arrangements of folk songs from Spain and Northern Ireland. In typical Galway style, this album brings together works from wide-ranging musical worlds.

During the 1980's, Galway continued to release albums featuring a mix of classical favorites and adaptations of popular or folk tunes. Examples include Pachelbel Canon and Other Favorites, The Wayward Wind, Nocturne, Serenade, and the holiday album Christmas Carol.

James Galway Plays Mozart. Recordings of the Mozart concerti are a staple in most flutist's discographies, and in 1984 Galway released the album James Galway Plays Mozart. This recording contains the two concerti K. 313 and K. 314, the Andante K. 315, and the Concerto for Flute and Harp, K. 299. In addition, it features the Rondo K. 373, the minuet from the Divertimento K. 334, and an arrangement of Eine kleine Nachtmusik.

This was not Galway's first album devoted to the works of a single composer, nor was it the first time he recorded some of the Mozart concerti, but the appearance of these particular works on a single album was important in establishing Galway as a serious flutist, and it contrasted sharply with his previous mixed-genre releases. Galway's renditions of these concerti are lighthearted and appealing, and they showcase his expert control over technical passages.

Music for My Friends. Alongside numerous greatest hits albums, in the 1990's Galway recorded albums of popular appeal and those of the standard flute repertoire. Of the former variety, The Wind Beneath My Wings, At the Movies, and Unbreak My Heart are representative examples, with renditions of songs by Stephen Sondheim, Paul McCartney, and Stevie Wonder.

While Galway's earlier albums tended to be accompanied by full orchestra, he later began to release recital albums, on which Galway collaborated with pianists such as Philip Moll, Christopher O'Reilley, and Martha Argerich. A representative example of this album was 1997's Music for My Friends, with his wife Lady Jeanne Galway on flute and Moll on piano. On this recording, Galway tackles some of the difficult recital repertoire for the flute, such as Jules Mouquet's "La Flûte de Pan," Phillipe Gaubert's "Nocturne et Allegro Scherzando," and Georges Hüe's "Fantasie." Galway's renditions of these works are characteristically flamboyant, but at the same time they display keen sensitivity to the contributions of his collaborators.

Musical Legacy

With his tireless performing schedule and his huge number of recordings, Galway has became one of the best-known flutists of his era. His willingness to cut across boundaries of genre has been important as a gateway experience for listeners to explore music they might not otherwise know. Among the early crossover classical artists, Galway paved the way for others to breach the traditional boundaries between popular and classical music.

Galway was knighted by Queen Elizabeth II in 2001, he was named the 1997 Musician of the Year by Musical America, and he has received numerous Record of the Year awards from Billboard magazine. In 2005 he was given the Outstanding Contribution to Classical Music Award at the Classic Brits Awards. In commemoration of his sixtieth birthday, RCA Victor Red Seal released a fifteen-disc retrospective of Galway's career. Galway has also edited several performing editions.

Carey L. Campbell

Further Reading

Galway, James. An Autobiography. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1979. Galway details the successes and trials of his childhood, his training, and his rise to fame. His comments about his teachers are especially enlightening.

_____. The Flute. New York: Schirmer Books, 1982. Galway provides a history of the flute, discusses playing techniques, and offers career advice.

Mann, William, with James Galway. James Galway's Music in Time. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1982. A music history textbook for nonspecialists that originated as a sixteen-part television series narrated by Galway. The text of Galway's introduction and his participation in this project reflect his concerns about classical music's accessibility.

Skowronek, Felix. Speaking Out! Interviews With Eminent Flutists. Seattle, Wash.: Seattle Flute Society, 1982. Interviews with various flutists, with both orchestral and solo artists represented. Galway reflects upon the work behind his accomplishments.

See also: Argerich, Martha; Denver, John; Kreisler, Fritz; Mahler, Gustav; Rampal, Jean-Pierre; Sondheim, Stephen; Wonder, Stevie.

Jerry Garcia

American rock singer, guitarist, and songwriter

A founding member and leader of the iconic band the Grateful Dead, Garcia was a prolific artist on the 1960's psychedelic countercultural scene, creating songs that captivated a legion of devout fans called Deadheads and inspiring artists in a variety of genres, including classical, jazz, folk, rock, and rap.

Born: August 1, 1942; San Francisco, California
Died: August 9, 1995; Forest Knolls, California
Also known as: Jerome John Garcia (full name)
Member of: Mother McCree's Uptown Jug Champions; the Grateful Dead; the Jerry Garcia Band; New Riders of the Purple Sage; Legion of Mary; Old and in the Way

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo or with various others): Hooteroll?, 1971 (with Howard Wales); New Riders of the Purple Sage, 1971; Garcia, 1972; Compliments of Garcia, 1974; Old and in the Way, 1975; Reflections, 1976; Cats Under the Stars, 1978 (with the Jerry Garcia Band); Run for the Roses, 1982; Mother McCree's Uptown Jug Champions, 1999.

ALBUMS (with the Grateful Dead): The Grateful Dead, 1967; Anthem of the Sun, 1968; Aoxomoxoa, 1969; American Beauty, 1970; Workingman's Dead, 1970; Wake of the Flood, 1973; Grateful Dead from the Mars Hotel, 1974; Blues for Allah, 1975; Terrapin Station, 1977; Shakedown Street, 1978; Go to Heaven, 1980; In the Dark, 1987; Built to Last, 1989.

ALBUMS (with David Grisman): Garcia/Grisman, 1991; Not for Kids Only, 1993; Shady Grove, 1996; So What, 1998; The Pizza Tapes, 2000 (featuring Tony Rice); Grateful Dawg, 2001; Been All Around This World, 2004.

WRITINGS OF INTEREST: Harrington Street, 1995 (autobiography); Garcia: A Signpost to New Space, 2003 (memoir).

The Life

Jerome John Garcia was the second son of Joseph Garcia, a swing band leader turned bar owner, and Ruth Marie "Bobbie" Clifford, a nurse. Named after his mother's favorite composer, Jerome Kern, Garcia took an early interest in rock and roll, blues, and folk music.

In 1947 Garcia lost the middle finger on his right hand while chopping wood with his brother, Clifford "Tiff" Garcia. Later that summer, his father drowned while fishing on a family vacation in Northern California. Trying to support her family, Garcia's mother spent the majority of her time at the family's tavern, Joe Garcia's, and by the end of the year Jerry and Tiff had moved in with their maternal grandparents, who lived across the street from their home. Garcia viewed this separation as abandonment by his mother, and he developed a feeling of being unloved.

After remarrying for the second time in 1953, Bobbie moved the family twenty-five miles south of San Francisco to suburban Menlo Park. Regarded as highly intellectual, Garcia enrolled in the public school's Fast Learner Program for eighth grade in the fall of 1955, but because of his aversion to test taking, he did not graduate until two years later. While at school, Garcia immersed himself in art, creating murals and sets for school plays, and literature, exploring the works of D. H. Lawrence.

In June, 1957, Garcia moved back to San Francisco to live with his grandparents. That August Bobbie gave him an accordion for his fifteenth birthday, which she allowed him to trade in for an electric guitar. Garcia used the time he spent as a dishwasher at Joe Garcia's to learn, by ear, all the Chuck Berry songs he heard on the jukebox.

By the fall of 1957, when he entered Denman Junior High School in the Outer Mission District, Garcia was smoking cigarettes and marijuana. In 1958 he read Jack Kerouac's beat tale On the Road (1957), a book that solidified his connection to the budding alternative beatnik counterculture. By the end of 1960, Garcia, dismissing attempts to conform, joined a band, the Chords, after his mother transferred him to another suburban school.

Later Garcia enlisted in the Army, and he was discharged after a few months. He moved in with friends in Palo Alto, California, near Stanford University. While working the lights for a local theater production of Damn Yankees (1955) in March, 1961, he met future songwriting partner Robert Hunter. The two performed at local music spots, such as Kepler's Books, where Garcia was first introduced to Ronald C. McKernan ("Pigpen") and St. Michael's Alley, where he met Phil Lesh. Garcia also met Sara Ruppenthal, a Stanford sophomore, at Kepler's Books. The two married on April 25, 1963; in December, Ruppenthal gave birth to their daughter, Heather. Ruppenthal and Garcia divorced when Heather was three.

Aside from performing with Hunter, Garcia worked as an acoustic guitar and banjo instructor. On New Year's Eve, 1963, he met Bob Weir. Weir and Pigpen would soon join Garcia in forming the jug band Mother McCree's Uptown Jug Champions.

In 1964, a defining year in Garcia's life, he tried the hallucinogenic drug LSD, legal at the time. In addition, the jug band transformed, with the addition of Lesh and Bill Kreutzmann, into the Warlocks. The Warlocks were aligned socially with Ken Kesey's Merry Band of Pranksters, an antiestablishment group, and often performed at the group's Acid Tests, where partyers knowingly or unknowingly ingested LSD. In 1965 the Warlocks changed their name to the Grateful Dead, and Garcia's life as a highly successful musician and charismatic counterculture icon began. Garcia also became a father two more times: to Annabelle in 1970 and Theresa ("Trixie") in 1974. Garcia and the girls' mother, Carolyn Adams, nicknamed Mountain Girl by the Merry Pranksters, married in 1981.

Jerry Garcia. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Unfortunately, the following decades hosted mental and physical lows for Garcia. His mother, severely injured in an automobile accident in 1970, died a few weeks later. In 1986 Garcia slipped into a diabetic coma that lasted for five days. In 1993 he and Adams divorced; Garcia married Deborah Koons on Valentine's Day, 1994. His involvement with drugs escalated to include opiates as well as cocaine, and his health quickly deteriorated. On August 8, 1995, Garcia admitted himself to Serenity Knolls, a rehabilitation center twenty miles north of San Francisco. On August 9, 1995, at 4:23 in the morning, Garcia died of a heart attack.

The Music

Garcia's music mirrored the collective disenchantment members of the counterculture often found with notions of conformity inherent in American culture. Much more than arbitrary psychedelic experimentation, his songs represented highly constructed spaces where divergent musical techniques and society harmoniously collided. Believing that "art is not only something you do, but something you are as well," Garcia used his own life experiences as a basis for his compositions. Captivated by classical, blues, folk, and rock music, Garcia played eclectic music that crossed racial and socioeconomic boundaries. Blending these styles and sounds into one fluidly composed musical arrangement, Garcia successfully broke established social customs and demonstrated how music and culture could embrace diversity and multiplicity.

"Scarlet Begonias." One of five Garcia songs on the album Grateful Dead from the Mars Hotel, "Scarlet Begonias" debuted live on March 23, 1974, at San Francisco's Cow Palace. The song became a fan and band favorite because its complex composition and numerous instrumental solo sections provided for free-flowing improvisation. In live performances, "Scarlet Begonias" was frequently followed by "Fire on the Mountain," and this combination was referred to as "Scarlet Fire." The lyrics "Strangers stoppin' strangers just to shake their hands" and "Everybody's playin' in the Heart of Gold Band," which appear at the end of "Scarlet Begonias," hold special meaning, affirming the intimate relationship between the fans and the band.

"Shakedown Street." The title song to the Grateful Dead's tenth album, "Shakedown Street," was Garcia's ode to disco. When the album was released in 1978, fans were wary, because disco was a divisive genre. While disco had legions of avid supporters, many others loathed the synthesized, repetitive nature of disco music. However, the band's fans learned through the Grateful Dead's live performances of it that the studio version of "Shakedown Street" was merely a launching pad for extended improvisation. "Shakedown Street" became synonymous with the area outside a performance venue where fans often doubled as vendors and sold an assortment of goods, ranging from T-shirts and food to drugs and drug paraphernalia.

"Touch of Grey." First played live on September 15, 1982, "Touch of Grey" did not appear on an album until five years later, on 1987's In the Dark. The lyrics were penned by Hunter, and Garcia composed for them an upbeat arrangement that caught notice. Released at a point when popular hit singles reigned, "Touch of Grey" brought mainstream mass-media attention to the country's most successful and popular touring band. As the refrain's lyrics shift from "I will survive" to "We will survive," the song advocates personal and collective perseverance and triumph. The most successful mainstream Grateful Dead song, it listed on the Billboard Top 10. The band produced its only music video for "Touch of Grey," and it aired as the culminating point on what MTV dubbed Day of the Dead. The song, however, divided the band's fan base. Some delighted in the mainstream's sudden interest in the band, while others felt the song paved the way for fair-weather fans who attended shows simply to hear one song, which, in traditional Grateful Dead form, was not played every night.

Musical Legacy

Garcia's music, especially that written and produced for the Grateful Dead, helped many individuals find peace and happiness in an alienating world, giving a voice to and kinship for members of the counterculture. Even after Garcia's death, people of various races, ages, genders, nationalities, and socioeconomic classes identified themselves as his fans. Rock-and-roll artists, rappers, and classical composers cite Garcia as an influential model. On September 29, 2005, ten years after his death, a group of such individuals came together in Berkeley, California, to celebrate Garcia's life, influence, and legacy at the tribute concert, Comes a Time: A Celebration of the Music and Spirit of Jerry Garcia.

Elizabeth Anne Yeager

Further Reading

Dodd, David, and Diana Spaulding. The Grateful Dead Reader. London: Oxford University Press, 2001. A vault of Grateful Dead information, with interviews, articles, lyric interpretations, and show reviews.

Gans, David. Conversations with the Dead. New York: Routledge, 1991. A collection of interviews with band members, including Garcia. Gans, a musician and self-identified Deadhead, hosted the radio program "The Grateful Dead Hour."

_____. Not Fade Away. New York: Avalon, 1995. A collection of fan stories and memories that were posted on the Internet in memory of Garcia immediately following his death. A key tool in examining the cultural impact of Garcia's life as well as his musical legacy.

Garcia, Jerry. Harrington Street. New York: Delacorte Press, 1995. This is an autobiographical and anecdotal personal history by Garcia.

Garcia, Jerry, Charles Reich, and Jann Wenner. Garcia: The Rolling Stone Interview. San Francisco: Straight Arrow Books, 1972. Detailed interview with Garcia during the Grateful Dead's formative years.

Hunter, Robert. Box of Rain. New York: Penguin, 1993. A collection of song lyrics and stories regarding song origins.

Jackson, Blair. Garcia: An American Life. New York: Penguin Books, 1999. A detailed biography of Garcia written by an established rock journalist and longtime Grateful Dead reporter. Jackson blends interviews with Garcia that cover a thirty-year span with those of other band members, close friends, family members, and business associates for a humane portrait of Garcia.

McNally, Dennis. A Long Strange Trip. New York: Broadway Books, 2002. Historiography of the Grateful Dead and individual members written by the band's official historian and longtime publicist.

See also: Anastasio, Trey; Carter, Maybelle; Dodge, Charles.

Art Garfunkel

American rock and folksinger and songwriter

Garfunkel, who formed a folk-rock duo with Paul Simon, is noted for his haunting and hushed vocal style.

Born: November 5, 1941; Queens, New York
Also known as: Arthur Ira Garfunkel (full name); Artie Garr
Member of: Tom and Jerry; Simon and Garfunkel

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (solo): Angel Clare, 1973; Breakaway, 1975; Watermark, 1977; Fate for Breakfast, 1979; Scissors Cut, 1981; The Animals' Christmas, 1986; Lefty, 1988; Songs from a Parent to a Child, 1997; Everything Waits to Be Noticed, 2002; Some Enchanted Evening, 2007.

ALBUMS (with Simon and Garfunkel): Wednesday Morning, 3 A.M., 1964; Parsley, Sage, Rosemary, and Thyme, 1966; The Sounds of Silence, 1966; Bookends, 1968; The Graduate, 1968 (with others); Bridge over Troubled Water, 1970.

The Life

Arthur Ira Garfunkel (GAHR-fuhn-kuhl) was born in Queens, New York, to parents of Romanian Jewish descent. In sixth grade, Garfunkel met Paul Simon when they both appeared in their school's production of Alice in Wonderland (Garfunkel was the Cheshire Cat). As juniors at Forest Hills High School, the duo adopted stage names of Tom and Jerry, and they released a moderate-selling single entitled "Hey Schoolgirl." They also appeared on the televised dance show American Bandstand, sharing the bill with Jerry Lee Lewis. Their follow-up single was not successful, so they disbanded and went to college. Garfunkel attended Columbia University to study architecture (later obtaining a degree in art history) and performed occasionally as Artie Garr.

Garfunkel and Simon reunited in 1962, and they began performing in Greenwich Village folk coffeehouses before being signed to CBS Records by Tom Wilson. Their debut album, Wednesday Morning, 3 A.M., sold only a few copies until Wilson had the single "The Sounds of Silence" overdubbed with electric instruments, which transformed it into a huge hit. After years of commercial success, Garfunkel decided to pursue an acting career, and the duo disbanded again. They have reunited for several performances, and both perform and record as solo artists.

The Music

Simon and Garfunkel performed primarily between 1957 and 1970. After being signed to CBS Records by Wilson in 1964, they released their debut album, Wednesday Morning, 3 A.M., which was not a commercial success. The disappointed duo temporarily split, with Simon moving to Europe (and releasing his solo British album, The Paul Simon Songbook, in 1965), and Garfunkel pursuing a master's degree in mathematics from Columbia University. A year later, without their knowledge, Wilson used Bob Dylan's studio band to overdub "The Sounds of Silence" with electric guitar, bass, and drums, releasing it as a single and making it a number-one hit. Radio stations across the country began receiving requests for the song, and CBS decided to salvage the album. Simon returned to the United States to regroup with Garfunkel, and the two became stars. Though neither of them initially approved of Wilson's "electrified" version of their music, it was that folk-rock style that made them famous.

Early Works. The Wilson remixed single appeared on the duo's second album, The Sounds of Silence, which also featured material taken from The Paul Simon Songbook. A surprise success, the album contained the hits "Homeward Bound" and "I Am a Rock." Their next album, Parsley, Sage, Rosemary, and Thyme, contained such favorites as "A Hazy Shade of Winter," "At the Zoo," "The Fifty-ninth Street Bridge Song" ("Feelin' Groovy"), and "Scarborough Fair."

The Graduate. Filmmaker Mike Nichols commissioned the duo to do some songs for the sound track of his 1967 film, The Graduate. The sound track was an instant hit, and in 1968 it knocked the Beatles' White Album off the top of the record charts. In 1969 the single "Mrs. Robinson" later won the first of several Grammy Awards for Simon and Garfunkel. Initially composed by Simon as a nostalgic salute to Americana, "Mrs. Robinson" began lyrically as "Mrs. Roosevelt." Nichols suggested the name change to relate it to his movie, and with that edge the duo ended up with a huge success. Their follow-up album, Bookends, became a number-one Billboard hit. The themes on the album were more complex than previously released albums, and it also included an updated version of "Mrs. Robinson."

Bridge over Troubled Water. At the height of their success, Simon and Garfunkel experienced pronounced personal differences. By 1969 Garfunkel was earnestly pursuing a film career, and he was given the role of Nately in Nichols's film adaptation of Joseph Heller's novel Catch-22 (1961). Simon had also been promised a part in the film, but it was ultimately cut. Garfunkel's filming time conflicted with studio recording time for the duo's next album, Bridge over Troubled Water, causing further tension in their relationship. The album, featuring eleven tracks, took two years to complete. Despite the strain between Simon and Garfunkel, the album was one of the best-selling of the entire 1970's, and it won several Grammy Awards in 1971, including Album of the Year and Best Engineered Recording. The title track, featuring Garfunkel's unmistakable tenor, won Record of the Year and Song of the Year. That same year, they also won Best Contemporary Song and Best Arrangement Accompanying Vocalists.

Other highlights from the album include "The Boxer," "Cecilia," and "El Condor Pasa." Despite their overwhelming success, the duo separated in 1970, stating that their intention was not to part permanently, but rather to take a break from each other. Garfunkel divided his time between acting and a small solo career, and the two have occasionally reunited, recording hits and performing for packed venues. They were inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 1990.

Musical Legacy

Influenced by the Everly Brothers and Bob Dylan, Garfunkel and his partner Simon sang songs with themes that appealed to teenagers and adults alike. Their duets married the elements of folk music (sometimes incorporating actual folk songs, such as the traditional English tune "Scarborough Fair") with rock music (drums, electric guitars, bass). That musical coupling, combined with the duo's close vocal harmonies, clean-cut images, and distinct academic backgrounds, made them unique among the folk-rock musicians of the day.

Anastasia Pike

Further Reading

Charlton, Katherine. Rock Music Styles: A History. New York: McGraw Hill, 2008. This rock music textbook places Simon and Garfunkel in context with other folk-rock musicians of the day.

Grodin, Charles. If I Only Knew Then: Learning from Our Mistakes. New York: Springboard Press, 2007. In this collection, Garfunkel recounts what he learned from his experiences with the Bookends album. The essay gives an insight into his personality.

McLeod, Kembrew. "Simon and Garfunkel." In St. James Encyclopedia of Popular Culture. Detroit, Mich.: St. James Press, 1999. The entry on the duo provides a brief synopsis of their major works.

Unterberger, Richie. Eight Miles High: Folk Rock's Flight from Haight-Ashbury to Woodstock. Milwaukee, Wis.: Backbeat Books, 2003. This documents the evolution of the folk-rock movement from 1966 until the end of the decade, with details about Simon and Garfunkel's musical contributions.

_____. Turn! Turn! Turn! The '60's Folk-Rock Revolution. Milwaukee, Wis.: Backbeat Books, 2002. An interesting and resourceful book containing numerous interviews with many of folk-rock's revolutionaries.

See also: David, Hal; Dylan, Bob; Everly, Don and Phil; Iglesias, Julio; Lewis, Jerry Lee; Simon, Paul; Webb, Jimmy.

Judy Garland

American popular music and musical-theater singer

Garland achieved stardom as a childhood singer and actress, appearing in vaudeville, in cabarets, in films, and on stage. She went on to international renown in American films, starring in the 1939 classic The Wizard of Oz.

Born: June 10, 1922; Grand Rapids, Minnesota
Died: June 22, 1969; London, England
Also known as: Frances Ethel Gumm (birth name)

Principal works

MUSICAL THEATER (singer): Judy Garland at the Palace: Two-a-Day, 1951; Judy Garland, 1956; Judy Garland: At Home at the Palace, 1967.

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Judy Garland Souvenir Album, 1940; The Wizard of Oz, 1940; Judy Garland Second Souvenir Album, 1943; Judy Garland Third Souvenir Album, 1949; Easter Parade, 1950; Words and Music, 1950; Girl Crazy, 1953; Miss Show Business, 1955; If You Feel Like Singing, 1955; In the Good Old Summertime, 1955; Judy Garland with the MGM Orchestra, 1956; Alone, 1957; Harvey Girls, 1957; Meet Me in St. Louis, 1957; Judy in Love, 1958; The Letter, 1959; That's Entertainment, 1960; Gay Purr-ee, 1961; Judy at Carnegie Hall, 1961; The Magic of Judy Garland, 1961; The Garland Touch, 1962; I Could Go on Singing, 1963; Our Love Letter, 1963; Just for Openers, 1964; "Live" at the London Palladium, 1965 (with Liza Minnelli).

SINGLES: "(Dear Mr. Gable) You Made Me Love You," 1937; "Oceans Apart," 1939; "How About You," 1941; "Yah-Ta-Ta Yah-Ta-Ta (Talk, Talk, Talk)," 1945; "Changing My Tune," 1946; "Send My Baby Back to Me," 1954; "Swanee," 1961.

The Life

Judy Garland was born Frances Ethel Gumm in Grand Rapids, Minnesota, to Frank and Ethel

Milne Gumm, former vaudevillians. From the age of two, she performed first with her two older sisters, Mary Jane and Virginia, singing "Jingle Bells" in her father's theater, and she was smitten by audience applause. To be closer to Hollywood, the family relocated to Lancaster, California, where her father bought a theater, where the Gumm sisters performed. Ethel Meglin's dance school taught them dancing, and they were showcased in the Kiddies dance troupe. They appeared in short films and with actor George Jessel at Chicago's Oriental Theatre.

Jessel persuaded them to change their name to the Garland Sisters in 1934, and Frances took the name Judy after the Hoagy Carmichael song "Judy." Garland signed with Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer in 1935, and at thirteen she went to school at the studio. With her powerful singing voice and her youthful charm, she won film roles. To support her active filming pace, she was administered drugs, and she then required drugs to sleep, leading to a lifetime of addiction. Garland was competitive, she loved the critical praise, and her acting talents grew as she starred in major films, singing signature songs. Overwork created stress, and she had a breakdown. In 1948 Garland failed to complete several pictures, and she made attempts at suicide.

Garland's will to live and her career were revived on the international stage. Craving the attention and warmth of live audiences, Garland made a concert tour of England in 1951, and audiences were thrilled to hear her sing. The venues, including the London Palladium, were sold out, and her performances received rave reviews.

Garland made her second signature film, A Star Is Born, in 1954. She continued to appear in concert and on television specials. After suffering from hepatitis in November, 1959, she recovered fully to play again at the London Palladium. She appeared at Carnegie Hall in 1961, and she aired her own television show in 1962. In November, 1964, she sang again at the London Palladium. Her following concert tour in Australia hit a low point, and she performed for only forty-five minutes in Melbourne, announcing that she suffered from pleurisy. She was contracted for, then let go from, the film Valley of the Dolls (1967). Later she recovered sufficiently to perform with her children, Lorna Luft and Joey Luft, at New York's Palace Theatre in July, 1967.

Judy Garland. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Garland was married to David Rose from 1941 to 1944, to Vincente Minnelli from 1945 to 1951, to Sidney Luft from 1952 to 1965, to Mark Herron from 1965 to 1967, and to Mickey Deans in 1969. Garland died from an accidental drug overdose in 1969 in London.

The Music

Early Works. As part of the Meglin Kiddies, Garland made her film debut in The Big Revue (1929), and it was followed by A Holiday in Storyland (1930), in which she sang her first solo on screen. In La Fiesta de Santa Barbara (1935), filmed in Technicolor, the Gumm sisters trio sang "La Cucaracha." After signing with Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer in 1935, Garland sang "Zing! Went the Strings of My Heart" impressively in a radio performance for the Shell Chateau Hour. Showing her powerful adult voice, Garland recorded for Decca Records in June, 1936, "Swing Mr. Charlie" and "Stomping at the Savoy," her debut single with Bing Crosby's Orchestra. She appeared in Twentieth Century-Fox's college musical Pigskin Parade in November, 1936, singing "The Balboa," "The Texas Tornado," and "It's Love I'm After." Garland sang "After You've Gone" for the Shell Chateau Hour. She won considerable attention singing "You Made Me Love You" honoring Clark Gable at his studio-sponsored birthday party, and she filmed it in Broadway Melody of 1938 (1937), crooning to his photograph. As a fresh singing duo, the team of Mickey Rooney and Judy Garland were paired in Love Finds Andy Hardy in 1937, and its success brought them eight additional musical films together.

"Over the Rainbow." In 1939 Garland played the role for which she would be most recognized, Dorothy in The Wizard of Oz, and she sang the song for which she would be most recognized, "Over the Rainbow." At sixteen, Garland was dressed in blue gingham and her hair was plaited in braids, a simple presentation that was designed to focus all the attention on her singing and acting. Producers Arthur Freed and Mervyn LeRoy and an international film audience gave their overwhelming approval of her performance. The Wizard of Oz proved a smash hit, and she received a special Juvenile Academy Award for her performance. Her next film was Babes in Arms (1939) with Mickey Rooney. Decca Records released her first album, Judy Garland Souvenir Album, in three discs.

"For Me and My Gal." Working through a frantic filming schedule in 1940, she starred in Andy Hardy Meets Debutante, Strike Up the Band, and Little Nellie Kelly. In the last film, Garland shared her first grown-up on-screen kiss. and she demonstrated her mature acting style by portraying the roles of both the mother and the daughter. In the Andy Hardy film, she sang "I'm Nobody's Baby," and her record made it to the Top 10. In 1941 Garland appeared in Ziegfeld Girl, Life Begins for Andy Hardy, and Babes on Broadway. In 1942 she starred with Gene Kelly in For Me and My Gal, and she received top billing for singing the film's signature song, with the record listing in the Top 10. Garland had reached stardom, propelled largely by her singing ability in film musicals. Beginning in 1941, at age twenty-one, Garland began to portray glamorous roles, and in 1943 she starred in Presenting Lily Mars and Girl Crazy. Garland made her concert debut with the Philadelphia Orchestra directed by André Kostelanetz on July 1, 1943, at the Robin Hood Dell outdoor theatre. She toured military service camps during World War II.

"The Trolley Song." In 1944 Garland had another big success with Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's Meet Me in St. Louis directed by Vincente Minnelli. Judy sang songs that would prove to be some of her favorites—"The Trolley Song," "The Boy Next Door," and "Have Yourself a Merry Little Christmas"—all romantic and upbeat. "The Trolley Song" hit the Top 10, as did her album of movie songs. Her only dramatic nonsinging role was in 1945 in The Clock, with Robert Walker. Garland's first record to hit the Top 10 without first being sung in a film was "Yah-Ta-Ta Yah-Ta-Ta (Talk, Talk, Talk)," sung with Bing Crosby. Recognizing that Garland's fans desired to see her in singing film roles, the studio featured her in The Harvey Girls (1946), singing "On the Atchison, Topeka, and the Santa Fe." This was a career high point, which was followed by some low points. In 1947 Garland had difficulty completing The Pirate, suffering a mental breakdown and spending time in a private sanatorium. Ever the trouper, she bounced back from overwork to film The Easter Parade, costarring Fred Astaire, in 1948, and to film Words and Music, which produced a number-one sound track album. In the Good Old Summertime (1949) and Summer Stock (1950), which produced a Top 10 sound track album, proved to be her last films with Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer.

Going abroad to perform on stage at the London Palladium in April, 1951, she found again the adoration she craved, and she embarked on a major comeback. Applause and appreciation renewed her career aspirations and her vitality. Beginning on October 16, 1951, she played the Palace Theatre in New York, and she was presented a special Tony Award in 1952 for her revival of vaudeville traditions on the Broadway stage.

"Born in a Trunk." Garland and Sidney Luft formed Transcona, a production company that contracted to produce a remake of the musical A Star Is Born, a vehicle designed to propel Garland back to her former star status, with Warner Bros. supplying financial support. James Mason and Garland starred; George Cukor directed; Jack Warner supervised. The famous Garland "Born in a Trunk" medley was inserted into the film to showcase her musical performance talents and to help make the film a financial success. Largely because of the film's excessive length, however, it lost money. It did earn wide critical acclaim, and Garland was nominated for an Academy Award for Best Actress, winning a Golden Globe for Best Actress in a Musical Role in 1954. The sound track album released by Columbia Records became a Top 10 hit, and it was coordinated with a Garland television special, Miss Show Business, for which she received an Emmy Award nomination for Best Female Singer.

Garland further revived her singing career by appearing on television in the Ford Star Jubilee for three years, from 1955 to 1958, and doing a special live concert for General Electric Theatre on CBS in 1956. Garland also sang in Las Vegas at the New Frontier Hotel for fifty-five thousand dollars per week. She received the highest salary ever paid a Las Vegas entertainer in 1956. In 1958 Garland made the albums Judy in Love and Judy Garland at the Grove.

Judy at Carnegie Hall. Garland capitalized on her comeback success with her album That's Entertainment in 1960. Judy at Carnegie Hall recorded her appearance on April 23, 1961, at Carnegie Hall, which went to gold and number one on the charts. Garland filmed Judgment at Nuremberg (1961), for which she was nominated for both a Golden Globe and an Academy Award for Best Supporting Actress.

Many in the industry equated Garland's personal life with her starring role in her final film, I Could Go on Singing (1963), the story of an ambitious female singer striving for recognition. The sound track reached the Top 40. She appeared on television in The Judy Garland Show special in 1962, with guests Frank Sinatra and Dean Martin, and it was extended to a series in 1963. This series was nominated for an Emmy Award for Outstanding Performance in a Variety or Musical Program or Series. Her album The Garland Touch, released in 1962, reached the Top 20, and her album Just for Openers showcased songs sung in her television series. With Burt Lancaster, she made the dramatic film A Child Is Waiting (1963).

"Live" at the London Palladium. In November, 1964, Garland sang with her eighteen-year-old daughter Liza Minnelli at the London Palladium, and this performance was filmed and recorded. The film version appeared on British television. The recording was used for the album "Live" at the London Palladium, and it was released in 1965 by Capitol Records. This success opened the way for another Garland singing tour of the United States. In 1967 she returned to the Palace Theatre in New York, and she produced a live album, Judy Garland: At Home at the Palace, released by ABC Records.

Musical Legacy

Several of Garland's recordings have been inducted into the Grammy Hall of Fame—"Over the Rainbow," "Have Yourself a Merry Little Christmas," "Get Happy," "The Trolley Song," and "The Man That Got Away." When the American Film Institute ranked the top one hundred movie songs over the last one hundred years, "Over the Rainbow" ranked number one, and the other four ranked from number eleven to number seventy-six. Posthumously, Garland was awarded a Grammy Lifetime Achievement Award in 1997, testimony to her musical resilience and her radiant vocal achievements.

Barbara Bennett Peterson

Further Reading

Clark, Gerald. Get Happy: The Life of Judy Garland. New York: Random House, 2001. This biography illustrates Garland's drive to succeed in her long-standing and multifaceted career.

Edwards, Anne. Judy Garland. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1975. A sympathetic portrayal of the nuanced life of Garland as a singing icon.

Luft, Lorna. Me and My Shadows: A Family Memoir. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1999. A laudatory biography, written by her daughter.

Shipman, David. Judy Garland: The Secret Life of an American Legend. New York: Hyperion, 1992. Fully illustrated biography relates the personal and professional life of Garland, using information from film institute archives and from an unpublished biography of Vincente Minnelli.

See also: Andrews, Dame Julie; Arlen, Harold; Ebb, Fred; Elliot, Cass; Kern, Jerome; Previn, Sir André; Ronstadt, Linda; Sinatra, Frank; Tormé, Mel.

Erroll Garner

American jazz songwriter and pianist

A self-taught musician of prodigious technique, Garner was known for the rhythmic independence of his left and his right hands. The composer of the standard "Misty," Garner was also known for his original and florid treatments of ballads.

Born: June 15, 1921; Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania
Died: January 7, 1977; Los Angeles, California
Also known as: Erroll Louis Garner (full name)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: Overture to Dawn, Vol. 1, 1944; Overture to Dawn, Vol. 2, 1944; Overture to Dawn, Vol. 3, 1944; Overture to Dawn, Vol. 4, 1944; Overture to Dawn, Vol. 5, 1944; Passport to Fame, 1944; Yesterdays, 1944; Erroll Garner and Billy Taylor, 1945 (re-released as Separate Keyboards, 1945); Gone with Garner, 1945; Serenade to Laura, 1945; Cocktail Time, 1947; Erroll Garner at the Piano, 1949; Erroll Garner Playing Piano Solos, Vol. 1, 1949; Erroll Garner Playing Piano Solos, Vol. 2, 1949; Erroll Garner Playing Piano Solos, Vol. 3, 1949; Erroll Garner Playing Piano Solos, Vol. 4, 1949; Garnering, 1949; Rhapsody, 1949; Encores, 1950; Erroll Garner Plays Gershwin and Kern, 1950; Long Ago and Far Away, 1950; Piano Moods, 1950; Piano Solos, Vol. 1, 1950; Piano Solos, Vol. 2, 1950; Plays for Dancing, 1950; Body and Soul, 1951; Garnerland, 1951; Gone-Garner-Gonest, 1951; Piano Stylist, 1951; Piano Variations, 1951; The Provocative Erroll Garner, 1951; Solo Flight, 1952; Contrasts, 1954; Erroll!, 1954; Erroll Garner Plays Misty, 1954; Mambo Moves Garner, 1954; The Original Misty, 1954; Afternoon of an Elf, 1955; Concert by the Sea, 1955; Solitaire, 1955; Solo, 1955; Erroll Garner, 1956; He's Here! He's Gone! He's Garner, 1956; The Most Happy Piano, 1956; Swinging Solos, 1956; Another Voice, 1957; Soliloquy, 1957; Paris Impressions, Vol. 1, 1958; Paris Impressions, Vol. 2, 1958; Dreamstreet, 1959; The One and Only Erroll Garner, 1960; Close-up Swing, 1961; Easy to Love, 1961; You Brought a New Kind of Love, 1963; Erroll Garner, 1964; Now Playing: A Night at the Movies, 1964; That's My Kick, 1966; Up in Erroll's Room, 1968; Feeling Is Believing, 1970; Gemini, 1971; Magician, 1974.

The Life

Erroll Louis Garner was born into a musical family in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, in 1921. His father and older brother were professional musicians, and his three sisters were also musically gifted. Though his father encouraged him to take piano lessons, Garner preferred playing baseball. However, the lure of music eventually overcame his interest in sports, and he began learning to play piano by ear. Dodo Marmarosa and Billy Strayhorn, who lived nearby and who later became important jazz pianists, helped the fledgling pianist. Garner was playing professionally in the Pittsburgh area by the time he was twelve.

Garner moved to New York City in 1944, and by the end of the decade he was recording and performing extensively. In 1955 he recorded Concert by the Sea, one of the best-selling jazz records of all time. Garner's melodic, hard-swinging playing had tremendous popular appeal, and by the late 1950's he was one of the most well-known figures in jazz. His popularity extended beyond jazz audiences, and he appeared on television many times in the 1950's and 1960's. He toured Europe extensively in the early 1960's. He was also an occasional composer. He wrote his most well-known song, "Misty," in 1954. Garner died of a heart attack in 1977.

The Music

Garner began his career firmly rooted in the stride tradition of Fats Waller and James P. Johnson. His own style evolved quickly, retaining elements of stride and ragtime, but also showing the strong influence of swing pianists such as Teddy Wilson and Earl "Fatha" Hines. His ballad style reflects the influence of Art Tatum, containing florid, right-hand sixteenth- and thirty-second-note passages surrounding statements of the melody. Like Tatum, Garner left few spaces unfilled. His dense, two-hand chordal passages also recall Tatum. His ballad treatments, often containing extended introductions of unrelated material before the beginning of the actual song, are another signature of Garner's style.

Garner's up-tempo playing is often characterized by rhythmically propulsive left-hand quarter notes. This device represents an updated treatment of the left hand common in Scott Joplin's ragtime writing, expanding the voicings to four-note seventh chords in open position, often with a tenth between the outer voices. These left-hand voicings, which come directly from the stride piano style, recall the guitar style made famous by Freddie Green of the Count Basie Band. Over this rock-solid left hand, Garner superimposed melodies and improvised lines in octaves and block chords, a pianistic device often first attributed to Hines. Garner's right-hand lines were often played behind the beat, especially at medium tempi, sometimes lagging behind the left hand as much as an eighth note. This rhythmic independence between right and left hands, technically quite difficult, is one of the most identifiable traits of Garner's playing.

Erroll Garner. (CBS/Landov)

The Dial Sessions. Soon after moving to New York City in 1944, Garner began playing regularly at jazz clubs on Fifty-second Street. In February of 1947, he recorded a session in California with Charlie Parker, along with bassist Red Callender and drummer Doc West. Garner recorded several tunes, including "Bird's Nest" and "Cool Blues," for Dial Records. Although Garner afterward remembered the session as one of the highlights of his career, he was not a bebop player, and he never played with Parker again.

"Laura" and "Misty." Garner's first hit was the 1955 recording of the standard "Laura." The clearly stated melody (surrounded by lush block chords and florid right-hand lines) and its brevity (just under three minutes long, it contains a short introduction and coda surrounding a single statement of the song form) made the recording accessible to non-jazz audiences and no doubt account for its popular success. Garner wrote a number of songs, such as "Dreamy," "It Gets Better Every Time," "One Good Turn," and "No More Shadows," but his best-known composition—and one of the most recorded standards of all time—is the ballad "Misty," written in 1954.

Concert by the Sea. Garner recorded extensively, and his records sold well. He was something of a legend in the music industry for his ability to record a great deal of music in a relatively short period of time: Most of his albums consist of first takes recorded in a single session. On September 19, 1955, he recorded one of the best-selling jazz albums of all time, Concert by the Sea, at a live concert in Carmel, California. This record contains the trademark Garner devices. The up-tempo versions of "I'll Remember April," "Red Top," and "It's All Right with Me" feature the now-famous left-hand strumming with right-hand octaves and block chords on the melody. Lush introductions to "Autumn Leaves" and "April in Paris" reveal the influence of Tatum. Medium-tempo versions of "They Can't Take That Away from Me" and "Teach Me Tonight" showcase his legendary dexterity, with the on-top-of-the-beat left-hand pulse supporting the laid-back right-hand line.

Musical Legacy

Garner's playing was highly idiosyncratic. While the particulars of his style were not widely imitated, his heavily orchestrated yet pianistic approach to arrangements of popular songs—with its wide dynamic range and imaginative variety of textures—has influenced generations of pianists. His innate lyricism, coupled with his imaginative yet accessible treatments of well-known melodies, made him immensely popular, and his hard-swinging right-hand lines and his sophisticated harmonic approach rooted him in the jazz tradition. One of the most impressive qualities of his playing is its sheer joy and ebullience.

Matthew Nicholl

Further Reading

Collier, James Lincoln. The Making of Jazz: A Comprehensive History. New York: Dell, 1978. This source covers the development of jazz piano, placing the contributions of the most well-known players in context. Includes numerous references to and biographical information about Garner.

Doerschuk, Robert. 88: The Giants of Jazz Piano. San Francisco: Backbeat Books, 2001. This historical overview of jazz piano includes short portraits of important pianists, with a chapter on Garner.

Doran, James M. Erroll Garner: The Most Happy Piano. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1985. This resource contains extensive biographical information on Garner and a discography complete through 1985.

Feather, Leonard. Encyclopedia of Jazz in the Sixties. New York: Horizon Press, 1967. Contains photographs, a short discography, and biographical information about Garner.

Rizzo, Gene. The Fifty Greatest Jazz Piano Players of All Time. Milwaukee, Wis.: Hal Leonard, 2005. This book contains a chapter about Garner, placing his work and contributions in context with the historical development of jazz piano.

Taylor, Billy. Jazz Piano: A Jazz History. Dubuque, Iowa: William C. Brown, 1982. Written by a highly respected jazz pianist, this excellent overview of jazz piano contains numerous references to Garner, his influences, and his contributions.

See also: Blakey, Art; Burke, Johnny; Gershwin, George; Hancock, Herbie; Joplin, Scott; Kern, Jerome; Parker, Charlie; Tatum, Art; Waller, Fats.

Marvin Gaye

American soul singer and songwriter

Possessed of a soulful, passionate voice with great range and versatility, Gaye was a star in the early decades of soul music. Recording solo and duet hits with the 1960's Motown sound, in the 1970's he branched into groove-oriented albums with social and sensual content.

Born: April 2, 1939; Washington, D.C.
Died: April 1, 1984; Los Angeles, California
Also known as: Marvin Pentz Gay, Jr. (birth name)

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: The Soulful Moods of Marvin Gaye, 1961; That Stubborn Kinda Fellow, 1963; Hello Broadway, 1964; Together, 1964 (with Mary Wells); When I'm Alone I Cry, 1964; How Sweet It Is to Be Loved by You, 1965; A Tribute to the Great Nat King Cole, 1965; Moods of Marvin Gaye, 1966; Take Two, 1966 (with Kim Weston); United, 1967 (with Tammi Terrell); I Heard It Through the Grapevine!, 1968; In the Groove, 1968; You're All I Need, 1968 (with Terrell); Easy, 1969 (with Terrell); M.P.G., 1969; That's the Way Love Is, 1970; What's Going On, 1971; Trouble Man, 1972; Let's Get It On, 1973; Diana and Marvin, 1974 (with Diana Ross); I Want You, 1976; Here, My Dear, 1978; In Our Lifetime, 1981; Midnight Love, 1982; Dream of a Lifetime, 1986; Romantically Yours, 1989.

The Life

Marvin Pentz Gay, Jr., was born in Washington, D.C., in 1939 to Marvin and Alberta Gay. Marvin, Sr., pastored a church with music-filled services, and Marvin, Jr., began singing in the church at the age of three, later learning piano and drums. Marvin, Sr., was a harsh parent who beat Marvin and his three siblings.

In 1956 Marvin, Jr., left high school to join the Air Force. An uncooperative soldier, he was discharged within a year. Soon after, he helped start the Marquees singing group; however, its single "Wyatt Earp" failed to become a hit. In 1958 he joined Harvey Fuqua's New Moonglows group.

When the Moonglows disbanded in 1960, he signed a contract with Berry Gordy's fledgling Motown Records in Detroit. On January 8, 1961, he married Gordy's sister, Anna, who was eighteen years his senior. He also added an "e" to his last name. Gaye's first hit, "Stubborn Kind of Fellow," came the next year, soon followed by other hits. With his good looks and sensual voice, Gaye was paired with some of Motown's leading female stars, including Mary Wells, Kim Weston, and Tammi Terrell.

On November 12, 1965, Gaye's son, Marvin Pentz Gaye III, was born, although his mother was apparently Anna's teenage niece Denise Gordy, with Anna's consent. Gaye and Anna adopted two more children over the next few years. In 1972 they separated and eventually divorced acrimoniously.

In 1971 Gaye's career took a new turn with the release of his socially conscious What's Going On album, reflecting the Vietnam-era turbulence in the United States. With the album's success, Gaye moved to Los Angeles, purchased his own recording studio, and immersed himself in popular psychology, meditation, physical fitness, and use of cocaine. In 1977 Marvin married Jan Hunter, with whom he already had two children. With claims against him by his former wife Anna and the Internal Revenue Service, Gaye declared bankruptcy in 1978. Soon thereafter Jan started divorce proceedings. In difficult straits, Gaye embarked on international tours, eventually moving to Europe, where he continued to record successfully. Returning to the United States after a couple of years, he rented a home with his mother, who was recuperating from surgery. His father came to live with them and the two men often quarreled. On April 1, 1984, Marvin Gay, Sr., shot Gaye, killing him. Claiming self-defense, Gay pleaded no contest and was sentenced to five years' probation.

Marvin Gaye. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The Music

Singing in church from an early age, Gaye developed a wide range of vocal talents and a spiritual touch that he would never lose. At first Gaye tried for success as a romantic balladeer. Despite his smooth tenor and three-octave range, success would come only with Gaye's embrace of rhythm-and-blues, or, as it came to be known, soul music.

Motown Solo and Duet Hits. Gaye became one of Motown's first solo stars with such hits as "Stubborn Kind of Fellow," "Hitch Hike," "Can I Get a Witness," "I'll Be Doggone," and "How Sweet It Is." These songs epitomize the Motown sound with lush, symphonic instrumentation backing Gaye's energetic singing and gospel-like passion. "Can I Get a Witness" refers to the call-and-response of African American church preaching. Supported by a driving double beat of piano and drum that mimics rhythmic clapping in a church, Gaye sings both sweetly and with a rough edge. His vocals echoed by a male and female chorus, with horns chiming in, "Can I Get a Witness" is Gaye's most successful effort at transplanting the music of a Pentecostal church into the Motown sound.

Gaye's versatility was displayed to good effect in his 1964 duets "Once upon a Time" with Mary Wells and "What Good Am I Without You" with Kim Weston. In his 1966 hit recording "It Takes Two" with Weston, the power of Weston's voice easily matches Gaye's.

The most celebrated of his duets were with the more delicately voiced Tammi Terrell. They recorded a string of hits in 1967 and 1968, including "Your Precious Love," "If I Could Build My Whole World Around You," "Ain't Nothing Like the Real Thing," and "You're All I Need to Get By." Introduced by memorable drum sticking and bass lines, Gaye's and Terrell's yearning for each other on "Ain't No Mountain High Enough" is palpable. Although distraught by Terrell's tragic onstage collapse in October, 1967, and subsequent fatal illness, Gaye made a recording of "I Heard It Through the Grapevine" that hit number one on the pop charts and sold more than four million copies. Backed by ominous instrumentation, Gaye sings with pathos, and sometimes falsetto, of his lover's betrayal, his few tender notes beckoning her return.

What's Going On. Although Gordy resisted Gaye's idea of instilling social relevance into his songs, Gaye's best-selling album What's Going On was a milestone in soul music. What's Going On reflected the social turbulence in America, as Gaye sang of war and protest on the title track and on "What's Happening Brother"; poverty and civil rights on "Inner City Blues (Make Me Wanna Holler)"; environmental degradation on "Mercy Mercy Me (the Ecology)"; and spiritual themes on "Wholy Holy" and "God Is Love." Gaye was now increasingly producing and writing his own music, embellishing it with a mellow, relaxed sound marked by a funky, percussive beat and vocal overlays. Undergirded by groove-oriented bass and congas, Gaye's singing on What's Going On reflects his wide vocal range from soft tenor to angry shouts.

Later Works. Let's Get It On represented another departure for Gaye with the open eroticism of its title track. With the advent of disco he recorded the dance-oriented hit "Got to Give It Up" (1977). He expressed his bitterness over his divorce proceedings, as well as a hope for personal peace, in such songs as the rhythmically rich "Anger" from Here, My Dear, an album titled for his alimony settlement. It is hard not to hear a confessional element in Gaye's aggressive single "Ego-Tripping Out" (1979), where he brags of his magnetism to women. Gaye's embrace of New Age sexuality reached its height in his last big hit, Grammy Award-winning "Sexual Healing" (1982), which launched him on his troubled Midnight Love tour.

Musical Legacy

Gaye recorded some of the best 1960's Motown-sound songs. Whether joyous, yearning, moody, or plaintive—or anxious and vulnerable, as in his biggest Motown hit, "I Heard It Through the Grapevine"—Gaye sings with gospel-inspired exhilaration. His duets with Motown's female stars, especially Terrell, rank among popular music's finest love songs. In the 1970's and early 1980's, Gaye pioneered a distinctive musical trend, recording albums with songs that reflected social angst, erotic fulfillment, and personal troubles. Taking control of the production and content of his music, Gaye fashioned a relaxed, stylish sound, influenced by funk but tinged with the spiritual passion of his earlier days.

Howard Bromberg

Further Reading

Dahl, Bill. Motown: The Golden Years. Iola, Wis.: Krause, 2001. With more than one hundred rare photographs, the book focuses on twelve Motown superstars, including Gaye. Extensive quotes from Gaye's Motown writers and producers.

Dyson, Michael Eric. Mercy, Mercy Me: The Art, Loves, and Demons of Marvin Gaye. New York: Basic Civitas, 2004. Assesses Gaye's life and music in a cultural context.

Gaye, Frankie and Fred Basten. Marvin Gaye, My Brother. San Francisco: Backseat Books, 2003. Firsthand account of Gaye's troubles with his father at the beginning and end of his life.

Posner, Gerald. Motown: Music, Money, Sex, and Power. New York: Random House, 2002. Motown history, including founder Berry Gordy's efforts to dissuade Gaye from expanding to socially oriented records such as What's Going On.

Ritz, David. Divided Soul: The Life of Marvin Gaye. New York: Da Capo Press, 1991. By Gaye's cowriter on "Sexual Healing," based on extensive interviews with Gaye.

Taylor, Marc. The Original Marvelettes: Motown's Mystery Girl Group. Jamaica, N.Y.: Aloiv, 2004. History of the group that Gaye backed up with occasional drumming and songwriting.

Turner, Steve. Trouble Man: The Life and Death of Marvin Gaye. New York: Ecco Press, 2000. Straightforward biography with a comprehensive listing of Gaye's recordings, tours, and update on the people in his life.

See also: Cole, Nat King; Cooke, Sam; Dozier, Lamont; Holland, Eddie and Brian; Jagger, Sir Mick; Jamerson, James; Kirk, Rahsaan Roland; LaBelle, Patti; Mayfield, Curtis; Robinson, Smokey; Ross, Diana.

George Gershwin

American musical-theater and classical composer

Gershwin's ability to transcend the division between classical and popular music, in his career and individual works, makes him a uniquely American composer. His memorable songs and concert works draw from a variety of influences, including Broadway, African American jazz and blues, and European art music.

Born: September 26, 1898; Brooklyn, New York
Died: July 11, 1937; Beverly Hills, California
Also known as: Jacob Gershvin (birth name); Fred Murtha; Bert Wynn

Principal works

CHAMBER WORKS: Lullaby, 1919 (for string quartet); Short Story, 1925 (for violin and piano).

MUSICAL THEATER (music): La La Lucille, 1919 (lyrics by Arthur J. Jackson, Buddy G. DeSylva, and Irving Caesar; libretto by Fred Jackson); Morris Gest's Midnight Whirl, 1919 (revue; lyrics and libretto by DeSylva and John Henry Mears); George White's Scandals, 1920-1924 (revue; lyrics by Ira Gershwin; libretto by Andy Rice and George White); A Dangerous Maid, 1921 (lyrics by Ira Gershwin; libretto by Charles W. Bell); The French Doll, 1922 (lyrics and libretto by A. E. Thomas); Our Nell, 1922 (music with William Daly; lyrics by Brian Hooker); Spice of 1922, 1922 (revue; lyrics and libretto by Jack Lait); Little Miss Bluebeard, 1923 (lyrics by Ira Gershwin and DeSylva); The Rainbow, 1923 (lyrics by Clifford Grey and Hooker; libretto by Albert de Courville, Noel Scott, and Edgar Wallace); Lady, Be Good!, 1924 (lyrics by Ira Gershwin; libretto by Guy Bolton and Fred Thompson); Primrose, 1924 (lyrics by Desmond Carter and Ira Gershwin; libretto by George Grossmith and Bolton); Sweet Little Devil, 1924 (lyrics by DeSylva; libretto by Frank Mandel and Laurence Schwab); Song of the Flame, 1925 (music with Herbert Stothart; lyrics and libretto by Oscar Hammerstein II and Otto Harbach); Tell Me More!, 1925 (lyrics by Ira Gershwin and DeSylva; libretto by Thompson and William K. Wells); Tip Toes, 1925 (libretto by Bolton and Thompson); Oh, Kay!, 1926 (lyrics by Ira Gershwin and Howard Dietz; libretto by Bolton and P. G. Wodehouse); Funny Face, 1927 (libretto by Paul Gerard Smith and Thompson); Strike Up the Band, 1927 (libretto by Morrie Ryskind; based on George S. Kaufman's libretto); Rosalie, 1928 (music with Sigmund Romberg; lyrics by Ira Gershwin and Wodehouse; libretto by Bolton and William Anthony McGuire); Treasure Girl, 1928 (libretto by Thompson and Vincent Lawrence); Show Girl, 1929 (lyrics by Ira Gershwin and Gus Kahn; libretto by McGuire and J. P. McEvoy); Girl Crazy, 1930 (libretto by Bolton and John McGowan); Of Thee I Sing, 1931 (music with Ira Gershwin; libretto by Kaufman and Ryskind); Let 'Em Eat Cake, 1933 (libretto by Kaufman and Ryskind); Pardon My English, 1933 (libretto by Herbert Fields and Ryskind); Porgy and Bess, 1935 (folk opera; lyrics by Ira Gershwin and Dorothy Heyward; based on DuBose Heyward's novel Porgy); The Show Is On, 1936 (revue; libretto by David Freedman and Moss Hart).

OPERA: Blue Monday, 1922 (jazz operetta; libretto by Buddy G. DeSylva; later renamed 135th Street).

ORCHESTRAL WORKS: Rhapsody in Blue, 1924; Piano Concerto in F, 1925; An American in Paris, 1928; Cuban Overture, 1932; Second Rhapsody, 1932 (for piano and orchestra); Variations on "I Got Rhythm," 1934 (for piano and orchestra); Catfish Row, 1936 (five-movement suite for orchestra; adapted from Porgy and Bess).

PIANO WORKS: Tango, 1915; Three Preludes, 1926.

SONGS (music; lyrics by Ira Gershwin unless otherwise stated): "When You Want 'Em, You Can't Get 'Em, When You Got 'Em, You Don't Want 'Em," 1916; "The Real American Folk Song (Is a Rag)," 1918; "Mischa, Jascha, Toscha, Sascha," 1919; "Swanee," 1919 (lyrics by Irving Caesar); "The Man I Love," 1924; "I Got Rhythm," 1930; "Let's Call the Whole Thing Off," 1937; "Nice Work If You Can Get It," 1937; "They Can't Take That Away From Me," 1937; "Our Love Is Here to Stay," 1938.

The Life

George Gershwin (GURSH-wihn) was the second son of Russian Jewish immigrants, Moishe and Rose Gershvin. His parents purchased a piano in 1910 so that George's older brother Ira could learn to play, but George proved to be more musically inclined. In 1914, four years after he began taking piano lessons, he dropped out of school to work for Jerome H. Remick and Company, a Tin Pan Alley music publishing company, as a song plugger, a pianist who demonstrated the company's songs to singers who might choose to perform them onstage. In 1917 Gershwin left his job to pursue a career on Broadway, first as an accompanist for rehearsals and concerts. Soon he was writing songs for Broadway shows and revues, and in 1919 the first musical with a score entirely by Gershwin, La La Lucille, enjoyed a moderate run and positive critical reception.

Between 1917 and 1933 Gershwin wrote songs and scores for more than two dozen Broadway musicals and revues, many of which were commercially and critically successful. (Beginning in 1924 the majority of his songs' lyrics were written by his brother Ira, an exceptionally talented and witty wordsmith.) He also composed several works for the concert stage and appeared as a piano soloist and conductor (almost always playing and conducting his own compositions). His celebrity increased steadily from the 1924 premiere of Rhapsody in Blue onward; in July, 1925, he was the first composer to have his face on the cover of Time magazine; in 1934 and 1935 he hosted a CBS radio show, Music by Gershwin.

Although he never married, Gershwin was romantically involved with a number of women, including several stage and screen actresses. Perhaps his most serious relationship was with Kay Swift, a fellow composer whose musical Fine and Dandy was a success in 1930. She was Gershwin's musical confidant, particularly on his opera Porgy and Bess, and the title of his 1926 musical, Oh, Kay!, may have been an homage to her.

In 1936 Gershwin moved to Hollywood with his brother Ira to write songs for Fred Astaire's films at RKO Pictures. During his time there, he became friends with the modernist composer Arnold Schoenberg; the two played tennis and talked about music, each admiring the other's work. Gershwin was unhappy with the constraints of working for the studio, expressing to friends his loneliness and desire to return to New York. His increasingly erratic behavior and worsening headaches were attributed to psychological problems, until on July 9, 1937, he fell into a coma; a spinal tap revealed a brain tumor. Surgery was unsuccessful, and Gershwin died two days later, at age thirty-eight.

The Music

Gershwin's output runs the gamut from seemingly effortless, frothy popular songs to ambitious and groundbreaking opera, but he did not keep the popular and serious sides of his career sealed off from each other. The decidedly American nature of his music, which he consciously cultivated, can be seen in the confluence of elements from both sides of the tracks: The concert works include infectious rhythms and memorable melodies, while the popular songs are harmonically complex and ingeniously crafted.

George Gershwin. (Library of Congress)

Popular Songs. Gershwin was a veritable American Franz Schubert, composing hundreds of songs over the course of his short life. His songs have proved endlessly adaptable and attractive to singers and jazz musicians. Their style is marked by rhythmic energy, use of repeated notes, and harmonic inventiveness. The majority of Gershwin songs are complemented by his brother Ira's delightfully clever lyrics.

"Swanee," Gershwin's first hit (with lyrics by Irving Caesar), rocketed to best-seller status when entertainer Al Jolson began performing it in 1919. This ironic and rollicking pastiche of tropes from Stephen Foster songs was Gershwin's most profitable song and became Jolson's trademark.

A 1932 collection published by Random House, George Gershwin Song-Book, contains piano-vocal scores for eighteen of his popular songs, including "Fascinating Rhythm," "The Man I Love," "'S Wonderful," and "I Got Rhythm." The songs he wrote for films in the last year of his life are among his best loved, such as "Let's Call the Whole Thing Off," "They Can't Take That Away from Me," and "Love Is Here to Stay."

Rhapsody in Blue. Paul Whiteman, the self-proclaimed King of Jazz and director of a popular, all-white jazz band, commissioned Gershwin to compose a jazz piano concerto. The result was Rhapsody in Blue, a single-movement work whose 1924 premiere at New York City's Aeolian Hall propelled its composer to the forefront of the debate then raging about the artistic value of the new music called jazz. As orchestrated by Whiteman's staff arranger Ferde Grofé, Rhapsody in Blue features instruments that were then associated with jazz (including clarinet and banjo), as well as lively syncopated rhythms, blue notes, a showy part for the piano soloist, and a generous handful of memorable melodies. There are two recordings of Rhapsody in Blue with Gershwin at the piano, playing with panache and a remarkable lack of sentimentality; the piece has been performed and recorded countless times since, becoming the single most popular concert work by an American composer.

Concerto in F. Impressed by Rhapsody in Blue, New York Symphony conductor Walter Damrosch commissioned a piano concerto from Gershwin in 1925. The three-movement piece is in many ways reminiscent of those by Peter Ilich Tchaikovsky and Franz Liszt, with sweeping themes, grand and idiosyncratic orchestration, and a virtuosic part for the soloist. The slow middle movement, inspired by the blues, is especially expressive.

An American in Paris. Gershwin described this 1928 tone poem, inspired by visits to Paris, as "a rhapsodic ballet." (It has been choreographed for dancers several times, most famously by Gene Kelly in the 1951 film An American in Paris.) While it is an easy work to enjoy, featuring a number of winning melodies and engagingly innovative orchestration (including the use of taxi horns), it is also a highly complex and sophisticated composition, rewarding careful study.

Of Thee I Sing. A comedy satirizing American politics, Of Thee I Sing (1931) was the first musical to be awarded the Pulitzer Prize, in 1932. (The award went to those responsible for the show's book and lyrics: Morrie Ryskind, George S. Kaufman, and Ira Gershwin.) Its music is masterfully ironic and consistently interesting, and the work is a virtual operetta, featuring a structurally cohesive overture, solos, ensemble numbers that advance the plot, and several scenes that contain a steady succession of such numbers without any spoken dialogue.

Porgy and Bess. Gershwin's magnum opus was his American folk opera, with libretto by poet and playwright DuBose Heyward and additional lyrics by Ira Gershwin. The work, which premiered in 1935, tells the story of love and death on Catfish Row, an impoverished African American community in Charleston, South Carolina. Gershwin's score draws upon a wide variety of black musical styles, from spirituals and work songs to ragtime and blues, as well as upon American musical-theater and European operatic tradition. At the insistence of the Gershwin estate, the African American characters in Porgy and Bess have been played by black performers in every American production of the work. For decades, some have argued that the opera is marred by the libretto's racial stereotypes and demeaning dialect, while others believe that the humanity and complexity of the characters transcend the libretto's dated elements. While Porgy and Bess is the most famous and frequently performed American opera, it is best known for its songs, including "Summertime" and "It Ain't Necessarily So," which have been popular since the opera's premiere.

Musical Legacy

Gershwin's music is almost unrivaled for its ability to conjure the image of an iconic urban America: energetic, optimistic, confident, commercial, and yet sincere. Although he thought of himself as a typical New Yorker, the composer was at home with the heterogeneity of American culture, and he sought to reflect that national character in his work. Those who have criticized his concert music, particularly Porgy and Bess, as stylistically inconsistent or tasteless, have often failed to note that inclusiveness was part of a deliberate, nationalistic approach on Gershwin's part.

His ability to write music both instantly popular and enduring and his choice to draw upon a range of musical styles have had a lasting impact on subsequent generations of American composers. Today, much of the music composed for Broadway is deemed worthy of critical respect and scholarly attention, and the idea that serious contemporary art music might draw on elements from jazz and popular song is no longer shocking. Gershwin's groundbreaking output played an important role in shaping those attitudes.

Gwynne Kuhner Brown

Further Reading

Alpert, Hollis. The Life and Times of Porgy and Bess: The Story of an American Classic. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1990. A fascinating and well-researched history of Gershwin's opera, from the novel that first caught the composer's attention to fifty years of productions.

Carnovale, Norbert. George Gershwin: A Bio-Bibliography. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2000. An extremely useful resource for researchers, including an extensive annotated bibliography, a list of works and performance dates, the names of performers who first performed songs, a discography, and a filmography.

Jablonski, Edward, and Lawrence D. Stewart. The Gershwin Years. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1973. A chatty and readable biography of George and Ira Gershwin. Particularly valuable for its wealth of illustrations, including photographs, sketches, reproductions of manuscripts, playbills, letters, and more.

Pollack, Howard. George Gershwin: His Life and Works. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2006. Exhaustively researched and meticulously detailed. Particularly noteworthy is its substantial treatment of Gershwin's entire musical output. Illustrations, bibliography.

Rimler, Walter. A Gershwin Companion: A Critical Inventory and Discography, 1916-1984. Ann Arbor, Mich.: Popular Culture Ink, 1991. Contains background information, descriptions, and analytical notes on all of Gershwin's published music in chronological order. Numerous unpublished works are cataloged as well. Discography.

Schiff, David. Gershwin: Rhapsody in Blue. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press, 1997. Concise and useful account of the work, including its history, reception, influence, and musical analysis and insights. Select bibliography.

Schneider, Wayne, ed. The Gershwin Style: New Looks at the Music of George Gershwin. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999. New essays by twelve highly regarded scholars are featured, with topics including score analysis, reception history, and performance issues.

Wyatt, Robert, and John Andrew Johnson, eds. The George Gershwin Reader. New York: Oxford University Press, 2004. A valuable source of primary documents and selected secondary literature, including letters to and from the composer, newspaper reviews, interviews with original cast members from Porgy and Bess, essays by Gershwin, eulogies and reminiscences, and a few scholarly articles. Bibliography.

See also: Arlen, Harold; Bechet, Sidney; Beiderbecke, Bix; Burton, Gary; Carter, Benny; Charles, Ray; Cooke, Sam; Copland, Aaron; Davis, Sammy, Jr.; Dorsey, Thomas A.; Evans, Bill; Gershwin, Ira; Goodman, Benny; Grappelli, Stéphane; Hammerstein, Oscar, II; Heifetz, Jascha; Lewis, John; Merman, Ethel; Nichols, Red; Romberg, Sigmund; Steiner, Max; Stoller, Mike; Strayhorn, Billy; Tatum, Art; Webster, Ben; Whiteman, Paul.

Ira Gershwin

American musical-theater lyricist and composer

Gershwin was a witty, skillful, and musically sensitive lyricist, particularly well attuned to the rhythm and energy of his younger brother George's music. With his gift for ingenious wordplay and delightfully singable word choices, he is widely considered one of the finest lyricists of his era.

Born: December 6, 1896; New York, New York
Died: August 17, 1983; Beverly Hills, California
Also known as: Israel Gershvin (birth name); Arthur Francis

Principal works

MUSICAL THEATER (lyrics; music by George Gershwin unless otherwise stated): George White's Scandals, 1920-1924 (revue; libretto by Andy Rice and George White); A Dangerous Maid, 1921 (libretto by Charles W. Bell); Little Miss Bluebeard, 1923 (lyrics with Buddy G. DeSylva); Lady, Be Good!, 1924 (libretto by Guy Bolton and Fred Thompson); Primrose, 1924 (lyrics with Desmond Carter; libretto by George Grossmith and Bolton); Two Little Girls in Blue, 1924 (music by Vincent Youmans and Paul Lannin; libretto by Fred Jackson); Tell Me More!, 1925 (lyrics with DeSylva; libretto by Thompson and William K. Wells); Tip Toes, 1925 (libretto by Bolton and Thompson); Oh, Kay!, 1926 (lyrics with Howard Dietz; libretto by Bolton and P. G. Wodehouse); Funny Face, 1927 (libretto by Paul Gerard Smith and Thompson); Strike up the Band, 1927 (libretto by Morrie Ryskind; based on George S. Kaufman's libretto); Rosalie, 1928 (music by George Gershwin and Sigmund Romberg; lyrics with Wodehouse; libretto by Bolton and William Anthony McGuire); Treasure Girl, 1928 (libretto by Thompson and Vincent Lawrence); Show Girl, 1929 (lyrics with Gus Kahn; libretto by McGuire and J. P. McEvoy); Girl Crazy, 1930 (libretto by Bolton and John McGowan); Of Thee I Sing, 1931 (music with George Gershwin; libretto by Kaufman and Ryskind); Let 'Em Eat Cake, 1933 (libretto by Kaufman and Ryskind); Pardon My English, 1933 (libretto by Herbert Fields and Ryskind); Porgy and Bess, 1935 (folk opera; lyrics with Dorothy Heyward; based on DuBose Heyward's novel Porgy); The Show Is On, 1936 (revue; libretto by David Freedman and Moss Hart); Ziegfeld Follies of 1936, 1936 (revue; music by Vernon Duke); Lady in the Dark, 1941 (music by Kurt Weill; libretto by Hart); The Firebrand of Florence, 1945 (libretto with Edwin Justus Mayer; music by Weill; based on Mayer's play The Firebrand); Park Avenue, 1946 (music by Arthur Schwartz; libretto by Nunnally Johnson and Kaufman); My One and Only, 1983 (libretto by Peter Stone and Timothy S. Mayer).

SONGS (lyrics; music by George Gershwin unless otherwise stated): "When You Want 'Em, You Can't Get 'Em, When You Got 'Em, You Don't Want 'Em," 1916; "The Real American Folk Song (Is a Rag)," 1918; "Mischa, Jascha, Toscha, Sascha," 1919; "The Man I Love," 1924; "I Got Rhythm," 1930; "Let's Call the Whole Thing Off," 1937; "Nice Work If You Can Get It," 1937; "They Can't Take That Away From Me," 1937; "Our Love Is Here to Stay," 1938; "Long Ago and Far Away," 1944 (music by Jerome Kern); "The Man That Got Away," 1954 (music by Harold Arlen).

The Life

Ira Gershwin (I-ruh GURSH-wihn) was the first child of Russian Jewish immigrants, Moishe and Rose Gershvin. A quiet, studious boy and avid reader of poetry, he developed a particular appreciation for light verse and began writing his own. After dropping out of City College of New York in 1916, he took a variety of jobs, while submitting verse to newspapers and magazines.

In 1917 Ira began providing some lyrics for his brother George, whose career as a songwriter was getting under way. They first published a cowritten song, "Waiting for the Sun to Come Out," in 1920. For this and other early lyrics, Ira used the pseudonym Arthur Francis (based on the names of their younger brother and sister respectively). He collaborated with other composers, as George did with other lyricists, but by the mid-1920's they were a well-established team, and the majority of George's songs until his death in 1937 featured his brother's lyrics. Ira generally wrote lyrics to fit George's music, but there was much give and take between them as they worked to complete a song.

Ira and his wife Leonore moved to Hollywood in 1936, to work in films along with George. They would live there for the rest of their lives. After George's death, Ira worked with other composers on Broadway musicals and films until 1954, at which point he largely retired. He devoted himself to his brother's legacy, donating a wealth of George Gershwin-related material to the Library of Congress. He died in 1983.

The Music

Musical Comedies. From 1924 until 1933 Ira wrote the lyrics for a series of mostly successful musical comedies with music by his brother, beginning with Lady, Be Good! and including Oh, Kay!, Funny Face, Girl Crazy, and Pardon My English. Each show contains a mixture of comic songs and ballads, the former witty and colloquial, the latter poignant but free of excessive sentimentality. Among the classic songs from these shows are "Fascinating Rhythm" from Lady, Be Good!, "Someone to Watch over Me" from Oh, Kay!, and "Embraceable You" and "I Got Rhythm" from Girl Crazy.

Political Satires. In 1927 Ira and George joined with playwright George S. Kaufman to create Strike up the Band, a biting political satire about war profiteering. This operetta offered Ira his first chance at lyrics that were fully integrated into the plot. A revised version in 1930, with libretto improved by Morrie Ryskind and the addition of more love songs, was substantially more successful than the 1927 production.

Two more political operettas followed, created by the same foursome: Of Thee I Sing and Let 'Em Eat Cake. Ira Gershwin's lyrics for these works rival those of W. S. Gilbert (of Gilbert and Sullivan fame) for ingeniousness. Of Thee I Sing was the Gershwins' longest-running show on Broadway and garnered Ira, along with Ryskind and Kaufman, the first Pulitzer Prize ever awarded for a musical.

Porgy and Bess. Ira contributed significantly to the libretto for George's Porgy and Bess. He wrote the lyrics for several songs, including "It Ain't Necessarily So" and "There's a Boat Dat's Leavin' Soon for New York," and collaborated with librettist DuBose Heyward on others, such as "I Got Plenty o' Nuttin'" and "I Loves You, Porgy." Gershwin helped Heyward, who was an accomplished novelist and poet but a novice lyricist, to make his lyrics more natural and singable.

Hollywood. The songs that the Gershwin brothers wrote during their brief time together in Hollywood are among their best, such as "They Can't Take That Away from Me" and "Let's Call the Whole Thing Off" from Shall We Dance? (1937), and "Love Is Here to Stay" (The Goldwyn Follies, 1938), the last song George composed before his death in 1937. Ira's lyrics for these songs, with their wonderfully mundane details and seemingly effortless eloquence, are the perfect complement to some of George's most memorable music.

Lady in the Dark. Of his various collaborations after 1937, perhaps the most significant was Lady in the Dark, with the book by Moss Hart and score by Kurt Weill. Gershwin's sophisticated, contemporary, and often hilarious lyrics were an ideal fit for this ambitious musical about a woman's psychoanalysis, with extended dream sequences that Weill called "one-act operas." The show ran for 467 performances, beginning in 1941.

Ira Gershwin. (Library of Congress)

Musical Legacy

Happy throughout his life to take a backseat to his famous brother, Ira's contribution to the golden era of Broadway songwriting has been increasingly appreciated over the years. His musically sensitive, endlessly inventive, and brilliantly witty lyrics have played an important role in the ongoing popularity of dozens of Gershwin songs.

While his best-known work was done in collaboration with his brother, Ira went on to work with several other notable composers, including Weill, Aaron Copland, Jerome Kern, and Harold Arlen. In addition, Ira was a dedicated guardian of his brother's legacy after 1937, working to ensure that his music was preserved at the Library of Congress and protected from infringement.

Gwynne Kuhner Brown

Further Reading

Furia, Philip. Ira Gershwin: The Art of the Lyricist. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996. Detailed and illuminating examination of Gershwin's lyrics by an English professor. Illustrated.

Gershwin, Ira. Lyrics on Several Occasions: A Selection of Stage and Screen Lyrics Written for Sundry Situations; and Now Arranged in Arbitrary Categories. To Which Have Been Added Many Informative Annotations and Disquisitions on Their Why and Wherefore, Their Whom-For, Their How; and Matters Associative. New York: Limelight Editions, 1997. Anecdotes and witty comments from the lyricist.

Jablonski, Edward. "What About Ira?" In The Gershwin Style: New Looks at the Music of George Gershwin, edited by Wayne Schneider. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999. An engaging account of Ira's artistic life after George's death.

Jablonski, Edward, and Lawrence D. Stewart. The Gershwin Years. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1973. An informative biography of George and Ira Gershwin. Particularly valuable for numerous photographs, sketches, reproductions of manuscripts, playbills, letters, and more.

Kimball, Robert, ed. The Complete Lyrics of Ira Gershwin. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1993. A mostly chronological collection of more than seven hundred lyrics, many previously unpublished, with information about each. Includes anecdotes from Gershwin's Lyrics on Several Occasions. Illustrations.

Kimball, Robert, and Alfred Simon. The Gershwins. New York: Atheneum, 1973. A sprawling collection of lyrics, photographs, excerpts from Ira Gershwin's diary, lists of shows and songs, and lore, with an introduction by Richard Rodgers.

McClung, Bruce. Lady in the Dark: Biography of a Musical. Oxford, England: Oxford University Press, 2007. A well-researched history and analysis of the Weill musical, from conception to revivals. Bibliography, illustrations, score excerpts.

Rosenberg, Deena. Fascinating Rhythm: The Collaboration of George and Ira Gershwin. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1991. Rev. ed. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1997. Explores the brothers' working relationship and oeuvre. Includes score excerpts, photographs, bibliography, and discography.

See also: Arlen, Harold; Cohan, George M.; Fitzgerald, Ella; Gershwin, George; Kern, Jerome; Merman, Ethel; Newman, Alfred; Petty, Tom; Romberg, Sigmund; Ronstadt, Linda; Taylor, James; Tormé, Mel; Weill, Kurt.

Stan Getz

American jazz saxophonist and composer

With his signature tone quality on the tenor saxophone, Getz introduced the bossa nova craze of the early 1960's and influenced countless jazz musicians.

Born: February 2, 1927; Philadelphia, Pennsylvania
Died: June 6, 1991; Malibu, California
Also known as: Stanley Gayetzky (birth name)
Member of: Thundering Herd

Principal recordings

ALBUMS: All Star Series, 1946; The Brothers, 1949; The New Sounds, 1949; Prezervation, 1949; Quartets, 1949; Stan Getz and Tenor Sax Stars, 1949; Getz Age, 1950; Modern World, 1950; The Sounds of Stan Getz, 1950; Split Kick, 1950; Billie and Stan, 1951; Chamber Music, 1951; The Sound, 1951; Moonlight in Vermont, 1952; Stan Getz Plays, 1952; Diz and Getz, 1953 (with Dizzy Gillespie); Interpretations by the Stan Getz Quintet, Vol. 1, 1953; Interpretations by the Stan Getz Quintet, Vol. 2, 1953; Interpretations by the Stan Getz Quintet, Vol. 3, 1953; The Melodic Stan Getz, 1953; More West Coast Jazz with Stan Getz, 1953; Stan Getz '57, 1953; Stan Getz Plays Blues, 1953; Another Time, Another Place, 1954; Eloquence, 1954; Stan Getz and the Cool Sounds, 1954; For Musicians Only, 1956; Hamp and Getz, 1955 (with Lionel Hampton); Stan Getz Quintet, 1955; West Coast Jazz, 1955; The Steamer, 1956; Award Winner: Stan Getz, 1957; The Getz/J. J. Set 1957, 1957 (with J. J. Johnson); Getz Meets Mulligan in Hi-Fi, 1957 (with Gerry Mulligan); The Soft Swing, 1957; Stan Getz and Gerry Mulligan/Stan Getz and Oscar Peterson, 1957 (with Mulligan and Oscar Peterson); Stan Getz and the Oscar Peterson Trio, 1957 (with Peterson); Imported from Europe, 1958; Jazz Giants '58, 1958; Stan Getz with Cal Tjader, 1958; Stan Meets Chet, 1958 (with Chet Baker); Cool Velvet, 1960; Jazz Jamboree '60, 1960; Stan Getz at Large, Vol. 1, 1960; Stan Getz at Large, Vol. 2, 1960; Focus, 1961; Rhythms, 1961; Stan Getz and Bobby Brookmeyer, 1961; Big Band Bossa Nova, 1962; Jazz Samba, 1962 (with Charlie Byrd); Getz/Gilberto, 1963 (with João Gilberto); Jazz Samba Encore!, 1963 (with Luiz Bonfa); Reflections, 1963; Stan Getz with Guest Artist Laurindo Almeida, 1963; Chick Corea/Bill Evans Sessions, 1964 (with Chick Corea and Bill Evans); Stan Getz and Bill Evans, 1964; Look at Yesterday, 1965; Mickey One, 1965; Quartet in Paris, 1966; A Song After Sundown, 1966; Voices, 1966; What the World Needs Now: Stan Getz Plays Bacharach and David, 1966; Sweet Rain, 1967; Didn't We, 1969; Marakesh Express, 1969; Change of Scenes, 1971; Communications '72, 1971; Dynasty, 1971; Captain Marvel, 1972; But Beautiful, 1974 (with Evans); The Best of Two Worlds, 1975 (with Gilberto); The Master, 1975; The Peacocks, 1975 (with Jimmy Rowles); Affinity, 1977; Another World, 1977; Children of the World, 1978; Forest Eyes, 1979; Stan Getz, 1979; Autumn Leaves, 1980; Billy Highstreet Samba, 1981; Blue Skies, 1982; Pure Getz, 1982; Line for Lyons, 1983 (with Baker); Poetry, 1983; Voyage, 1986; The Lyrical Stan Getz, 1988; Just Friends, 1989; Soul Eyes, 1989.

The Life

Stanley Getz was born in Philadelphia. Proficient on the harmonica, string bass, and alto saxophone, he decided to pursue a jazz career, declining a bassoon scholarship to Juilliard.

By age fifteen, Getz was playing saxophone at New York City's Roseland Ballroom and touring with trombonist Jack Teagarden. After stints with Stan Kenton and Jimmy Dorsey, Getz recorded with Benny Goodman in 1945, performing his first solo. After Goodman fired him, he joined Woody Herman's band, the Thundering Herd, and he was a charter member of the famous Four Brothers saxophone section.

Getz moved to California, formed his own quintet, and released the successful Moonlight in Vermont. During the 1950's he recorded with jazz luminaries Chet Baker, Dizzy Gillespie, Count Basie, and Lionel Hampton. Getz spent the end of the decade in Denmark. In 1961 he collaborated with guitarist Charlie Byrd on Jazz Samba and with João Gilberto and Astrud Gilberto on Getz/Gilberto, a Grammy Award winner.

During the 1970's Getz joined the jazz fusion movement, but he returned to his traditional bop roots. The 1980's, in part, were spent as an artist-in-residence at Stanford University while he continued to record. In 1988 he was stricken with liver cancer and suffered a hemorrhage. Getz died in June, 1991, at his home in Malibu, California.

The Music

Like many renowned jazz musicians, Getz had a distinctive sound, flawless rhythm and technique, and creativity. From the 1940's through the 1980's, Getz crafted his style on the tenor saxophone with the utmost care. Like many of his jazz compatriots, he was trained in the ballroom dance bands and progressed to sharing the stages and recording studios with jazz giants. The instant popularity of bossa nova propelled him to new heights and opened up opportunities for further musical exploration with voices, string orchestras, and electric-fusion jazz. Later in life, Getz regretted that he had never formally studied the arts of orchestration and composition. Consequently, he worked with composers who knew how he played and could arrange or write music to fit his needs and style. Getz usually studied the prepared score, then he proceeded to play strictly by ear.

Stan Getz. (AP/Wide World Photos)

"Early Autumn." It was during his time with Herman's band, the Thundering Herd, that Getz launched his solo career and developed his unmistakable tone. He joined the second edition of the Thundering Herd in 1947 as a member of the Four Brothers, along with Serge Chaloff, Zoot Sims, and Herbie Steward. This saxophone section—consisting of three tenor and one baritone—created a sound quite different from the standard two alto, two tenor, and one baritone saxophone configuration of most big bands. Besides the namesake arrangement titled "Four Brothers," the band had a certified hit with "Early Autumn." Getz demonstrated an incomparable ability to romanticize a melody with his lyrical and mellow tone. His solo on "Early Autumn" established Getz as rising star.

Moonlight in Vermont. When Getz left Herman's orchestra, he moved to New York and formed his own quartet. Guitarist Johnny Smith invited him to a session for a quintet recording on the Roost label, released as Moonlight in Vermont. The title-track version of the well-known standard sold not only to jazz aficionados but also to the general public. It was voted Jazz Record of the Year by Down Beat magazine. With Smith's simple and supportive chordal guitar and his masterful arrangements, Getz's solos were at times technically incredible and at other times wispy and refined. The quality of performance is even more remarkable considering that Getz was addicted to heroin at the time.

Focus and Jazz Samba. Getz's recordings during the 1950's were a mixture of various-size groups, and they included such artists as Gillespie, Horace Silver, Oscar Peterson, and others. Although he was well known and admired, Getz had not yet distinguished himself as an innovator. After he returned from Europe to America in 1961, he recorded the remarkable album Focus with strings. Focus allowed Getz to improvise over the richly orchestrated string arrangements of Eddie Sauter. The result was sensational. The next year, Getz and guitarist Charlie Byrd recorded the bossa nova-inspired Jazz Samba. The album included "Desafinado," which won the Grammy Award for Best Jazz Performance. It was the first jazz album to attain a number-one ranking on the pop charts.

Getz/Gilberto. "The Girl from Ipanema," from the album Getz/Gilberto, stayed ninety-six weeks on the charts, with the song and the album winning Grammy Awards. The union of Brazilian samba and American jazz catapulted Getz into the limelight, much to the delight of Verve Records. Bossa nova, like cool jazz, was a blend of colorful timbres, restrained techniques, and mellow tone qualities—with a Brazilian beat. The collaboration of Gilberto and Getz was a great success, both commercially and artistically.

Musical Legacy

As a boy, Getz practiced eight hours a day for two years in order to fulfill his dream of becoming a jazz saxophonist. He became a major figure in the cool jazz era of the 1950's, and he popularized bossa nova-Brazilian jazz in the early 1960's. His lush and romantic tone occupies a singular place in jazz history. Others have tried, without success, to imitate his tone. Unfortunately, his lifelong battle with alcohol and heroin cut his career short. The Berklee School of Music in Boston honors Getz's legacy by housing the Stan Getz Media Center and Library, made possible by a donation from the Herb Alpert Foundation. Eight thousand compact discs, tapes, laser discs, and CD-ROMS are stored there.

Douglas D. Skinner

Further Reading

Budds, Michael J. Jazz in the Sixties: The Expansion of Musical Resources and Techniques. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, 1978. Provides insights into Getz and the jazz samba movement, with information specific to the 1960's.

Churchill, Nicholas. Stan Getz: An Annotated Bibliography and Filmography, with Song and Session Information for Albums. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland Books, 2005. A bibliography with more than two thousand citations, some annotated. Periodicals, articles, dissertations, films, Web sites, and more are included.

Gelly, Dave, and Stan Getz. Stan Getz: Nobody Else But Me. Milwaukee, Wis.: Backbeat Books, 2002. Getz's autobiography provides insights into his improvisational style, his unique tone, his substance abuse, and his criminal acts.

Maggin, Donald L. Stan Getz: A Life in Jazz. New York: HarperCollins, 1997. Biography with emphasis on Getz's addictions to heroin and alcohol as well as details on his musical career.

Ostransky, Leroy. Understanding Jazz. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1977. Ostransky, a jazz educator, presents an overview of jazz history to the 1970's. Includes several references to Getz.

Wein, George. Myself Among Others: A Life in Music. New York: Da Capo Press, 2003. Wein led an active life as a club owner and promoter, and he maintained a close relationship with many jazz artists. His reflections on Getz are included.

See also: Alpert, Herb; Bacharach, Burt; Burton, Gary; Corea, Chick; Davis, Miles; Gilberto, João; Gillespie, Dizzy; Hampton, Lionel; Iglesias, Julio; Jobim, Antônio Carlos; Legrand, Michel; Peterson, Oscar; Young, Lester.

Barry, Maurice, and Robin Gibb

English rock and rhythm-and-blues singers, songwriters, and guitarists

Winners of multiple Grammy Awards, the Bee Gees—brothers Barry, Maurice, and Robin Gibb—were successful as a soft-rock act in the late 1960's and early 1970's and as leading superstars of the disco-music era in the late 1970's.

Barry Gibb

Born: September 1, 1946; Isle of Man, England
Also known as: Barry Allan Crompton Gibb (full name)

Maurice Gibb

Born: December 22, 1949; Isle of Man, England
Died: January 12, 2003; Miami, Florida
Also known as: Maurice Ernest Gibb (full name)

Robin Gibb

Born: December 22, 1949; Isle of Man, England
Also known as: Robin Hugh Gibb (full name)
Members of: The Bee Gees

Principal recordings

ALBUMS (as the Bee Gees): Bee Gees Sing and Play Fourteen Barry Gibb Songs, 1965; Spicks and Specks, 1966; Bee Gees 1st, 1967; Horizontal, 1968; Idea, 1968; Odessa, 1969; Cucumber Castle, 1970; Trafalgar, 1971; Two Years On, 1971; To Whom It May Concern, 1972; Life in a Tin Can, 1973; Mr. Natural, 1974; Main Course, 1975; Children of the World, 1976; Saturday Night Fever: Original Soundtrack, 1977 (with others); Spirits Having Flown, 1979; Living Eyes, 1981; E. S. P., 1987; One, 1989; High Civilization, 1991; Size Isn't Everything, 1993; Still Waters, 1997; This Is Where I Came In, 2001.

ALBUMS (Barry, solo): Now, Voyager, 1984; Shine, Shine, 1984.

ALBUMS (Robin, solo): Robin's Reign, 1970; How Old Are You?, 1983; Secret Agent, 1984; Walls Have Eyes, 1985; Magnet, 2003; My Favourite Carols, 2006.

The Lives

Barry Allan Crompton Gibb, born on September 1, 1946, and his fraternal twin brothers Robin Hugh Gibb and Maurice Ernest Gibb, born on December 22, 1949, were three of five children of Hugh Gibb, a bandleader, and Barbara Gibb, a singer. The three Gibb brothers made their first performances at local film theaters in Manchester in 1955, singing between shows. They performed under an assortment of names, including the Blue Cats and the Rattlesnakes.

In 1958 the family moved to Brisbane, Australia. The trio, known as the Brothers Gibb, continued performing at talent shows, and they caught the attention of a local deejay, Bill Gates. They ultimately got their own local television show in Brisbane, and they took the name the Bee Gees (for Brothers Gibb). They secured their first recording contract in 1962 with the Festival Records label in Australia. They were incredibly popular, in the press and on television, and they performed to enthusiastic audiences.

By late 1966, they had made a decision to abandon the Australian music world and return to England, which had launched the British Invasion. During their trip back to England, the Gibbs learned that the Bee Gees had at last topped the charts back in Australia with their final release, Spicks and Specks. The group had forwarded demo recordings ahead of time to England, and Spicks and Specks had attracted the notice of producer Robert Stigwood. Stigwood signed the trio to a five-year contract upon their arrival.

In 1969 the trio got into a disagreement over a double album called Odessa. Since the brothers could not agree on which song was to be the single, Robin decided to leave the group. Even Barry and Maurice parted company for a while. In 1970 they resolved their differences and re-formed the group.

In 1977 the group was contacted about contributing to the sound track of a film entitled Saturday Night Fever. Their featured songs—"Stayin' Alive," "How Deep Is Your Love," and "Night Fever"—became number-one hits, and the album stayed in the top spot for twenty-four weeks, while the film broke existing box-office records. A fourth Gibb brother, Andy, also had enormous chart success during this same period as a solo singer.

By the end of the 1970's, however, disco had fallen out of favor. The Bee Gees experienced a backlash for their domination of the airwaves, with mass burnings of Bee Gees posters and albums at public forums sponsored by radio deejays. Some radio stations did not play new releases by the group after 1979. The Bee Gees participated (at Stigwood's persistence) in the film Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band (1978), loosely inspired by the Beatles' album and songs. The film was a box-office and critical failure.

Due to their association with the disco era, the successes and opportunities they found in the 1960's and 1970's eluded them in the 1980's. Barry worked as a producer creating hits for artists such as Barbra Streisand and Diana Ross. Even though the older Gibb brothers had struggled with the abuse of alcohol and drugs, the youngest sibling, Andy, died in 1988, five days after his thirtieth birthday, from heart condition complications created by the use of cocaine.

Robin, Barry, and Maurice Gibb (from left). (AP/Wide World Photos)

The Bee Gees stayed active in the music industry until the untimely death of Maurice in January, 2003. While getting treatment for an intestinal blockage, he suffered cardiac arrest and died at the age of fifty-three. After his death, Robin and Barry chose to stop performing as the Bee Gees.

The Music

The Bee Gees' records are widely recognized for their gorgeous melodies, tight three-part harmonies, and lush orchestral arrangements (contributed by conductor Bill Shepherd). The lyrics of these songs are romantic yet complex, with a melancholy tinge. Barry and Robin took turns singing lead vocals, harmonizing together and with Maurice. Barry played rhythm guitar, while Maurice, along with singing background vocals, played bass, piano, organ, Mellotron, and other instruments.

In the late 1960's, the Bee Gees began to deconstruct elements in the singing and harmonies of black American music and to rebuild them in their style. After getting back together in the early 1970's, their relationship improved, and they evolved musically out of pop-psychedelia and into pop-progressive rock. In their disco years, the Bee Gees began to use falsetto in their songs. By 1977 the Bee Gees were heard on black radio stations that were usually reluctant to play any white acts. The group managed to merge all their influences—from the Mills Brothers to the Beatles and early 1970's soul—into their signature sound.

"To Love Somebody." "To Love Somebody" is the second single released by the Bee Gees in 1967 from their album Bee Gees 1st. The song was originally written by Barry and Robin for soul legend Otis Redding, but the singer died in a plane crash before he could record the song. The Bee Gees decided to record their own version of the song, with Barry taking the lead vocals. It has become one of the most famous Gibb compositions. "To Love Somebody" is a soulful ballad in the style of 1960's rhythm-and-blues and soul groups such as Sam and Dave. The song follows the typical late 1960's soft-rock style, with opulent orchestral arrangements featuring prominent solos by the violin, harp, trumpet, and flute. This soul standard has been covered by many artists, including Nina Simone, Janis Joplin, and Michael Bolton.

